The moon, which was only a few days past the full, rose majestically from the eastern horizon, and, in a short time, attained to such an altitude that our friends were able to see her silvery face above the tree tops.

The light she shed was clear and beautiful, and once more the form of Claude Duval became revealed to their eager gaze.

Motionless and deathlike he lay, however, as the cold moonbeams poured their lustre upon him.

As they gazed, strange thoughts of the stories they had heard flitted across the minds of the two highwaymen.

They recollected the prevalent and apparently well-authenticated superstitions of the vampire, and the lifeless looking form of Claude Duval, with the pale moonbeams flooding it, was well calculated to recall such a superstition to their recollection.

They had both heard how the dead body of a vampire, should it be exposed to the moonbeams, became restored to a horrible and loathsome vitality; and, as they gazed upon Claude's pallid countenance, they wondered whether the moon's light really did possess resuscitative powers.

Neither spoke, but the same thoughts occupied their minds.

Suddenly both started.

They had observed Claude make a slight movement.

Ashamed of the superstitious ideas which they had permitted to run riot in their brains, they turned round and watched eagerly for some other signs of his awaking.

They soon came.

The effects of the liquid which had been administered to him were rapidly passing away.

Claude's whole frame trembled, and his eyelids fluttered.

At length, with a deep sigh, he awoke.

He started at once into a sitting posture, and looked about him like one bewildered to think where he was.

That feeling, however, immediately subsided when he caught sight of the forms of his old comrade bending over him.

They spoke.

"Lie down again, Claude," they said. "Lie down again for a moment, and collect your thoughts. All is well; we are with you."

Claude laid down again as his companions had requested, and, closing his eyes, endeavoured to collect his scattered thoughts.

For a moment or two he was unable to do this, but, with a rush, a full remembrance of the past came upon him.

In a rather faint tone of voice, he said—

"I have been wounded."

"We know that well enough," replied Sixteen-String Jack, in a cheerful voice; "but your hurt was a slight one, and, by this time, you will perhaps feel little of it."

These words encouraged Claude, and made him feel much better.

With comparative ease he raised himself to a sitting posture, and then became immediately curious to know what had befallen him since he had received his wound.

Mutual explanations rapidly followed, but we need not trouble the reader with a detail of them, since every incident has been related.

When they had come to an understanding with each other, Tom and Jack expressed their wish to return to Enfield Chase with as little delay as possible, because of the anxiety which Dick Turpin would experience.

Claude was equally desirous to return, and declared that he could feel himself grow stronger every moment.

If this really was the case, and he did not allow his fancy to deceive him, the draught administered by the gipsy must have been a potent and invaluable restorative.

Claude, indeed, was willing to start at once, but his two comrades urged him to remain a little longer where he was, in order to recover himself as thoroughly as possible.

CHAPTER CCCLXXXVI.

CLAUDE DUVAL, TOM KING, AND SIXTEEN-STRING JACK REACH ENFIELD CHASE IN SAFETY, AND DICK TURPIN HAS A SLIGHT ALARM.

Half-an-hour quickly passed away in pleasant conversation upon the events that had recently taken place, and, at the end of that time, Claude Duval expressed his impatience to commence the journey.

It is quite certain, however, that his recovery from what looked so much like certain death, was little less than miraculous, and so his friends considered it.

As for Claude himself, of course he had no due appreciation of the amount of danger through which he had passed, and, finding himself tolerably well, he immensely overrated his strength.

This is nothing to be surprised at, since those who have been sick almost invariably do so.

He would have mounted his horse and set off at a trot, but his two comrades had too great an amount of prudence to permit him to do any such thing.

They assisted him into the saddle, however, for he would insist that he was strong enough to ride.

Tom and Jack determined on no account to go any faster than at a walking pace.

This they doubted not he would be able to accomplish, for it could scarcely be said to fatigue anyone.

Having seen him properly seated in the saddle, his two companions mounted their horses, and the little party at once emerged from the wood.

The moon was shining with extraordinary brightness in a sky which was not even speckled by a single cloud.

Although her light had been so useful to them such a short time ago, they would now willingly enough have dispensed with it altogether.

This, however, they were unable to do.

Tom and Jack both judged it expedient not to approach the road upon which they had discovered the body of Claude, for fear suspicion should be attached to them.

Accordingly, after having carefully noted their position, they made their way in almost a straight line for their destination.

The only times when they deviated from a direct course was when they encountered some insurmountable obstacle which compelled them to do so.

This was a kind of travelling with which our friends were familiar, and, in spite of occasional detours, they lost very little ground indeed.

The pace at which they went, however, was one that took them a long while to go a short distance, but they soon perceived how wisely they had acted in adopting it, or their wounded comrade would have been completely overcome.

He found his strength had rapidly evaporated, and it now required him to make continual efforts to retain an upright position on the back of his steed.

Tom King and Sixteen-String Jack noticed this, but said nothing.

Efficacious in such cases as the gipsy's cordial unquestionably was, still it was hardly to be supposed that it would supply the place of the immense quantity of blood which Claude Duval had lost.

Nevertheless, its effects were wonderful, or he would never have been able to travel in the manner he had.

At length, to the satisfaction of all three, Enfield Chase appeared in the distance.

Its immense size, and the circumstances from portions of it being at a considerable elevation above the surrounding country, made it a conspicuous object for many miles.

The bright moonbeams on that night made it visible at a great distance.

The sight of his destination seemed to have a strengthening and invigorating effect on Claude Duval, and he sat more erectly in the saddle.

Right glad would he be when the journey was over.

As, however, the chase, although in sight, was still a long way off, and as they would, on account of the slowness of their progress, be a long time in reaching it, they propose a halt, to which Claude only assented with great reluctance.

Happening to be in a very lonely and unfrequented part of the country, Tom and Jack felt there would be little risk in halting for some time.

Not only would Claude regain fresh strength by the rest, but they should still have ample time to reach the appointed spot before daybreak.

The place they had chosen for their halt was far away from any public road or private footpath, and they seated themselves and tethered their horses in the deep shadow of a hedgerow.

Here they had little fear of being seen.

Sixteen-String Jack produced a flask of spirits, of which he compelled Claude to partake very sparingly.

The small quantity he drank acted upon his body as a stimulant, and endowed him with fictitious vigour.

Still, he did not drink enough to produce any ill effect.

Their halt was a short one, but this was principally upon Claude's account, who manifested extreme impatience to recommence his journey.

Once again, then, in compliance with his urgent wishes, the trio mounted their steeds and set out towards the chase.

It was encouraging for them to be able thus to see the termination of their journey.

Much time was occupied in speculation as to the effect which their long absence would be likely to have upon Dick Turpin.

All hoped that he had not been tempted to set out in search of them.

As the three highwaymen are not likely to meet with any interruption or further incident during the remainder of their journey, we will leave them slowly approaching the chase, and occupy ourselves in relating the proceedings of Dick Turpin.

In a former chapter we have described how, after their perilous adventure with the serpent in the cavern, Maud and our hero had made their way to the spot which had been appointed for a meeting place.

Here they watched the faint light of the new day gently steal through the trees, and gradually bringing all things into view; but, though they listened intently, and waited patiently, they could not hear anything to indicate the approach of the three highwaymen.

The extent of Dick's anxiety upon their account can be imagined; but, when the sun rose, and the day fairly passed away without the least symptoms of their return, he was in a state of mind bordering on distraction.

Although he did not for a moment think that his three comrades would venture to approach or enter the chase during daylight, yet Maud could not induce him to quit the spot upon which he knew they would first appear.

During the whole day he manifested his agitation by pacing the green sward, with rapid and unequal strides.

At length, to his relief, the sun set, though his impatience had made him think that that event would never come to pass.

Never had a day appeared of such tremendous length.

As the sun declined behind the bank of clouds on the western horizon, and the faint twilight crept over the scene, Dick's impatience, so far from abating, increased.

Nothing but the fact of Maud's presence in the chase, and the impossibility either of leaving her in it or taking her with him, would have had the effect of causing Dick to remain in the same spot all day like he did.

Indeed, now, the impulse to mount his bonny mare, and sally forth in quest of his absent comrades, was so strong as almost to be irresistible.

He, however, possessed sufficient strength to struggle with, if he did not overcome, the feeling.

Maud's anxiety was scarcely less than Dick's, and most fervently did she hope that the three highwaymen would rapidly return.

Her left hand was resting lightly on Dick's arm, and both had their attention fixed and their countenances turned in the direction in which they expected them to come.

Every moment Dick grew less and less able to control himself.

The twilight passed away, and was succeeded by the darkness of night.

Still no signs of his comrades.

Somehow the idea had taken hold of his mind, almost from the first, that they had fallen into the hands of the police.

Perhaps, at that very moment, when he stood there so vainly watching and waiting for them, they were all three confined in some place of strength and security.

This was a reflection that maddened him, and, the more he pondered over the idea, the more convinced he became that it must be the actual state of affairs.

He was well aware that, if they had all three been taken prisoners, they would have had neither the means nor the opportunity of communicating that unpleasant fact to him. All, then, was uncertainty and doubt.

Suddenly he felt Maud's hold upon his arm increase to a degree of tightness almost painful, while she clung close to him, convulsively.

Surprised at this incident, he forgot for the moment the harassing thoughts which had so long held possession of his mind, and questioned her eagerly as to the cause of the alarm she exhibited.

Instead of replying to his question, however, Maud only clung still closer to him, and implored him, with the greatest anxiousness, to be silent.

He looked around, as well as the dim light would permit him, but no alarming object met his view.

"Speak, Maud," he said. "Speak. Tell me at once, I implore you, the cause of this alarm."

"Hush! hush!" replied Maud, in accents of the utmost terror, but in a voice so faint that it could not have reached any other ears than those for which it was intended. "Hush! hush! Do not speak so loud."

"Tell me, then, the meaning of this sudden alarm," said Dick, who sank his voice until it became a faint whisper.

"Tell me. It may be of the utmost importance."

"I fear we are observed," said Maud, glancing around her in extreme terror, as though she every moment expected her eye to rest upon some terrible object.

Dick started.

Her alarm was too great for it to be unreal.

Like a flash of light he drew his sword, and stood upon the defensive, with his arm encircling Maud's waist.

"You fear we are observed?" he said, repeating her words. What grounds have you for such a dread? In this place we are alone."

"No—no," said Maud, in the same low, whispering tones; "we are not alone."

"Are you sure of that?"

"I thought"——

"What, dearest? Tell me, I pray you. Keep me no longer in this dreadful state of suspense."

"I thought I heard a faint rustling among the bushes."

"What, again?"

"Yes, again; and the sound was precisely similar to that which I heard this morning."

"Ah! say you so?"

"Yes."

"You describe it then as though some one was endeavouring to creep through bushes as silently as possible."

"Yes—yes; that is the sound."

"And you have heard it again?"

"Yes—yes."

"When?"

"This moment; when I pressed your arm."

"Indeed!" said Dick, and, as he spoke, he looked around him as well as the dim light enabled him.

But he could see nothing and hear nothing save the murmuring sound which is always audible where trees grow together in large quantities.

"This is most serious," he added. "Are you quite sure you were not mistaken?"

"Quite."

"But I heard nothing."

"Nor did you this morning."

"I know I did not."

"That, then, is because, perhaps, your faculties are so absorbed by thinking of your comrades."

"Perhaps so. But this matter is serious in the extreme; and you must give me all the information in your power. Be under no apprehension, however. I am with you; and let the danger be what it may, all will be well."

"For me, perhaps, but not for you; and it is on account of your safety that I feel alarm, and not on my own."

Dick pressed her still closer to him, as he said—

"But this sound which you have heard, and which has caused you so much alarm? Tell me all respecting it, for I can assure you I heard nothing."

"I did, and I am sure I am not mistaken. It was as though some person was endeavouring to crawl through the underwood without his progress being heard."

Dick's face became more anxious.

"When I heard the sound," continued Maud, "I grasped you by the arm, and no sooner had I done so, than"——

"What—what? Oh! what!"

"I distinctly saw some dark object move."

"Where?—where?"

"Yonder, among those bushes."

Dick looked in the direction in which she pointed, but could see nothing.

"The object I saw is no longer there," said Maud.

"What was it like?"

"It was gone too soon for me to be able to say for certain, but I thought it was like the head of a man."

"Release me a moment," said Dick. "This must be looked into."

As he spoke these words, he somewhat rudely disengaged himself from the hold which Maud kept upon him.

Sword in hand, he dashed among the bushes which grew where Maud had pointed.

With a faint scream she darted after him, for she feared he would receive some injury.

Dick laid about him most vigorously with his sword, and plunged it into every bush, but without encountering any obstacle.

He continued his exertions in spite of Maud's entreaties, until he had searched all around him for a considerable distance.

He met with nothing to reward him for his trouble, and at length he ceased his fruitless search.

He could not help feeling somewhat alarmed at what Maud had told him.

He feared some of his foes were upon his track, and taking steps to encompass his destruction.

He would have been much better pleased if he could have fallen across some animal which would have caused Maud's alarm, but his being unable to find anything filled him with uneasiness and made him dread the worst.

Over and over again he questioned his fair companion, but he was still unable to come to any conclusion.

He resolved to be more attentive, and to keep his ears open to catch the slightest sound.

It was not long before he heard a slight noise, which each moment increased in loudness.

"That is not the same sound as I heard before," said Maud.

As she spoke, Dick's practised ear told him that the noise he heard was caused by horses' feet.

He grasped his sword tightly by the hilt, and held Maud in such a position that he should be able to defend her should an encounter take place.

On came the horsemen—nearer and nearer, until at length three mounted horsemen presented themselves before him.

CHAPTER CCCLXXXVII.

DICK TURPIN AND HIS TWO COMRADES HAVE A CONVERSATION UPON A SUBJECT OF GREAT IMPORTANCE.

So entirely was Dick Turpin's attention occupied by this fresh incident, that for the time being he became quite oblivious of the fact that the reason he was waiting there was that he was in expectation of the return of his comrades.

As the reader has no doubt surmised, the three horsemen, who so suddenly made their appearance, were no other than our old acquaintances, Tom King, Claude Duval, and Sixteen-String Jack.

Dick Turpin, when he heard them coming, connected the sound which they made in their approach with the cause of Maud's alarm, and the attitude in which they found him was a very hostile and threatening one.

His comrades looked all the surprise they felt, but Dick, perceiving in a moment the mistake he had made, flung down his sword, and, springing forward, greeted them warmly.

He overwhelmed them with questions as to the cause of their late appearance, but Tom, bidding him be patient, said he would relate all at the first opportunity.

So saying, he and Sixteen-String Jack sprang nimbly off their steeds, and then going towards Claude Duval, assisted him to alight.

This was the first intimation Turpin had that his comrade had met with a misfortune, and again he addressed a dozen eager questions, but all the information he could gather was that Claude had been wounded.

The remainder of the journey of the three highwaymen to the chase after we last saw them was, as we had anticipated, performed without the occurrence of any particular incident, and without their encountering a single human being.

At times a dreadful sensation of weakness and exhaustion would come over Claude, but on each occasion he rallied his failing energies by the thought that he had now only a short distance to go.

As we have seen, he gained the chase in safety.

Tom King took charge of the horses, and led them off by the bridle, while Sixteen-String Jack supported the steps of Claude Duval.

Dick Turpin and Maud brought up the rear.

The dawn of the new day was not far distant, and they debated whether they should enter the cavern or remain in the open air.

Dick, who knew the disagreeable sight which would be presented to them when they entered it, briefly described his adventure and encounter with the serpent.

The information that the cavern was frequented by such creatures was received by the three highwaymen with anything but pleasurable emotions.

It was only reasonable to suppose that where one had been seen there were others not very far distant.

Such companions as these they had a decided objection to, and they already exhibited a reluctance to re-enter the cavern.

Their unwillingness, however, was overruled by Claude Duval, who complained that his limbs were cramped with cold, and that he must have a fire to warm himself.

This decided the matter at once, and, overcoming their very natural repugnance, they bent their steps in the direction of the entrance.

At a word, however, from Dick Turpin, Tom King, having disposed of the horses, made his way into the cavern first, in order to remove, as well as he could, the disagreeable evidences which remained there of the creature's presence.

Dick and Maud held back until informed by Tom that all was ready, and that they might enter.

It was no wonder Claude complained of the cold.

He was in a condition now to be more than usually susceptible of its effects.

A keen east wind swept through the forest, and that dampness which always prevails soon after daybreak seemed to increase its chilliness.

As the wind blew upon them, it seemed to be laden with minute aqueous particles, of icy coldness.

The whole of the party, then, having been for some time subjected to it, felt the shelter of the cave to be very welcome and desirable.

Of course, the fire which Dick had left burning so many hours ago was extinct, and all traces of its warmth had dissipated; but Tom King had already heaped another pile of fuel on the hearthstone and ignited it.

Little more than smoke proceeded from it at present, but that state of things would soon be altered.

Claude Duval, who, now that all excitement was over, felt his weakness momentarily increase, was temporarily placed by Sixteen-String Jack upon a rude bench.

Leaving his side, he made his way to one of the inner chambers, and quickly returned with as many of the deer-skins as he could carry.

These he laid smoothly upon the floor of the cavern, near the fire, in such a manner as to form a comfortable-enough couch.

Upon this Claude was placed.

By the time this was done, the fire had begun to burn up and to diffuse a cheerful light and warmth around it.

The excitement of their meeting having now subsided, the cravings of nature began to make themselves felt.

All were hungry, but they were not at first able to see how their appetites should be appeased.

There was nothing whatever in the cave of an eatable character, so an excursion into the chase was imperative.

The matter was finally adjusted in this manner.

Claude Duval, whose weakness proceeded in a great measure from hunger, was clearly not competent to accompany them; so he was left upon his couch of deer-skins by the fireside.

Maud was to remain with him, and replenish the fire when requisite.

Dick Turpin, Tom King, and Sixteen-String Jack equipped themselves for a hunting expedition, and set forth in order to obtain something comestible which would serve them for a breakfast.

There was little fear that they would be any longer away than they were compelled, for they were almost famished.

Then they would not be likely to be detained in consequence of the scarcity of game.

Indeed it was more than probable that they would be able to obtain what they required immediately upon gaining the entrance of the cavern.

Such, however, on the present occasion was destined not to be the case.

Maud showed great unwillingness to part with Dick, but the thought that he was not going far away, and would not be absent long, somewhat reconciled her to it.

Upon entering the chase, after having carefully concealed the entrance to the cave, Dick Turpin demanded from his two comrades a full account of all that happened since they last parted with each other.

This they were well able to do: and as Claude had told them all that happened to himself, they were in a position to present Dick with a tolerably well-connected account of all that had taken place.

With all this the reader is acquainted.

It was not, however, until this relation was fairly over that they thought in good earnest of the errand upon which they had been sent, and they now began to look about them for game of some description.

There was a considerable risk in firing a pistol, as they well knew, but there was no hope of their being able to avoid doing so.

In trampling through the bushes, a large deer suddenly started up, and set off at full speed.

Two young fawns were with her, and hastily aiming at one, Dick fired.

The shot was a true one.

The bullet did its work, and the pretty, innocent looking creature, which it really seemed an act of cruelty to slay, rolled over and over upon the turf, mortally hurt.

The mother of the fawn, perceiving what had taken place, stopped suddenly short in her course and bounded to its side.

The speedy approach of our three friends, however, startled it away.

This was a lucky shot, and the purpose with which they set out having been fully accomplished by it, Tom King slung the little creature over his shoulder, and they bent their steps towards the cavern, from which, while so occupied with conversation, they had strayed much further than they were aware of.

The fawn was now quite dead, and as it was a very young one its weight was inconsiderable, and Tom carried it with ease.

On their way back Dick spoke in a rather serious tone of voice to his comrades.

It was unlike the mode in which he generally addressed them, and in consequence it commanded their instant attention.

"My friends," said Turpin, "during your absence something has occurred with which it is necessary that you should be made acquainted, and when I have told you what this is, I shall expect to receive your advice upon the matter."

This commencement filled his two comrades with curiosity, and they impatiently requested him to begin.

"It may be," continued Dick, "that this may turn out to be an unimportant affair, but there is doubt in it, and where there is doubt with us there is danger."

His companions assented.

"Early yesterday morning, after the adventure with the serpent in the cavern, which I have already related to you, Maud and myself made our way towards the spot at which I expected you to arrive. Just as we reached it, Maud started suddenly, and asked me whether I had heard anything? I replied in the negative, and at the same time inquired what kind of sound she had heard? She described it as though some persons were creeping through the bushes, and endeavouring to do so without being heard."

Tom and Jack both started.

The matter was more serious than they had imagined.

Dick continued to speak with great rapidity.

"Knowing how much she had been alarmed such a short time before, I fancied she must have deceived herself as to the character of the sound, which probably was one common to the forest. Under this impression I soothed her as well as I could, and, having succeeded in calming her apprehension, I thought no more about the matter. Just before your arrival, however, and while we were standing almost on the same spot, I felt Maud suddenly clinging to my arm with great violence, turning towards her, I found her whole countenance exhibiting the utmost terror. Upon inquiring what had alarmed her, she informed me that she had been startled by a repetition of the sound she had previously heard, and, in addition, she had seen some dark object among the bushes move suddenly, which she fancied was the form of a man This was sufficient to alarm me I could not believe that she had been twice led into the same error. At my request, she pointed out the particular spot from which the sound had appeared to come, and where she had seen the figure move. Sword in hand, I rushed in that direction, and searched the underwood narrowly around. I could, however, find nothing. Just then I heard you approaching. It was only natural that I should connect this sound with what had so recently taken place, and this will account for the attitude in which, to your surprise, no doubt you found me."

This communication, which Dick thus made to them, was of so important a character, that they forebore to interrupt him, but listened with the utmost attention to all he had to say.

When he had finished, Tom King said—

"This is, indeed, a strange affair, and my heart misgives me much respecting it."

"What do you think, then?" asked Dick.

"I dread the worst."

"So do I," coincided Sixteen-String Jack.

"It seems, then, that we are unanimous," said Turpin.

"You may depend," said Tom King, "that in some mysterious way or other our place of retreat has been discovered. Maud, no doubt, is right; and what she heard was some spy stealing cautiously through the bushes, and endeavouring to hear your conversation."

"If such is the case," said Turpin, "and I fear what you say is only too correct, the sooner we leave this place the better it will be for us."

"I do not quite agree with you," said Sixteen-String Jack.

"Why not?"

"Because you have nothing like proof that all this is correct. The sounds Maud has doubtless heard might easily have been produced by some harmless denizen of the chase, and it would be vexatious if we were driven from a secure retreat by the mere shadow of danger."

"You are right, Jack; but what do you propose should be done?"

"In the first place, that we lose no time in returning to the cavern; and, in the second, that we take no active steps in the matter until we receive some more definitive intelligence than we are in possession of. We can be vigilant. The apprehended danger may pass away, but let things be how they may, we cannot improve our position by leaving the chase."

CHAPTER CCCLXXXVIII.

TOM KING DETECTS THE SPY, AND DICK TURPIN COMMANDS HIS IMMEDIATE EXECUTION.

THE view which Sixteen-String Jack had taken of this rather puzzling question was a common one, and the conclusions to which he came were of such a rational character that they at once convinced his two auditors that nothing better could be done at present than to use extra vigilance, and be guided entirely by what events happened in the future.

Having come to this determination, the hearts of all three became lighter, and they made their way back to the cavern as rapidly as they could.

Upon their arrival, they found Claude Duval and Maud anxiously awaiting their return.

In the best manner they could the fawn was dressed and cooked, and in a short time they had quite a tempting meal before them.

Not in the length and breadth of all England could five persons be found who sat down to a meal with a keener relish.

While it was discussed not a word was said respecting their late conversation.

There was nothing better than water to wash down the delicious viand, but of this there was plenty of excellent quality.

This was an inconvenience which they could easily put up with.

The effect of this meal upon Claude was really astounding, and it was now the extraordinary virtues of the medicine that he had taken began to manifest themselves.

He grew rapidly stronger, until at length, when the meal was concluded, he declared that he had never felt better in his life.

His comrades advised him, however, not to try his strength too far.

He, however, laughed at their caution, and stated that he felt nothing but a slight soreness from his wound.

Lightly and cheerfully they talked about their past and future dangers, and, for a time, all was merriment.

It was destined to be of short duration.

A sharp, crackling noise, which was heard plainly above other sounds, startled them all.

Tom King was the first to spring to his feet.

He drew his sword.

His actions were rapidly imitated by his companions, upon whose faces wonderment was most visibly impressed.

The sound which startled them evidently came from the passage which led from the cavern into the open air.

"I know the meaning of that sound," said Tom King, speaking rapidly; "our worst suspicions are confirmed. Some one has entered the passage. I am sure of it, because I took the precaution when we came in just now to place several dry twigs just inside the entrance to the passage. Some one has trodden upon them. That is the explanation of the sounds we have heard."

These words produced an electrical effect.

No sooner had he spoken than Tom King, with the velocity of an arrow, rushed down the passage.

His companions were close behind him.

In his excitement, Claude Duval forgot all about his having received a wound.

Upon reaching the end of the passage, there appeared every confirmation of the truth of what Tom King had said.

When, a short time before, they had passed through the secret opening in the rocks, Tom had handed the fawn to Dick, while he replaced the bush in its proper position.

It was while doing this that the thought occurred to him that he might as well adopt some simple means which would inform them at once if any other person attempted to enter the cavern.

For this purpose he had, as he had hastily stated, placed several dry twigs just within the passage, in such a position that one of them could not fail to be trodden upon, the immediate result of which would be a snap of sufficient loudness to reach his ears.

This had evidently happened, and he had reason to congratulate himself upon his forethought in putting such a scheme into execution.

Upon reaching the end of the passage, instead of things presenting the same appearance as they did when he left them, the bush was found drawn away and trampled upon the ground.

Not heeding this, the highwaymen gave one bound and were in the open air.

The first thing that struck their notice was a rustling sound, and a commotion among the bushes at a little distance.

They rushed in that direction, but, before they could reach the spot, they saw a man spring to his feet and run rapidly across the chase.

They commenced a pursuit immediately; and how it would have terminated would have been hard to tell, had not the flying man, in his blind speed, caught his foot against the root of a tree, which projected rather above the ground.

The result of this was that he measured his full length upon the turf, and, before he could regain his feet, the highwaymen were upon him.

All three seized him, and compelled him to rise.

The man trembled in every limb.

Our friends looked at him with curiosity.

He was dressed in a very ragged suit of clothes, but there were several things connected with them which at once convinced the highwaymen that they were merely donned for the purposes of disguise.

This man had evidently been set by some one as a spy upon their actions, but he had incautiously betrayed himself.

To this conclusion they unanimously came.

Here, then, was no doubt the explanation of the slight sounds which the quick ear of Maud had caught, and which she fancied were produced by some one stealing stealthily among the bushes.

She was unquestionably right.

In a stern voice Dick Turpin addressed himself to this man.

"Who are you?" he asked; "what want you here?"

The man endeavoured to put on an air of determination, and to brazen it out.

"What's that to you?" he said; "I have as much right to be here as you."

"I should advise you to be a little more civil," said Claude Duval, "or it may be the worse for you."

"Answer me at once," said Dick; "tell me what you are doing here!"

"That's my business."

"You will find it concerns me as well as yourself."

"Shall I? I don't see that. This ere chase is as free to me as it is to you."

"That may be; but why were you stealing into the cavern?"

"That's my business."

"Then am I to understand by that that you refuse to give any account of yourself?"

"Yes—for I don't see why you ought to ask it."

All the time this little conversation had been going forward the man had been fumbling with his hands after something.

Our friends still retained their grasp upon him, but allowed him this much liberty, for they were curious to know what he was about to do.

The reader may be sure that not one of his motions escaped the observation of the highwaymen, by whom he was held captive.

With great suddenness, this man, after fumbling in the breast of the coat he wore, produced a bugle.

With a wrench, he freed his arm sufficiently to enable him to place this to his lips.

Another moment and he would have, doubtless, produced a loud note from the instrument; but ere he could command his breath to do so, Tom King dashed it from his hand.

"Ho! ho! my fine fellow," he said. "You are a dangerous customer, I see, but we know you now."

The man groaned and gnashed his teeth with rage at being prevented from giving this signal with the bugle.

He was defeated, and he made the most desperate exertions to get free.

It was in vain, however.

The grasp by which our friends held him was too tight a one to be shaken off very easily.

His struggles were futile.

The aspect of affairs was becoming serious, far more serious, in fact, than they had imagined.

Dick was resolved to obtain all the information he could from this man.

There was but one way by which he could hope to succeed in this design, and that was by threatening to take his life.

In his struggles with Tom King and Sixteen-String Jack, a portion of his clothing had been dragged aside, and Turpin now perceived that round his waist this man had got a quantity of strong rope coiled.

For what purpose this was intended he was at a loss to think, though Dick was aware that police-officers occasionally provided themselves in this manner when out upon any dangerous service, in case rope should be required to securely bind their prisoners.

But there was something about this man's appearance which was quite unlike that presented by a police-officer, and Dick came to the conclusion that he did not belong to that fraternity.

As soon as he spied the rope, our hero hastened up to the man, and, taking hold of it, quickly unwound it.

The spy looked at him apprehensively.

The piece of rope was a good length; and Dick, finding he had plenty to serve his ulterior purpose, drew his sword and cut off a portion of it.

He then beckoned to Claude to assist him, while he said to his two other comrades—

"Hold him firmly, my friends, and we will pinion his arms behind him with this convenient bit of rope we've

[THE DRAGOONS KEEP WATCH FOR THE HIGHWAYMEN IN THE OLD CAVERN.]

he has been kind enough to furnish us with, and then you will not have so much trouble with him."

Claude advanced, and, with Turpin's assistance, they quickly tied the spy's arms securely behind his back.

To hold him then became a comparatively easy matter.

"Now," said Dick, "once for all, and all for once, will you tell us your business in this wood?"

"I will not."

"What was your intention when you tried to blow that bugle?"

"I decline to say."

"Very well, then. The bird that can sing and won't sing must be made to sing."

The spy looked at Dick suspiciously as he uttered this rather enigmatical speech.

But he was not for long left in doubt as to what he meant by it.

Dick Turpin now stooped down, and picked up the longest piece of rope.

The spy watched him eagerly.

His first proceeding was to make a running noose in it.

He did this with great deliberation.

Having tied the knot to his entire satisfaction, Dick looked round for a tree which had a good stout projecting branch not many feet from the ground.

In Enfield Chase he had not to look far to find a tree of this description.

Indeed, he was standing within two yards of one, which could not have done better if it had been made on purpose.

Coiling the rope round his hand, Dick swung it backwards and forwards several times, and then, having taken his aim, threw it over the arm of the tree.

The first time he did not succeed in his object, but he did the second.

He pulled the rope, and, finding it all right, he cried to his comrades—

"Lead the prisoner this way, and we will soon see whether he will speak or not."

The man attempted a resistance, but he felt it was so utterly useless, that he gave in at once, and reluctantly suffered himself to be led to the tree.

Dick held that end of the rope which had the noose in it, and, as soon as the man was led beneath the tree he dropped the noose over his head.

With one snatch he drew it just tight enough for the man to feel what was round his neck.

Tom King and Sixteen-String Jack did not require to be told to take hold of the other end of the rope.

They did that at once.

Then Turpin stood back a few paces.

Addressing the man, he said—

"I am willing to give you a chance for your life, but the only means by which it can be spared will be by your disclosing your true object in stealing into the cavern."

"I tell you that's no business of yours."

"Very well, then; all I can say is you must perish in your obstinacy. I shall give you three minutes to make up your mind. If, at the end of that time, you do not think fit to make a full disclosure, I shall give the word of command to those who hold the rope, and up you will go at once! Now, understand, you have three minutes to decide whether you will be hanged, or whether you will give me the information I require."

Dick spoke these words in a very resolute and menacing tone, and the man looked at him furtively, as though anxious to ascertain whether he was in earnest.

But Dick's countenance was stern, and fully corresponded with the words he had just uttered.

Turning to Tom King and Sixteen-String Jack, Dick said—

"Be prepared, comrades, to swing him up the moment I utter the word 'now.' You need not wait for any further instructions, but pull him up at once, for we have no time to spare, and the sooner this job is over the better."

"All right, captain," was the reply, given with great readiness, and willingness too the man thought, and he glared around him with increased apprehensiveness.

"Time is speeding," said Dick; "that you are a spy, I feel convinced, and with your object I am pretty well acquainted, but I desire some more definite information than I possess. Quick, tell me, and spare your miserable life."

"I have nothing to tell," said the man, doggedly.

"That may be a misfortune, and it may be a fault. Anyhow, I am sorry for it, for if you do not tell me what I want to know, up you will go."

The man was silent.

"Will you tell me, or will you not? I ask you now for the last time."

"I have nothing to tell."

"Very well; I am sorry for that. Now, my comrades, up with him!"

CHAPTER CCCLXXXIX.

THE SPY CONSENTS TO SAVE HIS LIFE BY MAKING A FULL CONFESSION.

ALTHOUGH the tone in which Dick Turpin had spoken was so firm and decided, that the spy felt sure he was in earnest, yet the reader, from his knowledge of our hero's character, may almost feel certain that it was never his intention to murder this man in cold blood—for, had he swung him up to the bough of the old tree, by no other name could the deed be designated.

Such a proceeding as this was entirely foreign to Dick's nature; and this his comrades well knew, although the spy was ignorant of it.

Thus was it, then, that, even after his injunctions, the command he had given was not put into immediate execution.

Dick had not communicated his precise intentions, but they knew quite well how they were to act without his doing so.

Accordingly, the moment their captain spoke, they, with great apparent good earnest, gave the rope a sudden jerk, which tightened it in a most uncomfortable manner round the spy's throat.

At this manifestation, which seemed remarkably real and earnest, the man altered his mind about holding his peace.

He believed that, in another second, a vigorous pull at the rope would lift him completely off his legs.

When that was once done, it would be out of his power to speak, no matter how much he might then wish to save his life by making a full disclosure.

Instantly, then, he bawled out that he would tell all if they would only spare his life.

This was enough, and exactly what Dick Turpin required.

He made a signal to his three comrades with his hand, which they immediately understood.

They slackened the rope, and the man, with chattering teeth and rolling eyes, again implored them to spare his life.

His close proximity to death had frightened him exceedingly.

At first he had thought his life was not in danger, but the apparent earnestness of our friends deceived him.

"As I told you," said Turpin, still speaking as resolutely as before, "you have a chance of your life, if you only like to avail yourself of it. The only condition upon which your life can be spared is, that you at once disclose your object in creeping about the chase, and stealing into the cavern."

"And if I do this you will spare my life?"

"Most certainly; I pledge you my word to that effect."

"Take the rope off my neck, then."

"Not just at present, my friend. In order to guard against the possibility of future trouble, we will just listen to what you have got to say with the rope still round your neck."

While Dick spoke these words, the spy looked very eagerly all round him, on every side, and assumed, at the same time, a listening attitude, as though he was in expectation either of seeing or hearing something which would benefit him in his present strait.

This was not lost upon the highwaymen, and they continued to observe his countenance attentively.

They then perceived that it became clouded with disappointment.

"Come," said Dick, again, "if you are going to make us any disclosures, speak at once, for we cannot afford to waste time by remaining here. Either speak or not, just as you please. We shall not dally, I assure you; so, you have your choice of life or death before you, and we cannot be blamed if you choose the latter."

"What do you want to know?"

"That you have already been told. Will you give us the information we require, or not? If you won't, up you go."

By way of a comment upon what Dick had just said, Tom King jerked the rope again to the dismay of the spy, who thought he was going to be lifted off his feet.

"I will tell you!" he yelled. "I am a telling you. Do not hang me up. Let go of the rope. I am telling you, I tell you!"

The rope was slackened again.

"I know you all four," continued the spy, now speaking with great volubility, and pointing successively to the highwaymen in the order indicated by the following—"You are Dick Turpin, you are Tom King, you are Claude Duval, and you are Sixteen-String Jack."

"You are quite correct," said Dick, who took upon himself to reply for his comrades; "but does it not strike you that it is a very dangerous piece of information for you to avow yourself in possession of?"

The spy looked at him uneasily.

"You have promised to spare my life," he said, at length.

"True, true," replied Turpin, as though suddenly recollecting himself. "Go on. You know us; but what else? We wish to hear something about you."

"I suppose you are aware," said the man, "that the military have been called out in quest of you?"

"No, I did not know it," exclaimed Dick, who was betrayed into this admission by the surprise which the unexpected piece of intelligence occasioned him.

"Then, if you don't know that," said the spy, "I suppose you are not aware that there is a reward of a hundred pounds for anyone who can give any precise information as to your whereabouts."

"Proceed," said Dick. "What of that?"

"There is such a reward offered, and I can tell you a good many have been trying to earn it, but no one has succeeded as yet. You must understand it don't apply to any way to your capture, but the money will be given to any one who can lead the military to where you are."

"Oh! indeed. Then I suppose this will account for your presence here?"

"Well, it might."

Answer me at once, and decisively; is this what brought you here."

"It was."

"That will do; I know what to make of such answers as these. And now, then, there is something else. How came you to know we were here?"

"I thought this was a likely place for you to hide."

This might be a correct answer, and it might not; but our friends were compelled to take it, and it was sufficiently plausible as not to be open to a positive doubt."

"But how did you recognise us? Tell us that," interrupted Tom King.

The man hesitated a moment, and then he replied—

"From the printed descriptions which I have seen, you are very accurately described."

"Oh! indeed; that is it."

"Yes, gentlemen, it is, I assure you."

"And you have skulked about the chase, finding out all you could, and I suppose by this means discovered the secret entrance to the cavern?"

"I found the place where you disappeared, and guessed it led to a cavern. I was trying to find out when I trod on those cursed twigs, and then you heard me."

"Just so, and your capture followed. There is one thing, however, you must tell us, and tell us truly, otherwise you swing."

"What is it?"

"To whom have you communicated the important discovery you have made?"

"No one, more's the pity!"

"I don't agree with you there."

The man looked sullen, and said nothing.

What he had stated entirely agreed with what they had suspected, and their situation was very critical.

The chief difficulty in which they now found themselves was whether they were to believe all that the man had told them.

It might be that he had spoken the truth, and it might be that he had lied, but which it was they were quite unable to tell.

"Release me!" exclaimed the man. "I have kept my word, and told you all. Let me go."

"Do you think we are mad?"

"You promised to spare my life."

"I know I did; but I did not say a word about setting you at liberty—you must be mad to think of such a thing."

"Release me!" said the man. "Let me go, and I will promise not to reveal a word."

"It is, perhaps, an unfortunate thing, but we cannot trust you. Wait a moment. You are quite secure as you are, and I will confer with my comrades as to what we are to do with you."

The spy looked uneasy when he heard this, and, for the first time, began to wonder what fate was in reserve for him.

Not heeding this, however, Dick Turpin crossed the sward to the spot upon which his comrades stood, holding the rope.

An anxious consultation now ensued, which the spy watched with such intentness as a man only could watch who happened to be in his situation.

He could gather little that was satisfactory from the countenances of the highwaymen.

Our friends were now exceedingly puzzled, and for a long time they were unable to decide what would be the best thing they could do with their prisoner.

To take his life, even had they at first felt inclined to do so, they could not, after having promised to spare him as they had.

To release him would be an act of utter madness, for it is not likely that he would hold his peace respecting these events, no matter how many oaths he might take to do so.

To keep him a prisoner seemed no less disagreeable than embarrassing and impossible, so that, whichever way the highwaymen looked at the matter, nothing but difficulty was presented to them.

It was necessary, too, that they should decide quickly, in order that they might have an opportunity to consult together respecting this fresh danger with which they were menaced.

They seemed to be driven to the resource of keeping him a prisoner, but they had no means of doing this properly, and he was almost certain to escape.

At any rate, there was no place in the cavern where he could be kept in security.

At length, after a great many suggestions had been made, and the matter had been looked at from every possible point of view, Sixteen-String Jack hit upon an expedient.

It was not, perhaps, quite so good a one as might be devised, but, as no better could be proposed, they resolved to adopt it.

The proposition was a simple one.

It was this.

The spy was to be led, pinioned as he was, into the deepest recesses of the wood.

He was then to be bound both hand and foot, and afterwards to be blindfolded and gagged.

In this hopeless and helpless condition he was to be bound to a tree, with the rope which was at that moment about his neck.

This, at first sight, looked a very merciless proceeding, and one little short of murder; but, as Claude suggested, it would do no harm for the man to remain there while they decided as to what proceedings should be taken.

This, then, was ultimately agreed to.

The spy knew in a moment by their dispersing that they had come to a decision, and he wondered what would now happen to him.

So great was his impatience, that he implored to be enlightened on this point.

But our friends were deaf to his entreaties.

"Ask no questions," said Dick. "Come with us; you will know what your fate will be soon enough."

The man, finding that part of their intention was to march him away from the spot where he now was, made up his mind not to stir on any account.

As for our friends, having made up their minds as to what they should do, they, with great speed, set about carrying out their design.

The piece of rope was pulled off the bough, and the prisoner requested to move.

However, true to his determination, he refused to budge an inch.

"Leave me to deal with him," said Dick Turpin, as soon as he discovered what the man's intentions were, "leave me to deal with him, and you will see he will be all right enough then."

As he spoke, our hero once more drew his sword.

The rope, as we have said, had been pulled down off the bough, but it had not been removed from the prisoner's neck, round which it still clung with unpleasant tightness so far as his own comfort was concerned.

Dick held his sword in his right hand, and with his left he caught hold of the rope about four feet from the noose.

"Now," he said, to the spy, "follow those who walk before you. If you refuse, I shall proceed to harsh measures, and compel you."

The man still persisted in remaining as though his feet were rooted to the ground.

Dick Turpin stood behind him, and, extending his sword, he pricked him with it.

The incision he made was only just in the skin, but the spy felt it, and, uttering a howl of agony, sprang forward several paces involuntarily.

Dick had touched him in about the tenderest part of his person.

"Now," he cried, "go on, without you want it again."

The pain of the one slight wound he had already received seemed, however, to be quite sufficient for the spy.

He walked on after Turpin's three comrades with all imaginable submission.

Presently, however, when he found that he was being conducted into the darkest and gloomiest portion of the chase, he came to a desperate stand.

But Dick was prepared for him.

He still held the sword easily in his grasp, and once more punctured a hole in the spy's skin with it.

Another howl of agony was the result, and he continued on his way again without murmuring.

Into the deepest recesses of the chase the three highwaymen directed their footsteps.

The ground beneath their feet was soft and swampy, and thickly overgrown with rank vegetation such as is ever to be found on such a soil.

At every step they took their feet sank into the morass, but, altogether heedless of this, they pushed onwards.

Not only, then, did the undergrowth of the forest increase tremendously in its exuberance and rankness, but the trees themselves—the legitimate occupiers of the ground—grew rapidly larger.

The circumferences of their trunks increased until the girth was prodigious, and their branches, shooting out in every direction, crossed and recrossed each other to such an extent, that they almost shut out the light of day.

At length our friends paused, imagining they had reached a spot well suited to their purpose.

The spy looked apprehensively around him, and, as well as he could, into the countenances of his captors—endeavouring to gather from their expression some idea as to his doom.

Nothing was satisfactory or cheering.

Cold drops of perspiration started out upon his trembling body, and he once more glanced around him.

Of all others he thought that spot best calculated for the commission of some awful crime, and he shuddered as the conviction forced itself upon him that he was destined to be the victim.

"Help — help!" he shrieked. "Mercy — mercy! You promised faithfully to spare my life if I would tell you all, and I have done so! Mercy—mercy! Spare my life, and I will do anything you wish!"

"We have no intention of taking your life," said Dick, "without you compel us to do so by continuing to cry out in the manner you did a moment ago. We are going to keep you in safety, that's all."

There was nothing very encouraging in this; but the spy, when thus again assured that no harm was intended him, so far as his life was concerned, gathered hope from it.

Without further delay, our friends now proceeded to carry out their arrangements.

A piece more of the cord was cut off, and with this the spy's ankles were tied together.

His arms were already pinioned; and in this perfectly helpless condition he was placed in an upright position against the trunk of one of the trees.

The rope was then removed from his neck, and with it his body was securely and firmly bound to the tree.

All that now remained was to blindfold and gag him.

Despite his remonstrances and entreaties, our friends accomplished their purpose.

They stepped back a pace, and, on looking at their work, came to the conclusion that for a time he was perfectly secure, and what they were eventually to do with him would be a matter for future consideration.

They had first of all their own affairs to settle.

Seeing him all secure, they turned back to the cave, taking precautions to leave such a track as would enable them to proceed direct to the spot upon another occasion.

During their walk back to the cave, the information the spy had given them was thoroughly canvassed.

It was not, however, until the last moment that Dick Turpin recollected that, when they had left the cave with so much precipitation, they had left Maud in it.

What had become of her, he asked himself, during his absence?

Terrified and alarmed she would sure to be; and, under the dominion of those feelings, she would probably rush out of the cave in search of them, and fall into some danger.

With his heart oppressed with forebodings, and over and over reproaching himself for having left the cavern in such a manner, Dick Turpin hastened back, having communicated his fears to his comrades, who shared them in an equal degree with himself.

But they had yet far to go.

The distance from the spot where they had captured the spy to the cave was considerable, and Dick's anxiety now made it seem three times as far as it really was. Regardless of the obstacles which lay before him, he rushed onward, forgetful of everything but the fact that, through his carelessness, Maud would certainly suffer much uneasiness, if not danger.

Leaving him for a few moments, however, we will direct the attention of the reader to a widely different scene which took place some hours before the events we have just described, and the consequences of which proved eminently disastrous to our friends.

It is in this way we shall account for the unexpected presence of the spy, and show how far correct the account was which he gave to Dick Turpin and his three companions.

CHAPTER CCCXC.

GIVES SOME INFORMATION ABOUT THE CAPTAIN OF A DETACHMENT OF DRAGOONS, AND RELATES HOW A SPY WAS SENT TO ENFIELD CHASE TO DISCOVER THE HIGHWAYMEN.

It was just about dawn on the morning preceding the one upon which Tom King and Sixteen-String Jack discovered the apparently lifeless form of Claude Duval in the roadway, that the officer in command of a small troop of dragoons, whose duty, in common with many others, was to patrol the roads in search of the four highwaymen, called out "Halt!" to his men.

The word was pronounced in the true military manner, and the little troop at once reined in their steeds.

There was for a moment the faint jingling of accoutrements, and then all was still.

The piece of roadway to which this particular troop had been appointed to patrol was at no very great distance from Enfield Chase, which was, when they turned their eyes in one direction, a very conspicuous object.

It was, in fact, the highroad leading from London to Enfield town. The dragoons wondered for what purpose they had been told to halt, and looked rather curiously towards their captain for an explanation.

The detachment consisted of twelve well-mounted and well-armed men, and the officer who had the command, and who assumed by courtesy the title of captain, made the thirteenth.

It must not be supposed that there was one of these men who at all admired the duty upon which he had been sent.

Indeed, it is questionable whether any feeling could be more universal than this among all the military.

To do what was, as they considered, their own duty, they never grumbled, but they did not like the idea of being made police-officers of, or being got to do that which the regular force had failed to accomplish.

They had no resource, however, but to submit to the commands of their superior officers; the only thing they were left to do was to grumble, and this they did to their hearts' content.

Nevertheless, it did not reconcile them in the least degree to the duty they had to perform.

Perhaps the reader can, in his imagination, realize the difference between spending the night in barracks, with only the customary hours of guard, and between this duty upon which the dragoons were now sent.

For the whole of the live-long night — no matter whether it was wet or fine, cold or warm — they had to mount their horses, and pace up and down a certain piece of road which was appointed them, until the rising sun should warn them that their watch was over.

No doubt the persons who travelled just at that period very much approved of the additional safety with which they performed their journey, but these were the only persons who benefited by the manœuvre.

The authorities made a mistake in sending men to do that work for which they felt the greatest possible amount of dislike, and they could scarcely expect it to be performed efficiently.

They looked only at the rewards which were offered, and certainly anyone would have thought that these were large and tempting enough to induce them to do anything, no matter how repugnant.

The united rewards for the capture and conviction of the four highwaymen amounted to a sum considerably over two thousand pounds, and in addition to this very large amount, a further sum of one hundred pounds had recently been offered to anyone who would give information as to where these daring characters were to be found.

The Secretary of State, who had taken the affair in hand on behalf on the Government, was much annoyed to think our friends should have so completely disappeared as they had, for nothing had been heard of them for more than a week after the burning of Newgate, although inquiries had been made in every possible direction

This reward of a hundred pounds, however, to be paid to anyone who should merely disclose or discover where they were lurking, no matter whether they were captured or not, would, he flattered himself, be productive of some very gratifying result.

But he was disappointed and deceived.

Nothing came of this extraordinary offer, which he thought was such a master-stroke of policy; and he was now at his wits' end to know what else he could devise.

Such was the precise aspect of affairs upon the morning to which we now desire to direct the reader's particular attention.

The captain of the little troop, as we have said, called out to his men to halt just about the time when they were thinking that, for that one night at least, their lonely task was over.

What the captain was going to say to them they could not for the life of them conceive, but they were not for long left in darkness upon this point.

"My lads," said this officer, "we have done one more night of this disagreeable duty—I call it a disagreeable duty, and so do all of you, I know."

Various murmurs came from the troop, but silence immediately ensued, and the captain continued—

"I don't like this any better than you do; and the sooner we cease to be police-officers the better I shall be pleased. I am tolerably certain, though, that we shall not be called off this duty until these highwaymen are captured. From this, it is clear, our wisest plan will be to catch them, if we can. The reward will be well worth having, and then there will be an end to this work."

"That's all very well, captain," said one of the soldiers; "but where are we to look for these fellows? We should like to set eyes on them well enough, but they appear to have vanished into air."

"They do," replied the captain, "and that is what I wanted to talk to you about."

The men bent forward in their saddles, eager to hear what he had to say.

"There is one thing," began the captain, "which is quite certain, and that is, that these fellows have gone into hiding somewhere, and have made up their minds not to stir from their retreat until this storm has blown over. They have, doubtless, taken their measures very cleverly; and, while the roads continue to be guarded like they are, depend upon it, they will never make their appearance. They will tire our patience out first, I am certain."

"There's no doubt about that, if you like, captain," said the man who had before spoken, and who seemed to be the privileged mouthpiece of his comrades. "I say, captain, there is no doubt about that; for, hang me! if they havn't done that already!"

There was a faint laugh, and something like applause, from the remainder, as he said this.

The captain continued—

"Your patience is exhausted, no doubt; but you must wait a little longer. I have something which I want to propose to you; and, unless I am very much mistaken, it will be the means, not only of our obtaining and dividing among us all the rewards offered, but also free us from this everlasting pacing up and down a dreary road."

This announcement on the part of their captain was received with acclamation, which he was too well pleased to hear to attempt to suppress.

The curiosity of the men, however, who were anxiously impatient to hear what he had to propose, effectually prevented its endurance for any length of time.

"I think we can take for granted," he resumed, "that these gentlemen are hiding themselves somewhere. If they were not, we must have heard of them before now. Taking this for granted, I have occupied myself with thinking in this way:—'Suppose I was one of these highwaymen,' I said to myself,' where should I look to find a place that would shelter me—some place where I should not be found?' For a long time I could not think where would be best, until all at once the idea occurred to me that I should try to find some out-of-the-way place in the country where few people were ever about, and where my enemies were unlikely to look for me. Well, when I thought this far, I was able to get farther. I thought of what part of the country we happened to be in, and it seemed just the sort of place that I had made up my mind would be suitable, for there's no houses anywhere near. However, I needn't go through with my thoughts; it will do if I tell you the conclusion I have come to. It is this. Do you see that great wood yonder?"

As he spoke he raised his hand and pointed to Enfield Chase, the topmost trees of which the rising sun had just began to tinge with a beautiful golden hue.

"Yes, yes; we see it," exclaimed the dragoons, "and we know it too; that's Enfield Chase."

"As you say, it is Enfield Chase. Now, I only go by hearsay, but I believe it is a more extensive forest than most people imagine, and, to make a long matter short, it's my opinion, though I have no more grounds for it than I have told you, that Dick Turpin and his three companions are to be found somewhere in it!"

A deep silence followed the utterance of this very remarkable speech, during which the dragoons pondered over the idea which had been suggested to them, and which was what they had never suspected.

The more they reflected, the more likely they thought that either in this or some similar place the four highwaymen were hiding.

They said as much to the captain, who was naturally pleased to find his own notion appeared a probable one to other persons besides himself.

"We agree so far, then," he said, "and now listen to what I have further got to say. As you all know, there's a hundred pounds to be earned by anyone who finds out whereabouts these highwaymen are. Now that's a very handsome sum, to my thinking, and if I was not put here as captain, I should try very hard if I could not earn it."

"How—how?"

"Patience, and I will tell you. I am shut out from this, but you are not. First of all, though, suppose those we want should be in the chase yonder. Well, if we all went in a body to look we should never find them, because it would be impossible to keep our presence a secret. The highwaymen, if they were there, would instantly take to their heels, and we should have all our trouble for nothing."

"But how should we do?"

"I have thought of a plan, and if you will only be patient for a moment I will tell you what it is."

The dragoons pressed forward with increased eagerness.

"Although I cannot be spared from the troop myself, as I am held responsible, there is no reason why one of you should not. Now, one of you had better get a disguise in the first place, and, having done that, creep stealthily into the forest. Whoever goes will then be able to skulk and pry about; and, in the end, if the highwaymen are there, cannot fail to discover them. If this is done it will be a capital thing, because we should be at hand to make them prisoners, and we should get in that way all the rewards; and, if they were not there, why we should have our trouble for nothing, and that would be no great matter. What do you think of that, my comrades?"

The dragoons were one and all enraptured with the brilliant scheme which had been placed—not without a good deal of art—before them.

Everyone was anxious that the affair should be commenced at once, so great was their impatience.

The captain was well pleased to perceive this, and stimulated them to the utmost of his power.

"It now remains to be decided which of you shall disguise himself and go on an exploring expedition into the forest."

"Send me, captain; send me, captain!" was the cry that came from every lip; for they were all equally desirous of availing themselves of this chance of earning the hundred pounds which would of course belong exclusively to the man who made the discovery.

"I cannot send you all," said the captain; "I would much rather that one volunteered to go upon this duty. Who will volunteer?"

All pressed forward in a moment.

"I see you all want to go; but that is impossible. You must adopt some mode of making a choice."

"How? captain—how?"

"You had better draw lots; that will be the fairest way."

Against this nothing could be said, and the proposal was at once agreed to and adopted.

They did this in a peculiar manner among themselves by tossing up a halfpenny, and guessing whether it was head or tail.

The result of this was, that the enviable duty fell upon one of their comrades.

Of all the rest, this man was least liked; and the captain, when he saw who fate had appointed to carry out his scheme, felt much vexed, and could not help wishing it was someone else.

To alter this, without producing disaffect, he well knew was impossible, so he very wisely forbore to make the least attempt.

The man stepped forward from the rest, and prepared to receive his instructions from the captain.

These were few, and were comprehended in what he had already said.

He was to disguise himself, steal into the wood, skulk about until he made a discovery, and, when he had learned all that he was able, he was to return and communicate the intelligence to the captain.

In addition to this, a bugle was given him, and, should anything extraordinary happen, or should he fall into any danger, he was to blow a long note upon it—the captain assuring him that he would take care to keep with his troop within reach of the sound.

Matters being thus adjusted, they retired to their quarters, where they passed the day; and the fortunate soldier, as he was considered, having had a long and refreshing sleep, disguised himself and set out for his destination.

He was sure he reached the chase unobserved, and skulked about for a long time without being able to find out anything.

This man, as the reader must be aware, was the very spy that our friends so fortunately captured.

It so happened that he entered the chase at a point far distant from that portion of it which was frequented by our friends.

Consequently the spy, although in the forest during the time the extraordinary marriage ceremony was performed between Dick Turpin and Maud, saw nothing of it.

He was a persevering man though, was this soldier, and he did not allow this want of immediate success to daunt him, and he determined not to lose all hope until he had thoroughly searched the chase in every part.

From its vast extent this would be a work of time.

Steadily pursuing his object, he worked his way round to that side of the chase opposite to the one by which he had entered it.

When he arrived here it was close upon daybreak.

Having reached the confines of the chase, he, with a feeling of disappointment and vexation which he could not repress, prepared to turn back again.

It was just as he was about to do this that he startled by a faint sound.

He paused instantly, and listened.

The sound came again, and with increased distinctness.

Anticipating, and yet scarcely daring to hope for a discovery, the spy crouched down until the dense undergrowth of the chase completely concealed his form.

The sound he had heard soon attained a decisive character.

It was the sound of footsteps.

Some persons were approaching.

Eagerly he strained his eyes, and gazed in the direction from which the sounds came.

Presently he could distinguish voices mingling with the footsteps.

The darkness baffled him, and he could see nothing but those objects which were very near him.

He was consoled by the knowledge that the sounds came nearer, and that the murmuring of voices became plainer.

At length the dim and shadowy figures appeared in sight, and continued to advance.

Fearful that if they continued they would discover his whereabouts, the spy, as silently as he was able, slunk through the bushes.

In his progress, however, he could not avoid making a slight rustling sound.

It was this that reached the ears of Maud; for, of course, it was no other than Dick Turpin and herself who the spy both saw and heard approaching.

A faint, gray light now began to steal through the trees.

It was dark in the chase long after it was light in the plains, and when the sun rose there was never more than a dim, hazy twilight.

This was the light that now began to bring different objects into view.

The spy was aware in a moment that his movements had excited suspicion, but he had the presence of mind to remain profoundly still.

The alarm then ceased.

By a slight change in his position, which he effected noiselessly, he could hear some of the conversation which passed between Maud and Dick, and it was not long before the spy was able, by attending to what they said, to come to the conclusion that Dick Turpin stood before him.

This was, indeed, important information, and, as day was fast coming on, he thought he had better creep away from where he was, and communicate the result of his errand to his officer.

With great caution he stole away, so far as he could tell, without giving a second alarm.

Once at a distance he rose to his feet, and made his way at full speed to the place where his comrades had taken up their quarters.

Upon arriving he at once had an interview with his captain, who was delighted with the information given him, though he could not help thinking it was too good to be true.

As the spy had obtained no information respecting the other three highwaymen, the captain dispatched him again the same night, with instructions to be particularly careful, and to find out all he could, so that, when the dragoons made an attack upon the highwaymen, they could make sure of the victory.

Again, then, this man set off on his perilous errand.

We have seen how it eventuated.

He went direct to the spot where he had seen Dick and Maud, and, somewhat to his surprise, found them still upon the same spot.

On this occasion he was enabled to approach them very closely without being perceived, and he also overheard sufficient of their conversation to let him know that they were waiting for the return of their comrades, who had gone off upon some expedition or other.

It was only now and then, however, that he could distinguish what was said, and he tried to creep still closer.

The quick ear of Maud Gouldman again detected him, and this time he had much difficulty in escaping the rigid search which Dick made after him.

However, he did escape, and shortly afterwards he saw three horsemen arrive upon the scene.

CHAPTER CCCXOI.

THE SPY BREAKS LOOSE FROM HIS BONDS, AND CARRIES IMPORTANT INFORMATION TO HIS CAPTAIN.

THE three horsemen who now arrived were no other than Tom King, Claude Duval, and Sixteen-String Jack.

As we have related in a precedent chapter, they had just returned from their long and perilous excursion.

Under the excitement of this meeting the alarm they had so recently experienced was forgotten.

They all repaired to the cavern, and the spy took good care to keep upon their track, though at a very safe distance.

The exultation which now filled his heart knew no bounds.

His task was not over yet, however.

He had to track the highwaymen to their secret haunt.

Like an Indian he kept upon their trail, halting when they halted, and all the time accommodating his own speed to theirs.

In this manner he followed them into the cavern.

But he did not see them enter.

Prudence compelled him to keep in the rear, and it thus happened that it was not until some time after they entered the cavern that he became aware that they had disappeared.

Where they had vanished to he knew not, but, being able to form some idea as to the spot where the disappearance had taken place, he wisely resolved to conceal himself in the vicinity and keep watch.

His patience was not put to a very severe trial, for, as the reader will remember, almost as soon as the fire was lighted, Dick Turpin, Tom King, and Sixteen-String Jack set out upon their hunting expedition.

The spy did not see them emerge from the secret passage, but he caught sight of their almost immediately after they had done so.

Seeing the rocks before him, it was very natural that he should come to the conclusion that there was a hiding-place somewhere among them.

He argued, too, that the three highwaymen, who he could hear forcing their way through the trees, would presently return.

Under this impression, he took up such a position as enabled him to command a view of the whole face of the rock in which the opening of the secret passage was situated.

Here he waited patiently, and, ere long, he had cause to congratulate himself upon having acted in the way he had done.

He saw our three friends again make their appearance, and he saw that one of them carried a fawn slung over his shoulder.

Never did the soldier look so earnestly at all that now took place.

He saw the bush pulled down in the manner we have so frequently described—he saw the highwaymen enter the passage, and the bush pulled back into its former position, thus effectually concealing the opening through which they had passed.

For a moment or two after they had disappeared the spy remained profoundly still, moving neither hand nor foot, and keeping his eyes fixed upon the particular bush as though he feared that, if he once removed them, he should never be able to pitch upon it again.

Having waited what he considered a safe period, he cautiously stole towards it.

But in his progress he never gave one glance at where he was going, but steadfastly fixed his gaze upon the bush, and continued to do so until he had reached it.

Then he drew a long breath, and listened.

But all was still as the grave itself.

He drew yet closer.

He placed his ear against the prickly bush, and listened again.

But he could hear nothing.

The passage leading to the cavern was of too great a length for any sounds made by our friends to be audible where he stood.

What to do now the spy scarcely knew.

His curiosity was very strongly excited.

He wished to communicate his intelligence to the captain, and he wished to obtain even more information than was at present in his possession.

After a brief period of hesitation he resolved, as all continued so still, to pull down this bush as he had seen the highwaymen do, and find out what kind of place it was beyond.

Accordingly, he did so; and the result of this action we already know.

Seeing a long, dark passage, he made one step into it, and trod upon some of the dry twigs which Tom King had so cunningly placed there.

The crackling sound came with startling loudness in the silence of that rudely-vaulted passage; and, when he heard it, his heart seemed almost to turn to ice.

So overcome was he, that he could not move, but leant against the rocky wall.

The sound of Tom's voice, however, and the hasty trampling of feet, warned him of the danger of remaining, and, making a violent effort, he started off, and concealed himself among the nearest bushes.

Terrified by the rapid approach, he started off, and was hotly pursued by them.

With all that afterwards took place, up to the moment he was bound to the tree and left there, the reader is acquainted; and, now that these additional circumstances have been related, it will be seen that the confession he made to Dick Turpin was in most respects correct, though he concealed quite as much as he disclosed.

It will be now easy to understand why he was so bitterly disappointed when the bugle was dashed from his lips at the very moment he was going to blow a blast upon it, which would have brought his companions to his immediate assistance.

When he failed in this, a remarkable change in his behaviour took place, and much of the hardihood and courage which up to this period he had displayed evaporated.

When he was tied to the tree in the manner we have described, he listened with the greatest anxiety to the retreating footsteps of our friends.

He could not call out to them and implore them to return.

He was gagged, and, but for this circumstance, he would have made the wood resound with his oateries.

At last the footsteps of the highwaymen became inaudible, and then terrible thoughts took possession of his mind.

Of what he endured no description could convey an adequate idea.

After a time, however, he turned his attention to freeing himself from the bonds by which he was held.

But this appeared a really hopeless task.

The highwaymen had taken particular care that he should be quite secure, and although he struggled desperately to free himself from the ropes, the only result he achieved was to become more than ever convinced of their strength and security.

Never until that moment did he fully realize what useful things his hands were.

He would have given anything to have one of them at liberty.

He struggled hard at the cord, but to no purpose.

By continuing his efforts, however, and by the total sacrifice of the skin round his wrists and on the back of his hands, he fancied he slackened the tightness of the rope in some degree.

This encouraged him to continue, and, after suffering incredible agony, he released one of his hands.

When he had done this, the rest was comparatively easy.

But he had a strong stimulant to urge him on to make the most desperate exertions.

Smarting with pain, and with his hands dripping with blood, he removed first of all the bandage which covered his eyes, then the gag which prevented his speech, and, finally, the cords by which his ankles were tied together, and by which his body was secured to the trunk of the tree.

He was then free.

His first act was to utter some horrible maledictions upon the heads of those who had served him in this manner, and if the troop had been anywhere near at hand, there was no doubt that, under the influence of passion as he was, he would have placed the bugle to his lips, and availed himself of the quickest and readiest means of summoning his comrades.

As this was out of the question, he burst forth with a few more curses, and dashed off in the direction which would take him to them.

He had a long way to go, and the rapid exertion soon exhausted him.

He kept on, however, and at length reached his destination.

The captain, perceiving him return, questioned him eagerly.

The spy had a long tale to tell, but the captain was rejoiced at the tidings he received, and from that moment looked upon the large reward as already earned.

He determined, however, not to do as the spy wanted him, which was to set off at once, but to wait until night fairly came, and approach the enemy under the cover of the darkness.

This was unquestionably the best course to be adopted, and the soldier was compelled, though much against his inclination, to bow before the order of his commanding officer.

The time to nightfall would be but short, for already the sun was rapidly declining behind the clouds on the western horizon.

The captain, in the meantime, employed himself in questioning and cross-questioning the man, and he did this with so much address and skill, that he made himself familiar with every incident, however trivial.

When he was sure that he knew all, he considered his plans for a little while, and gave particular instructions to every member of his troop.

By the time this was done it was almost dark, and it was quite so when they were all mounted and in readiness to start.

Upon arriving at the chase the whole party dismounted, and tethered their horses in such a manner that they were perfectly secure, and, at the same time, able to crop the short, sweet grass which grew plentifully around them.

This done, the spy at once took upon himself the task of leading his companions, and never was a service more willingly performed.

They advanced with the greatest possible caution.

The spy had noted the position of the cavern well, for he made his way towards it without deviating from his course in the least.

Upon reaching the entrance they came to a halt.

It was, however, a brief one, for the captain had already made up his mind what to do.

With his own hand he seized the thorn-bush, and, pulling it down, disclosed the commencement of the passage.

He was pleased to see this, because it was important confimatory evidence of what the soldier had told him.

At a sign, two of the men seized the thorn-bush, and pulled it up by the roots, thus leaving the opening clear.

"Now, my lads!" he cried, in a low but emphatic voice, "follow me, and the reward will be ours!"

The soldiers made no response, but followed closely in the footsteps of their captain, who rushed into the passage.

Truly were our friends now menaced with a danger of no common or ordinary description.

The secret upon which they so much relied was discovered, and foes who, from their skill in the use of their weapons they had everything to dread, were close upon them.

In order to understand what follows, it will, however, be necessary for us to leave the dragoons in the passage for a little while, during which we will revert to the proceedings of Dick Turpin and his friends.

Anxious in the extreme to ascertain whether any harm had befallen Maud, who he had left so hastily and so thoughtlessly, our hero made his way back to the cavern with all the speed which he was capable of making.

His heart was filled with dread that she had either encountered some terrible danger by remaining in the cavern alone, or else that she had incurred extreme peril by venturing to leave it.

Over and over again did he reproach himself for what he had done, but it was now too late. From what the spy had said, and from his behaviour, Dick feared that he had some companions in the chase, and who he relied upon coming to his assistance.

He could account in no other manner for the singular boldness he had displayed.

At length Dick came in sight of the entrance to the cavern.

It was still open, with the thorn-bush lying down upon the ground just as they had left it.

To his joy, however, he saw Maud standing just within the passage.

She was safe and unhurt.

As soon as she found who was approaching, she bounded forward, and our hero felt full of joy to think the apprehension under which he had laboured was groundless.

One glance into all their countenances was quite sufficient to let Maud know that something, both disagreeable and important, had taken place; and she was impatiently anxious to know what had taken place, as well as to have an explanation respecting the alarm which had caused them to rush out into the chase with so much precipitation.

Dick asked her to be patient, and led the way into the cavern, where he was followed by his companions.

Tom King remained behind to place the bush in its proper position.

This done, he rejoined his comrades, who by this time had reached the cavern.

A very anxious consultation as to what had best be done now took place between them, in the course of which Maud was made aware of the precise nature of the danger with which they were threatened.

Her terror was excessive, and Dick found his efforts to calm her agitation were scarcely sufficient.

The position of our friends was now exceedingly embarrassing.

Doubtless a great deal of what the spy had told them was correct, but in other points he might have deceived them, or suppressed something.

There was danger every way.

If they remained in the chase they were almost certain to be attacked, and the result of such an encounter would be very doubtful; and if they ventured to leave their place of concealment, such a watch would doubtless be kept all around that they would be pounced upon and captured merely through the numbers of their assailants being so superior to their own.

Claude Duval was of opinion that the secret of the whereabouts had been discovered, but that their foes, not altogether liking the idea of attacking them in their stronghold, had adopted the expedient of sending this spy in order to frighten them out of the chase, when they would immediately attack them with every advantage.

This was a view of the case which might or might not be a correct one.

At any rate there was a doubt upon the matter.

Knowing the cunning of their foes, it was not unlikely that they should adopt some such mode as that described by Claude Duval.

The more they considered this subject the greater dilemma did they find themselves to be in.

Claude Duval, however, strenuously opposed their leaving their present quarters.

There was no other place to which they could take themselves where they would be more safe.

They were not quite certain, either, whether they would be attacked.

In the end, however, they unanimously came to the conclusion that to attempt, just at present, to leave the chase would be dangerous in the extreme, and that the best thing they could do was to remain patiently where they were, and await the result of what had happened.

They fancied that should they be attacked by their foes they should be able to stand a siege of some length, and, in anticipation of this event, they set about putting it into as good a state of defence as they could.

Materials were collected and placed together in a heap, by means of which they could barricade and block up the entrance of the cavern, and, in short, nothing was left undone that was at all likely to add to their security.

Maud watched all these proceedings with great apprehensiveness.

She could not help thinking they were in most imminent danger, and that it was next to impossible that they should be able to escape.

The coolness with which the four highwaymen looked upon it inspired her with some slight degree of courage and confidence.

Sixteen-String Jack made a proposition which he at once proceeded to carry out.

It was to make his way to the outside, so as to give warning of the approach of anyone.

This was a very sensible undertaking, and his comrades highly approved of it.

They agreed to take this duty upon themselves by turns.

They were uneasy chiefly upon one point.

They were very short of ammunition, and they had no means of obtaining a fresh supply.

This would prove a second drawback to them, should they be attacked.

Such, then, was the aspect which things presented in the old cavern after the discovery of the spy.

Sixteen-String Jack was watching and waiting, close to the thorn-bush which concealed the opening in the rocks, and his companions inside adopting every means which they thought would conduce to their common safety.

There were several fragments of rock lying about in various places on the floor of the cavern, and these they all piled up close to the opening of the passage, so as to block it up with them, should circumstances occur to render such an expedient necessary.

In short, nothing that they could think of was left undone.

And now night came on.

The highwaymen had said that, if that night passed over without any attack being made upon them, they should have better hopes of remaining unmolested.

[DICK TURPIN STEALS UNAWARES UPON HIS FOES.]

Presently, as the darkness deepened, the vigilance of our old friend Sixteen-String Jack increased.

He paced up and down in front of the cavern like a sentinel, making use of all his faculties to detect any sign of an enemy's approach.

At length, in one particular direction, he fancied he heard a crackling, rustling sound.

He paused and listened.

He was not mistaken.

Pressing onward, but with great caution, he saw the troop of dragoons advancing in the manner we have already described.

This was enough for Jack, and, without waiting to hear any more, he hurried back to the cavern.

CHAPTER CCCXCII.

DICK TURPIN AND HIS FRIENDS ARE ATTACKED IN THE CAVERN BY THE DETACHMENT OF DRAGOONS.

Breathless—not only with the speed he had made, but with the discovery of the dragoons—Sixteen-String Jack entered the passage, and replaced the thorn-bush as quickly as he was able.

Upon reaching the cavern, he found that his three friends were all standing up with anxiety imprinted upon their countenances.

They had heard his hasty approach, and had started up, impatient for the intelligence of which they questioned no the was the bearer.

The interior of the cavern would have been quite dark but for the wood fire smouldering on the hearthstone, and, as this was for the most part composed of dry wood, it diffused a cheerful light around it, and brought out into salient relief the rugged outlines of the cavern.

By the aid of this firelight the three highwaymen were could perceive the expression on the countenance of their friend, and, before he had time to speak, they judged that something momentous had taken place.

He hastened to let them know the worst.

"Quick—quick!" he cried. "There is not a moment to be lost! Our foes are upon us! Some ten or twelve men—soldiers—for I saw the glitter of their accoutrements, are making their way through the chase in the direction of this place, and, doubtless, with the intention of attacking us. Block up the entrance as we determined to do, we shall then have a barricade behind which we can fight!"

Almost before he had finished speaking Sixteen-String Jack seized several of the fragments of rock, and began in good earnest the laborious task of blocking up the passage with them.

In this he was instantly seconded by his comrades, who could tell by his manner that there was every need for them to be urgent.

As the piece of rock had been placed there for this purpose, they were able to perform their work quickly, and they soon had the opening completely blocked up.

They were only just in time.

Ere the last block could be wedged into its place the dragoons had entered the cavern, and with great impetuosity rushed forward.

Their onward progress was checked by the mass of rock.

They were compelled to halt.

This was an obstacle which the captain scarcely expected to find.

It told him at a glance that preparation had been made for their reception, and that they would have to fight the matter out.

Calling out in an encouraging manner to his men, and telling them that their prey was almost within their grasp, he commanded them to storm the barricade.

This was a work to which the soldiers were accustomed, and they responded to his command with hearty good will.

But though the hastily-constructed mass of stones trembled before the attack which was made upon it, yet it did not give way.

Our friends had taken care that each piece should be wedged in firmly.

Repulsed on this first occasion, the soldiers immediately prepared for a second and more vigorous charge.

They made use of the butt-ends of their muskets for this purpose, and the concussion was so tremendous that several of the fragments were dislodged from their position, and rolled on to the floor of the cavern.

They were now able to see before them, though not much, for the highwaymen had scattered the fire about, and attempted to extinguish it.

The only illumination there was, was a dull red glare, which proceeded from the fast-expiring embers.

By the aid of this they could, nevertheless, see into the interior of the cavern.

Another rush removed some more of the fragments, and the consternation of our friends can be imagined when they saw their barricade thus rapidly demolished.

The captain of dragoons, having made this demonstration, conceived it to be his duty to call upon the highwaymen to surrender.

He did this in a very loud tone of voice, but no notice whatever was taken of his words.

He could neither hear nor see anyone in the cavern, and but for the fact that the last stone of the barricade had been added when he was within a short distance of it, he would have fancied the place to be untenanted.

Finding his first summons to surrender disregarded, he hazarded another, and this time coupled with the threat that if they did not immediately surrender, he should command his men to fire, and the consequences of their resistance would rest upon their own heads.

No more notice was taken of this than there was of his former appeal.

He waited a moment or two, however, when finding all remained still, he commanded his men to storm the barricade and enter the cavern.

Dick Turpin and his comrades now felt that they could no longer hold back from action.

At this crisis something must be done.

Nearly half the barricade had been removed, and the lower portion would probably be stormed with greater ease than the upper.

There was only one thing that would prevent this, and that was that the bottom block was of enormous size.

Nevertheless, our friends determined to strike a blow at their foes.

Suddenly, advancing into the middle of the cavern, they levelled the loaded pistols they held in their hands, and fired a volley.

Maud, who had been left by Dick in a place of safety, sprang forward, terrified for Dick's safety.

She clung to him, and he instinctively clasped her round the waist.

"Back—back!" he cried. "Back for your lives!"

He set the example of doing this while he spoke.

It would have been madness for them to have remained where they were, and to have exposed themselves to the fire of their enemies.

The detachment of dragoons was very densely packed in the little passage, which was only just wide enough for two men to stand abreast in, and the four bullets which came from the pistols of the highwaymen told upon them with terrible effect.

Enraged by this unexpected return for his temperate speech, the captain commanded his men to fire.

"Make ready!" he cried, in the stern, abrupt tones of military command. "Present!—fire!"

The command was obeyed instantly.

Almost before the last word had left his lips, a rattling discharge from the muskets of the dragoons raised a thousand echoes in that subterraneous place.

The bullets, one and all, harmlessly expended themselves against the wall of the cavern.

Indeed, it would seem as though the captain's object in causing this volley to be fired was more with the idea that it would cause a feeling of intimidation in the breasts of the highwaymen than aught else.

Certain is it, they were nowhere to be seen when the men fired.

If this was his object, it failed most lamentably; for our friends were the last people in the world to be dismayed into a surrender by the firing of a few musket-shots.

The captain was soon convinced of this, for the highwaymen, as soon as they found their foes had fired, stepped forward to the opening in the rock, and poured forth another volley, precipitately retreating as soon as their fingers had pressed the triggers.

This made the captain almost frantic.

Such a disastrous reception as this he had never counted upon.

In fact, his calculation was that the highwaymen would be overawed by his very appearance.

The repulse he met with, however, only served to make him still determined to effect his object.

He had now an additional motive, and this was a more powerful one than that which had first prompted him to undertake the expedition.

This was revenge.

He looked upon the death or capture of the four highwaymen with quite a personal feeling, and he determined within himself that, no matter at what risk, one of these should be accomplished.

He had himself received a slight wound in his left arm, and the pain which this occasioned tended not a little to enrage him.

Sword in hand, he rushed furiously upon the mass of rock, and set the example of scrambling over it.

This was what all his men had hesitated to do, because of the manifest danger they incurred by thus exposing their persons to the enemy.

But the captain was now wound up to such a pitch that he became utterly heedless of this.

After a desperate effort, he succeeded in scrambling on to the top of the barricade, and from thence he rapidly descended to the floor of the cavern.

To his surprise, he found that no attack whatever was made upon him, either while he was on the rock-work or when he reached the floor.

Inspired by his example, and encouraged by perceiving that their captain met with no mishap in consequence of this exploit, those dragoons who were unhurt, or only slightly wounded, also scrambled over the barrier into the cavern.

Almost as soon as his feet touched the ground, the captain found several of his men close behind him.

The interior of the cavern was now, however, in utter darkness, and they were unable to distinguish anything.

The fire had become quite extinct.

The highwaymen had scattered the embers which composed it in every direction, and, after having smouldered for a short time, they one after another expired.

At the present moment there was not one which emitted even the feeblest gleam of light.

All was silent too.

Their foes, who, from what had taken place, they imagined would greet them warmly, made no movement.

The captain turned round on his heels once.

Nothing, however, met his straining eyes but uniform, utter darkness.

The silence, too, continued.

Where were the highwaymen, from whom they had already suffered so severely?

That was a mystery.

They made no demonstration of their presence whatever.

The captain began to grow terribly apprehensive.

He dreaded he knew not what.

The prominent idea in his mind was that he was about to be stricken down by some hideous, unexpected, and invisible danger.

A thousand times more preferable would it have been to his feelings had the highwaymen continued to attack them as they had done at first.

"Lights! lights!" he cried, in a voice rendered so unlike his own by apprehension and anxiety, that his men scarcely recognised it. "Lights, I say! Let us have lights!"

When he had thus imperiously uttered this command, he felt calmer.

He knew that in a moment or so he would be obeyed, for his men were all provided with materials for obtaining a light readily.

It was while in this suspenseful state, however, that there came to his ears a hollow, rumbling sound.

All his men heard it, for the noise was considerable, but what it proceeded from they were unable to form any idea.

It was like nothing which they had heard in the whole course of their lives.

They could only compare it to the muttering of thunder, or the roaring sound which is heard from a cannon when discharged from a great distance,

This added not a little to the uneasiness of the captain's mind.

He connected the sound, naturally enough, with the highwaymen; but then, he asked himself, what could they be about?

The horrible thought that they were about to take some step which would involve himself and his men in utter destruction, took possession of his mind, and the thought was of such a nature as almost to drive him mad.

Fortunately, at this moment the soldiers succeeded in igniting the torches which they had brought with them.

They held them high in the air, so as to diffuse their light as much as possible.

At first they were quite inadequate to disperse the darkness, which seemed to hang about the cavern in large clouds.

Gradually, however, their brightness increased.

With his eyeballs almost starting from their sockets, the captain of the dragoons glared all about him.

But his gaze rested not upon the forms of his foes, nor did they, even now, make the least demonstration of their presence.

This was most bewildering.

Snatching a torch from the hands of the soldier who stood nearest to him, the captain waved his sword round his head, and advanced still nearer to the centre of the cavern.

But he saw no one.

Heard no one.

Again he raised his voice, and called upon the highwaymen, in the king's name, to surrender, and again pronounced that, if they would submit quietly, and without resistance, their lives should be spared, and their persons be uninjured.

But he might as well have addressed his words to the rocky walls of the cavern for all the notice that was taken of them.

By this time the torches had all fairly caught light, and by their aid he was able to see around him.

But his eyes rested not on the forms he wished to see, and the thought obtruded itself, and refused to be banished, that he should even now be baulked of capturing them, although a little while ago he seemed to stand so good a chance of doing so.

With his heart relieved from a great many of the vague apprehensions that had pressed upon it, the captain commenced a rigid exploration of the cavern.

Its area was large, but it was not long before he had been all over it.

He had encountered no one, nor had he been able to perceive the least trace of those he so much wished to find.

His doubts now began to multiply, indeed, although he would not have confessed it, he almost feared that his chances of effecting their capture were small indeed.

In the cavern they certainly were not.

He was quite convinced of that, because he had been over the whole area of it himself.

He had noticed, however, that there were numerous recesses in the rock, and these he determined should be thoroughly explored, one by one, so that if they had concealed themselves they should not escape detection.

With this end in view, he first of all caused a man to seat himself upon the partially-demolished barricade, who was to see that no one attempted to leave the cavern by that means, while he, with the rest, who were in a condition to do so, entered the recesses in succession, and explored them in every part.

We have previously alluded to and described these places.

They were simply indentations in the rock, and had no outlet.

Of this the soldiers quickly satisfied themselves.

One after another they entered these places, but without achieving any result whatever.

The highwaymen were not in any of them, nor was there a trace of their recent presence.

There were more recesses, however, to examine, and they houyed themselves up with the hope of making the wished-for discovery in one of these.

As they proceeded, however, and increased the number of recesses they had discovered, their hopes grew less and less.

At length they came close to the one they had first entered.

Close to this was one more cavity, and this was the only one left to examine.

If they did not find the highwaymen here, their disappearance would remain an inscrutable mystery.

Hoping, and yet scarcely daring to hope, when they thought of the many disappointments they had already experienced, that they were on the right track at last, and that the highwaymen would either be discovered or the mystery of their disappearance elucidated, the captain and his soldiers thronged into this recess, the entrance of which was much narrower than any of the rest.

CHAPTER CCCXCIII.

THE DRAGOONS FAIL TO DISCOVER THE HIGHWAYMEN, BUT THE MYSTERY OF THEIR DISAPPEARANCE IS REVEALED TO THE READER.

SUCH being the case, it immediately became blocked up, and the dragoons in their efforts to enter it quickly, did nothing but impede their own progress.

The captain was first, however, and he knocked his torch against a projection of the rock so as to remove the charred portion, and caused it to burn more brightly.

He then glanced about him.

In its general appearance this recess differed but slightly from those he had previously examined, except that it grew rapidly wider and higher.

Pressing forward, and not paying so much attention to where he trod as he ought to have done, he called out to his troopers to follow him, and they obeyed with great alacrity, the moment the difficulty of passing through the narrow entrance was overcome.

Suddenly the captain, after proceeding about twenty paces, came to a halt, and, at the same time, uttered an exclamation of surprise and astonishment.

He discovered that he could go no further.

Before him was a mass of earth which completely blocked up the passage.

From the peculiar smell which this earth gave forth the captain could tell that it had been recently disturbed.

There was some deep mystery here, he felt convinced, and he waved his torch anxiously round and round his head, in the endeavour to discover something more.

In this, however, he was unsuccessful.

His men now all crowded eagerly around him.

They, too, held their torches aloft, and, though there was now a great accession of light, yet it did not seem to show them any more than they at first perceived.

The fresh smell of this earth, coupled with the manner in which the passage was blocked up with it, made the captain fancy that a portion of the roof of this passage had recently fallen in.

He then remembered the peculiar roaring sound which he had heard while in the outer cavern, and for which he had not been able to account.

The noise now, he all at once recollected, was such as would be occasioned by the fall of a large mass of either rock or earth.

By what he saw before him, he was driven to the conclusion that this had taken place, and, on conferring with his men, he found they were of the same opinion as himself.

This seemed to afford a clue to the disappearance of the highwaymen which had so much perplexed him.

They might have sought shelter in this place, and either intentionally caused the roof to fall, or else they had been buried beneath it.

Which of these two it was he had no idea, and both were merely suppositions, so that it was possible for him to be mistaken.

The passage being obviously filled up with a mass of earth which had fallen from the roof was a suspicious circumstance, but nothing more.

For some time both he and his men remained gazing blankly at the obstruction in their path, but awakening at last to the inutility of this, he turned round, though still undecided as to what he had better do.

He almost repented now that he had embarked in this enterprise at all.

He had gained nothing by it but disappointment, and had lost two or three of his men.

The prospect, too, of his being able to gain anything seemed slight, and his breast was filled with a feeling of deep vexation.

At length he determined to make his way into the outer cavern, and there hold a council of war with his men.

He felt it a relief to have decided upon something, and he ordered his men to leave the passage.

He was never more willingly obeyed than in the present instance; for the soldiers, having come to the conclusion that the roof had fallen in, exchanged anxious glances with each other; for they did not know how soon the portion beneath which they stood would also fall and crush them.

This was by no means a pleasant thought; and as soon as they were commanded to do so, they cleared out with uncommon expedition.

The captain never once dreamt of this danger, and he wondered at the extraordinary alacrity which his men displayed.

He followed them, and, on emerging into the cavern, his ear was saluted with a succession of groans.

These came from the lips of his wounded soldiers.

The two volleys which our friends had fired had done terrible execution, for it was like shooting down a tube thronged with men.

Several of the dragoons had been severely hit, and it was feared that the hurts of one or two would prove fatal.

The captain had forgotten this, and now that he was reminded of it, he felt greatly exasperated as this result was so different to what he expected.

The wounded dragoons, hearing and seeing their companions approaching, cried out for assistance, and implored for a light to be left with them.

While in the passage, the captain had had all the men who carried torches along with him, so that the cavern was plunged in utter darkness, of which the wounded men bitterly complained.

Their leader felt that he was imperatively called upon to see that their injuries were attended to.

Now that the fire no longer burnt upon the hearth, a chill atmosphere filled the cavern, and the captain shuddered as he felt its influence.

The night was one of intense frost, and the biting air found its way through the numberless crevices in the roof.

At this moment the captain struck his foot against something, and, looking down to find what it was, discovered it to be a partially-burnt piece of wood.

It was a log that had been knocked off by the highwaymen when they had dispersed the fire and scattered the materials of which it was composed about the floor of the cavern.

"Make a fire," cried the captain, as soon as he saw what it was that lay at his feet. "There seems to be plenty of material, and you have your torches to light it with. Make haste, and then we will consult together as to what had best be done."

The stone slab, which was fixed in the floor for the purpose of a fire, was quickly discovered by the men, as they roamed about picking up the fuel, and as there were several of them engaged in the work, there was soon a goodly heap piled up upon it.

With the torches they ignited it.

The half-burnt wood, some of which was still quite warm, lighted readily, and in less time than one would have thought possible, a large cheerful fire was burning, which not only dispensed that warmth of which they so much felt the need, but illuminated the cavern with much greater power than the torches had done.

The wounded dragoons were now placed at a convenient distance from the fire, and their comrades attended to their hurts as well as they were able.

Two, however, were judged to be in such a precarious state that the captain judged it his duty to despatch one of his men to fetch a surgeon, for it would never have done to have moved them.

There was water in abundance in the cavern, and with this their wounds were washed, and their parching thirst assuaged.

Nothing more could be done for them now until the surgeon arrived, and the brave fellows, aware of this, did not utter another murmur, but waited patiently until he came.

In the meantime, the fire having been replenished, the captain called his men around him to hold his intended conference.

Happening to see a cask, he rolled it up to the fire, and sat down upon it.

It was the identical cask upon which the Rev. Mr. Martext had stood when he performed the remarkable marriage ceremony between Maud Gouldman and Dick.

A rather animated consultation now ensued as to the course it would be most prudent for them to adopt.

Many suggestions were made, and many hypotheses started to account for the disappearance of the highwaymen.

The prevalent notion appeared to be, not that they had been buried by the fall of the roof, or that they had escaped, but that they were hiding somewhere close at hand, and waiting for them to take their departure.

Many arguments were brought forward in support of this view; and, in the end, it was determined that they should all remain where they were with their ears open—until the surgeon arrived, at least—by which time they thought something would happen to show whether they were correct or not.

Having brought themselves into this frame of mind, we will leave them seated by the fire, listening eagerly for any slight sound which might happen to strike upon their ears, while we proceed to give the real and true explanation of the mysterious disappearance of our friends.

We should have done so earlier, but that it was deemed best to relate the whole of the proceedings of the soldiers to this point, so that, when we once commenced, we should not have to break off the thread of the narrative.

We resume, then, at that period when our friends, rapidly advancing, fired their second volley, after having done which they rapidly retreated.

They were just in time to avoid the bullets from the muskets of the dragoons, which flattened themselves against the opposite wall of the cavern.

It may be imagined that our friends suffered no small amount of apprehension when they saw the very energetic manner in which they were attacked, and when they perceived how little their ardour was damped by the execution they felt certain they had already done among them.

"It is all over with us," whispered Dick, who took in at one comprehensive glance all their chances and all their dangers. "It is all over with us, without we can contrive to leave the cavern in some way. In another moment they will be upon us, and if it comes to a hand-and-hand encounter on level ground I fear we shall get the worst off, for their numbers seem to exceed ours by far, and you may depend they are well skilled in the use of the weapons they carry."

"You have hit the right nail on the head, Dick," said Tom King: "but how we are to leave the cavern I cannot imagine. We have once explored it, and were only able to find one outlet."

"True! and yet, ever since that affair of the serpent I have fancied that we must have been in error."

"We can but make the attempt to leave the cavern," said Claude Duval; "if we fail in doing so, we cannot make our situation worse than it is at present."

"That is, if we are expeditious."

"Certainly."

"Come, then; there is an opening in the rocks just behind us. Let us enter there."

They did so.

Dick Turpin, with his arm round the waist of Maud, followed Tom King, who was the first to enter the recess.

The rear was brought up by those inseparable companions, Claude Duval and Sixteen-String Jack.

They were only just in time in entering the recess, for at this moment the captain of the dragoons was climbing over the barricade.

Sixteen-String Jack had in his pocket a small dark lantern, and as they walked along he lighted it.

A bright beam of light came through the lens, and though this was by no means sufficient to light up the place in which they were, yet it enabled them to see to some extent where they were going.

As they advanced, they found the indentation in the side of the cavern increase rapidly in width and height.

Sixteen-String Jack directed the ray of light for them.

Suddenly Tom King paused.

The passage became narrower, and the roof lower.

"Take care," he said; "the roof is much lower here, you had better stop here all of you."

As he spoke, he set the example of doing as he had directed, and continued on his way.

Claude Duval came last, but, either owing to his great height, or else to his not having stooped sufficiently, caught his head rather a violent blow against a sharp piece of rock, which hung down from the roof like a stunted icicle.

He uttered a cry, which instantly attracted his companions' attention, and they turned round, for, of course, they could not tell what had happened.

"Confound it," said Claude, "I have struck my head a tremendous blow against something."

He turned round as he uttered these words, and then perceived the curiously-shaped piece of rock which hung down from the centre of the roof of the passage in an exceedingly dangerous and awkward manner.

"This is it," he cried, the moment he saw it.

"Come on," Claude cried to his companions.

"All right, I am coming."

Our old friend had taken hold of this piece of rock while he had been speaking, and now, instead of letting go of it, he gave it a vigorous pull.

It was the pain of the blow he had received which prompted him to do this as being a species of revenge.

But he was totally unprepared for the startling effect produced by this apparently simple action.

To his unutterable astonishment, the piece of rock came away in his grasp as he tugged at it, and immediately there came the rushing, roaring sound which had struck so much alarm to the heart of the captain of dragoons.

The roof of the passage had fallen in.

Fortunate for them was it that our friends did not linger while Claude did this.

If they had done so they could not possibly have escaped destruction.

As it was, Claude Duval almost paid with his life for what he done.

When he seized the piece of depending rock and pulled it, he was already in the act of following in the steps of his companions, and, ere the roof fell, he had got several paces.

To this alone can be attributed his escape.

Had he remained stationary, he must have been buried beneath the mass.

Even as it was, he felt himself suddenly prostrated to the earth by the earth falling upon him.

Both Turpin and Sixteen-String saw their companion's danger.

The first released himself from Maud, and the second dropped the lantern.

Together they darted forward, and, seizing Claude by both his arms, dragged him from his terrible situation.

Scarcely had they done so, than a fresh quantity of earth came rolling down, so that, if he had not been thus promptly extricated, he would have been smothered before their eyes.

He was so lucky as to escape with only a few slight bruises and a shake.

For some few moments there was such a cloud of dust that our friends could hardly breathe, but it subsided.

They were now in total darkness, for the lantern was extinguished by its fall.

Their situation now was terrible.

They could not tell how soon some other portion of the roof would fall and involve them in a common destruction.

The first thing Sixteen-String Jack did, after rescuing his friend, was to stoop down and grope after the lantern.

At length his hand encountered it, and, almost dreading to see what its light would reveal, he ignited it.

Upon the faces of all an expression of the greatest consternation was depicted.

Slowly Jack raised the lantern.

All eyes followed the direction of the bright beam of light, eager and yet dreading to see what it might disclose.

By chance it so happened that Jack's face was turned towards the spot where the roof had fallen in, and, as a matter of course, the light of the lantern turned in that direction also.

The same, or nearly the same sight, met their gaze as the captain of dragoons saw from the other side.

The way by which they had gained the spot upon which they stood was entirely blocked up with a mass of crumbling earth.

Speechless and surprised, they gazed upon this extraordinary phenomenon.

How to account for it they scarcely knew.

The only conclusion they could come to was that the piece of rock which Claude had seized was like the keystone of an arch, and alone supported the immense mass of earth above.

CHAPTER CCCXCIV.

DICK TURPIN AND HIS COMPANIONS FIND THEMSELVES IMPRISONED IN A LIVING TOMB.

THERE can be very little doubt that if this piece of rock had remained undisturbed much longer, it would have given way of itself.

It was manifestly inadequate to support so tremendous a weight, and Claude, seizing it as he did, only anticipated that which would ere long have taken place of its own accord.

Sixteen-String Jack directed the light of his lantern over every part of the fallen earth, but he did not speak.

Dick Turpin was the first to recover himself.

He spoke in a tone of encouragement to his companions.

"There is a barrier now," he said, "between our enemies and ourselves, which, I fancy, they will have some trouble to surmount."

"It has been a narrow escape for us," said Claude Duval, drawing a long breath as he thought of his own danger, "but we ought not to feel displeased at this accident, for the earth falling as it has, between our enemies and ourselves, looks like a good omen, and will prove an insurmountable obstacle to them."

Sixteen-String Jack said nothing, but turned round.

A thought had occurred to him to which he felt he scarcely dared give utterance.

It was an awful one, and his heart fluttered strangely, and his hand shook.

His companions, however, did not appear to observe his agitation, or if they did they took no notice of it.

Perhaps they attributed it to the peril from which they had so recently escaped.

But such was not the cause of it.

It was a peril that was in perspective, and which did not seem to occur to the others at all.

Slowly, then, as we have said, he turned round until his back was towards the fallen earth.

Then he directed the light of the lantern before him, and glanced in that direction.

He could not repress a slight exclamation which rose to his lips, though he strove hard to do so.

Before him he should have seen a continuation of the passage.

But he did not.

The light of the lantern fell only upon an almost perfectly smooth piece of rock.

"Trapped!" he exclaimed. "My worst fears are realized."

These words at once made the others sensible of the extent of their danger.

"Trapped!"

All echoed his word.

They could do no more.

Tom King sprang forward, and Sixteen-String Jack flashed the lantern rapidly around him.

The only result which followed this, however, was the complete realization of what he had stated.

An examination of the place in which they were showed it to be a small and nearly circular cavern, the diameter of which was somewhere about fifteen feet.

Its height they could not estimate.

The rays of the lantern, when directed upwards, became lost in the deep gloom, and discovered no signs of a roof.

The falling earth had choked up the passage which led into this cavern, which was formed in some places of a kind of clayey soil, and in others of masses of rock.

They were prisoners, hopelessly prisoners, and as they gazed into each others' countenances, by the dim light which the lantern afforded, they saw nothing but the utmost consternation imprinted upon each.

Maud clung tightly to Dick's arm.

Her whole form was convulsed with terror.

It was excusable if they all felt appalled by their frightful situation.

The danger which they had just escaped seemed now to be not half so great as it had first appeared.

It was some moments before either of them could command their voices sufficiently to speak with calmness.

The silence of that dark and gloomy cavern was truly terrible and heart-chilling, while the darkness with which it was filled seemed to press upon their spirits like a pall.

It was during this strange and awful stillness that the dragoons came into the recess, and arrived at the opposite side of the mass of earth which choked it up.

But our friends heard them not, and were altogether unconscious of their proximity.

The quantity of soil which separated them was so great that scarcely any sound, no matter how loud, would have been able to penetrate it.

Sixteen-String Jack roused himself from the state of abject abstraction into which he, in common with the rest, had fallen.

Once more he waved his lantern around, and successively let its light fall upon different portions of the walls of the cavern.

Almost mechanically the eyes of all followed upon its devious course, but without meeting with the least encouragement.

The damp walls of the cavern looked inexpressibly gloomy, and their spirits sunk still lower in their breasts.

Could they but have thought of some words of encouragement to utter to the rest, they would have spoken.

It was vain for them to try this, for there was nothing to suggest hopefulness.

Dick Turpin, feeling probably that he was looked up to as a chief by the others, was the first to shake off this apprehensive kind of nightmare which pressed so heavily upon them all.

But it was not until after he had made violent and repeated efforts that he was able to do this.

"My comrades," he said, in a voice shaken with emotion.

At the sound, all turned towards him, and Sixteen-String Jack raised the lantern, so that the bright beam of light which streamed through the lens should fall upon his countenance.

"My comrades," said Dick again, "in escaping from one danger we have fallen into one which seems to be of even a more terrible character. Before we had at least the chance which an encounter would have given us; now it seems we are imprisoned in the bowels of the earth. The examination we have already made has shown us that this cavern has, or had, but one entrance and exit. That is now choked up with many tons of earth—so many that it would be useless for us, with such inadequate tools as we possess, to attempt to tunnel our way through it. Here is a cheerless prospect, but yet I think we ought not to lose all hope."

Dick said this, but he did not feel it.

He was desirous, however—and it was a praiseworthy desire—to instil hope into the bosom of his companions, who he could tell had abandoned themselves to despair.

No one liked to say where are we to look for hope, or there seems no prospect of it, and yet that was precisely what all thought.

The probability that the circular cavern in which they stood would prove to them a living tomb was so frightfully strong that it seemed to palsy all their energies.

Turpin's speech, however, produced one good effect.

It seemed to break the spell of silence which had fallen upon them.

Now that he had spoken, the others recovered the use of their speech.

They endeavoured, too, to speak in a strain which was at total variance with the state of their feelings.

It was Sixteen-String Jack who said—

"It is true we have not been able to discover any outlet as yet, but still, for all that, one may exist."

"When we searched, you must bear in mind we were in a state of great excitement, in consequence of the shock of alarm which we had received. When we have recovered our calmness, I should recommend that we commence our examination afresh."

"If we can but succeed in effecting our escape from this place," said Tom King, with a slight shudder, "the circumstance of the roof of the passage having fallen in will be a fortunate enough one."

"True," said Claude Duval; "and I think there is some consolation to be derived from the fact that I escaped being buried as I did."

"You have had two narrow escapes of your life, lately, Claude," said Turpin, "but as yet all is well."

"To be sure, my case has looked very desperate, but yet here I am, and not much the matter with me either," replied Claude; "so there is, to some, hope to be distilled out of that."

"It is to be hoped that things will turn out better than they at present promise to do," said Tom King.

"If there is one thing I hate more than another, it is burrowing in the earth in this manner," said Claude Duval; "and once let me get out of this scrape, and I don't think you will ever find me getting beneath the surface of the earth again."

"There is something very disagreeable about it, I admit," replied Dick Turpin. "But come, my comrades, this talk is all very well, and may, perhaps, in one way have done us some good. I propose, however, that we set about a careful and rigid examination of this cavern."

This proposition was immediately agreed to by all.

It would either have the effect of consigning them to despair, or else would fill their breasts with hope.

They did not dare to think of the consequences, should this second examination terminate in the same manner as the first.

Wisely they looked at the brightest side, and continued to hope on for the best.

Sixteen-String Jack handed the lantern to Dick Turpin, who, the moment he received it, set about making this important examination—the result of which would be so serious.

Maud released the hold which she had hitherto maintained upon his arm, and, clasping her hands together, followed him in speechless anxiety.

Dick commenced his examination of the wall of the cavern at the spot where the earth had fallen in.

By this means he would be able to tell for certain when he had completed the circuit of it.

Some such mark as this was quite necessary.

The cavern walls looked very cheerless

In most places they were damp with the moisture which exuded from the clay of which they were composed.

Strange fungic vegetation covered them in many places.

After examining the wall for some few paces, Dick perceived a cleft or fissure.

It was but small, and so narrow that it would not have admitted the person of one of them; still it might lead somewhere.

If so, then, the opening could be enlarged.

Under this impression he plunged his sword in.

But the blade penetrated a few inches only, and then struck against the rock with a sharp sound.

That hope, then, was destroyed, and he once mo e continued.

He did not hurry.

He well knew that there was time enough and to spare, and so he resolved that the examination should be a rigid one.

With this intent he let the bright beam of light rest for a moment upon every square inch of the wall, from the floor of the cavern up to as high a point as the ray would reach.

What was above, or how high the roof might be, he had no means of telling.

He only knew that it must be very many feet above their heads.

Gradually, then, Dick Turpin, accompanied by Maud and his three comrades, worked his way round the cavern.

At every step that was taken the frail hope into which they had cheated themselves faded away, until at length, when they reached the mass of fallen earth again without having found what they so anxiously sought, it was dissipated completely.

They were now forced to the conclusion that there was but one mode by which that strange, circular-looking cavern could be entered and left, and that was by the outlet which the earth had completely filled up.

There was not one now who dared to look into the countenances of their comrades.

Too well they knew the expression which appeared upon their own, and they desired to encounter it upon the countenance of another.

Dick Turpin groaned slightly, as he said—

"My friends, our last hope is over now. Our fate threatens to be a fearful one, but we must meet it with what boldness we can."

"It is clear there is no means of leaving this place, and the consequences of a long stay here are so obvious that I need not mention them. It seems as though we were all destined to perish from starvation. If such is to be our fate, let us endeavour to meet it with firmness."

A deep silence followed these words.

Under such circumstances, who could speak?

Death—lingering, painful death—stared them in the face.

It was impossible for them to escape.

They must remain where they were and perish by slow degrees.

To add to the inconveniences of their position, Dick now found that the lamp was beginning to burn dimly, and showing unequivocal symptoms of expiring.

Anxiously he inquired whether any of his comrades had the means to replenish it.

But they had not, and, after flickering for a few moments, the flame went out.

They were now plunged in total darkness.

The consolation that the light of the lamp would have afforded they were deprived of, and their situation, terrible as it was before, seemed now to redouble in horror.

It was now impossible for them to see each other, and the only proof they had of the existence of their comrades was when they spoke or touched them.

A more deplorable condition than theirs now was could not be imagined.

Destitute of food, deprived of light, without fire, buried alive in the bowels of the earth without the faintest hope of release, such was the position of those whose fortunes we have followed with so much interest.

Everyone now abandoned themselves to despair, and it is not to be wondered at that under such circumstances as these they lost all strength of mind.

In this state time passed slowly and wearily away.

How many hours elapsed they knew not.

They were dead to all such knowledge.

There was one thing which slowly forced its way upon their minds.

It was this.

The cavern had been examined by them and found to have no outlet.

Nevertheless they became aware that it was filled with fresh, cool air.

Where this came from was a mystery, and they were endeavouring to account for it, when they became conscious that a soft and gentle light was beginning to fill the place.

This at once brough the outer cavern to their recollection, which, as we have already described, was tolerably well lighted in the daytime by meaus of the crevices innumerable in the roof of it.

From some such cause as this the light, which now every moment increased in power, proceeded.

Wearily and listlessly they turned their eyes upward

They were right.

It was day, and the soft, beautiful light that illuminated the earth above came streaming down upon them.

It so happened that all looked up at precisely the same moment, so the discovery was made simultaneously.

A cry of hope and joy came from their lips.

The light came through the roof of the cavern, but, instead of finding its way through so many small openings as it did in the outer one, it came through one aperture of apparently considerable dimensions.

It was high above their heads; but, as the sun rose and the light increased, they were able to see the blue sky, upon which they had scarcely hoped to look again.

It was afar off, it is true; but still they derived some consolation from the bare fact of being able to look upon it.

"Hope! my friends, hope!" cried Dick Turpin, in almost joyous tones; "there is hope for us yet! Do you see that opening in the roof above? It is at a great height from the floor, but we must reach it by some means, and then our freedom will be secured."

His companions shook their heads.

"Do not be sanguine, captain, over this."

It appears to be about as easy for us to reach that opening as it does for us to bore a hole through the earth."

"Not so, not so," cried Dick; "it will be, no doubt, a difficult task for the first person to reach the earth above us, but the others will have little trouble. The one who stands above will be able to render immense assistance to those below, and help them out of this place easily."

"But how is the opening to be reached?"

"That is a point which we have plenty of time to consider; but, before we attempt to do anything, there are one or two things that we must take into consideration and consult upon."

CHAPTER CCCXCV.

IN WHICH DICK TURPIN SUCCEEDS IN EFFECTING HIS ESCAPE FROM THE CAVERN, AND STEALS UNAWARES UPON HIS FOES.

THE cheerful, animated tones in which Dick Turpin spoke could not fail to be productive of a good effect in the minds of his comrades.

They felt themselves revived by them, and roused from that despairing apathy into which they had been plunged.

They looked about them with better spirits, and prepared themselves to listen attentively to what their captain had to say.

The daylight, too, which found its way in and revealed their countenances to each other, had an invigorating effect upon their spirits, and altogether the alteration in their feelings which now took place was really wonderful when contrasted with their state a few moments before.

Dick spoke:

"My comrades," he said, "in our anxiety to escape from this place we must not forget that the chase is occupied by our foes, to whom our sudden disappearance must seem almost marvellous. That they will search narrowly for us you may be sure, from the vigorous and determined manner in which they attacked us. Such being the case, it will be our most prudent course to remain here for a time, so as to give them an opportunity to withdraw."

To this all assented, but as they did so, they glanced up at the aperture so far above them, as much as to say, "It is well for us to talk of remaining when there is such a slight chance of our getting away."

Dick could tell this was the thought that occupied their minds, but he did not allude to it.

"I have more to say, my comrades," he continued, "if you will listen to me."

"You may depend upon our doing that, captain," they replied.

"Very well, then. Under the circumstances, then, I think even if we had the chance it would be very unsafe and unwise for us to leave this place until we had some knowledge respecting the dragoons, or found out, in some way, that they had left the chase."

"Exactly, captain, but—"

"Nay, listen, and do not interrupt. I will be brief in what I have to say. This place serves us as a place of concealment, and I think there is little fear of our being discovered here by our foes. Is not that your opinion?"

"Most certainly.

"Then I will tell you what I have to propose, and I think, when you hear it, that you will agree with me that it is the best thing we can do."

"Speak, captain; we are all impatience."

"Fortunately, then, we have all made a hearty meal, and though we may be hungry, yet we can manage, no doubt, to go without food for some hours to come. I would recommend, then, that we stay here until night. By that time I doubt not the patience of the dragoons will be exhausted, and they will withdraw for a time. We ought to ascertain, however, before we leave this place, whether they have gone or not."

"It would be quite as well, captain, but how is it to be done?"

"That is just the point. Now I think that I shall be able to reach the roof of the cavern, and if I can succeed in this, all will be well. I must confess I have no doubt about being able to do this in my own mind, and therefore, with your permission, we will suppose that it is done."

His comrades could not forbear smiling at the confident tone in which he spoke.

Unheeding this, however, he continued.

"When I reach the top, I shall want you all four to remain perfectly still where you are until I come back to you. My course of action will be this. As cautiously and stealthily as I can I shall make my way about the chase, and endeavour to discover whether the dragoons have left or not. I shall be able to ascertain this beyond all doubt. If they have taken their departure, well and good. I will procure a rope or something of that kind by which I can assist you to leave this place. Then as to when we once stand under the sky again, future circumstances can alone determine."

The three highwaymen exchanged glances with each other while Turpin was speaking, and as soon as he had finished, Tom King said—

"If one of us can get out of the aperture above, all will be well. You say you have some scheme in your head for doing this?"

"I have."

"I rejoice to hear it. You will tell us what it is?"

"Of course."

"Then I have an amendment to propose."

"What is it?"

"Instead of going yourself, I will go."

"Nay, nay, Tom. I guessed what you were about to say, but I tell you, once for all, my mind is made up, and I will not allow myself to be turned by anyone!"

"I am sorry you are so determined as you appear to be, because I consider that it would have done quite as well if I had gone on this reconnoitring expedition."

"Don't oppose me, Tom. I have set my heart upon it."

"I shall not gainsay a word you may utter, captain."

"Very good, then. Do not press this. It will be useless if you do. I shall remain firm."

"That is enough, then."

"I am glad to hear you say as much. And now I think you will agree with me that it would be better if we were to remain here until nightfall."

"Decidedly."

"The dragoons will be more likely to have taken their departure by that time than if I was to start now."

"We don't question that, captain."

"Well, then, the best thing we can do is to make ourselves as comfortable as we can in these uncomfortable quarters."

To this his comrades immediately assented; and such was the implicit confidence they had in him that they did not even urge him to tell them how he proposed to perform the apparently impossible task of climbing up to the roof of the cavern.

Having made up their minds as to what should be done, and feeling the amount of confidence in their leader which they did, the day passed away much more pleasantly than anyone would have expected.

To be sure, the brief winter's day seemed to them to equal the longest one in summer. But this is scarcely surprising.

As well as they could they relieved the monotony by conversation, and at length, towards mid-day, thoroughly overcome with fatigue and exhaustion, they laid down upon the damp floor of the cavern and slept.

They were aroused by some kind of noise.

What, they knew not, but they instinctively directed their gaze upward.

What they saw there was enough to unnerve them, and, if in their surprise they had shouted out, they could scarcely have been wondered at or blamed.

As it was, they remained silent.

They were so astonished and so absorbed that they were deprived of the power of utterance, until they became aware that it was necessary to their safety to remain silent.

The cause of the noise which had disturbed them became manifest at once.

Upon looking up to the orifice in the roof, they perceived that it was darkened by something which they could not at first make out, but almost immediately they discovered that several men were standing round the opening, and endeavouring to look down into it.

These could be no other than the dragoons.

Our friends were not much alarmed at this, because they knew it was impossible for them to be seen by anyone standing on the brink of the pit, for such it would appear to be to anyone standing on the level ground in the chase.

The dragoons were talking, and by listening attentively our friends could distinguish all they said.

"This is a strange looking place; that's all I can say about it," remarked one.

"You are right there."

"What should you take it to be?"

"A pit, unquestionably."

"That's what it is, I think myself."

"Do you think it can have any communication with the cavern?"

"Ah! there you puzzle me, comrade, and I feel myself unable to give an opinion."

"It might be so."

"As you say, it might."

"It's a very strange thing where those fellows can have disappeared to."

"Well, my conviction you already know; there is some secret passage leading out of that cavern. They have availed themselves of it, and are, doubtless, far enough away by this time."

"I fear you are right."

"I fear so too; and this enterprise, which promised to turn out so well, will prove a failure."

"I am afraid so, but if it does it will be no fault of ours. We have done the best we could."

"Very true, comrade, and I think we shall do little if any good by remaining here any longer. Have you any idea whether the captain intends to stay, or what he was going to do?"

[DICK TURPIN AND MAUD ESCAPING FROM THE CAVERN.]

"No. That wound in his arm, which he at first thought nothing of, is playing the bear with him, and there is no knowing what he will do."

"There it is, but I am more disgusted with this police officers work now than ever."

"Don't get on to that subject. What do you think about this pit? The very fellows we want might be concealed in it."

"They might, but I don't think it's very likely. I'll tell you what we will do."

"What?"

"Form round in a circle and fire a volley down into it."

"A good thought."

"Stop a moment comrades," said another voice; "do you see this large stone?"

"Yes."

"Well, then, instead of wasting our powder and shot by firing down on them, let us roll the stone over and over until it falls in."

"Agreed; that is a capital idea."

"You see comrades," said the man who had proposed the expedient of rolling the stone down; "if the pit is deep the stone will break into a thousand pieces on the bottom, and if anyone is there we shall know of it, I'll warrant."

"Let us call out first," said another, "and let them know what we are going to do; perhaps they will call out."

"There can be no harm in trying."

"Call out, then."

"No, you."

"Very well, I have no objection."

One of the dragoons now advanced to the mouth of the pit.

What the feelings of our friends were when they heard this conversation, we will leave the reader to guess.

They did hear it, however, and every word too.

The man who had agreed to warn them of their fate now called out—

"Hallo! below there! Is there anyone below there?"

He listened for a moment, but no reply came; and then, turning round, he addressed his comrades, saying—

"I don't think there is anybody there. However, I think I will call out again."

"Here, I will," said another; "perhaps your voice is not loud enough."

"There's no fear of their not hearing you, Samuel," said the rest.

A tall, bulky dragoon now stepped forward, and placing his hand to his mouth, bawled out—

"Hullo! below there. If there is anyone below, speak up, as we are going to roll a stone down. Hullo! Below, I say!"

This dragoon had a voice as powerful as his form, and it reverberated with extraordinary loudness in the dome-shaped cavern.

Still no notice was taken of it.

The dragoons listened, but there came no sound from below to indicate the presence of a living creature.

"There's nobody there," said the dragoon with the powerful voice.

"Never mind, we'll roll the stone in for all that."

"Oh! yes, by all means, for they are quite artful enough to keep quiet."

"So they are; but if they don't cry out when they hear this stone come down upon them, it's odd to me."

The idea of the soldiers was that it was a pit into which they looked, and they never dreamt that it might grow larger towards the bottom.

With one accord they now set about their self-imposed task of rolling the stone.

It was an enormous fragment of rock, and required their united strength to move it.

Slowly and gradually they got it towards the brink of the abyss.

A deep indentation was left in the earth where they had rolled it.

At length it overhung the brink.

One more touch and it would plunge down, and would, in consequence of its weight, acquire considerable momentum in its descent.

It would almost seem as though the soldiers had some dim and indistinct consciousness that there was someone below, for, having thus far carried out their intention, they paused, and made another appeal to those below.

But the result was the same.

As before, their words were responded to only by the echoes of their own voices.

Resolved, then, to dally no longer, they put their shoulders to the stone.

There was one united effort of strength, and then it gave way.

The earth on the verge of the abyss crumbled, and fell down in a shower, like a presage of that which was about to follow.

Then, with a rushing sound, the huge stone disappeared.

The dragoons, as they stood on the brink, heard the hissing sound of the air which was displaced by its descent.

Animated by a universal and spontaneous impulse of curiosity, all crowded round the pit, and looked down into it, or rather strove to do so, for, of course, they could not see far down.

They could not see the stone, but they fancied they could.

Anxiously they listened for the sound which should indicate that it had reached the bottom.

It came.

Crash!

The immense mass of rock struck the stone floor of the cavern, and broke, as the dragoon had prophesied, into a thousand fragments.

But after the awful sound had reached their ears, and the strange echoes which it raised had died away, they listened in vain for any cry or groan which should testify to the presence of those they were so eager to find.

The silence of the very grave itself ensued, and, after listening for a long time, the dragoons were compelled to confess themselves defeated in their expectation, and turned disappointedly away.

Unwillingly they were forced to come to the conclusion that they were mistaken, and they had no other resource than to recommence their search elsewhere.

This, as we know, would be resultless, and so we will not follow them on their bootless expedition, but relate how our friends fared when the heavy stone was rolled down upon them.

We have already stated that, by straining their sense of hearing to the utmost, they could hear almost every word of the conversation that took place between the dragoons, who spoke in rather a loud tone of voice.

The danger did not therefore fall upon them unawares.

They had time to think and devise some means of safety.

But this seemed to be impossible.

The floor of the cavern was, of course, very much larger in area than the opening in the roof, but still there was nothing to hope for in that circumstance.

There could be very little doubt that the stone would break into fragments, and that those pieces would fly with incredible velocity in every direction.

That none of these would strike our friends appeared in the highest degree improbable.

Indeed, they were threatened with severe injuries from them.

How were they to escape?

That was the question that immediately suggested itself to their minds, and they looked about them anxiously.

It was a question of such vital importance, that it had the effect of driving all others from their minds.

The dragoons spoke, but they heeded not their words—they were very thankful to think they had so much the more time left them for reflection, and to make their preparations.

"There is only one thing we can do," said Dick, hurriedly, after having looked around him. "There is only one thing that we can do, and that is far from being so safe and good as I could wish."

"What is it, Dick?" asked his comrades anxiously, for in that hour of imminent peril they naturally looked up to him as their leader. "Let us know what it is at once!"

"We had better all lie down," replied Turpin, "and get as close to the wall of the cavern as we can. That is our only chance. The fragments which will be chipped off the stone by its fall will have a natural tendency to fly upwards, and this is the sole means by which we can avoid them."

"We will do it," cried his comrades, in a suppressed voice. "We are saved from that danger at least."

"What we have most to apprehend," rejoined Dick Turpin, "is the large stone. But hasten, my comrades. Quick! quick, or we shall be too late!"

Not another word was said.

Choosing different parts of the cavern, our friends laid themselves down at full length on the floor of it, and turned their faces towards the wall.

Breathlessly, then, they awaited the result.

They heard the earth clatter down, and the next moment the huge piece of rock came swinging through the air.

CHAPTER CCCXCVI.

PARTICULARLY DESCRIBES THE EXTRAORDINARY MANNER IN WHICH TURPIN ESCAPED FROM THE CAVERN.

Involuntarily all suspended their breath.

They continued to do so while the stone descended.

It would be a vain task to endeavour to describe their feelings during this brief interval of time, and therefore we shall not attempt it.

The sensations apparently of hours were compressed into a few seconds.

They could not tell what would be the result of the fall of the fragment of rock.

It might be that one or more of them would be dangerously hurt, perhaps killed.

They were powerless to do anything to avert either.

At length, after to them an interval of sickening horror, the crush came.

It was terrific.

It smote upon their ears as no other sound had hitherto done.

The stone, striking upon the mass of rock of which the floor of the cavern was composed, was dashed to atoms.

The small fragments flew about like hail.

For about a second this fearful shower lasted, and then all was over.

The fragments struck against the walls of the cavern, and rebounded with incredible violence.

Soon, however, they all lay still upon the floor of the cavern, which was literally covered with the remains of the huge stone.

Then one by one our friends ventured to look up, each anxious to know whether the other had escaped.

Fortunately such was the case.

The precaution which Dick had suggested, and which had been adopted, was proved to be a good one.

As he had stated, the pieces that were chipped off by the violence of the concussion all flew upwards, and, from the position they occupied, they escaped without sustaining any injury whatever.

It was with the utmost joy they learned that they all had escaped the frightful peril with which they had been so fearfully menaced.

They crowded round each other, and expressed their satisfaction in whispers, for they were fearful of any sound reaching the listening ears above.

As they glanced upwards they could distinguish the dark forms of the dragoons as they bent over the abyss, and strove to pierce the obscurity which hid all things from their sight.

Our friends, however, were looking from darkness into light, and the forms of the dragoons were clearly defined against the morning sky.

At length they withdrew, and after waiting for a little while in silence, our friends ventured to speak with less restraint to each other.

Still they were cautious to a degree, for it was impossible for them to be sure that there was not one of their foes listening attentively above.

"We have one more narrow escape to be thankful for," Dick Turpin observed at length. "Believe me, I scarcely dared to hope that we should all remain unhurt as we have done."

"It is entirely owing to the excellence of the means you devised, captain," replied Tom King.

"Let us hope that we shall never be exposed to so terrible a danger again," said Sixteen-String Jack, shivering as he spoke.

"We must not forget," added Turpin, "that this circumstance will now turn out to our benefit. Our foes having, as we have seen, assured themselves that we are not here, will search for us elsewhere, and the chances are a thousand to one against their making any further examination of this place; consequently it will be the most secure place for us to remain in that can be imagined."

"You are right enough there," said Claude Duval; "but there is one thing which you must not overlook."

"What is that?"

"We are without provisions, and, consequently, for us to remain here longer is a sheer impossibility."

"I grant that freely. But do not for a moment imagine that I had forgotten anything about this. It is a great drawback; but what I have to propose is this. As soon as night comes on I will leave the cavern—or, at any rate, try to do so—and, when I have gained the open air, I shall reconnoitre the enemy. Doubtless, while on this excursion, I shall be able to obtain some provisions, and, if so, all will be well."

"But, supposing," said Tom King, "that you have succeeded in reaching the upper air—by-the-bye, I don't see how you are to do it—supposing it done, however, what shall you try to do?"

"Why, in the first place, to ascertain the whereabouts of our foes. When that much is accomplished, I should endeavour to find out as much respecting their movements as I could. If I thought they would remain here for a length of time, I would procure some provisions and rejoin you; if, on the contrary, I found they were about to leave the chase, I should keep in their track and watch their departure. I should assure myself that all left, and left without the intention of returning, and should notice whether any straggler was left behind or not. Then I should obtain the means of releasing you from this dungeon, for such it might well be called; after having done which, it would be quite time to consult and decide upon our future plan of operations."

"That sounds all very well, captain," said Sixteen-String Jack, "but the enterprise which you propose to undertake is both a difficult and a dangerous one."

"I am aware of that," rejoined Turpin; "and now that you know my intentions, let us consider the matter as settled. I shall be displeased if any one wishes to take my place."

This was enough.

The three highwaymen had too much respect for their captain to gainsay him in anything.

As for Maud, she did not speak.

She merely pressed tightly on Dick's arm.

After what he had said she would not have dreamt of raising her voice in opposition to his.

She trembled at the frightful amount of danger which, as a matter of course, he would incur, and which would be perfectly unavoidable.

Nevertheless, she had confidence in Dick's powers.

He had ere now been the hero of adventures apparently far more dangerous, and why should he not succeed in the present instance?

Maud believed that he would succeed, and this conviction was a great consolation to her.

She knew that they must all perish if some means of leaving the cavern could not be found.

About the achievement of this task Dick had spoken with great confidence.

But his companions appeared to look upon it as an impossibility.

If he was so much better able to overcome this difficulty than they were, why should it not be the same with all the rest?

From these considerations, then, did Maud forbear to utter a single word of remonstrance against his departure.

She deserved all praise for this manifestation of sound sense.

She looked upon the matter in a proper light, but there are few who would have looked upon it in this manner.

She did so, however, and Dick was pleased with her for it.

As for his comrades, they no longer continued to press their point.

Tom King, however, spoke.

"You have told us what you intend to do when you reach the upper air, captain," he said, "but you have not told us how you intend to leave this cavern."

"You will see in good time."

"But I am full of anxiety upon the point. Allay my curiosity, for I cannot help deeming it an impossibility. Could I be shown that it was not, I should feel all the more content."

Tom King was warmly seconded in this appeal by the two other members of the band, and Turpin, unable to withstand their importunities, consented to explain this to them.

He spoke as follows—

"When I was a boy," he said, "I saw a man—a mountebank—perform a feat very similar to the one I am about to attempt. At the time I saw him I was much struck with it, and the natural result of this was that I practised the feat continually until I was able to accomplish it."

At this commencement, the highwaymen prepared themselves to listen to what he had to say with redoubled interest.

"I will describe what I saw as well as I am able. An upright piece of wood was fixed in the ground. Its height appeared to be about thirty feet. The shape of this piece of wood was square, and it was perfectly straight. It was fixed in an upright position on the village green, where the exhibition took place. This post, if such I might term it, was pierced with circular holes, each about an inch in diameter, and at a distance of about two feet from each other. These holes commenced a short distance from the ground and were continued to the top."

"Do you mean that two sides of the square post were pierced in this manner, captain?" asked Claude Duval.

"Yes."

"I understand."

Dick continued.

"The mountebank now came forward and invited the company to observe this exercise of muscular strength, for so he termed it. He held in his hand two round pieces of wood. They were about ten inches in length, and about three quarters of an inch in diameter, so that they would fit easily in the holes drilled in the post, as I have mentioned. These pieces of wood having been inspected, he held one in each hand as one might a dagger. Advancing to the post, he raised his arm as high above his head as he could, and made a stab at the post. So correct was his aim, that the piece of wood he held in his hand entered one of the holes drilled to receive it. Keeping his body in a perpendicular position, this man raised himself off the ground slowly and gently by the mere strength of the muscles in his arm and in the hand where with he grasped the stick. He continued so to raise himself until his head was level with this peg, for the piece of wood, when thrust into the post in the manner I have described, had that appearance. Having done this much, he raised his other arm high above his head and thrust the piece of wood he held in it into the hole which was next above him. With this hand he raised himself in precisely the same manner, and continued to repeat this action until he had reached the top of the post, upon which a broad flat piece of wood was fixed, and on this he seated himself."

"It was a very remarkable feat," said Sixteen-String Jack, "and one that I have never seen or heard of."

"Nor I—nor I," coincided his companions.

"Of course," continued Dick, "the feat was a wonderful one from the amount of muscular strength necessary to perform it."

"Just so."

"One word more, and I have done; this man repeated the feat several times in succession, sometimes ascending with incredible speed and at other times very slowly. All this time, you must understand, his body hung down in a perpendicular position."

"Yes, but"——

"Wait a moment, and let me finish. As I told you, I was much struck with this feat, so much so that I practised it continually, and at length was able to perform it with as much dexterity as the man I had seen do it!"

"You will excuse me, captain," said Claude Duval, bluntly, "but although I have listened with great attention and interest to what you have just been saying, for the life of me I can't see how you are going to turn this to any account."

"Well, wait a little while and I will show you," replied Turpin, good humouredly; "I shall be able to do that much better than I shall be able to explain it. It will be dark ere long."

This conversation, which we have just set down, lasted for a considerable period, for we have given all that was said as briefly as possible.

A long time had elapsed since the stone had been hurled into the cavern, and since the dragoons had taken their departure, and the short winter's day was rapidly drawing to a close.

In a little while Turpin would put into execution his scheme for leaving the cavern.

His companions were full of curiosity upon the point, but he would not satisfy them.

At last he commenced his preparations.

He first produced from his pocket a strong, dagger-like knife.

It did not shut into a handle, but fitted into a sheath.

It was remarkably strong, and Tom King carried one exactly like it.

This Dick now asked for, and it was immediately given him.

Thus provided, our hero walked round and round the cavern, narrowly inspecting the walls. Pausing before one particular spot, he glanced upwards

"Now," he cried, "I am going to try my scheme, and you will no longer be in ignorance of what it is. I hope I shall be successful in what I am about to attempt."

His three companions, when they saw him with these two dagger-like knives in his hands, seemed to have some dim notion of his purpose, but all was doubt and uncertainty.

We have before had occasion to remark that the walls of the cavern differed widely in character.

In some places they were composed of solid rock, in others of clay, and in others of clay and small-sized pieces of stone mi was before a part of the wall of this description that Dick Turpin paused, and from previous observation during daylight, he was aware that it continued of the same quality up to the top.

Going close up to it, he raised one hand in the manner he had described, and then, striking one fierce blow, he buried the dagger-like knife up to the haft in the earth.

Our friends then understood in a moment what he was about to do, and they shook their heads, for they believed such a feat to be utterly impossible.

In a similar way to the mountebank they now saw that it was Dick's intention to plunge these knives into the side of the cavern, and, trusting to their hold, raise himself up by slow degrees.

Dick saw them shake their heads, and noted the incredulous expression on their countenances; but, paying no attention to it, he set about the very difficult task before him.

When led by the spirit of emulation to imitate the deeds of the mountebank, Dick little thought that this one would prove to be of such service to him.

Without having practised this feat he could never have performed it.

The first time he had stuck the blade of the knife into the wall of the cavern it was merely by way of experiment.

The principal thing he had to ascertain was whether this would suffice to sustain his weight.

He tried, and was overjoyed to find that, though the knife bent slightly, it showed no symptoms of giving way.

His heart was now comparatively light, and, with feelings of great confidence at his heart, he set about commencing his ascent in good earnest.

Requesting his comrades to stand beneath, so as to catch him should he be unlucky enough to fall, he clutched the hilt of the knife tightly, and drawing himself up until his head was almost on a level with it, he stuck the other knife in about two feet higher up, and sustained himself by that.

He now discovered that to extricate this lower knife was no easy matter, but at a second attempt he succeeded in doing so, and again, drawing himself up, stuck it in at a considerable distance from the ground.

A more fatiguing exercise for the muscles, or one that would tax them more, could scarcely be found.

Dick Turpin, however, had inured himself to this exercise, and though a long time elapsed since he had had any practice, yet he was pleased to find that he had lost none of his former strength and skill.

With eager anxiety and suspense, his companions watched his ascent, fearful, every moment, of witnessing an accident.

Slowly and steadily, however, Dick continued to get higher and higher, until his form was almost lost to view in the gathering gloom.

As he approached the surface of the earth he spoke encouragingly to his comrades below, and expressed his conviction that he should be able to accomplish the task he had set himself.

Upwards he went, until at length he found that one more effort would suffice to place him on the turf in old Enfield Chase.

Summoning up all his energies for this last effort, he raised himself up, and, with a tremendous exercise of strength, swung himself on to the earth.

A faint cheer from his comrades below reached his ear.

But, entirely overcome with his exertions, he lay for some moments on the grass without being able to move.

CHAPTER CCCXCVII.

DICK WATCHES THE DRAGOONS LEAVE ENFIELD CHASE, AND PAYS ONE MORE VISIT TO THE OLD CAVERN.

What words could possibly convey an adequate idea of the feeling of thankfulness which crept—not over the heart of Maud—but over the hearts of those who stood by her side when they found that the daring feat which their leader had proposed was thus successfully carried out!

Now that he had reached the surface, all experienced a feeling of great security—perhaps greater than was warranted by circumstances

For a moment they were oblivious of the presence of the dragoons in the chase, and that Dick might be captured by them.

Soon, however, they recollected this; but they then relied upon the confidence they had in their captain.

That he would be cautious in the extreme, they felt certain; and that he would run into no unnecessary danger they were assured—not only for his own sake, but for theirs, who without his aid, would surely perish in that place.

It was under the impulse of the moment that they uttered the faint cheer when they found he had reached the ground in safety.

Then they listened intently for some sound from their captain's lips; but for a little while, which seemed to them an age, none came.

Quickly, however, Dick Turpin recovered himself from the effects of his late exertion, and fully anticipating that his comrades would expect him to speak to them, he crawled closer to the brink of the abyss.

Holding his head over, he looked down, but he found that those below were totally invisible.

It was just as though he had plunged his gaze into some fathomless gulf.

Nor could he discover anything that would lead any one to the belief that it was a cavern; on the contrary, its appearance was only that of a deep and irregular-shaped pit.

But, if his friends were out of the reach of his vision, they were assuredly not out of the reach of his voice, and he at once addressed them.

As they looked up, however, they could see his head plainly enough.

"All is well, my faithful comrades," said Dick Turpin—"all is well. So much of my enterprize I have performed with safety and success. Let us gather encouragement from it as to the remainder. Stay where you are, rest yourselves in perfect security, and await, with what patience you may possess, my return. As soon as I have ascertained that it will be safe for you to leave this place of refuge, I will come here with such means and appliances as will enable you to do so. Until then, farewell. Do nothing—attempt nothing until I return. You may be sure that I shall not be long."

Dick Turpin's companions responded heartily to his farewell, and then our hero, rising slowly to his feet, took a long and earnest gaze about him.

Nothing but the green trees, however, and the waving undergrowth met his gaze, nor did any sounds strike upon his ears save those which were common to the forest.

No traces either remained of his enemies who had been so lately upon that spot, save where the ground had been trampled by their heavy boots.

The necessity of using the utmost caution in all his movements was clearly before Dick's mind.

Trees grew thickly and plentifully around, so that there was no difficulty about keeping under cover.

He glided, therefore, to a tree, the girth of whose trunk was unusually great, and from this point, feeling more secure, he gazed about him, and endeavoured to form something like a correct idea as to his precise whereabouts.

Short as had been Dick's residence in Enfield Chase, it had sufficed for him to make himself tolerably familiar with the whole of it, and quite so with respect to that portion of it which environed the cavern where he had hoped to remain in safety with his comrades for a much longer period than fate had allowed.

Such being the case, it was not long before he was in a position to say with certainty just in what direction to go in order to reach the entrance to the cavern.

To this point he had determined to repair with all the stealth he possibly could, for, reasonably enough, he conjectured that it was here where he would most likely be able to learn something about the motions of his foes.

With great caution, then, taking care not to make more noise than he could possibly avoid, and darting from tree to tree, he made his way in a circuitous manner to the place he wished to reach.

Every time he paused he listened, but hearing nothing indicative of the proximity of the dragoons, he continued to creep onwards.

As he drew nearer to the entrance to the cavern, his vigilance increased.

The same stillness prevailed, however, and he could almost have brought himself to believe that the dragoons had already left the wood.

Satisfactory as it might be to him if they had done this, yet he would much rather have watched their departure, because then he would be in possession of positive intelligence in the matter, and, in the former case, it would have merely been conjecture.

This silence, however, was both strange and suspicious, and our hero could only account for it by supposing that they had either left the wood, or else were all in the cavern.

Nearer and nearer he approached, until at length, as he stood behind a tree, he was able to see the face of the rock in which the indentation was that led to the cavern.

Here were evident signs of the presence of his foes.

The grass was trampled down, the branches of the bushes broken, and the thorn-bush that had so well concealed the entrance to the cavern, had been uprooted, and lay withering and dying on the ground.

In contrast with its former aspect, this spot now presented an appearance of utter desolation.

Dick sighed as he saw this, for he had almost began to love the place, which would probably no longer afford a shelter for them.

A profound stillness reigned about this spot, and at length, so long did it continue, that Dick felt almost inclined to venture into the passage.

Very fortunately, however, he did not do this.

While he was debating the matter in his mind he was startled by the sound of approaching footsteps.

They were at a distance, and came from the direction of the cavern.

Several persons were evidently coming, and Dick Turpin glanced upwards at the branches of the tree beneath which he was standing, and resolved to hide himself among them; for his present place of concealment was scarcely deserving of the name, and he ran, in consequence, a great risk of being discovered.

It so happened that this tree had a horizontal projecting branch, the distance of which, from the ground, was barely eight feet.

This was just what Dick wanted.

Giving a slight spring, he seized hold of this branch with his hands, and easily and rapidly drew himself up into the tree.

It was an evergreen, and the large leaves which grew upon it formed an excellent and most effective screen.

He had just time to settle himself in a secure position, when a dragoon made his appearance at the mouth of the passage.

He was followed by another, and another, until Dick counted, in all, fifteen.

But they were not all dragoons though all wore a species of uniform.

Two were surgeons, and two of the dragoons were carried by their companions upon rudely-constructed litters.

These were the two who had been so dangerously wounded by the bullets from the highwaymen's pistols.

The surgeons walked by the side of the litters.

The captain had his arm in a sling, and his face was expressive both of pain and vexation.

The result of this adventure, so different to what he had expected, annoyed and chagrined him exceedingly.

He had had all this extra trouble, had received a wound, had had two of his best men badly hurt, and had gained nothing whatever in return.

Under these circumstances, it is not wonderful that he should feel so mortified as he did.

A dejected, jaded look was also visible upon the countenances of the other dragoons, who, of course, had been much harassed by their service, and scarcely one had escaped receiving a wound of some sort or other.

Much wondering what this little procession meant, Dick looked earnestly at them.

They all came to a halt as soon as they had emerged from the passage, but this our hero easily understood.

It was in order that the bearers of the litters might be changed.

As soon as this was done the captain gave the word to march, and in a compact throng the troop of dragoons directed their steps across the chase.

From the tree in which he was hidden, Dick was able to command an extensive prospect, and some moments elapsed before the soldiers got out of sight.

As soon as ever he found himself unable to perceive them, our hero quitted his place of concealment and hastened after them.

To follow in their track was an easy enough matter, for so many persons forcing a path through the brushwood rendered the way they had taken plainly perceptible, for the dragoons took no pains to disguise their route.

At a cautious distance, Dick followed them.

His heart was elated with the idea that his foes, thoroughly weary of their search, were about to leave the chase.

To ascertain whether he was right was his motive for following them as he did.

The supposition was not at all an unlikely one, and from the direction they took, Dick became more and more confirmed in his notion, for if they did not change their course they would in a short time reach the borders of the chase.

With increasing hope at every step, Dick crept after them.

Occasionally the sound of their voices, and the jingling of their weapons would reach his ear, but he was unable to hear what was said, and to have approached them more closely would be dangerous to a degree.

Wisely, then, he restrained his curiosity, and maintained the same distance between them.

As they drew nearer to the borders of the chase, where the trees were not of such huge dimensions, and where they grew at a greater distance apart, Dick's progress became exceedingly difficult, and the chances of his being seen were very much increased.

He was forced at length to adopt the expedient of crawling on his hands and knees.

By this means he was enabled to advance without exposing his form to observation.

Suddenly, however, he was forced to come to a halt, for the dragoons no longer continued to advance.

Looking up stealthily, our hero saw that they had now reached the confines of the chase.

The bushes, which had so far afforded him a shelter, extended only a few yards further.

Beyond these grass grew, and on this spot the horses belonging to the dragoons were grazing.

"Surely," Dick thought, "I shall now know for certain whether it is their intention to leave the chase or not. Patience, and no doubt I shall learn all."

The litters were now deposited upon the grass, and the dragoons began to prepare to mount their horses.

The captain was assisted into the saddle by two of his men, for the state of his arm would not allow him to mount unaided.

All, then, followed his example save four, and these had to carry the wounded men.

The surplus horses were led by the bridle.

When this much was done, the little cavalcade again set itself in motion.

But they went only at a walking pace, for the condition of their comrades would not permit them to go faster.

Most eagerly did our hero watch them, until he was unable to do so any longer.

He waited a minute or two, until he thought it was safe, and then crossed the open space.

He could now see them once more, though they vanished from his view almost immediately.

Still he knew that they had really left the chase.

At this scarcely hoped-for departure of his foes the exultation of Dick Turpin knew no bounds, but all at once he sobered down as the thought occurred to him that some members of the troop might yet be left in the chase.

He had seen rather a large number depart, it is true, but there was no evidence to show that all had gone.

It was well he made this reflection when he did, or he might have incautiously run into much danger.

What he should next do was rather a puzzling question, but, after some few minutes' reflection, he came to the conclusion that, if any dragoons had been left behind, they would most likely be in the cavern.

Towards this place, then, he resolved at all risks to go again.

The bright and beautiful moon, which was only a few days past the full, was high in the cloudless heavens, and enabled him to see about him with great distinctness.

At length, upon passing a tree which had a small piece of its bark chipped off, as it seemed, with a knife, Dick turned, and, after a momentary hesitation, changed the direction in which he had been going.

He just then recollected that these pieces had been chipped off in order that they might readily find their way to the tree to which the spy had been bound.

Curious to learn something respecting him, Dick made his way towards this tree.

He reached it in a few moments, and then discovered, as he had more than half expected, that his prisoner had gone.

Dick thought very likely he had been released by his comrades, but we happen to know that this was not the case.

The spy had got off without any one to help him but himself.

Recollecting that he had been bound with rope, and that this would now be useful in the highest degree to him, Turpin looked about for it.

He succeeded in finding nearly all of it.

There were several yards, and he took possession of it with a feeling of great satisfaction.

Having done this, he once more made his way towards the cavern.

The distance was considerable, and some time necessarily elapsed before he reached it, because his safety demanded that he should proceed with caution.

At length he came in sight of the opening.

This faced the direction in which the moon beams fell, and, in consequence, the rock could be seen with great distinctness.

The moon's rays penetrated a little way into the passage.

But they revealed nothing but the bare earth, and the rugged sides of the rock.

A deep silence prevailed in this place, and the longer Dick stopped and listened, the more did he feel convinced that his foes had taken their departure.

Eventually he made up his mind, after arguing the matter pro and con for some time, that he would at all risks enter the cavern, and ascertain whether it was empty or not.

He was well aware that the danger he would incur by this proceeding would be of no common description, but, considering the importance of the knowledge he would gain, he thought he ought to make the attempt.

Having come to this determination, and encouraged by the silence which still continued, he crossed over the little open space, and in a moment stood just within the passage.

Here he paused and listened.

But he could hear nothing, and on tip-toe he proceeded towards the cavern.

As a precautionary measure, he drew his sword and projected it before him.

He would then be prepared should any sudden attack be made upon him, or should he run into an unexpected danger.

At every few yards he took he would stop and listen, and then, encouraged by the unbroken silence, would advance.

In his progress he felt certain that he made a scarcely audible sound.

Of course the passage was buried in profound darkness, but he was familiar with all its intricacies.

He strained his eyes in a vain endeavour to pierce the gloom, for every moment he expected to see a gleam of light come from the direction of the cavern, for should anyone be there, it was scarcely likely they would remain in darkness.

CHAPTER CCCXCVIII.

DICK TURPIN SUCCEEDS IN RESCUING HIS COMPANIONS FROM THE CAVERN.

But no gleam came.

Both the silence and the darkness of the tomb prevailed in that gloomy region, and, the nearer Dick got to the termination of the passage, the more convinced did he feel that he was the only living human being anywhere near the place.

Nevertheless, he did not abate his caution, for he remembered that a barricade had been erected, and he knew not whether it had been removed.

If not, he would have to take care to avoid any contact with it.

As he slowly put one foot before the other, assuring himself before he placed it on the ground that there was no obstacle before him, he found, by the difference in the temperature of the atmosphere, that he had really entered the cavern, so that the barricade, it was clear, had been removed.

It was equally clear, too, that the cavern was empty.

Our hero now became conscious that a faint, misty kind of twilight found its way into this place, and, glancing upwards, he perceived that it proceeded from the rays of the moon finding their way through the crevices in the roof.

As the Queen of Night rose higher and higher in the heavens, this hazy twilight increased in brightness, and Dick Turpin quickly became able to see about him with tolerable ease.

One by one, the many and well-remembered features of the old cavern came into view, until, after standing for a little while near the entrance of the passage, he was able to observe the whole outlines of the place.

The pale moonbeams, penetrating through those small apertures above, had an exceedingly beautiful effect.

As soon as he found himself able to discern one object from another, Dick Turpin moved from the spot upon which he had been standing, and confident that there was no other person in the cavern besides himself, he walked boldly to the centre of it.

Unconsciously he paused close to the hearthstone, and he almost instantly became sensible of an increase of warmth.

The cause of this was, of course, no mystery to him, and with the point of his sword he stirred together a few embers that were upon the stone.

They were at the point of extinction, but by stirring them about Dick succeeded in procuring a blaze.

It was a fitful one, it is true, but still it served to light up the cavern with a much greater degree of brilliancy than the moonbeams.

There was no longer any need for apprehension, for had any person been in the cavern besides Dick, his presence would ere now have been manifested.

Still, he held his drawn sword in his hand in an attitude ready for immediate service, so as to guard against the possibility of a surprise.

Some more dry twigs were close at hand, and these he cast on the fire as soon as he perceived them.

A bright light was the result.

Very curiously, now, Dick looked about him.

On every side he saw traces of the recent presence of his foes, but nothing to lead him to the belief that they would return.

The conviction that they had in earnest taken their departure deepened in his mind; and he resolved, without further loss of time, to release his companions from their unpleasant place of refuge.

The thought, however, occurred to him, that he was but ill-provided with the means of doing this, and that in the cavern he might very likely find something of great use, which had been left behind by his foes.

In a moment, then, he took a fire-brand from the hearth, and commenced an examination of the cavern.

Almost the first thing he saw was a coil of thick rope lying upon the floor.

What it had been brought there for, he could easily guess; and he supposed that it had been left where he found it through negligence or accident.

Dick seized it with an exclamation of pleasure.

It was of great length; and with the pieces he already had in his possession, he should, doubtless, have sufficient for his purpose.

This was a good commencement to his search, and he continued it with additional ardour.

He found nothing, however, that promised to be of the least service to him; and rightly imagining that his companions would feel uneasy at his long absence, he resolved to return to them without delay.

Accordingly, he made his way towards the entrance of the passage, which he traversed with as much speed as he could command; and, in the space of a minute or two, found himself in the open air.

To reach the upper ground in which the hole was situated, he was compelled to make a considerable detour; for to climb up the perpendicular face of the rock was an impossibility.

But Dick's heart was light and his steps fleet, so that a very short time elapsed before he reached his destination.

Lying down at full length upon the ground, he held his head as far over the abyss as he dared.

Before he had time to speak himself, he was addressed by his friends below.

To them an endless time appeared to have elapsed since his departure, and their eyes had been continually directed towards the aperture in the roof, in the hope every moment that they would see him make his appearance.

They had cheated the time of much of its tediousness by conferring together upon their future prospects, and endeavouring to come to some conclusion as to the best course of action to be adopted by them in future.

In this Maud felt but little interest.

Her thoughts were wholly occupied in thinking about our hero, and wondering whether he was in safety, or whether he had fallen into the hands of his enemies.

No sounds of alarm had reached her ears, though she knew that Enfield Chase was large enough for a great disturbance taking place in one portion of it to be unheard in another.

Her heart beat with joy when she saw him approach the aperture, for she did not dream it could be anyone but he whom she had so anxiously expected.

"All is well," said Dick Turpin, in reply to the salutation of his comrades: "I have the best of all news to communicate. The dragoons have left the chase; I saw them depart myself!"

The three highwaymen uttered a faint hurrah, and then Claude Duval said—

"I am glad to hear that, captain; and the next thing will be to get us out of this place."

"That shall be done as soon as possible," said Turpin, in a cheerful voice; "I have a good deal to do, though, in the way of preparation."

As he spoke he rose to his feet, and proceeded to make an examination of the rope.

He found he had a pretty large quantity—even more than he thought he should require.

The first thing he did was to tie all the pieces of rope together, having done which he tied one end firmly to the tree that grew nearest to the aperture, and pulled it with all his strength, to make sure it was perfectly secure.

He had at first intended to tie some large knots in this rope to facilitate the process of climbing up it, but he suddenly thought of a fresh expedient, which would answer to the purpose much better.

This was to cut down some pieces of wood from the branches of the trees, each about eight inches in length.

These he resolved to tie in the rope in such a manner that they should be horizontal to it, and thus form a rude kind of ladder.

With one of the knives he carried it was perfectly easy to cut these pieces of wood, for there was no lack of material.

This, then, was his next proceeding.

Although it took him but a few minutes to cut each one, yet as a great many were required, the operation naturally ran into a great deal of time.

At length having, as he fancied, cut as many as he required, he proceeded to tie them in the rope.

This was an easy matter.

All he had to do was to tie the rope into a loop, thrust the prepared piece of wood into it, and draw it tight, so that the tighter the rope was pulled the firmer would the horizontal pieces become.

They were fixed at rather irregular distances, but the average was about a foot.

At last Dick completed this rude kind of rope-ladder, and announced the fact to his companions.

All that now remained was to ascertain whether it was long enough to reach the bottom of the cavern, but Dick had estimated this, and felt very little doubt.

Nevertheless, he lowered it with a slight feeling of anxiety.

Eagerly and joyfully did our old friends Tom King, Claude Duval, and Sixteen-String Jack watch its descent.

They were thoroughly tired of their present quarters.

and had been for a long while, so that this prospect of escape was really delightful.

Suddenly Dick, as he was lowering the rope, felt it become tight, and, at the same moment, a cry from below announced to him the fact that his companions had reached it.

"Pull it tight!" he cried, when he found they had taken hold of it.

He was willingly obeyed.

In another moment the rope was pulled quite tight.

"Hang upon it with all your weight," said Dick, "in order that we may know whether it will be safe to ascend by it."

This was immediately done, as the importance of obtaining this piece of knowledge was obvious.

The rope stood the test bravely.

The three highwaymen were now impatient to ascend, but Turpin requested them to wait a moment.

They did so, and then, somewhat to their surprise, they saw him lower himself over the brink of the abyss and commence a rapid descent.

In less time than they could have believed possible, he was standing among them.

With a low cry of joy Maud sprang forward, and Dick clasped the devoted girl fervently in his arms.

So great was her joy at thus finding him in safety by her side, that it was only with the greatest difficulty that she prevented herself from fainting.

Turpin turned round to his comrades.

"Ascend, my gallant friends," he cried; "the means of escaping from this dismal place are before you. Ascend with all convenient speed, for the sooner we reach the open air the better. I should advise you, however, to ascend one at the time."

"And you, captain?"

"I will follow you as soon as you are above in safety."

"Nay—nay. You go first. We will follow."

"Not so. You go first. Do not waste time about this. Ascend."

The highwaymen no longer hesitated, but they took good care to follow their captain's excellent advice.

Claude Duval was the first to climb.

The two others held the rope steady for him.

Nothing could be easier than to ascent the rope by means of the horizontal pieces of wood, and Claude was very quickly at the top.

Tom King and Sixteen-String Jack followed him, and reached the surface of the earth without accident.

They now looked down rather anxiously for the captain and his fair companion to make their appearance.

While the three friends had been ascending, Dick had occupied himself in endeavouring to calm the agitation under which Maud laboured.

The poor girl was dreadfully excited, and she clung to Turpin's arm with almost frantic violence.

For the first time Dick now wondered by what means Maud was to leave the cavern.

In her present state he was certain that it would be in the greatest degree dangerous for her to attempt to ascend by the rope in the same manner as his companions had done.

Some other mode must, therefore, be devised, and this for a little while completely baffled him.

At length he hit upon an expedient which he thought would answer his purpose, provided the rope was strong enough.

At all risks, however, he resolved to attempt it, for, by lingering there, they were perhaps incurring great danger and diminishing their chances of escape.

He called out to his comrades to make sure that the rope was firm and had not given way in any place, and having received a satisfactory reply, he addressed himself to Maud.

"Cheer up, dearest; pray, cheer up. This is weak of you; indeed it is. Our greatest peril is over now, and, believe me, there is little need of apprehension. The dragoons have gone; I watched them leave the chase with my own eyes. All we have to do is to rejoin our comrades at the top, and then to decide upon what we shall do in future."

"I know all that, said Maud; "but what distresses me is the fear that, after all that you have done, I shall not be able to ascend. I feel that my strength would abandon me, that I should grow giddy

"If that is all," replied Dick, "do not let that distress you a moment longer, for I have thought of a means by which we'll be able to ascend."

"Have you? How thoughtful you are! Tell me what it is, and I will try my best."

There was a hopeful tone in her voice.

"Show me, then," said Maud; "for in you I have every confidence."

"I hope you have," said Dick, earnestly.

"Believe me, I have. Tell me what I am to do first?"

"Clasp your hands together, and hold them out before you."

He was immediately obeyed.

Our hero then took off his cravat, and by means of this he ingeniously tied Maud's wrists together in such a manner as to be quite firm, and yet without giving her much pain.

What this was for she could not conceive; but she asked no questions.

As soon as he had assured himself that her wrists were securely tied together, Dick led her towards the rope.

Grasping it with both hands, he said—

"Now, Maud, dearest, show your confidence. Place your arms round my neck."

There was only one way by which she could do this, and that was lifting her hands and putting them over Dick's head

This was what he desired her to do.

"Cling firmly to me," he added, "and we shall reach the surface without trouble."

"No—no!" exclaimed Maud, when she saw what Dick intended. "It is impossible that you can ascend the rope with me hanging on your neck in this manner."

Turpin laughed.

"Have confidence," he replied; "and then you see."

At the same moment he commenced the ascent.

With her wrists tied in the manner we have described, Maud's arm formed a kind of loop round Turpin's neck.

This made her secure so far as this went but our hero, though he had spoken so lightly of this achievement, found that in reality, it was a most difficult one.

He had, every possible inducement for exertion.

Clinging to the cross-pieces of wood with his hands he slowly but surely mounted, using his feet as a means to assist him.

Maud held her breath.

At every moment she expected that Dick would loose his grasp, and that they would both be precipitated to the rocky floor below.

As they ascended higher and higher, however, without meeting with any accident, she began to grow less apprehensive.

In reality the danger now was greater than it had been.

Dick found that it required the exertion of his utmost strength to preserve his balance, and to continue to raise one hand above the other.

He felt his muscles strained until they almost cracked—his fingers threatened to give way—while his heart throbbed painfully and irregularly.

Every second served to take him nearer to the surface, and it was this which encouraged him to renew his efforts.

Perspiration streamed from every pore, and occasionally his whole body would tremble like an aspen.

At last, however, the top was safely reached.

CHAPTER CCCXCIX.

SIXTEEN-STRING JACK MAKES A PROPOSITION TO DICK TURPIN AND HIS COMRADES.

Had not Dick Turpin's three companions been waiting on the brink of the abyss, the escape from the cavern, though so far accomplished, would never have been completed.

When his hands grasped the last cross piece of wood, our hero felt that, if the rope had been one foot longer, he should not have been able to ascend it.

To have even now fairly reached the ground would have been impossible, had it not been for the assistance his comrades rendered him.

Bending over, they took hold of Maud by the arms, and fairly lifted her up.

She hung a dead weight upon their hands, and almost immediately they discovered that she had fainted.

[DICK TURPIN AND HIS COMPANIONS BIDDING ADIEU TO ENFIELD CHASE.]

Accordingly they laid her down upon the turf, and turned the whole of their attention to their captain, who, in truth, required all the assistance they were able to render him.

When he had been relieved of the weight of Maud in the manner we have described, he felt most thankful, for he feared that he should not have been able to retain his hold a moment longer.

Now, however, it was comparatively an easy matter; though, when he tried to reach the ground, he found his strength insufficient for the performance of such a feat.

It was while he was exhausting himself with making fresh efforts that his comrades arrived.

To seize him by both arms, and drag him over the brink, was the work of less than a moment.

At first he could do nothing; but, summoning the whole of his strength, he rose to a half-sitting posture, and inquired eagerly after Maud.

Tom King assured him of her safety, adding, at the same time, that she was insensible.

The violent exertion which Dick Turpin had just gone through was really quite enough to exhaust anyone, but he was not long in recovering himself.

He was anxious about Maud, and he immediately made his way to where she was lying upon the ground.

She was now evincing unequivocal signs of recovering her senses.

Almost as soon as he bent over her she opened her eyes.

Her glance fell in a moment upon his countenance, and then she uttered a faint sigh of joy and satisfaction, for she knew that he was safe.

That was her first thought, and that was her sole anxiety.

At Dick's request, she did not attempt to move for a few minutes, until she felt herself strong enough to be able to do so.

Sixteen-String Jack had a flask containing a very small quantity of brandy.

This he handed to the captain, who partook of it eagerly.

it was wonderful to see what a difference the stimulant made to him.

He next assisted Maud to her feet, and then all five of them stood together in a huddled-up group.

The moon still continued to shine with great force and power, though she had some time passed the meridian.

What our friends now had to do was to seek some temporary place of shelter, and then decide upon what should next be done.

At a word, then, from their captain, the three highwaymen left the open space upon which they had been standing, and concealed themselves among the trees and underwood which grew at a short distance.

Close to where they halted the trunk of a huge tree lay upon the ground.

It seemed as though it had been struck down with lightning, and had evidently remained for a long period in its present position.

Upon this they sat down, and, amid the deep silence and solitude of nature, prepared to consider their present position and future prospects.

It was well that our friends were so light-hearted as they were, or they would have shrunk dismayed from the view before them.

They waited in silence for Turpin to speak, although, during his absence, they had talked the whole matter over, and come to their own conclusions.

Dick understood their silence.

"You are waiting for me to speak," he said, "and to advise what had best be done. I cannot take upon myself to do this, though I have given the subject much reflection."

"So have we," replied his comrades.

"Then, I doubt not," rejoined Turpin, "that we shall be able to come to a decision. In point of fact, what we have to make up our minds about, is this. Shall we remain in the chase, and risk another attack being made upon us, or shall we take our departure?"

"That is exactly it, captain," said Tom King; "we have those two alternatives, and we must choose one of them. Which will suit us best, is a matter for deliberation."

"Right!" replied Turpin; "there is much to be said in favour of both modes of action. We must weigh the subject thoroughly in our minds, consider it under all its aspects, and then determine."

"I was in hopes," said Sixteen-String Jack, "that the chase would have afforded us an asylum for a long while, or, at any rate, until the violence of the pursuit after us had abated."

"That hope is at an end now, however," replied Claude Duval. "Our presence here is not only suspected, but known."

"True," said Dick; "but our foes, as yet, have failed to discover us, and I watched them leave the chase early in the evening."

"But that," remarked Tom King, "may only be a ruse upon the part of our enemies, so as to lull us into a sense of false security, while, in the meantime, they take such measures as will make our escape from the chase a matter of impossibility."

"I fear that is but too reasonable a supposition," said Dick Turpin; "and yet, they may have withdrawn from the chase solely in the expectation that we should leave it, and perhaps a large force is assembled on the border waiting for us to make our appearance, and in readiness to pounce upon us."

"That is a supposition," said Sixteen-String Jack, "that, to my fancy, is quite as probable as the one put forth by Tom King."

"Just so," said Dick Turpin; "and it is this which makes decision such a difficult matter, for, of course, all will depend upon which we do."

"Decidedly!" said his comrades, as with one voice.

But for a short time we will leave them in this state of doubt and perplexity—remaining idle when they ought to be active—and consulting earnestly as to what should be done, while we turn our attention to the proceedings of the dragoons, and enlighten the reader with respect to their movements, about which, no doubt, a great amount of interest is felt.

We will briefly record their proceedings from the moment when we left them seated round the fire in the cavern.

Throughout the live-long night did they keep guard, listening attentively to all sounds; but they learned nothing respecting the highwaymen.

Two surgeons arrived within a short time after they had been sent for, and when the wounds of the dragoons had been attended to, the captain discovered that his own arm was very painful, and he applied to have it dressed.

This was done at once; and when the surgeon made an examination of it, it was discovered that a bullet had passed completely through the fleshy part of his arm.

After it was dressed, the captain experienced a great deal of pain from it, and this added not a little to the ill-humour which he felt consequent upon the unsuccessful result of his expedition.

In a wearying, tedious manner the night passed away; and at length, to the infinite satisfaction of the unwounded dragoons, day broke.

They requested the captain to allow them to make a search in the chase for the four highwaymen, and strive to obtain some clue to their whereabouts.

To this request he consented, though he did not for a moment think it would be productive of any important results.

With a portion of what took place on this occasion, the reader has already been made acquainted.

We have described how the dragoons, in the course of their search, came to the orifice in the roof of the cavern, in which our friends were imprisoned and concealed.

We have related, too, how they rolled the fragment of rock down, after having done which, they listened.

But as no sound whatever came from below, they not unnaturally came to the conclusion that there was no one there, and took their departure.

For some hours longer they continued their search in the chase, but there can be no interest in describing it, because they had all their trouble for nothing, and achieved no result whatever.

Thoroughly tired out, they returned to the cavern, and acquainted their captain with the failure of their expedition.

As this was just what he anticipated, he did not feel in the least disappointed.

A consultation now took place as to what they should do, and one of the surgeons, a shrewd Scotchman, joined in the conversation.

He was especially ready with his advice, and one of his suggestions was by all present deemed such a good one that they resolved to act upon it without delay.

His proposal was this.

They were one and all to leave the chase—really leave it, and not pretend to do so—taking care to proceed with great deliberation, and not to attempt the least concealment.

He argued from this that the highwaymen, seeing them depart, would depart also.

They would then be in readiness to pursue them, and when they had once started their game, the other detachments would join in the pursuit, so that capture would in the end be certain.

From this it will be seen that the highwaymen were in very great jeopardy indeed, and their danger was in reality much greater than they fancied it to be.

The dragoons had only to be patient, and, sooner or later, they would accomplish their object, for it was subsequently determined that, should many hours elapse without the highwaymen making their appearance, according to expectation, they were to re-enter the chase and thoroughly search it in every part.

Owing to the circumstances which have already been related to the reader, the specified time passed by without anything being seen, and the captain, whose impatience was now wrought up to the highest pitch, ordered his men to march, and once more entered the chase.

All was profoundly still, however, with the exception of the noise which they themselves made in their progress.

No trace of their prey could be seen, but, undaunted, they pressed onward with the firm determination of searching every bush until they had unkennelled them.

They had evidence that the cavern had been frequented by the highwaymen, because they had been seen to enter it, and because they had, to their knowledge, so mysteriously disappeared from it; so, naturally enough, they made their way back to this place.

They were careful to make no more noise in their progress than they could possibly avoid, and for this purpose all dismounted from their steeds, and left them in charge of one of their companions.

A root, then, they stole through the leafy glades of the forest, animated by the hope that they should at length be able to steal unawares upon the highwaymen.

From what has just been narrated, it will be seen that our friends were both right with respect to the interpretation which they put upon the dragoons leaving the chase.

To them we will now return.

Little did they think, as they sat there conversing, that their enemies were stealing so stealthily upon them.

Little did they dream that they were threatened with a danger of so imminent a description.

"I am afraid," said Turpin, in reply to his comrade's observation, "that the probabilities of both are so evenly balanced, that, without some more definite information than we at present possess, or are likely to obtain, it will be impossible for us to come to a decision. It is, I think, quite certain that, now that our presence here is known, it will never do to remain; if we do, we are sure to be captured. As we must leave, then, let us do at once."

"But the roads," said Tom King; "you must not forget that all the roads are nightly patrolled by detachments of dragoons, and it is scarcely possible that we shall be able to escape being seen by some of them."

"That is a danger," replied Turpin, "which, however great it may be at present, will certainly never grow less; therefore the sooner we leave it the better chance we should have."

"So I think," said Sixteen-String Jack, "and, if you will listen to me for a moment, I will tell you what I think had better be done under the circumstances."

"Speak—speak!" said Dick Turpin, "let us hear what you have to propose, by all means."

"I can say it, then, in a very few words, but I think it will be best to lead you on by degrees."

"Just as you like."

"Very well, then. In the first place, I think you will admit that it is well known to our foes that we are all four together."

"Certainly."

"Consequently, then, the dragoons will look out for a party of four, and you may depend that no such party would pass them without examination."

"Well—well."

"I agree with the captain that the difficulties in the way of leaving the chase will never be less than they are at present. We must leave it at some time or other—and why not now?"

"That is just my opinion," said Dick Turpin.

"And mine—and mine," said Tom King and Claude Duval.

"Then it seems we are all of one opinion with respect to the advisability of leaving this place without delay."

"We are—we are."

"Then I have something else to propose, which will, I hope, meet with your full approbation."

"Go on—go on."

"It is this. You have admitted that the dragoons, who are on the lock out for us, will expect to see us all four together."

"Yes."

"Then I propose that we should separate."

"Separate?"

"Yes. Why not?"

"I thought we had agreed to keep together," said Tom King.

"So we had, and the principal reason for our doing so was because we thought it would be conducive to our common safety. Now, however, I think that our safety would be best secured by our separating."

There was a few moment's silence after Sixteen-String Jack pronounced these words, but at length Dick Turpin said—

"I had not thought of this, but now that you mention it, I am almost inclined to think it would be best. In what manner do you propose the separation shall take place?"

"I do not quite understand you."

"Do you mean that we should separate into four parties or two?"

"Oh two, most certainly."

"You and Claude, I suppose; and Tom King and myself."

"That was what I thought, captain."

"Well, I have nothing to urge against such an arrangement."

"Nor I," said Tom King.

"I entirely agree with Jack," said Claude Duval.

"But," added Turpin, "I cannot think that this separation, which is brought about solely with the view of promoting our personal safety, is intended to be permanent."

"By no means!" said Sixteen-String Jack, warmly, "by no means. You wrong me by entertaining such a thought."

"Enough—enough!" replied Turpin. "It now remains for us to decide upon some place at which we are to meet at a certain time."

"Just so."

"Where, then, shall this place be?"

"Wherever you like."

"Nay, mention some place which, in your judgment, is least likely to be suspected by our enemies."

"Do you know Finchley?"

"Certainly."

"Do you know where the road divides, one portion leading to London by way of Highgate, and the other by way of Hampstead?"

"Yes—yes, quite well."

"Then you must have noticed that there is a triangular piece of land overgrown with grass where these roads separate."

"There is—there is."

"Let that, then, be our meeting place."

CHAPTER CCCC.

OUR FRIENDS BID ADIEU TO ENFIELD CHASE.

"AGREED," exclaimed the three companions of Sixteen-String Jack, speaking as with one voice. "Agreed."

"I am glad that you approve of my suggestion," he said.

"I do," replied Turpin. "I highly approve of it. I know the spot you mention well, and a more lonely and unfrequented one could not, I think, be found within twenty miles of London."

"Ever since a most horrible murder was committed there some fifteen years ago, the neighbourhood has been shunned by every one," said Sixteen-String Jack; "and, knowing this, prompted me to name it as our place of rendezvous."

"Nothing could suit us better."

"It is, then, determined that we shall meet there?"

"Yes."

"But when?"

"On the third night from this."

"That will do. By that time we shall certainly be able to repair to the appointed spot, and, when we meet, then it will be time enough to decide upon some future plan of operations."

"Just so."

"Are you all quite agreed as to what is to be done?" asked Turpin. "It is time we decided, for the night is waning."

"Yes, we are all agreed; and we think the sooner we leave Enfield Chase the better, at any rate for the present."

"So I think. We cannot lessen our danger by doing so; and, if we remain, I am afraid we shall increase it."

"So am I," remarked Tom King. "Do not say a word about remaining, I beg."

"There is no need to do so. The first thing necessary to be done will be to secure our horses."

"Yes, I have been thinking about that," said Claude Duval, "and I am sadly afraid that will give us a great deal of trouble."

"The dragoons may have disturbed them, perhaps," said Turpin; "but they did not capture and lead them away, I am quite sure of that."

"But how shall we capture them?"

"I think it will be done with greater ease than you imagine. The cattle are almost sure to keep together, and I have a particular whistle, by means of which I summon Black Bess."

"And will she obey it?"

"Beyond all doubt. You will find that, when I give utterance to the signal, she will neigh, and make that whinnying noise that horses always do when they are released, and then she will make her way towards me."

"But the other horses, captain; what about them?"

"I am of opinion that they will follow Black Bess."

"Well, perhaps they may; and it is to be hoped that they will do so."

"At any rate, we can but try. Should they arrive, all will be well; if not, we must adopt some other means."

"Do you think," asked Sixteen-String Jack, "that Black Bess will make her way to this spot if you give the signal here?"

"Assuredly, if she is within hearing."

"Then I think Claude and myself had better make our way to the little recess just within the entrance of the passage, where, as you well know, the saddles and bridles were deposited."

"True," said Turpin. "I had forgotten that. I am afraid, however, that our trappings have fallen into the hands of our foes, and if so, we shall be very awkwardly situated indeed."

"I scarcely apprehend anything on this score, for the place where they are deposited is dark, and little liable to discovery."

"Away, then," said Turpin, "and make use of all possible expedition; in the meantime, I will give the signal to Black Bess."

Claude Duval and Sixteen-String Jack now rose from the trunk of the tree and hastened in the direction of the cavern, while our hero uttered that shrill chirping whistle which we have so frequently described.

In the intense silence of the forest it sounded with surprising distinctness, and echoed far and wide through the leafy recesses of the chase.

But the sound died away into nothing without creating any response, though Dick listened eagerly and intently for Black Bess's answering neigh.

As the silence continued, he resolved to try again, and, should he be unsuccessful, to remove to another spot and try the effect there.

Once more, then, he whistled, and this time with much greater loudness than before.

The result was all that he could expect.

Before the echoes had died away, the sound he had so much wished to hear came upon their listening ears.

It was the short, sharp neigh of which Dick had spoken, and, in a moment afterwards, the crashing of branches, as the bonny mare bounded towards her master, made itself heard.

Again and again did Dick repeat the signal so as to encourage the noble animal, and enable her to reach the spot upon which her master stood.

The sounds she made in her progress sufficiently indicated the direction in which she was coming, and Dick Turpin, together with Maud and Tom King, eagerly turned towards it.

Their patience was not put to a very severe trial.

In another moment the bushes before them were rudely trampled down, and Black Bess appeared.

At first she stood motionless, but as soon as Dick repeated the signal she bounded to his side.

Our hero patted and stroked his magnificent steed, to whom he was so deeply indebted.

He was delighted to once more behold her, and the gallant creature seemed to be herself no less delighted, for she rubbed her head against his breast as playfully as a dog.

Dick was roused from caressing her by hearing Tom King speak.

"You are right, captain," he said. "Here are the other horses. They look frightened, but we shall doubtless be able to capture them."

Looking up as his old comrade spoke, Dick saw that the other three horses were standing at a little distance with their faces turned towards them.

By their attitude and appearance he could tell that the least thing would send them off at a gallop.

It would, therefore, be necessary to use the utmost caution in approaching them.

Taking Black Bess by the forelock, our hero led her towards the three other horses, who now seemed to suffer much less apprehension.

Tom King followed closely behind Turpin.

In this manner, and by speaking coaxingly every few moments, they succeeded in getting close up to the animals, and, at last, patted them.

After this, all was easy.

About Black Bess Dick Turpin knew he had no occasion to trouble himself; he therefore released the hold which he had previously retained upon her, and grasped the two others, while Tom King secured the remaining one.

Scarcely had they done this, than Claude Duval and Sixteen-String Jack, laden with the trappings belonging to the four steeds, came running towards them.

At a glance they could tell, not only by the expression of their countenances, but by their very air and manner, that something of an unusual and exciting character had taken place.

At full speed they came to where Dick Turpin was standing, and then, flinging down the heavy articles with which they had been encumbered, they strove to speak, but they were so breathless with the exertion they had recently undergone that for a few seconds they were quite unable to articulate a word.

At length, in a gasping sort of voice, Sixteen-String Jack said—

"Quick! quick! For your lives, be quick! Saddle the horses instantly! Mount, and be off with all the speed you can make! Quick! quick! I say. Saddle the horses!"

"What is the meaning of all this?" asked Dick Turpin, to whose arm Maud was again clinging, dreading, yet hoping to hear the news.

"There is no time for explanation," said Sixteen-String Jack. "On with the saddles and bridles! Quick! I say! I will tell you more presently. But, believe me, there is now no time to lose."

Urged by the energetic manner in which he spoke, as well as by his example, Dick Turpin and Tom King hastened to accoutre their steeds.

Claude Duval and Sixteen-String Jack occupied themselves in a similar manner, and with that rapidity which long practice had given them, they saddled and bridled their steeds.

In answer to Dick's repeated inquiries, Sixteen-String Jack said—

"We gained the cavern in safety, and found the trappings just where he had deposited them. Taking them up, we were about to return, when our attention was attracted by a slight sound. What it meant, we knew not, but deemed it important to ascertain.

"Creeping through the brushwood cautiously, we discovered that a troop of dragoons were making their way towards the cavern which they had just left. More than this we did not wait to see, but hastened hither, as you have seen."

This was, indeed, alarming intelligence, and Dick Turpin and Tom King no longer wondered at the alarm which their comrades had manifested.

By the time, however, that these explanations had taken place, the horses were saddled and ready for immediate use.

With activity they sprang into their saddles, and prepared to start.

Turpin had no other means of conveying Maud at present than he had formerly made use of—namely, to place her on the saddle before him.

This he at once did, though he determined at the first opportunity that occurred to find her some more comfortable mode of conveyance, and one not so likely to attract attention.

While he carried her thus, everyone they passed could not fail to notice it as being something unusual and peculiar.

To attract attention was what he least desired; but there was no help for it in this instance, as there was no other manner in which Maud could be carried.

No time was lost in making a start after they were once in readiness to do so, and these reflections occurred to Dick as he forced his way through the undergrowth.

There was another circumstance, too, in connexion with carrying Maud in this manner.

With a double burden it was not likely that Black Bess could put forth that marvellous degree of speed for which she was so celebrated; and it seemed more than probable, on the present occasion, that there would be the greatest and most pressing need for her utmost powers to be tried.

Already their foes were close behind them.

To be sure, at present, they had made no manifestation of their presence, but our friends could not tell how suddenly or unexpectedly this might happen.

They hoped, however, to be able to emerge from the chase with due caution and deliberation, and not be compelled to fly from it for their lives.

In the one case, they would have, at least, a chance of avoiding any of their foes, who might be stationed round the chase to watch for their appearance, but in the other, detection would be inevitable.

On their way towards the borders of the forest, Sixteen-String Jack and Claude Duval both declared that the dragoons, whose approach to the cavern had so much alarmed them, had not heard them, and had no suspicion of them, but they could not tell whether or how soon they might be followed.

This intelligence was much more cheering and hopeful than our hero had hoped to receive; still, he clung more than ever to his original idea, that the sooner they left the chase the better it would be for them.

His companions had fallen back and allowed him to lead the way, so he directed his steps in as straight a line as he could to the outskirts of the forest.

After proceeding in this manner for some distance without hearing anything of their enemies in the rear, they were warned by the rapidly-increasing thinness of the vegetation that they were close to the open country with which Enfield Chase was surrounded.

Dick now came to a halt, and his companions did the same.

"We had better part here," Turpin said, "since we have agreed upon the separation taking place. It will be better to emerge by twos than all four together."

"Certainly!" said Claude and Jack.

"There is no need for any delay over the ceremony of parting, and we have no time to spare. You understand the place at which the meeting is to take place?"

"Yes; do not forget, captain—the triangular piece of ground, the junction of the two roads near Finchley."

"Depend upon me," replied Dick. "I know the spot well; and on the third night from this I will most surely be there."

"At what hour?"

"It is impossible to say what hour, for we cannot tell what may occur. Let it be some time between midnight and daybreak."

"Agreed!"

"One word more, ere we part."

"What is it, captain?"

"It will be necessary for the sake of your own safety that you use the utmost caution and circumspection in your progress. Remember, the roads all round London, as we have been informed, are nightly patrolled by detachments of dragoons, whose sole duty it is to endeavour to capture us. You will, I fear, have much trouble in eluding them."

"Rely upon our being cautious to a degree, captain."

"I will do so. The only chance you have of escaping them, I think, is this. I shall adopt it myself."

"What is it, captain?"

"To avoid the main roads altogether, and travel only through narow and unfrequented lanes."

"A good thought. As you say, we cannot do better; and you may depend that in this, if in nothing else, we shall follow your example."

"I am glad you have resolved to do so, because it will have the effect of removing a great deal of uneasiness from my mind."

"We shall try our best to elude our foes, you may depend. It is not the first time we have had to run the gauntlet, and, for my own part, I feel little apprehension."

It was Claude Duval who spoke.

"Let us part, then," said Dick Turpin. "We have already lingered here too long. Yet, ere we say farewell, look back for the last time upon the shelter we are about to leave. I thought old Enfield Chase would have proved a place of refuge for us for a much longer period than it has, but that hope is over. Our sojourn there, though brief, has been a very happy one. Our foes have forced us to quit it. Farewell!"

As he spoke these words, his comrades looked back upon the scene they were about leaving, probably for ever.

They could not but regret their departure from this place under such circumstances.

They had hoped that in future times it would have been a place to which they could have repaired, and hidden themselves from their enemies.

Now that hope was entirely over.

Not only had their retreat been discovered, but even the secret of the cavern, which they had hoped to preserve to themselves, was now a secret no longer.

After this one long glance at their greenwood home, the highwaymen turned round.

There was some emotion visible in the countenances of each of them.

It was caused by their leaving the forest and the cavern.

Barely was it that they were permitted to remain so long in one place as they had been in this, and already they had begun to look upon it with those feelings with which everyone regards home, and they felt leaving it with a keenness which none save those in their position can comprehend.

"Farewell!" said Dick, again; and, as he spoke, he extended his hand.

It was in succession warmly grasped by Claude Duval and Sixteen-String Jack, who repeated the word of valediction.

They also shook Tom King warmly by the hand, and bade adieu to Maud.

"Now," said Turpin, "forward! You shall go first, and we will follow."

"Right, captain. Farewell! Remember the third night from this on the Finchley-road, some time between midnight and daybreak."

"I will be there," said Turpin, "if I am in life. Fear nothing upon that head."

"Once more, then, farewell!" exclaimed Claude Duval and Sixteen-String Jack; and, as they spoke, they urged their horses forward.

Again and again did Dick Turpin repeat the word "Farewell!" until their comrades had fairly vanished from view.

For a moment or two all three were silent and motionless.

An uncomfortable feeling of foreboding came over them as soon as Claude and Jack had disappeared, and it was in vain they tried to shake off the depression under which they laboured.

Dick Turpin was, however, the first to recollect himself and the peril in which they stood.

CHAPTER CCCCI.

DICK TURPIN AND TOM KING ARE ATTACKED AND PURSUED BY THE DRAGOONS, AND MAUD HAS A NARROW ESCAPE OF HER LIFE.

"We are forgetting that our enemies are so close behind us," he said. "Now, Tom, do not let us linger any longer. Our two comrades have gone, and let us follow their example. We will, however, endeavour to emerge at another spot."

"It will be most prudent to do so."

"I am of that opinion."

As he uttered these words, Dick Turpin set his steed in motion.

Now that the trees grew at a greater distance from each other, and the undergrowth was not so dense, it was perfectly easy for Tom King to ride abreast with Turpin, and he accordingly did so.

Instead of going in a straight direction, which would in a few moments have led them clear of the Chase, they crept round the borders, intending to emerge at some point at a considerable distance from that where they had parted with Claude and Jack.

Scarcely, however, had they proceeded fifty paces, than they were startled by a sudden blast upon a bugle.

It came from somewhere very close at hand, and struck upon their ears with so much suddenness that it for a moment deprived our friends of sense and motion, accustomed as they were to sudden surprises of all descriptions.

The horses, too, reared slightly, for even they were alarmed by the startling abruptness of the sound.

Ere the two highwaymen could recover from their astonishment, a sudden crackling and crashing of the bushes made itself heard, and then immediately there appeared before them a man, who, at a glance, they saw by his uniform, to be a member of the troop of dragoons

He held in his hand one of those short-barrelled carbines which they carry; and placing this in a moment to his shoulder, he said—

"Surrender! you are my prisoners! Surrender, or I fire!"

These last words were almost drowned by a tremendous uproar in the distance.

Our friends now understood all.

Indeed, there was no difficulty in coming to a correct conclusion upon the matter.

The troop of dragoons, which Claude and Jack had seen approaching along the cavern, had dispersed themselves over the chase.

Each one had been furnished with a bugle, with instructions to blow a loud blast upon it the moment they caught sight of the highwaymen.

The effect of this bugle blast would be to cause the whole of the little troop to make their way, with all speed, in the direction from which the sound came.

The dragoon who so boldly and daringly called upon our friends to surrender had suddenly caught sight of the two horsemen, who he knew to be those he sought, from the description which had been given him.

True to his commands, this dragoon placed the bugle to his lips, and blew the shrill blast upon it in the manner we have recorded; then, eager to earn as much of the reward as he could, he sprang through the bushes, with his carbine in his hand ready for immediate use.

That he was a brave man his conduct is quite enough to prove.

Raising his weapon to his shoulder, and covering those he addressed with it, he called upon them to surrender.

All this took place with so much rapidity that Dick Turpin and Tom King, who, under the first impulse of the moment, had reined-in their steeds, had not had time to set them in motion again.

The remainder of the detachment of dragoons was very close at hand, and, directly they heard the sound of the bugle, they rushed towards the spot from which the sound appeared to come.

It was their approach which caused the uproar that had followed so close upon the command of the dragoon to our friends to surrender.

Truly, they were now in a serious dilemma, and it is not to be wondered at if for a moment they hesitated as to what they should do.

To be driven out of the chase with a party of dragoons at their heels, was what they most wished to avoid, for it made their discovery almost certain.

Yet, to remain where they were, was quite out of the question.

They saw at once that an encounter with the dragoons could not but be most disastrous to them, and that there would be no hope of their being able to fight it out and remain the victors.

The real fact was, that our friends, skilful and courageous as they were, would not have stood the ghost of a chance with a body of men so well drilled in the use of the weapons they carried as these soldiers were.

They had, therefore, but one resource, and that was to fly.

There was a risk in doing this, for the dragoon pointed his weapon at them with a correct aim, and that he would fire the instant they attempted to move was quite certain.

Still this danger, great as it was, must be braved.

Ere another second could elapse, the greater portion of the troop would be upon them, for already they could perceive the glitter of their accoutrements as they forced their way through the underwood.

Loud shouts and cries, too, came from their lips.

It was for Maud that Dick felt most apprehension.

He was terribly afraid that she would be wounded.

By her manner, and the way she trembled, he could tell how great was the alarm she felt.

If was to Tom King's rapidity of motion that her safety may be attributed.

Suddenly drawing a loaded pistol from his belt, he fired it full in the face of the dragoon with the carbine, who was taken by surprise.

But his finger was on the trigger, and he fired.

But Tom's shot caused him to lose his aim, and the bullet with which the piece was loaded flew high above their heads.

"Forward," he cried to Dick Turpin, his voice mingling strangely with the report of the discharged firearm. "Forward—forward. Use your best speed, and we may yet escape."

While he spoke, he struck his spurs deeply into his horse's sides, while Dick Turpin just pressed with his heels upon the flanks of his bonny mare.

That was enough.

She bounded forward at a gallop that was truly marvellous to witness, and before the dragoon could recover from the shock, and before his comrades could arrive upon the scene, the prey, which at last they made sure was in their grip, had quite got out of sight.

At this their anger knew no bounds.

It so happened that all the dragoons were on foot, for they had found it impossible to conduct their search on horseback, and had, therefore, dismounted.

Nearly all of them had been close enough to see the highwaymen gallop off at the tremendous rate they did, and, consequently, were well aware that to attempt to pursue them on foot was worse than useless.

Nevertheless several ran in the direction they had taken, and had the satisfaction—or rather dissatisfaction—of seeing them at a considerable distance pushing across the open country surrounding the chase with all the speed they were able to make.

These, having once caught sight of our flying friends, did not remove their gaze, but closely watched the direction which they took, so as to be able to follow them with greater certainty.

This was a very useful precaution.

In the meantime, the captain, with a ready forethought, for which he deserves due credit, commanded the man next to him to blow three blasts upon the bugle.

This signal was intended for the men who had charge of the horses, and they had been previously instructed to make their way to whence the sounds came without loss of time.

The clear, sharp notes of the bugle rang out with great effect on the clear night air, and made themselves heard over a large tract of country.

Even our friends heard it in their wild flight, and much wondered what it meant.

The musical sounds reached, too, the ears for which they were intended, and were obeyed with that promptitude which characterizes the soldiery.

A serious delay, however, took place in bringing the horses to the required spot, although not a second was lost.

As soon as they arrived, however, the captain, commanding his men to vault into the saddle, showed them the example by doing so, and was mounted first.

He then called out to them to follow him, and, with the same reckless impetuosity, dashed forward before he had time to see whether he was obeyed.

Considering the difficulties they had to contend with, the dragoons were fairly mounted, and in full pursuit, in an incredibly short space of time.

Some minutes had, however, necessarily elapsed, and to our friends these few minutes were everything.

They enabled them to get such a start of their pursuers as made their chances of escape much greater.

When the captain rode out of the chase they had entirely disappeared, and though the country was lighted up with extreme brilliancy for many miles by the slant rays of the moon, yet he was unable to even catch a glimpse of them.

Nor was there any sound to indicate their locality.

The only chance they had laid in the fact of several of the dragoons having watched our friends out of sight, so they were able, at any rate, to get upon the right track.

The horses of the dragoons, thoroughly rested and refreshed, were in excellent condition for the road, and their riders taxed their powers to the utmost.

Away, then, they flew, as though upon "the wings of the wind," and the rate at which they sped over the ground seemed, at least, to promise them a chance of overtaking the fugitives.

Whether or not they were destined to do this will very shortly be seen.

It is, however, we fancy, in the pursued that the greatest interest is felt, and not in the pursuers.

Leaving, then, the dragoons to push on with all speed after the highwaymen, we will describe what happened to them.

Owing to the pistol which Tom King had so judiciously fired, the dragoon had been baffled and his aim confused.

Consequently, although he fired, yet the bullet with which his piece was loaded did not the least injury to either Dick Turpin, Maud, or Tom King.

How they then darted off, has already been told.

The two highwaymen had been pursued too many times in their lives not to know the importance of making all they could of the short time that would elapse before their foes would be in a condition to follow them.

In a chase of this description a good start would be everything, and, if they should only be lucky enough to obtain it, they did not doubt, should nothing disastrous occur, that eventually they would be able to shake them off altogether.

Our two old friends did not say a word to each other; the rate at which they were travelling entirely precluded conversation, but there was no necessity for speech, they perfectly understood what was to be done.

Urging their horses to the utmost, they flew over the country at a speed which entirely took away their breath and carried them out of sight of their enemies.

They did not take to the road, but kept in a straight line across the face of the country.

For the most part they had to traverse meadow lands, and the only obstructions to their headlong course were such as hedges and ditches.

Over these they forced their flying steeds to leap.

From time to time they cast anxious glances back in the direction of the chase, but they could see nothing of the dragoons, who were, as we have related, waiting for their horses to be brought to them.

This cheered their spirits, and encouraged them to make fresh exertions, for could they once get clear out of sight, they felt sure they would escape.

It was a circumstance which rather struck them with surprise that they had encountered none of the other troops of dragoons, of whose existence the spy had informed them, and with whom they fully expected to come into contact.

It might be that the reason of this was that they had not taken to the high road anywhere, but had kept clear across the meadows.

This conjecture was partially correct, but there was another reason with which the reader will presently be made acquainted.

It is certain that the flying highwaymen felt much pleasnre in consequence.

Suddenly, however, they came in sight of a narrow, cross-country lane, and immediately drew in their steeds.

They were separated from it by a low hedge only, and over this they leaped.

When they alighted in the road they remained for a moment or two immovable, for the double purpose of allowing their steeds to recover, to some extent, from the tremendous exertions which they had made, and to allow Dick and Tom an opportunity of looking back and ascertaining whether their pursuers were on their track.

But though they looked with keen and practised eyes in the direction of the chase, they were nnable to see anything of them.

Rejoiced at this circumstance, the two highwaymen ventured to address a few words of encouragement and hope to each other.

Dick Turpin cheered Maud as well as he was able.

The poor girl was in a terrible state of alarm, but events had lately taken place with so much rapidity that she was scarcely able to realize the full extent of her danger.

She was unhnrt, and our hero felt no small amount of joy upon being made acquainted with this important fact.

She was breathless, however, not with terror alone, but with the rapidity with which she had been carried along.

"Our foes have no horses ready," said Tom King; "yon may depend that is the reason we have been able to get so far in advance of them."

"It may be," replied Turpin; "but we must not trust to that."

"Certainly not."

"I think, now that we have arrived at this cross-country road unperceived, that the best thing we can do is to keep along it at tolerable speed, but not so as to exhaust our horses quickly."

"That is precisely my opinion, Dick," said Tom King. "We shall be able to turn, and wind and double upon our course in such a manner that our pursuers will be fairly puzzled if they attempt to follow us."

"We will try if we cannot bring about such a desirable result; and by confining ourselves entirely to these narrow lanes, and not venturing out upon the high roads at all, I think we shall be able to avoid coming into collision with the other troops that may be patrolling the roads."

"Just so. I think there can be no doubt about that."

"Forward, then. We ought to be moving, and our horses by this time have rested long enough to recover their spent wind."

Dick Turpin gave Black Bess the reins as he spoke, and the noble animal immediately set off at an easy gallop, but which, nevertheless, got over a large piece of ground in a surprisingly short space of time.

It was a pace, too, which Tom King was able to keep up with.

The lane wound about as country lanes nearly always do, and scarcely any time could they see twenty yards before them.

This it was not likely they would find fault with, because it gave them a better opportunity of keeping out of sight of their pursuers.

Unfortunately for them, however, the hedges on both sides were not high enough to conceal them from the view of any persons who might be in the meadows.

This they could not remedy, so, very wisely, they made the best they could of their position.

They now perceived, though, that the moon was rapidly declining towards the western horizon, and they knew by this that dawn was not far distant.

This was an inducement for them to increase their speed, for, from the mere fact of his having Maud upon the saddle before him, it made Dick desirous of reaching some place of shelter and safety before daylight fairly came.

CHAPTER CCCCII.

DICK TURPIN AND TOM KING ARE LULLED INTO A SENSE OF FALSE SECURITY.

It was quite certain that the attention of anyone who passed them would be at once attracted by so unusual a circumstance.

Curiosity would be roused—the whole affair would be commented on, and, as a natural consequence, the dragoons would have little or no difficulty in tracing them.

This consideration, then, which he communicated to his companion, induced Dick to accelerate his speed.

At that early hour of the morning—an hour at most before sunrise—it was scarcely likely they would meet with any persons in these lonely lanes; but as soon as the sun rose it would be a different matter, for rural inhabitants are usually early abroad.

All around them the country was monotonously level, but with this they were well enough pleased, for it enabled them to get over the ground in much less time, for they had no steep hills to climb.

Lower and lower sunk the moon, until at length she disappeared beneath the western horizon, and still our friends continued their way.

There was nothing to be seen of their enemies, and if they were in the rear they were at so great a distance as to be completely out of sight.

This was encouraging to our friends, whose hopes of ultimately being able to elude their foes increased every moment.

Day dawned.

A faint, cold, misty sort of light crept by slow degrees over the whole country.

Gradually, distant objects were brought to view; and when at length day fully came, our friends reined in their steeds, and Tom King, standing in his stirrups, looked long and eagerly in the direction they had just come.

Attentively he scanned every object, no matter how small or remote, but still he was unable to detect anything moving.

For a long time he continued thus scanning the country, and shading the extraneous light with his hands.

Still he could see nothing; and at length, with an expression of content and satisfaction upon his countenance, he once more seated himself in the saddle.

"All is well, Dick," he said. "That capital start we had did the business. We have fairly got rid of our pursuers. They are, I am convinced, no where in sight."

"I am glad to hear that," said Dick. "And now I think the next thing we must see about doing is to find some place where we can remain all day, and where our horses will be able to have proper food and rest."

"Decidedly. If we are not careful to attend to their wants, it will be all over with us."

"You are right; our lives wholly depend upon them, and, therefore, we cannot be too careful."

"We had better jog on gently. I should think, before we proceed much further, we shall certainly be able to meet with some place where we shall be able to put up for a time."

"I hope so."

"What we want to find is some quiet, out-of-the-way road-side public house—one as far removed from other dwellings as possible, and the less frequented, the better."

"You are right; that is just the sort of place we require."

"We must look out for it. Come forward! it will be best not to linger. I expect every moment to meet with someone."

The highwaymen urged their horses to go faster, and quickly reached the termination of the lane.

It opened into a broad country road.

Upon reaching this place our friends paused to reconnoitre.

No one appeared to be in sight, however, but a little distance down this road to the left could be seen the roof and chimneys of some building.

A second glance showed them that at that portion of the road which was opposite to the dwelling a post was fixed, which carried a swinging sign.

It was about a quarter of a mile off.

The early rays of the rising sun fell upon this sign-board and revealed some gilding upon it, but what it was they were too far off to see.

"There is the very place we are looking for, it appears to me," said Tom King, as he pointed towards it; "I do not think we can do better than make our way towards it."

"I am of the same opinion," replied Turpin, "though, had I been permitted any choice in the matter, I should have preferred one in some less busy road."

"In some respects such a one might have been more desirable, but perhaps it is better as it is. I am inclined to think that we shall act wisely by taking up our quarters there."

"So am I; and the thing which influences me most is the fatigue which Black Bess so palpably exhibits. A double load is too much for her."

"It is; but what you have just said has put me in mind of something which I am sure demands our earnest attention."

"What is it"

"If you ride up to the inn yonder with Maud still seated on the saddle before you, suspicion will be immediately aroused."

"True. I am glad you mentioned it."

"At any rate, it will be provocative of curiosity and comment, and we want to be as little noticed as possible."

"Just so."

"What means you would like to adopt to get over this difficulty, I know not. At any rate, some means must be devised."

"Unquestionably. Have you any plan?"

"No."

"I must think of one, then."

Dick Turpin relapsed into silence.

He comprehended in a moment the full force of what his comrade had said to him, and was aware of the imperative necessity of diverting all observation from them as much as possible.

"There is only one plan that I can think of by which this difficulty may be overcome," he said, at length.

"What is it?"

"I am not at all pleased with it," he replied, "and if you could devise some other, I should be glad."

"Let me hear it."

"It is this. Suppose Maud alights, and remains for a little while in the road. In the meantime, we will make our way to the inn, see to our steeds, and then sit down in one of the rooms, saying that we expect a lady presently, and that they are to show her into the room."

"I understand," said Tom. "Maud would walk out towards the inn."

"Just so."

"It is a good plan, and one well calculated to divert suspicion."

"I think so; but, at the same time, I am very unwilling to leave Maud here in the road to walk on by herself."

"If that is the only thing you have to urge against the plan," said Maud, gently, "consider it as nothing. I am willing to do much more than that to secure your safety. Let me alight."

"Brave girl," said Dick, as he pressed her still closer to his breast. "I am most unwilling that you should incur the danger of walking to this inn."

"What danger can there be? Your enemies are far behind. I heard you say as much."

"True, but there is always danger, and I dread to allow you to be a moment out of my sight."

"It will not take many moments, and I shall scarcely be out of your sight. Let me alight. I am sure no better means could be found of averting suspicion."

This was exactly what Dick himself thought, but still he was reluctant to agree to its adoption.

At length, however, after she had renewed her entreaties, he assisted her to the ground, after giving her very particular instructions as to what she should do.

To all of them she promised implicit obedience, and a few words of parting having taken place between them, the two highwaymen started off, leaving her on foot upon the road.

A feeling of uneasiness, for which he was totally at a loss to account, filled Dick's breast upon thus leaving her behind him, and all his efforts to banish it were unavailing.

At every few yards he turned back to look where she was standing, until he was warned by Tom King of the danger of indulging in this propensity.

The reader must be pleased to understand that, what we have just described, took place near the end of the lane, and not upon the broad road into which it debouched.

The reason for this was that they were fearful of being seen by any of the inhabitants of the inn, some of whom might be at the upper windows.

As soon as they had started, however, Maud ventured to emerge into the roadway, where she stood, with clasped hands, watching their disappearance.

A similar sensation to that which filled Dick's breast weighed also upon her spirits.

She felt a strange foreboding, such as she had never before experienced.

She felt inexpressibly lonely, and, though Turpin was fully in sight, it seemed to her as though she had parted from him for ever.

So strong was this idea, that it was not without difficulty that she restrained her impulse to call out to him to return.

Ashamed of this weakness—for so she termed it—she forebore to do so.

She saw him turn round in the saddle and look after her, and she waved her hand in token of recognition.

Her eyes filled with tears as he receded more and more from her view, and a terrible dread that she should see him no more—that she was then taking her last look of him—filled her bosom.

She saw them both halt before the inn, and then enter the yard.

Upon seeing them thus utterly vanish, she burst into tears.

Her impatience and anxiety would not allow her to remain any longer where she was, and, with slow and tottering steps, she walked along the dusty road towards the inn.

Here we will leave her, and return to the two highwaymen.

It was well that Tom King had sufficient forethought to warn his comrade against continuing to look back in the manner he had done, for such a proceeding would have inevitably caused suspicion.

"It is necessary that we should be cautious to a degree," continued Tom King. "You may depend everybody is on the alert."

"No doubt—no doubt."

[TOM KING CONCILIATES THE OSTLER OF THE MOUNTAIN RILL INN.]

"And that reminds me when we go to the inn, be careful to choose a sitting-room upstairs."

"Why?"

"Because, from an upper window we shall be sure to have a more extensive prospect than one on the ground-floor, and I should recommend that we keep a continual look-out for our foes, for you cannot tell how soon the dragoons may get upon our track, and it will never do to be taken at unawares by such adversaries as those."

"You are quite right," said Dick Turpin, "and I am pleased to find that you have lost none of your old prudence and ability. It really seems like old times for us both to be upon the road together, and makes me long for an adventure."

"Hush!" said Tom. "We may be overheard."

As he spoke, he checked his steed, and Dick immediately did the same.

Early as was the hour—being only just after sunrise—there were ample indications that the inmates of the inn were all astir.

As soon as our friends paused before the door, a stout but somewhat aged man appeared upon the threshold.

There was something in the expression of this hale old man's countenance that gave our friends quite a feeling of satisfaction to look upon.

It was beaming with health and good humour, and there was a merry twinkle visible in his clear, bright, gray eye.

His head was almost bald, and his shining pate made him seem at once venerable and agreeable.

All this our frieds noted in a moment, and the next thing that struck them favourably was the scrupulous cleanness that was visible, not only in his person, but over the whole of the house.

"Good morning, gentlemen," he said cheerfully and respectfully, carrying his hand to his forehead as he spoke.

"Do you want to bait here?"

"Yes, if we can do so."

"Then you can. I think, if you will give it a trial, that there is the best of accommodation, both for man and beast, at the 'Mountain Rill.'"

"That is the sign of the house, I suppose."

"Yes; you can see it is, if you will just glance up to the sign-board, and you'll see my name underneath it—Timothy Goodridge."

"Well, Mr. Goodridge," said Turpin, "we will try the accommodation you speak of."

"Thank you, gentlemen. Would you please to walk in?"

"Not just this moment. We would prefer to see our horses safe first."

"You leave that to me," said Timothy Goodridge. "I'll call the ostler out; he will take care of them."

"Oh! never mind. That's the way to the stables, I suppose," said Dick, pointing under an archway. "We will find the ostler ourselves."

As he spoke, our hero turned his horse's head in the direction of which he had spoken, and Tom King instantly followed his example.

The landlord knew very well that it was always injudicious to oppose the inclinations of his customers, so he ran after them, calling loudly upon the ostler as he did so.

That worthy very soon made his appearance, and took hold of the horses' bridles while they alighted.

During the time he was removing their trappings, Dick took the landlord on one side.

"If you can accommodate us with a private room for the remainder of the day, and a couple of bedrooms, we should feel much obliged. Can you do so?"

"Certainly, gentlemen; certainly."

"Have you any sitting-rooms up-stairs?"

The landlord scratched his head.

"There's the best room in the front of the house on the first-floor."

"Is it engaged?"

"No."

"Then we will take it."

"As you please, gentlemen."

"And there is something else, which I shall want you to attend to at once."

"I am entirely at your service, gentlemen."

"I expect a lady to call here in a few moments. She will inquire for us. When she does so, you will be good enough to show her into the best room of the first-floor, of which you have spoken."

"Very good, gentlemen; your orders shall be obeyed. But please to come to the house. The ostler will take care of the horses."

"All right, we will follow you immediately. Do you make haste to the front door, for I cannot tell how soon the lady may arrive."

After this the landlord found it impossible to stay any longer, so he waddled off at once.

As soon as he had gone, our friends turned their attention to the ostler, whose sympathy it was in the highest degree necessary for them to elicit.

The preliminary present of a crown-piece had the effect of placing them on excellent terms with each other, and the highwaymen adroitly kept him in conversation with them while he groomed and fed the horses.

Having satisfied themselves upon this point, as well as ascertaining the position of the stable, its distance from the house, the place where the saddles and bridles were deposited, as well as the manner in which the door was fastened, they crossed the yard, all the time looking carefully about them, and entered the inn by the back door.

CHAPTER CCCCIII.

THE CONDUCT OF TIMOTHY GOODRIDGE, THE LANDLORD, BECOMES SUSPICIOUS.

That there was nothing whatever calculated to arouse suspicion in the manner in which our two friends had arrived at the "Mountain Rill" inn, the reader must be well aware.

For two horsemen well mounted to halt as they did for refreshment, both for their beasts and for themselves, was a thing that happened frequently in those days, when the facilities for travelling which we now possess did not exist.

Neither was there anything suspicious or extraordinary in the very legitimate message they gave the landlord respecting the arrival of a lady.

All this was due to Tom King's caution, who, although they were so near to Enfield Chase, and consequently so close to their foes, nevertheless hoped that they would be able to remain at this inn for a sufficient length of time to enable them to recuperate their strength and consult upon what was to be done in the future.

For our own part we cannot help considering their position somewhat ticklish, and by no means share the confidence which they not only exhibited but felt.

Just as though he had lived there all his life, Dick Turpin placed his thumb upon the latch of the back door, and, raising it, entered the inn.

He found himself in a large and comfortable kitchen, in which, however, there was no company, though this was easily accounted for by the fact that the sun had only just risen.

Nevertheless, a cheerful fire was burning in the grate, and the whole of the room presented that appearance of cleanliness, neatness, and order which had impressed our two friends so favourably when they first halted in front of the inn.

A mere passing glance, which they cast around them as they crossed the kitchen, showed them this.

Just before them was a partially-open door, and to this they, of course, directed their steps.

It led into the passage communicating with the front door.

Here the landlord still stood.

He was looking earnestly down the road, and shading his eyes with his hands, for the sun shone into them in a perplexing manner.

So intently occupied was he, that he did not observe our friends approach.

It was evident from this that Maud had not arrived.

For this the highwaymen were not sorry; they would have preferred to have got comfortably seated in their private room.

As they approached the front door, however, the landlord turned round.

As soon as he caught sight of them he came towards them.

"You took me at unawares, gentlemen. I thought you would have come back the other way. Pray pardon my not being here to receive you."

"Don't mention that, I beg; but tell me, has the lady about whom I spoke to you yet arrived?"

"She has not, sir. Will she come on foot?"

"Why do you ask that question?" said Tom King.

"No offence, sir, I hope; but I was going to say that if so, there is a lady slowly coming this way."

"That is her, then," said Turpin. "Be sure that you are at hand to receive her."

"All right, worthy sir. Would you like to go upstairs at once? It will be some minutes, no doubt, before the lady arrives."

"Yes. Who is there to show me to the apartment?"

"I will, sir."

"But I want you to stay at the front door and keep watch."

"The lady is a distance down the road, sir; and it won't take me a moment to run upstairs and show you your room."

"Very good, then; make haste!"

The landlord was almost as good as his word.

The length of time it took him to show our friends into the front room was short, indeed; and, having done, he descended the stairs with greater alacrity than anyone would have imagined possible.

Dick Turpin's first impulse, upon entering the room, was to make his way to the window.

Tom King closely followed him, and the glance which he cast into the roadway was but little less anxious than that of his captain.

There was no Maud to be seen.

What could be the meaning of this?

They had fully expected to catch sight of her approaching, and to have increased her confidence by showing her that they were in safety.

"Did not the landlord say he could see her at some distance down the road?" asked Turpin, anxiously.

"He did, Dick."

"But I can see nothing of her."

"Nor I. Yet stay. I have a thought. How foolish of us, to be sure!"

"How—what do you mean? I do not understand you."

"Why, we have been long enough talking to the landlord and getting to the window to allow Maud to have reached the door."

"Of course. I did not give the matter a thought, and expected to see her at a distance still."

"She has arrived, you may depend."

"This window does not command a view of the front door, which appears to me to be immediately below us."

"Doubtless it is."

"There will not be much risk in opening the window. Let us do so. You see it opens like a door. We should then be able to see easily enough."

"Let us do so."

Dick Turpin hastily turned the little fastening of the latticed window, and opened it carefully.

Then both looked out.

The sound of voices reached their ears, and almost instantly they saw Maud standing at the door.

The landlord was there, and appeared to be questioning her closely.

Doubtless his curiosity was aroused, and he desired to learn all he could about his customers.

There was a look of deep distress upon Maude's countenance that made Dick angry to witness.

Doubtless she was alarmed at the cross-examination to which she was being subjected.

Dick could not contain himself sufficiently to remain a spectator of this scene for a moment.

"That will do, landlord!" he called out. "That is the lady I expect; let her come up."

This action of Dick's was rather an injudicious one, but perhaps it did not matter, as there was no one in sight. He was conscious that he had acted incautiously the moment after he had spoken, and drew in his head hastily.

When the landlord looked up he had disappeared.

Maud gave vent to a faint scream of surprise as the well-known accents fell upon her ears.

Where they came from she knew not, for when she looked around Turpin was nowhere visible.

With considerable confusion perceptible both in his voice and manner, the landlord spoke.

"This way," he said, "this way. Be good enough to walk this way. The gentlemen you desire to see are in the best room upstairs."

Maud followed, of course.

The mere fact of her arrival at the door of the inn will suffice to assure the reader that she performed her walk in safety.

What, then, the forebodings portended which had so filled her breast she knew not.

Dick Turpin, after having spoken from the window in the manner we have recorded, hastened to the door of the room, and, opening it, listened for Maude's approach. He could soon hear the sounds of the landlord's voice, which, somehow or other, had grown distasteful to his ears.

He was apologizing to her for having detained her.

In another moment the couple reached the top of the stairs, and the landlord, with many bows, ushered her into the apartment.

With a low, hysterical cry of joy, Maud sprang forward. Dick caught her in his arms.

He was somewhat surprised at this exhibition of feeling. He endeavoured to soothe her.

In the meantime, Tom King, who had all his wits about him, ingeniously got rid of the gaping and curious landlord by ordering him to bring the breakfast up as quickly as possible.

After this order, Mr. Timothy Goodridge could do nothing but retire, and he reluctantly left the room.

His curiosity was strongly roused, and as yet he had not been able to elicit any information calculated to quell it.

Dick soon succeeded in soothing Maud and calming her agitation.

When she fully realized that Turpin was safe, her excitement passed away.

Our hero questioned her closely with respect to her conversation with the landlord.

It was just as he had expected.

The landlord had asked a multitude of questions, all having the same tendency; namely, to elicit from her some information respecting his two early visitors.

Maud, however, had been fully on her guard, despite the excitement under which she laboured, and Mr. Goodridge had not succeeded in exacting anything from her at the moment when Turpin put an end to the colloquy by speaking from the window above.

All was now well, and after a few more words had been exchanged, Maud retired to the bedroom to arrange her disordered dress and attend to her toilette.

Turpin and King, too, were not at all sorry to do the same thing, and when the landlord came up with a first-rate breakfast, consisting of a host of homely delicacies, all three presented a much more civilized appearance than they had done a short time previously.

That all three were blessed with a good appetite the reader need scarcely be told, and, notwithstanding the dangers which they had so recently passed through, and the no less serious ones which seemed to menace them in the future, they sat down to this tempting meal with as light hearts as any in Christendom.

Even Maud smiled, and looked as gay and happy as her two companions, though occasionally her fair face would become clouded when her thoughts were directed to the future.

By the time the breakfast was finished—washed down as it was by copious draughts of ale of excellent quality—our friends felt much inclined to be at peace with all the world, and they became oblivious of all that was suspicious and disagreeable in the landlord's character while thinking of the good fare he had placed before them.

Aware, as they all of necessity were, of the importance of sleep in recuperating the body from fatigue, and being also conscious that some length of time might possibly elapse before they would have so good an opportunity of slumbering as they had at the present time, they agreed that they should sleep, if possible, till nightfall.

For both the highwaymen to have surrendered themselves to slumber would have been dangerous to a degree, and so it was arranged that Turpin and King should take it in turns to watch.

The lot fell first upon Tom King.

Drawing the dingy curtain which hung before the window, he sat down in such a manner that though he could command a good view of the country around, yet it would have been difficult for any one on the outside to have caught sight of him, and to have distinguished his form and features would have been impossible.

Here, then, he sat, with his eyes roaming constantly over the vast expanse of flat country spread out before him, in order to ascertain at the earliest moment whether the dragoons were approaching.

His first care was to make his eye thoroughly familiar with every feature of the landscape spread out before him, so as to be the better able to detect quickly the appearance of anything unusual.

This was a wise precaution, but there really seemed no need of it, for the time wore on, and still there were no signs of the approach of the dragoons.

From this Tom began to indulge in the hope that they had really been successful enough to elude them altogether.

At length the termination of his time of watching was reached, and, punctual to a moment, Dick entered the room to relieve his friend.

A few words passed between them as to what had taken place.

Dick was well pleased to hear that Tom had not seen anything of the dragoons; and he, too, ventured to hope that for a time they were safe from their enemies.

Tom King was right glad to be relieved, though he exhibited no hurry to retire; but Turpin could see by his haggard face how much he stood in need of rest.

At his urgent solicitation, he betook himself to the bedchamber which had been provided for him, and Turpin resumed his place at the window.

With no less eagerness and keenness than his companion he scanned attentively the various features of the landscape.

But all was satisfactory.

Where the dragoons were, or how it was they had not succeeded in tracking them to their present place of refuge, he was at a loss to think.

From the window at which he sat he had a prospect of many miles, but Enfield Chase was far beyond the limits of his vision.

Still his caution did not relax, and well was it for him that it did not.

As noon approached, he suddenly perceived in the far distance something which glittered brightly in the sun.

Instantly his eyes were fixed upon it with a most piercing gaze.

The glittering object moved, although but slowly.

Still it did move, and not for long did Dick remain in doubt as to what it was.

The great distance at which the object appeared to be would at once account for its motion seeming to be so slow.

It was a portion of the troop of dragoons.

It might be that their horses were going at a walking pace only, but that it was from the accoutrements of the soldiers that the glittering proceeded Dick felt confident.

He did not yet venture to arouse his companion, but resolved to do so should the troop draw nearer.

But this they did not appear to do.

Their course, slow as it seemed, was still continued at the same rate; but Turpin fancied that they came no nearer to the inn.

After a time he was convinced of this, and then he came to a correct conclusion upon the point.

The dragoons he had seen were pursuing a road parallel with the one on which the inn was built, and he was presently confirmed in this idea by perceiving that the dragoons slowly receded from his view, till at length they vanished altogether.

It was just after this that Tom King entered the room.

The time allotted to him for sleep had now expired.

CHAPTER CCCCIV.

DICK TURPIN AND TOM KING ENDEAVOUR TO ARRANGE THEIR FUTURE PROCEEDINGS.

So absorbed was Dick Turpin's attention, that he was unconscious of Tom King having entered the room.

He did not hear the unclosing of the door, nor yet his comrade's footstep as he approached him.

It was not, indeed, until Tom placed his hand upon his shoulder that Dick became aware of his presence.

He started and turned round, but he was reassured the moment he caught sight of his companion's countenance.

"Haa my term of watching just expired, then?"

"It has. Has the time passed so quickly that you were unconscious of it?"

"The fact is, Tom, my attention has been much absorbed for some time past."

"What has happened?"

"Nothing of an alarming character, I hope."

"That's well."

"Sit down a moment, Tom, and I will tell you."

"Do so. I was about to ask you to remain. I, too, have something I wish to say, and perhaps we shall not be able to find a better opportunity than the present."

"What is it you wish to say?"

"That you shall know presently. Let me hear you first."

Dick made no demur or hesitation, but at once told his comrade what he had seen.

We need not repeat his words, for the reader already knows the subject of his communication.

At first Tom was anxious, but, by the time our hero had finished his narrative, his uneasiness very much abated.

"The dragoons are hovering around us, that is certain, and the sooner we get to some other part of the country from this the better."

"Undoubtedly; and that at once brings me to the subject upon which I wished to speak to you."

"What, our leaving this place?"

"Yes."

"I had made up my mind to take my departure this very night and to travel until daybreak, by which time we shall be at a considerable distance from the scene of our late exploits."

"So we should; and, what I regret is, the difficulties which lie in the way of our departing from here to-night."

"Difficulties?" repeated Dick. "What difficulties?"

"Can it be possible that you are ignorant of them?"

Dick reflected a moment.

"I see, the same thought has not occurred to you," continued Tom King. "The difficulty is Maud."

"Maud?"

"Yes. Cannot you see that it will be impossible to leave here without doing so in a manner highly calculated to excite the suspicions of the landlord, whose curiosity we have good reason to believe is already so much inflamed? Cannot you see that, as we are now situated, we cannot direct our steps to a place of safety without both distressing Black Bess, and calling forth the attention of all those persons we may chance to encounter?"

"I see it all now," said Dick, who had been silent and thoughtful during his companion's long speech. "I see it all now, and am at a loss to think how I could have overlooked it."

"I have been thinking of it for some time," returned Tom King; "and I think the matter one of sufficient importance to call for immediate attention."

"It is, it is."

"We ought, too, to make some kind of arrangement as to our future plan of action. We have much to reflect upon ere we can come to a decision."

"We have, indeed."

"But first of all we must make up our mind as to what we are to do to-night. I am of opinion that to remain here will be running a greater risk than we are justified in incurring."

"Yet, what is to be done? Maud cannot be left behind."

"True; and it is equally certain that it will never do to take her with us as we brought her here. It would be folly to think of reaching a place of safety."

"What do you propose, Tom? If you have considered this matter over I am sure you have come to some conclusion. You are not one to point out a difficulty without being able to suggest a remedy."

"I have certainly thought over different modes of getting out of this dilemma."

"And you found one that was better than the rest; one, in fact, that would perfectly answer the end we have in view."

"I cannot say for that; but still I have a plan."

"Let me know it, then. Tell it me at once."

"In the first place, then, our difficulty is in taking Maud with us with the means of which we are at present in possession."

"Just so."

"It is clear that Maud must accompany us, and, therefore, what remains is to find some means by which she can do so."

"But what means can be found?"

"That is just it; and much will depend on the reply you give to my next question."

"What is it?"

"Can Maud ride?"

"Oh, yes."

"You are sure of that?"

"Oh, quite."

"That is all right. The rest is easy."

"Pardon me, but you have not explained yourself very clearly."

"I know I have not, but will do so in a moment. Let us call the landlord and ask him whether he has a horse to dispose of. Doubtless he has, for I saw several in the stable as well as a side-saddle."

"I see now. Your plan is a good one."

"I am glad you think so. It may, perhaps, look suspicious for us to have a female travelling with us in this manner, but it is quite certain it will not be so suspicious as to have her seated before you."

"Certainly not. Tom, I heartily approve of your plan, and am much obliged to you for suggesting it to me, or otherwise I should probably not have seen the danger until at the last moment."

"Shall we call the landlord?"

"If you like."

"I think it will be best to settle this part of the business first. We shall then be better able to talk over our future arrangements."

"Agreed."

"We will call the landlord, then, at once."

"Just so. But I have a caution to give you. I have already said how much his curiosity is inflamed. It will, therefore, be necessary to use great caution in addressing him."

"Trust me for that."

"I can do so, I know; but still, there was no harm in breathing a caution."

"None whatever."

The landlord was now called.

He obeyed the summons with alacrity.

As Tom had truly said, his curiosity was much inflamed.

He felt convinced in his own mind that a mystery of some kind hung over his customers, and though a thousand different solutions suggested themselves to his mind, he failed to hit upon the right one.

He was glad enough to make his way into the chamber, for he hoped thereby to glean some additional information.

Assuming a most obsequious manner, he bowed low as he entered the room, and said—

"What are your commands, gentlemen?"

"A bottle of your best port and three wine-glasses, landlord," said Dick Turpin.

Mr. Goodridge bowed, and withdrew.

"Three wine-glasses!" he muttered, as he descended the stairs. "What can they want with three wine-glasses? The lady is not with them, but perhaps she will come presently. That must be it! The third wine-glass is for the lady."

Thus muttering and ruminating, the landlord proceeded to execute his guests' commands.

Then, going up once more into the room, he was surprised to hear Dick say—

"Put the bottle and glasses on the table, landlord, and bring a chair and sit down with us. We want to speak to you."

The landlord was completely taken aback.

This was what he was furthest from expecting.

Nevertheless, he retained sufficient self-possession to obey, and, drawing a chair to the table, he sat down in an attitude compounded of assurance and deference.

In the meantime, Turpin proceeded to draw the cork from the bottle of wine, and, having done so, filled the three glasses.

One was pushed towards the landlord, who took it with a trembling and expectant hand, and a toast having been proposed, he raised it to his lips.

The two highwaymen emptied their glasses at one gulp, and then Dick Turpin somewhat abruptly approached the business he had in hand.

"Landlord," he said, "I have called you to see whether you can assist us out of a little difficulty. You look a man of discernment and experience, and, for that reason, we have ventured to trouble you with our affairs."

At this very flattering speech the landlord grinned complacently, and, bowing his head with an affectation of modesty, said nothing, but waited for our hero to proceed.

"I fancy I was not wrong in thinking that you would do your best to serve us in our present strait."

"You were quite right, sir," said the landlord; "and, in this business as well as in every other, it will be my constant effort to deserve satisfaction."

"That is all right," said Turpin; "and now to come to the point. That young lady who called here to see us wishes to continue her journey in our company, but, unfortunately, it is impossible."

"How impossible?"

"Why, you see, we have but a horse a piece, and she cannot ride upon one of these."

"Certainly not."

"Well, then, what we want is to find some means of allowing her to travel along with us."

"I understand," said the landlord; "and it so happens that I can get you out of your difficulty without any trouble at all."

"I am glad to hear that," said Dick. "Have another glass of wine."

He pushed the bottle towards the landlord as he spoke, who did not hesitate to replenish his glass.

"I can seen my way clear enough," continued Mr. Goodridge, "provided one thing."

"What?"

"That the lady can ride."

"Oh! yes; the lady can ride."

The landlord rubbed his hands together in a satisfied manner.

"Then," he said, "I have got as nice a lady's horse in my stable as ever was foaled. I bought it very cheap some days ago, thinking I might some day sell it to advantage."

"Well, an opportunity has now offered itself. I am quite willing to buy the horse for the lady if it is a good one."

"Come down and see it," said the landlord, forgetting his curiosity in the prospect of selling the horse advantageously. "Come down, and I'll show it you at once."

"All right, so we will; but we will finish this bottle first."

More glasses were filled and emptied, and then all three rose.

Tom King and the landlord went first, but Turpin lingered behind.

Tom knew his motive, and contrived to occupy the whole of the landlord's attention.

Turpin tapped at the door of Maud's room.

She opened it in a moment, and her face lighted up with pleasure when she saw who it was.

"Fear nothing, Maud; all is well. I am going down into the inn-yard to try and purchase a horse for you to ride upon. Do not detain me."

After speaking these hasty words of explanation, Dick hastened down the stairs and overtook the landlord and Tom near the bar, where they had paused and waited for him.

Maud closed the door of her room, and sprang to the window, from which, as she was well aware, she could see the whole of the inn-yard and the stables.

Ere she had occupied this post a moment, she saw the trio make their appearance, and she watched them as they took their course towards the stables.

It is with the doings of the highwaymen, however, that we are chiefly interested.

With an alacrity which he could not conceal or diminish, the landlord hurried across the yard, calling out lustily to the ostler as he did so.

That worthy made his appearance after a brief delay, for he had been upon the loft cutting chaff.

At the bidding of the landlord he re-entered the stable and fetched the lady's horse.

It was a fine-looking animal, and our two friends were pleased the moment they saw it.

A closer examination had no other effect than to confirm them in their good opinion.

It was really a first-class animal, and, apparently, without the slightest defect or blemish.

The landlord, like a keen man of business, noted the expression of pleasure which appeared upon their faces, and took his cue from it accordingly.

"What is your price?" said Dick, when he had finished making his examination.

The landlord paused a moment, and Tom King added—

"You told us you bought the horse cheap. Now, don't try to get too much out of it. We did not anticipate having to make this purchase, and we are rather short of funds."

At this announcement the landlord calmed down somewhat, and altered the sum he had just thought of mentioning.

"I'll tell you what I can do, and it will be fair both for you and for me. As to what I gave for the horse, that's neither here nor there. It's honestly worth eighty guineas; but I will take sixty, and that's the very lowest."

To this offer our friends at first said nothing, and having considered a moment or two, said—

"You ask a good round sum for the horse."

"He's worth twenty more; and I should not have named the price I did, had it not been for what your friend said. Of course I want to sell him as soon as I can, because the longer I keep him the less profit I shall get."

"Of course. Now, look here, landlord; besides a horse we want several other things. We want a bridle, a side-saddle, a lady's riding-habit, and a whip. Can you supply us with these?"

"Certainly; I have them all on the premises. They are not new, being those I keep to lend out on hire."

"That will not matter," said Dick. "And now, landlord, I will make you an offer, and you can please yourself about taking it. If you like to let me have the horse and the other things I have mentioned for sixty guineas, why, here's your money."

Our hero clapped his pocket significantly as he spoke.

The landlord hesitated a moment, and then he said—

"Well, it's driving a hard bargain, and I was in hopes of doing better. However, if you'll make it sixty-five guineas, I don't mind."

"Well, agreed."

"It's a bargain, then."

"Yes."

Tom King bent his mouth close to Turpin's ear, and whispered:

"We are in a fix now. We haven't got half sixty-five pounds between us."

CHAPTER CCCCV.

THE TWO HIGHWAYMEN PLAN AN EXCURSION ON THE HIGHWAY.

Dick Turpin changed countenance slightly when Tom King made this announcement, but, recovering himself almost immediately, he said to the landlord:

"I am not quite sure whether we shall start to-night."

"All right, gentlemen, as long as you like. My house and myself are quite at your disposal."

"However," continued Dick, "to do things fair and business-like, as well as to clinch the bargain, look, here is something on account."

So saying, our hero took from his pocket a leather bag, from which he counted out twenty guineas into the landlord's hand, who received them with evident satisfaction.

"We will consider the matter as settled now," he said.

"Just so."

The horse was then led back into the stable, and our friends returned to the house.

Upon entering their own room they sat down near the window, and Tom said:

"Well, Dick, you have bought the horse and paid twenty guineas on account, but where the remaining forty-five are to come from I don't know."

"Don't you? then I will tell you. Where plenty more has come from."

"It would be ridiculous upon my part to affect to misunderstand you. You mean, you would seek for the remainder of the money by an adventure on the road?"

"Just so."

"But think of the danger."

"It is great, I admit."

"You cannot help doing so. It is something more than great."

"Nevertheless, the danger must be braved. Tom, my friend, listen to me. You were at some pains, a little while ago, to show me that Maud must have a steed for herself. We obtain one, and not having money enough to purchase it, we must get the remainder how we may."

"I know all that, but think of the inevitable effects that would result from our levying contributions on the highway just at the present time. The idea is suicidal in the extreme. The roads are filled with dragoons, and if we have so far eluded them, a robbery would immediately set them upon our track."

"I am quite willing to admit the amount of danger there must be in any such attempt, but nevertheless, the money must be obtained. But stay; a fresh thought strikes me. I have nothing but your word that we have not money enough between us to make this purchase. Turn out the contents of your pockets and let us see."

Tom King willingly enough complied with this request, for he would have been only too glad to have owned himself in error, and discovered that they really did possess sufficient money.

But he had small hopes of this, for, some little time back, he had taken the trouble to ascertain with tolerable exactitude the state of their finances, and it was in consequence of this that he spoke to Turpin in the manner we have recorded at the close of the preceding chapter. As for Dick himself, with characteristic carelessness, he never troubled himself about the amount of funds in hand, and the probability is, he would not have discovered he was short of so much until the actual time of settlement arrived.

Thanks, however, to the forethought of Tom King, this disagreeable occurrence was avoided by being made known in good time.

Turpin quickly produced from his pockets all the money he possessed, and then, sweeping his own and his comrade's into one heap, began to count it.

Long before he had finished his task, he became painfully aware that there was nothing like sufficient.

Tom King was right.

The total amount of money before them was under thirteen pounds.

"That is what I said," exclaimed Tom King, as soon as Dick had announced the result. "And we are in a much greater fix than you feel inclined to admit."

"Not so."

"I say we are. Doubtless one good adventure on the road would place in our possession the money we require to complete the purchase, but then think of the imminent danger of such an adventure at the present time. Our position is, in my opinion, by far more ticklish than you seem to think it. Our only chance to preserve our lives and liberties is to keep quiet for some length of time; and one such exploit as you propose would bring all our enemies upon our track before we had time to get fairly off."

"I understand all this quite clearly," said Dick Turpin; "and you must not fall into the error of supposing that I underrate the danger. I do not. I quite agree with you as to the policy of keeping as quiet as possible, and no other circumstances than those which have occurred would induce me to attempt an adventure on the highway. But the money must be had, and, for my part, I can see no other means by which we can obtain it."

"Nor I. In fact, there is no other."

"Very well, then; we must resign ourselves to necessity, and try our best to avert the consequences you have just foretold."

"Then there is another thing," said Tom King. "A little while ago you agreed with me in saying that it would be unsafe in the extreme for us to pass the night in the inn, but in the event of an excursion such as you propose, how are we to avoid doing so?"

"That is a serious objection, I must confess, and yet I think it can be got over."

"How so?"

"Night is fast closing in. Look! Dusk has unconsciously stolen upon us."

It was as he had said.

The time had passed rapidly, and now they found that the shadows of evening were beginning to gather in the room, rendering all things indistinct.

The brief winter's day was fast approaching a close.

"In a little while," continued Turpin, "it will be quite dark. As soon as it is so, I will depart, and, if luck befriends me as she hitherto has done, I shall return here before the night is so far advanced as to prevent our departure."

"Stay a moment," said Tom King, gravely. "I beg that you will attend to what I am about to say."

"What is it?"

"I can see that the money must be had, and that there is no other means of obtaining it than by going upon the road, great as is the danger of such a proceeding, and much as I wish it could be avoided. But that is, unfortunately, quite out of the question. Turpin, you have spoken about setting out."

"Certainly I have."

"Then I hope you will understand me properly. For a long time we have been friends; and, by the long continuance of that friendship, I desire you to grant me a favour——"

"You need not go on any further with your speech," interrupted Dick Turpin, with a smile. "I know the favour you wish to beg."

"It is that I may depart upon this expedition instead of yourself."

"I knew that."

"And you will let me?"

"Nay—nay. I do not see how I can do so. It is on my account that the money is to be obtained—it is through me that this extra risk will have to be run—and surely I ought to be the person who should have the responsibility."

"That seems correct," said Tom King; "but I think I shall get you to consent to remain here while I depart upon this errand."

Dick smiled, and shook his head negatively.

"I still think so," said Tom King. "I admit all that you say, and must admit that it sounds just and reasonable. But, for all that, I think I ought to go, and not you."

"Why?"

"Simply on account of the landlord."

"The landlord?"

"Yes; from his inordinate curiosity we have everything to fear."

"Still I do not comprehend"——

"But you will in a moment. Maud is a woman. You will scarcely be able to disguise from her the errand upon which you are going, or, even if you do, she, knowing as she does the perils with which you are surrounded, will be in a state of dreadful anxiety and suspense until you return. It is tolerably certain that I shall not be able to soothe her—that nothing that I can say will have any effect in calming her agitation."

"Yes, I know all that; but"——

"Do not interrupt me, but listen until you hear all that I have to say. With the landlord's curiosity aroused, as it certainly would be, by your departure, he would infallibly notice Maud's agitation, and then there is no means of ascertaining the consequences which may result from his prying inquisitiveness. On the other hand, should I go in your place, you will be able to keep Maud calm and quiet, and the landlord would find no fresh food for his curiosity. I have one more reason to urge why I should go instead of yourself, and that is, I should be cooler and calmer than you, and, for that reason, more likely to meet with success, because you would feel anxious as to what was taking place here; and, in the hour of danger, that very anxiety might so much unnerve you as to cause your destruction."

To the arguments thus set forth by his comrade, Dick Turpin listened with profoundest attention.

He could not conceal from himself that all that Tom said was marked with the utmost good sense, yet he did not like the idea of allowing Tom King to depart on an expedition which he considered so peculiarly his own.

Tom King could derive no profit from it, and certainly would run into very great danger.

In the end, however, after much discussion, Dick Turpin was prevailed upon by his companion to abandon his original intention, and stay at the inn while he went in his place.

It was on Maud's account, however, that Dick relented, for he was unwilling to give her more cause for anxiety and uneasiness of mind than he could help.

That Tom King stood a much better chance of succeeding in the enterprise there can be little doubt, for he could be cool, and calm, and collected, while Turpin could only be so by the maintenance of a continual effort.

Yet it was reluctantly and unwillingly that Dick did give way, and more than once he felt inclined to rescind his decision.

On each occasion, however, Tom King overruled him.

By this time darkness had fully come, and they were aroused by a faint tapping at the door of the chamber.

Upon permission being giving to enter, the door was thrown open, and the landlord appeared upon the threshold with two lighted candles in his hand.

"I waited for some time, gentlemen," he said, in an apologetical tone of voice as he advanced and set the candles down upon the table, "but, finding you did not ring for lights, as I fully expected you would, I made so bold as to bring them without having any commands to do so."

While the landlord spoke, both of the highwaymen fixed their eyes with great intentness upon his countenance.

But they could glean nothing from it.

Its impassable expression baffled them.

His sudden entrance, uncalled for, they could not help looking upon as a suspicious circumstance.

Whether they were right or not time alone could show.

His entrance had, however, one good effect.

It confirmed Dick in the policy of remaining with Maud while Tom King was absent upon his hazardous expedition.

Perceiving that the highwayman made no reply to his speech, the landlord asked a direct question.

It was his old and oft-repeated one.

"Have you any commands for me, gentlemen?" he asked.

"Yes," said Tom King.

The landlord looked at him expectantly.

"I want my horse saddled immediately. I am going out for an hour or so."

"Very well, sir," returned the landlord, with his usual imperturbability; "you shall be obeyed."

He turned round and left the room as he spoke.

As soon as the door was closed, Tom King said—

"What do you think of the landlord, now?"

"I am at a loss to say."

"So am I, except that I consider his conduct grows more and more suspicious, and it behoves you to keep a careful look out upon him while I am away."

"I shall do so, you may depend. I can assure you I feel anything but comfortable when I think about him."

"There is no immediate dread," said Tom King, as he carefully loaded his pistols, "though I quite think you ought to be careful. Have your eyes open to every occurrence, no matter how trivial."

"Trust me."

"Very well, then. As I am ready, I will go. Farewell."

"Nay, nay; I will accompany you to the stables."

"Upon no account."

"Why not?"

"Because I want to have a few words with the ostler."

"But I shall not prevent that. You will have nothing to say to him that you do not want me to hear?"

"No, no; you mistake me entirely. I want to get that meddling, officious, inquisitive landlord out of the way. If we both go to the stables he will be sure to accompany us, in the hope of finding out something, and he will not be at a loss for an excuse."

"But he will accompany you if you go alone."

"No, not so; when I descend I will send him up to you, and tell him you want to see him. Upon some pretext or other contrive to detain him until I am off. You will have little difficulty in doing so."

"Oh, none at all—none at all. But, Tom, I cannot help expressing my admiration at the ready way you have of getting out of a difficulty. I will take care the landlord don't trouble you if you will send him up to me."

CHAPTER CCCCVI.

TOM KING ONCE MORE FINDS HIMSELF UPON THE ROAD, AND MEETS WITH A STARTLING ADVENTURE.

"VERY good," said Tom King; "and, as that is all arranged, and as I am quite ready, I will be off at once. It is not worth while to delay."

"Be careful," said Dick Turpin, as he took his comrade's hand and shook it warmly. "Remember how much depends upon your success."

"I will be careful, rely upon it; and now, for the present, farewell!"

"Farewell!" said Dick; "and you may rest assured that ere long I shall find some means of requitting this service."

"Pho—pho; Never mention that. Hark! I hear the stairs creak. Some one is ascending."

Scarcely had he uttered these words, than there came a faint tap-tap at the door, and, upon permission being given, the landlord entered.

Bowing low, he said—

"Your horse is quite ready, sir, and waiting; and, if you will be pleased to follow me, I will lead you to the stables."

At these words Turpin and King involuntarily changed glances.

They so exactly bore out what the other had said.

"I am just ready too," said Tom King, in reply.

"This way, if you please," said the landlord.

Tom King fully expected that Dick would say something to detain the landlord, but to his surprise he did not.

Nevertheless, feeling sure that his comrade understood him, and that he might safely leave him to do as he promised, he did not hesitate to follow the landlord out of the room and down the stairs.

When they had gone about half way down, he had reason to congratulate himself for not having interfered, for just then he heard his comrade call out—

"Landlord—landlord!"

Of course Mr. Goodridge paused.

"My friend wants you," said Tom King, quickly; "run up and see what he wants. I can easily find the way to the stables myself."

The landlord uttered an ejaculation of impatience, but he had no resource but to obey.

Most unwillingly, then, he reascended the stairs.

Tom resolved to make the best use of his time, so ran down the remainder as fast as he could and hurried to the stable, for he was by no means certain that Dick would be able to keep the landlord upstairs.

From his manner when he turned round to obey the call, it was clear that he had quite set his heart upon going to the stables and seeing Tom off.

The first thing our friend did on emerging from the back door of the inn, was to look up at the sky and note its aspect.

He was pleased with its appearance, for he saw that the night was one that just suited his purpose

The whole face of the heavens was covered with one huge black cloud.

There was no wind, and a slight hazy fog floated here and there, giving an appearance of indistinctness to all things.

On such a night Tom felt the most daring enterprise could be carried out successfully, and he walked across the yard towards the stable with a feeling of light-hearted confidence.

The ostler must have heard his approaching footstep, for, when he drew near, he opened the door of the stable, and led the horse out fully caparisoned.

A lamp was burning just inside, and this illuminated the ground round the stable for some distance.

Ere he ventured to mount, he carefully examined all the trappings to see that all was right, for he knew by experience how necessary it was to ascertain this before starting.

The ostler had, however, done his duty well, for the highwayman was unable to find anything out of place.

In another moment, Tom King had vaulted lightly and easily into the saddle.

The ostler held the horse by the bridle while he did so. Tom King took the reins, and then plunged his hand into his pocket.

He drew out a five-shilling piece.

"Ostler," he said.

The man addressed grinned and touched his forehead.

"You have done your duty well, so here is a crown-piece."

"Thank you, sir," was the reply, as Tom King slipped the coin mentioned into his hand.

"I hope you will understand," continued the highwayman, "that we feel inclined to be liberal with you if you will only serve us faithfully, and obey our orders promptly. That is but an earnest of what you will receive. I am going out for an hour, perhaps four or five. Don't go to bed while I am away. Sit up until I return. As soon as you hear me coming, run out, take the horse, groom it instantly, and place it in the stable in such a condition that no one could tell it had been out. Do you understand me?"

"Quite well, your honour."

"Very well, then. Attend to my instructions and you will find you will have no cause to regret it."

The ostler once more touched his forehead, and promised strict attention and obedience.

Having thus made matters right, Tom King seated himself firmly in the saddle and touched his steed lightly with his heavy riding-whip, which formed, when the lash was coiled round the hand, a very formidable weapon of offence and defence.

It was then somewhat similar to the modern weapon miscalled a life-preserver.

The horse's hoofs made a prodigious clatter on the stones with which the inn-yard was paved, and just as he emerged into the road, our friend caught sight of the inquisitive landlord standing at the front door of the inn.

But Tom did not check his speed in the least, and in less than a moment was lost to sight in the obscurity of the evening, though not to hearing, for the beat of his horse's hoofs rung out clearly and sharply upon the night air.

At length, they, too, ceased, and then the landlord, with a sigh of disappointment, turned back into the inn.

There was a wild, gleeful feeling about Tom King's heart as his horse bounded gallantly over the hard road.

His blood circulated in his veins with redoubled speed, and such a sensation of exultation took possession of him that he felt as though he could cry out aloud for very joy.

This impulse, however, he restrained, and by degrees reined in his steed, for he had no wish to distress it unnecessarily.

Subsiding at length to a trot, which the horse could perform with ease, he began to look about him for an adventure.

But he seemed to have the road all to himself, for, as yet, although he had come a considerable distance from the inn, he had not met with a single individual.

During the whole of the time, too, he had kept his ears on the stretch, listening intently for the slightest sound, for he could not tell how soon he might encounter one of the numerous troops of dragoons, who, he knew, were patrolling the roads.

He thought it probable, however, that the discovery that they were in the neighbourhood of Enfield Chase would have the effect of concentrating the soldiers about that spot.

As the reader may be sure, Tom took the road that would lead him not only away from Enfied Chase, but away from London also.

This was wise, for, as a matter of course, it diminished the chances of meeting with his foes.

A long time had elapsed since he had an adventure on the road, but in the interim he had forgotten none of his skill.

For this reason, then, although he was so environed by danger as he was, he hoped to be able to escape capture.

Being now, however, as he considered at a sufficient distance from the inn, he decreased his speed still more, until at length his horse proceeded at a walk only.

Suddenly a faint sound struck on his ear.

So faint was it, that it scarcely rose above the other noises with which the night air was filled, but the practised ear of the highwayman detected it.

He was, besides, able at once to recognise its character.

It was the sound produced by horses' hoofs.

They came from before him, though, from the extreme faintness of the sound, the rider whose approach was thus indicated, must have been at a considerable distance.

Tom King continued to advance at a walking pace, and had the satisfaction of hearing the sound increase in loudness and distinctness every moment, until there was no longer room to doubt the nature of it.

Presently Tom paused.

He had reached a piece of roadway which would, he considered, answer his purpose admirably, and he determined to go no further, but here await the coming of the traveller.

The place needs some description.

The roadway just where he had taken up his position was bounded by an embankment on both sides.

From the shape and general appearance of this, it would seem as though the greater portion of a hill had been cut away, in order to reduce the road to a more uniform gradient.

Such places are common in England, and, as the road alone is reduced to a level, and the fields on each side left untouched, the natural consequence is the formation of an embankment or cutting.

Tom paused as near as possible in the centre of this place, where the embankment on both sides was highest.

The effect of this was to plunge the piece of roadway into profound darkness.

One horseman alone was approaching—the sound of the horse's hoofs assured the highwayman of this—and he backed his horse as close to the side of the embankment as he could, turning his head away from the direction the traveller was coming.

Next, taking a pistol from his pocket, and holding it in an attitude ready for immediate service, Tom patiently awaited his coming.

The horseman, whoever he was, came on at a swift trot. Little did he think of the danger to which he was hurrying.

Doubtless aware that he had a disagreeable piece of road to traverse, he increased his horse's speed in order to pass through it as quickly as possible.

[DICK TURPIN, TOM KING, AND MAUD ARE ALARMED AT THE APPROACH OF THE DRAGOONS.]

On he came, but, somehow, as he drew nearer and nearer to the spot where the highwayman was lying in ambush, his pace faltered, and he insensibly drew in the rein.

Still he came on at a trot.

And now, when he came within a short distance of him, Tom King again exerted all his powers of hearing, in order to learn for certain whether the coming traveller was or was not alone upon the road.

Had he heard the echoing beat of another horse's foot he would have allowed the horseman to have passed by unmolested, as it would have been running too great a risk to attack him.

But all was still.

No other sound broke upon the universal silence.

The traveller was alone.

Tom King prepared for action.

He gathered the reins up in his hand, and grasped his pistol tightly.

One touch with his heel would, he knew, cause his obedient and well-trained steed to bound forward like an arrow.

On came the traveller.

Nearer and nearer he came at the same strange, faltering, hesitating pace.

In another moment, Tom, whose straining eyes had, to a certain extent, become habituated to the darkness, caught sight of his horse's head.

He was abreast with him.

Like a dart, Tom's steed bounded forward.

"Halt!" cried the highwayman, in tones of startling abruptness, which rung out loud and clear. "Halt! I say, or I fire, and the consequences be upon your own head."

It was easy to see that the rider was completely taken aback by the suddenness with which the highwayman had pounced out upon him.

But he was a brave man.

Recovering himself instantly, he plunged the rowels of his spurs deep into his horse's flanks.

With a cry of agony—half a snort and half a groan—

the poor creature reared up, and then bounded forward at a pace which could be designated by no other term than the appropriate one of break-neck.

It was evident the rider did not feel inclined to stop when he was bidden, and preferred to take the consequences of a refusal upon his own head.

To speak the truth, Tom King was scarcely prepared for this.

Nevertheless, he was as good as his word, and fired his pistol at the flying form, while at the same moment he urged his own horse to make his utmost speed.

The discharge of the pistol was followed by a blinding sheet of flame, which, for a moment, revealed the wild-looking aspect of the scene, and the tremendous report which echoed and re-echoed among the hills.

Whether his shot had taken any effect, Tom King knew not.

He had fired too suddenly to take anything like a correct aim, and he had no doubt in his own mind that the bullet had buried itself in the soft earth of which the embankment was composed.

He was confirmed in this opinion by the rapidity with which the traveller tore along.

The ground had a slight tendency downward, and this made his progress more rapid.

As we have said, Tom King urged his horse to the utmost.

But, in spite of all his efforts, he was unable to overtake the traveller's horse, which, maddened by pain and terrified by the explosion of the pistol, tore over the ground as no other horse had before.

Still he did not gain much upon Tom King, who, however, could not overtake him.

The bottom of the hill was reached, but on the level ground the horse continued his unabated speed.

In the excitement of this chase Tom King forgot everything but his determination to overtake the traveller.

He forgot the caution it was so necessary he should exercise.

He forgot that the dragoons were on the road along which he was flying at such a tremendous rate.

He forgot that his capture was imminent should he approach them too closely.

But the bold highwayman was oblivious of everything save his resolve.

His streaming eyes were fixed upon the forms of the traveller and his steed, which seemed to flit before him through the darkness with the swiftness of a phantom.

CHAPTER CCCCVII.

TOM KING PURSUES THE TRAVELLER DOWN THE LANE, AND MAKES AN UNEXPECTED AND TERRIBLE DISCOVERY

SUDDENLY, however, and when his speed appeared to have attained its maximum, the traveller's horse swerved rapidly on one side, and darted down a narrow lane that ran at right angles to the main road.

So swiftly was this done, that, though Tom King was in the rear and witnessed it, yet he was unable to check the progress of his own steed sufficiently to follow his example.

He pulled tightly at the rein, and the gallant creature strove to stop itself, but was unable to do so until the lane had been passed.

It was then necessary to come to a dead stop, and turn round.

This Tom did, and at a swift trot swept round the corner.

He found himself in one of those beautiful umbrageous lanes which are to be found nowhere else in the world but in England.

It was bordered on both sides by tall, thick hedges planted upon the top of an embankment, while here and there tall trees grew up in the summer time, casting a delicious shade over the lane, but now the branches were quite bare and leafless, giving an appearance of melancholy to the whole scene.

Tom King just gave a glance at the scene, and then directed all his attention to the object he had in view.

Faintly—very faintly—there came upon his ear the dull and rapid beat of a horse's hoofs.

The traveller had evidently got a good start, but the highwayman was determined that he should not escape.

Urging his horse forward by means of voice, whip, and spur, Tom tore over the uneven ground in the lane with a speed that was truly dangerous.

But King was wrought up to a pitch of desperation in consequence of what had taken place, and he determined not to abandon the chase until he was convinced that there would be no good in continuing it.

He was annoyed to think that in the first instance he had managed things so badly as to allow the traveller to slip through his fingers.

Away, then, he went down this narrow, winding lane.

It was very dark, for the thick clouds with which the sky was covered, effectually shut out the beams of the moon, although she was some distance above the horizon.

A faint, gray tint in the clouds denoted her whereabouts, but that was all.

As he continued his headlong course down the lane, Tom King leaned forward in his saddle, and listened with the utmost intentness.

Suddenly the sound of the horse's hoofs ceased.

What could be the reason of it?

He was sure that the cessation of sound had not taken place in consequence of the traveller having got out of earshot.

If this had been the case, the sound would have died gradually away.

But so far from this, he heard the hoof-beats one moment, and the next they ceased.

There could be but one explanation of this event.

The horse had come to a sudden stop.

Tom King grasped a pistol in his right hand, holding it in such a manner as to be available for immediate service, for he could not tell the meaning of this manœuvre.

He slackened his pace, too, so that if necessary he could pull up in a moment.

It was well he took these precautions.

The dense clouds parted, and through the rift the moon shone with beautiful effect, bringing into view all the different objects with which the highwayman was surrounded.

It was just as this took place that Tom King went round a bend in the lane.

To his surprise, he then saw before him, by the aid of the moonbeams, a pair of large iron gates.

Before these stood the traveller's horse, but he was riderless.

Tom King uttered an ejaculation of astonishment as he saw this.

The horse was making a strange moaning, groaning sound.

Eagerly Tom King glanced about him, anxious in the extreme to ascertain the whereabouts of the traveller.

The moonbeams were of great service to him on this occasion, for, coming from a high point in the sky, the roadway was rendered clearly visible.

A moment's glance enabled him to descry upon the ground the body of a man, or something that looked marvellously like it.

It was lying near the horse.

It was the traveller, no doubt.

When this extraordinary scene presented itself before him, Tom King reined in instinctively directly he caught sight of it.

He was about twenty yards from the horse.

In an infinitesimal portion of time more can be seen than can be described in an hour.

Briefly, however, we will endeavour to show the reader all that Tom King beheld.

As we have said, a dark-looking mass, which, from its general appearance, he imagined to be the body of the traveller, was lying by the side of the horse, and partially in the shadow which his body cast upon the moonlit lane.

The horse, trembling and groaning, was standing with his head close to the iron gate, as though he was desirous to pass through it.

This, however, was impossible; and its great height made it a barrier which no horse could overleap.

These large iron gates, which looked like the entrance gates to a nobleman's or a gentleman's grounds, were flanked on both sides by a massive stone wall of great height, and which extended to the right and left as far as Tom could see.

On the other side of the wall, and through the foliage-work of the gate, could be seen a kind of park, beautifully laid out and well stocked with trees.

Over the tops of these the chimneys, gables and roof-tops of a mansion glittered in the clear moonlight.

The picture was one of exquisite beauty, and one that any person could have gazed at for a long time without weariness, because some fresh beauty presented itself at every moment.

Such, then, is a feeble description of the scene which was spread before Tom King when he halted after having passed round the bend in the lane.

He could not forbear to pause and look upon it.

It was evident that the lane led nowhere else, save to these gates, and these gates clearly led to the mansion.

It was certainly not the front or main entrance—perhaps it was the one made use of by the domestics.

The tall hedgerows grew right down to the massive buttresses of the gates, and the stone wall divided the park, if such it was, from the meadows.

This lane was, then, probably a private road leading only to the mansion.

Why, then, should the traveller have turned down it, for it was only taking him into a trap.

Tom knew not.

To linger there, however, gazing as he was, would certainly accomplish nothing; and so he touched his horse lightly with the spur to urge him forward, for he was anxious to obtain a closer view of the traveller.

To his surprise, however, the horse resolutely refused to stir.

He then, for the first time, noticed that his steed gave indications of suffering under the greatest terror.

His nostrils were dilated, his eyes expanded, and he exhibited every token of alarm.

Tom patted his neck; but, perceiving how great was his disinclination to advance, did not press him to do so, but alighted, and secured his steed by the bridle to the trunk of a tree that grew by the side of the lane.

He then stepped forward on foot, but to his annoyance the rift in the clouds, through which the moon had been shining, closed up, leaving the lane in all the greater darkness from the contrast.

In spite, however, of this adverse incident, he continued to advance towards the iron gates, which were still visible.

It took little more than a minute to reach the spot where the traveller was lying, for the distance was not more than twenty yards.

Upon arriving here he looked anxiously up at the sky, in order to see whether there was any prospect of the moon breaking forth again—for her light would have rendered him essential service.

To his joy he saw a long, irregular shaped fissure, in which the stars could be seen twinkling brightly.

The moon was on the borders of the fissure, and in a moment or so more would certainly break forth.

He waited, therefore, until this time arrived before he attempted to do anything.

Gradually, as the moon got nearer and nearer to the fissure, her light shone through the thinner clouds which fringed it, and cast a dim halo around.

Gradually this brightened, and once more the details of the extraordinary scene were brought before Tom's view.

Without loss of time he stooped down over the prostrate form.

It was a man, and he was lying in a strange, huddled-up position.

That he was either dead or else seriously wounded, there could be no doubt.

Repugnant as it was to his feelings, Tom took hold of one of his arms and dragged his body into the lane, where the moonbeams would fall unobstructedly upon it.

The face was turned upwards, and its peculiar expression told Tom in a moment that the traveller, whoever he was, was dead.

From various portions of his clothing came various scintillations of light, which showed where diamonds were fixed upon it, and the material was of the best description, most elegantly and expensively trimmed.

The wearer was some person either of wealth or rank—probably both.

The pallid features were delicately formed, and, even in death, had an aristocratic appearance.

How he had come by his death was, at first, uncertain.

It might be that the horse, stopping short, had thrown him out of the saddle, or it might be that he owed his death to the pistol-shot which Tom had fired at him, but which the highwayman did not think had taken effect, because it was fired without aim, and because the traveller had continued his headlong speed.

This was a point, however, which Tom King resolved to ascertain.

Stooping down over him, he looked closely at him.

At first he saw no wound, and was about to adopt his first supposition as the true one, when he felt something wet on the breast of the traveller's coat as he passed his hand over it.

Tom held up his hand in the moonlight and looked at it.

It was stained with blood.

Hastily wiping it away, he unfastened the traveller's clothing, and at length his breast was exposed to view.

In this a small round hole was visible, from which the crimson fluid welled slowly.

The wound was such as a pistol would have produced, and was situated on the right-hand side of his breast.

Very little blood indeed flowed from it, and his clothing was little more than stained.

It was evident, then, that the wound had bled inwardly, and, from its position and proximity to his heart, he felt sure it must be mortal.

This was a discovery which Tom King far from anticipated, and he shuddered with horror at the suddenness with which it had come upon him.

The body was quite warm, but the heart had ceased to beat, and the features were fast becoming fixed in the stern rigidity of death.

"Good heavens!" exclaimed Tom King; "can it be possible? I had no idea that the shot which I fired at random, and under the impulse of the moment, would prove to be a fatal one. But it seems it is so. But how comes the traveller here? Suffering under such a wound, how could he have retained his seat in the saddle long enough to reach this place—and with the horse going at such a frightful speed? And then there was the sudden turn out of the highroad. It is a mystery. I cannot conceive how it was he retained his seat. He must have been a brave man, and one well skilled in the art of riding, or it never could have happened."

As he spoke, Tom King, with sadness upon his countenance, looked again into the face of the traveller.

"Quite dead!" he added; "quite dead. I never saw the impress of death more distinctly visible. Well, it is in vain to grieve. It cannot be helped. I am sorry for what has occurred, but I can do no more than make the best of it. Had he attended to my demands, I should not have fired, and his life would have been spared. It is all over now, though, and all the regrets in the world will not bring him back to life."

So saying, Tom King rose to his feet, and made two steps towards the spot where he had tethered his horse.

Then he stopped suddenly, as he said—

"I forget—I forget my errand. It is money that I require; and from the dress of that dead man, he doubtless carries plenty in his pocket. Now he is dead it can be of no further service to him. Why, then, should I scruple to take it from him? And yet—but I must not give way to such scruples. The night is going fast, and it is important for all that I get back to the inn without delay or further loss of time. Another adventure will be impossible, and the chances are quite against my meeting with anyone like this. He is dead, quite dead, and why should I hesitate? It is weakness, folly! The money is, then, to be had for taking. I wish all this had not occurred, but yet I must have it."

CHAPTER CCCVIII.

IN WHICH TOM KING LEARNS SOME PARTICULARS RELATIVE TO THE IDENTITY OF THE DEAD TRAVELLER.

ALTHOUGH he uttered these last words in a very resolute manner, yet Tom King advanced towards the body of the dead traveller with a slow and hesitating step.

He felt a certain and very natural amount of repug-

nance to approaching the man for the purpose of rifling his pockets.

It was a deed that he seemed instinctively to shrink from, and most certainly it was one which he had never committed before.

Yet, as he said, why should he recoil from taking it now, when he would have deprived him of it while he lived without remorse.

Now, however, he was dead; and it seemed as though his body ought to be held sacred, and not profaned by the robber's touch.

So powerfully did Tom King feel all this, that had the need of the money been any less urgent than it was, he would have mounted his horse and rode away, leaving the pockets of the dead man untouched.

But he knew how valuable the time was.

They would be compelled to leave the inn that very night, for to depart by daylight would be dangerous to a degree, and there remained to them only one night to to find some place of refuge and safety for Maud, as the night after they had appointed to meet their two comrades on the Finchley-road.

The sooner, then, that he was back at the inn the better it would be for their general safety.

Much time had already been consumed, and if he left the traveller, and looked out for another adventure, he might be detained for an indefinite length of time, and in the end run the risk of not obtaining the requisite sum.

Now, however, it was beyond all doubt within his reach, for the prostrate man looked like one who would not travel without valuables.

He was the more inclined to think he carried articles of great value about him from his very conduct.

Had he carried a light purse, he would have surrendered it rather than have run the risk of being fired at.

All these reasons pressed powerfully upon Tom King's mind as he made his way towards the traveller, with a slow and hesitating step.

Making a sudden effort, however, he passed over the remaining space which intervened between them.

Here he knelt down once more upon the ground.

He was easily able to find the pockets, but he did not put his hand into them.

He contented himself with feeling the outside, in order to learn whether there was anything of a bulky character within.

In the breast of his coat he felt something like a pocket-book.

He thrust his hand into his pocket, and found he was quite right.

It was a pocket-book, and, by its appearance, seemed to be full of something.

He opened it; and, as the moon continued to shine, he was enabled to make an examination of its contents.

They were bank-notes.

These were articles that Tom King never cared much about; but, on the present occasion, he thrust them into his pocket.

There was at that time an extreme difficulty in passing bank notes; and he thought perhaps the landlord of the "Mountain Rill" might refuse to take them as payment.

The first feeling of repugnance which he had entertained had now passed away, and he resolved to learn whether the traveller had any gold about him.

He was glad he made this second search, for it discovered to him a large bag of gold, which was in the other breast-pocket of his coat.

This Tom took with very great satisfaction.

Just, however, as he was about to rise to his feet, he heard a loud shout, coming apparently from many throats.

He was upon his feet in a second, with his face turned in the direction from which the sound had appeared to come.

Once more the clouds swept over the moon, entirely involving her in their obscurity.

But her beams were not on this occasion wanted by the highwayman, and he was glad when he found this had taken place.

The shouts which he had heard came from the other side of the iron gates, and that was the direction towards which Tom King's face was turned.

He saw immediately a number of moving lights; and, after a second glance, he felt convinced they proceeded from lanterns carried by some persons.

What was their object, he knew not; and he was also completely in the dark as to the meaning of the cry to which they had given utterance.

That they were approaching the gate was evident, and the speed at which they came was very great.

Tom King hesitated for a moment as to what he should do.

If he mounted his steed and hastened away, the mere fact of his doing so would put these people on his track, for they were so near that the trampling of his horse's hoofs could not but be heard.

To fly seemed, then, injudicious; and yet, to remain where he was, would be perilous to a degree.

Tom King, however, felt a great degree of curiosity to learn something more than he at present knew respecting the man who lay there so still in death.

Could he conceal himself somewhere close at hand, he felt that he would gladly do so; for, not only would such a course be more conducive to his own safety than any other, but it would also enable him to hear what took place, should the body be discovered; in the event of which, he would surely, he thought, hear something concerning him.

Already in his own mind, though almost without knowing it, he had connected the dead rider with the mansion which he had seen through the trees.

Having come to this resolution, he hastened to the spot where his horse was tethered.

The creature still showed symptoms of fright, and Tom feared that he should have some trouble with it yet.

A glance over his shoulder showed him that the people carrying the lanterns were very close to the gate, and he would have to be very expeditious to escape being seen by them.

What he had to do was to get into the meadows that skirted both sides of the lane, and take his horse with him.

But how he was to accomplish this was the difficulty.

He had not taken particular notice as he came down the lane, but he had no recollection of seeing a gate which led into these fields.

As he now stood, with his hands on his horse's bridle, he glanced up and down; but no gate was in sight.

Then the hedges were too high to be easily or quickly surmounted, and they seemed to be kept in first-rate preservation, so that there were no gaps in it through which he could force his way.

He saw all this at one brief and comprehensive glance.

He untied his horse from the branch of the tree, and then he noticed, for the first time, that there was a small space between the trunk of it and the hedge, which did not grow close to it.

There looked scarcely room to pass through such a place, but there was no choice, so Tom had to make the attempt.

He first of all scrambled up the bank, and managed to get into the meadow, at the expense of a few scratches only.

Then, holding the bridle, he spoke in a low voice to his horse, and tried to pull him up.

The horse seemed to perfectly understand what it was required to do, for he placed his fore feet upon the bank.

Tom pulled again, and the horse, making a kind of leap, forced his way into the meadow.

Tom patted it caressingly.

The grass in the meadow was short, but it was thick, so Tom had no fear of being heard walking over it.

He led the horse close under the hedge, and paused just opposite the spot where the body of the traveller lay.

The hedge was plenty high enough to conceal both Tom King and his steed from the view of anyone standing in the lane, but there were several interstices through which he himself would be able to see all that took place.

He had reached his place of concealment just in time, and that was all.

The party of men he had seen carrying the lanterns had now just reached the gate, which they unfastened and passed through.

No sooner was the gate opened, however, than the traveller's horse, which had continued to stand near it, gave utterance to a snorting sound that alarmed every one who heard it, and then bounded through into the park—if such it was—with a speed that was absolutely astonishing.

It was out of sight among the dark trunks of the trees in a moment.

Two of the men who were in the act of passing through the gate were thrown down with great violence, and trampled under foot.

Several others were also slightly injured, and a scene of the utmost confusion ensued.

Recovering themselves, they emerged into the lane, and then almost immediately they discovered the body of the traveller.

Those who first beheld it, uttered a shout which caused the others to gather round them.

One stooped down and raised the head, while the others directed the light of their lanterns upon the face.

"Alas! alas!" said one, "this is by far worse than I feared."

"It is indeed a sorry sight," said the one who held his head. "He is quite dead, and as cold as a stone!"

"I knew something was the matter," said another, "when I came by the gate and heard someone groaning. I was too frightened to stop to see what it was, so I ran up to the hall to you."

"Oh! what shall we do!" cried an aged man. "Alas! alas! Little did I think I should live to witness such a sight! Poor master murdered, and at the gates of his own park!"

"It's horrible! How shall we let missus know what has taken place?"

"Alas! I would not be the one that had to communicate such tidings to her."

"Nor I, nor I," said many voices.

"But who could have done such a barbarous deed? He was the best master that ever lived! And now dead—quite dead! Who is there that will tell us what has happened?"

"Do not let us give way to our sorrow in this manner," said one who had not yet spoken. "We do not know that master is dead. He may be in a swoon, or something of that sort. Carry him up to the hall at once, and I will start off for a doctor."

This was so rational a suggestion, that it was immediately acted upon.

"I fear there is no hope," said one. "He is getting quite rigid now, and look where his clothing has been torn open. Poor master has been robbed as well as murdered!"

A shout of execration came from the lips of the domestics as they heard this announcement, and they pressed forward eagerly, so as to assure themselves of the truth of it."

"Perhaps," continued the one who had just spoken, "the robber and murderer is lurking somewhere close at hand. Let some carry the body up to the hall, and let the rest of us make a search for the murderer."

"Agreed! agreed!" they all cried, with one accord.

Four now took up the body, and carried it tenderly through the gate into of the park.

The others, to the number of six or seven, dispersed about the lane.

It was not, of course, very long before they saw the foot-marks on the embankment up which Tom had climbed, and all clustered round this spot as soon as it was discovered.

The horse, too, in scrambling up, had dislodged a great deal of the loose soil, which had rolled down into the roadway.

With great boldness the men rushed up the bank into the meadow.

But here all was still.

So dark, too, was it, that they could see nowhere beyond the sphere of light which was cast by the lanterns they carried.

The clouds, however, were flitting across the moon, and presently her light broke forth in all its glorious effulgency.

It seemed to have the effect of extinguishing the light of the lanterns, which now looked only like so many stars.

The men embraced the opportunity to look about them.

Ejaculations of anger broke from their lips.

At the farthest extremity of the meadow could be seen a mounted man, who was urging his horse to make its utmost speed.

They saw it but for a moment, and then it disappeared.

Under the impulse of the moment, they rushed forward at full speed, but they soon checked themselves when they saw the utter futility of their attempt to overtake a horseman going at such a speed.

But they hastened back to the hall for horses and further assistance, as they were determined not to let the murderer escape if possible.

The reader scarcely requires to be told that the rider they saw in the distance was no other than Tom King.

He had lingered behind the hedge, and heard and saw all that we have described.

He did not attempt to move, indeed until he heard the men announce their intention of searching for him.

He then judged it high time to be off, so he mounted noiselessly, and led his steed away from the spot at a gentle rate, so as not to attract notice.

As soon as he was far enough off, however, he plunged his spurs deep into his horse's sides.

The poor creature flew over the level meadow with maddened bounds.

From time to time Tom looked back upon the road he had just come, and, as he did so, he noticed that, in the far distance, he could see the twinkling of lights.

There was a low hedge before him, and over this he leaped.

This will account for his sudden disappearance from the gaze of the men.

He alighted in another meadow, but as now he had nothing to fear from a pursuit, he allowed his horse to go at a more gentle rate.

He changed his course slightly, and then directed his steed over fields, and streams, and hedges, taking an almost straight line to his destination.

CHAPTER CCCCIX.

TOM KING SURPRISES DICK TURPIN BY HIS AGITATION AND HORROR.

It was nearly half an hour after this that a horseman, whose steed showed palpable signs of exhaustion and fatigue, trotted leisurely up to the gateway that led to the stables belonging to the "Mountain Rill" inn.

The hour was by no means a late one, and from several windows in the little roadside public-house came long, bright beams of light.

The horseman seemed to be well acquainted with the premises.

He glanced up to the old-fashioned bow-window on the first floor, and saw the dusky figure of some person standing at it.

He just waved his hand in token of recognition, and then he guided his horse underneath the archway.

In another moment he was in the yard at the rear of the inn.

A door was abruptly opened, and an elfish-looking lad appeared upon the threshold.

In his hand he held a lantern, the door of which was opened, in order that it should give a better light.

Behind him could be seen the figure of a man.

It was the ostler.

The liberal manner in which Tom King had behaved to him was not without exercising a sensible effect upon him.

He had sat on a corn-bin near the stable door during the whole period of Tom's absence, listening attentively for any sounds that would indicate his approach.

The reader will scarcely need to be told that the horseman who had just arrived was no other than our old friend Tom King.

He had seen nothing more of the domestics who commenced a pursuit after him; but, nevertheless, he made his way to the inn at full speed, for he was well aware that there was no time to lose.

Not only that Turpin would grow uneasy if he was long absent.

Tom dismounted rapidly from his steed, and gave his instructions to the ostler as to how the horse was to be treated.

The fellow promised implicit obedience to all his commands, but Tom would not allow himself to rest contented with the assurance merely, and though he had tolerably good faith in this ostler, he, nevertheless, waited and saw everything done, although he was impatient in the extreme to rejoin Dick.

It was while he was thus occupied that Timothy Goodridge, the landlord, made his appearance.

In a smiling, jovial, off-hand sort of way, he stepped up close to where Tom King was standing.

"Ahem!" he said. "I see you are back again, sir."

"Yes," replied Tom, who by no means desired to encourage the landlord in his loquacity, "I have come back."

"Quite glad to see you back safe so soon," continued the landlord, not checked in the least. "I am very glad to see you safe back again. Your horse looks tired. Has he been far, sir?"

"Pretty well."

"Ah! I thought so. You have come fast, too. I can see that. Really, it is not the thing to compliment anyone to their face, and it is a thing which I am not at all in the habit of doing; but, sir, you are a magnificent rider. I was standing at the front door when you started, and really, you sat in the saddle as though it was your cradle, and you had never been out of it all your life. Perhaps you have been in the habit of riding, sir?"

"Oh! yes, occasionally."

"Occasionally? Well, really now, do you know I should have thought, from seeing you, that you were in continual practice. You seemed so much at home."

"I am glad my riding has pleased you," said Tom, drily. 'I wish you could say the same thing to me about your talkativeness."

This was an oblique hint, but the landlord either did not or would not take it, but continued to gabble on in the same strain, his object evidently being to extract from Tom all the information he could.

But he found that Tom was not very easily pumped; and, when he had finished, he was not much wiser than he was before.

In his present frame of mind, this garrulity upon the part of the landlord was excessively distasteful to Tom, but he had no means of escaping the infliction.

He was compelled to listen to all.

The ostler, however, was very nimble; and, in much less time than Tom King believed was possible, he thoroughly groomed the horse, and turned it into the stable.

Tom King did not leave until he had superintended the feeding.

Then, gladly enough, he turned away, for he was thoroughly wearied with the landlord's inquisitive questions.

He was so good-tempered, and said everything with such apparent frankness and goodwill, that Tom found it impossible to offend him.

At length, however, when he had seen all was properly done, our old friend directed his steps towards the inn.

He was sure Dick had seen him arrive, and he was rather surprised that he had not ere this made his appearance, but he hoped that he should have a reason given for it.

The landlord would insist upon accompanying him to the door of the room, though Tom did all he could to prevent him.

Finding his efforts ineffectual, however, he was compelled to submit, and get rid of him only when he entered the room.

Turpin advanced eagerly towards him, but, by a look, Tom cautioned him not to speak until the landlord had withdrawn.

This Mr. Goodridge was reluctantly compelled to do, for he had no excuse whatever for remaining.

Maud was seated near the fire, and her face lighted up with joy when she saw Dick's faithful comrade had returned unhurt and in safety from his perilous expedition.

She noticed in a moment, however, the peculiar expression of his countenance, and wondered what could have caused it.

She fancied it might proceed from having failed to accomplish his purpose, but in this she was mistaken.

Dick Turpin noticed the strange, wild, haggard look upon his comrade's face, and would have spoken had not Tom placed his finger on his lip, as a signal for him to remain silent.

At the same time he took our hero by the hand, and, leading him up to the window, he said in a faint whisper—

"Do not raise your voice. The landlord's suspicions are, I am sure, aroused, by the questions he has just put to me."

"Has he been questioning you, then?"

"Yes, while I have been looking after my horse. Why did you not come down?"

"Because Maud did not wish to be left, and because I was undesirous of doing anything to further rouse the landlord's curiosity."

"It was as well, perhaps. You saw me arrive?"

"Yes; I have been watching at the window, here, nearly ever since your departure—not merely for your return, but to guard against being surprised by our foes."

"A wise precaution—a very wise precaution indeed, and we shall do well to continue to adopt it."

"Good. We will stand here and talk. But Tom, my friend, speak—tell me what has happened. Why do you look so strangely? Your face is ghastly white, and your eyes roll fearfully in their sockets. Do not keep me any longer in suspense. Speak! Tell me all. I am sure something terrible has happened."

"Hush!" said Tom, in a low but impressive whisper, casting his eyes all around him. "Hush!"

"This mysterious behaviour fills me with unknown dread," said Turpin, clutching his comrade tightly by the arm. "Answer my questions—relieve my uneasiness, I beg you."

"Be calm, and I will tell you all."

"Are our foes at hand?"

"No—no. I believe not—at least, not to my knowledge."

"You have failed, then, in your enterprise?"

"No—no; I have not failed. Look here. This bag contains gold to a large amount, and this pocket-book, bank-notes."

As he spoke these words, Tom King, not without a certain wildness of manner which much alarmed his comrade, produced from his pocket the articles he had named, and thrust them hurriedly into Dick's hands.

"What, then, is the meaning of your agitation, my friend?" he asked.

"I have had an adventure."

"An adventure?"

"Yes; one of such a fearful character that I have never had before, and I hope and trust I never shall again."

"Good heavens!" exclaimed Turpin. "Speak—speak no longer in these ambiguous terms, but explain yourself. Tell me what has happened."

"Patience—patience, and I will do so. I have not yet been able to overcome my horror; indeed now I reflect on what has occurred, it seems to redouble in intensity."

"Calm yourself—calm yourself, I pray!"

"You forget my caution. The landlord may be at the door listening, and should he overhear our conversation, we are lost."

"I will be careful. But tell me, I pray, what has taken place?"

"I will do so as briefly as I can. Listen!"

As he spoke, Tom drew Dick close to him, and inclined his mouth to his ear.

"I would not have Maud hear what I am about to communicate for worlds," he whispered; "so listen."

"I am listening," said Dick. "I am quite at a loss to think what can have occurred to have produced such an effect upon you. Your nerves are well strung. It cannot be a trifle which has so overcome you."

"It is no trifle, as you will say when you have heard me out. This is what has taken place—this is what has filled my very soul with horror and thrown me into this state of agitation."

Tom King then related to Turpin his adventure, which we have already placed in full before the reader, and, therefore, there is no need of ours to repeat it in his own words.

He had not exaggerated its horror.

Well might he utter the wish that such an adventure should never again befall him.

"To think, Dick," he added, in conclusion, "that, unaware of it, I for so long pursued a dying, perhaps a dead man! By what mysterious means he contrived to retain his seat in the saddle, I know not, for his steed's speed was tremendous. I do not for a moment believe that he guided the animal to its destination. I believe the animal carried him home by the mere force of its own instinct, and doubtless it would have carried him still nearer to his house had not the iron gates shown themselves to be an obstacle which he could not surmount."

"It is very terrible," said Dick; "but you take this too much to heart. The fault is not so much yours as his. Had he complied with your demands, he would have been unhurt."

"True, true! He wished to preserve his life and money!"

"And so he lost both. Tom this is really not so terrible as you seem to think it. Had he fallen anywhere save at the gates of his own park, you would not have thought it half so dreadful."

"Perhaps not. It would, however, have been better for my future peace of mind if I had not stayed to witness the finding of the body. I ought to have fled from the spot, but, as it was, I witnessed all—all! Never until my last moment shall I forget the terrible scene."

"Come, come," said Dick, anxious to rouse his comrade from this depressed state of mind. "Shake off these feelings; they are unworthy of you—they are unworthy of anyone. What took place was clearly an accident. You did not aim the bullet, although it struck a fatal blow. It was purely a chance shot. Do not take the event so much to heart, I beg. It is wrong of you to do so."

"Perhaps it is, Dick; perhaps it is. But had the need of money been any less urgent than it is, I should have turned and fled the moment I discovered the lifeless body in the lane. As it was, I robbed the dead!"

"And what of that. Why should you object to take that from his body while dead, which you would not have scrupled to take while living? Pho! pho! Where is the difference? Only in this. The dead man would not be sensible of his loss."

"It is well for you, Dick, to speak thus philosophically; but had it been you, I fancy you would have found the difference. It has given my nerves a shock such as they will be a long time recovering from. But come, let us quit this subject. We have other matters of much greater importance pressing upon us. This is the time for action, not for talk!"

"You are right, you are right; and I hope you are cool, calm, and collected enough to talk upon our future proceedings."

"I am, I am."

"What, then, are we to do?"

"Depart without delay."

"I think that will be the best plan. But stay. Tell me. I forgot to inquire before. While you have been out, have you seen or heard nothing of the dragoons?"

"Nothing at all."

"Well, then, that is good news. It seems to promise us that we shall be able to leave this place without molestation from them."

"It does, indeed. I am surprised we have been so little troubled with them. I cannot make it out."

"It is strange."

"Very strange. I wonder how Claude and Sixteen-String Jack have fared. You have no idea how anxious I am about them. I cannot help thinking that the reason we have not seen the dragoons, is that they are all in pursuit of them."

"Do not give way to such gloomy speculations as those, I beg. Let us prepare to start at once. As a preliminary step, we will call the landlord, pay the remainder of the money that is owing for the horse, and settle off the score."

"Pray do. Let us summon him at once. But, hark! Listen, Dick! What is that? Louder and louder! Plainer and plainer it becomes! What is it? I am afraid to say!"

"Be calm," said Turpin. "You do not seem yourself."

"Can you hear nothing?"

"I hear the trampling of many horses' hoofs."

"Yes—yes! That is the sound! We are lost! We have delayed our departure until it is too late! Hark! They are the dragoons! By some means they have tracked us to this place! Look out—look out, and tell me what you see!"

CHAPTER CCCCX.

THE DRAG—ONS HALT AT THE FRONT DOOR OF THE "MOUNTAIN RILL" INN, AND THE POSITION OF THE TWO HIGHWAYMEN BECOMES CRITICAL TO A DEGREE.

During the time that Tom King related to Dick the particulars of his terrible adventure on the highway, Maud had retained her seat near the fire.

Her eyes were directed towards both, but their forms were partially concealed by the gloom of the chamber and the dingy curtain which hung before the window.

Where she sat she could only hear the murmuring of voices, but could not detect a word, except on those occasions when Dick spoke, when he was immediately cautioned by his comrade to lower his tone.

It was well for our friends that they were thus prudent.

Tom King had good reason to fear the landlord's curiosity.

At that very moment he was crouching down upon the stairs with his ear close to the bottom of the door, between which and the floor there was a space of nearly half an inch, for the door was an old one, and now fitted very badly.

If Maud, sitting by the fireside, could not hear what Tom King said, it is quite certain the landlord could not, and so he had all his pains for nothing.

He heard a confused, murmuring sound, but that was all.

When, however, Tom King spoke the words with which the preceeding chapter concluded, she could tell, not only by the disjointed syllables which fell upon her ears, but by the excited manner in which they were uttered, that something wrong had taken place.

Ever on the look-out for danger, and apprehensive of every circumstance, Maud sprang in a moment from her seat, and hastened towards the window.

She clasped her arms around Dick, as she said, in fearful accents—

"What is amiss? Tell me—oh! tell me at once what is amiss."

"Hush! hush! Maud. Be not alarmed; it may be nothing. We can but prepare ourselves for the worst. Let us hope that the danger with which we are threatened will pass away."

Maud clung still more tightly to Dick Turpin, as he spoke these words, for she knew they foreboded peril.

In the meantime, Tom King had taken the two candles off the table, and placed them in one corner of the room, so that none of the rays of light from them should fall upon the window.

This would enable them to look out without so much danger of being seen by those who were approaching.

When first the quick ear of Tom King detected the sounds of horses' hoofs, they must have been a long way off.

Now, however, they were close at hand.

Anxiously the three fugitives crowded in the space of the old bow-window, and looked down the road.

It was dark without; and yet through the obscurity they could distinguish a dark mass approaching in various portions, of which something glittered brightly.

That peculiar, jingling sound which is ever heard when soldiers are on horseback, reached their ears.

That it was the dragoons who were approaching there could be little or no doubt, and yet the danger of their presence might be less than it appeared to be.

They might be possibly doing no more than patrolling the road, and, if so, the best thing for our friends to do would be to remain perfectly still where they were, since any hasty movement to escape might have only the effect of bringing immediate destruction upon them.

In the hope, then, that the dragoons who were approaching would pass the house, our friends stood at the window, looking out eagerly into the darkness.

On they came; the trampling of the horses' feet and the jingling of the accoutrements sounding plainer and plainer each moment.

Their speed did not relax.

On they came, and the hope that they would pass by and leave them in safety grew stronger and stronger in their breasts.

The approaching troop was a large one; the largest our friends had ever seen.

It seemed almost as though the numerous small bodies of soldiers that had been hanging about had coalesced into one.

If this was so, and if they would only pass the inn, then all would be well.

The circumstance would turn out a most favourable one for our friends.

Nothing would be easier than for them to take their departure as soon as the dragoons were out of sight, and go in a direction contrary to them.

Here every step they took would increase the distance between them, and conduce to their safety.

On the other hand, should the dragoons have by some means or other traced them to the "Mountain Rill," and made an attack upon them, their position would be one of the most imminent and deadly peril.

The circumstance of the dragoons having combined together in such a large number, seemed quite in accordance with this latter supposition.

It would account for such a thing at once, because they would consider by appearing in such great force they would be able to make sure of the victory.

Such were the reflections that swept through the minds of both the highwaymen with the rapidity of thought.

They did not speak to each other, or communicate their ideas, but both coincided in a remarkable manner.

They felt that their fate would depend upon the occurrences of the next few moments, and, therefore, the reader will easily be able to imagine for himself the suspenseful anxiety with which they watched the approaching troop.

Their lives and liberties depended upon whether they passed by or whether they stopped.

As they came nearer and nearer, so did their suspense increase.

At one moment hope would maintain the ascendency; at the next, fear and despair.

Fortunately for them, their suspense was not of very long duration.

The dragoons came on at a slow, jogging trot, such as is peculiar to the military.

They were now within ten yards of the inn.

The critical moment had arrived.

Would they pause?

No, they kept on at the same steady rate.

Hopeful and more hopeful grew our friends.

They ventured to breathe more freely.

The danger would pass by.

Another moment, and the danger would be over.

The dragoons will continue on their way.

No!

Suddenly—startlingly—there came upon the ears one word.

"Halt!"

That was the word.

It was uttered with that abruption upon which military officers so pride themselves.

It was like the report of a pistol, and it seemed to produce upon our friends the same effect as a suddenly-delivered blow.

They staggered back, and a faint scream came from Maud's lips.

It was drowned by the noise made by the soldiers reining in their steeds.

In an incredibly short space of time all were still.

Turpin and King had not moved from the window.

They seemed incapable of motion.

The dragoons halted immediately beneath them.

That is to say, at the door of the public-house.

"All is lost," said Maud, moaningly, with her face blanched by terror. "All is lost."

The despondent words were echoed by the hearts of her two companions, but not by their lips.

But the sound of her voice seemed to have the effect of rousing them into action.

Rapidly both withdrew from the window, where there was so much hazard of their being seen, now that the dragoons were so close at hand.

The rooms on the ground-floor of the "Mountain Rill" had low ceilings, and as the soldiers sat on horseback, they could almost reach to look into the bow-window.

Turpin and Dick paused near the centre of the room.

By common consent they looked at the priming of their weapons.

"What must be done now, Dick?" asked Tom King.

"Something and that right quickly," was the reply.

"But what?"

"We must not remain here, or we shall be taken prisoners."

"Where can we go? If we descend the stairs we shall be detected immediately."

"The landlord's suspicions are aroused, and if the dragoons do not know already that we are here, they will ask the landlord, and he will recognise the description, and then all will be over with us."

"Our position is truly desperate, and unless we adopt some desperate expedient, it will be all over with us."

"We must escape! We must leave this place at once!"

"But how?—that is the question."

"We must think—ah! an idea. Come, I believe there is hope yet."

As he spoke these words, Turpin passed his arm round Maud's waist, and led her towards the door.

"What are you about to do?"

"Follow us, and you will see," said Turpin. "It will be better than for me to stop and explain it."

Turpin had recollected all in a moment that the room which Maud had occupied was in the rear of the house, and that the window overlooked the stable-yard.

Towards this he made his way.

He crossed the landing, and entered the chamber.

As he did so, he called out to Tom King, who was close at his heels, to secure the door.

He was instantly obeyed.

All would now depend upon the speed they were able to make.

Turpin opened the window.

It was a large casement, and the leaf swung back suddenly against the wall.

"Joe—Joe," he cried. "Here."

"Let me call him," said Tom King. "I am on good terms with him."

"Do not speak too loud."

Tom called, but there was no response for a moment.

"What do you want with him?" asked King.

"To bring a ladder and place it against the window. We shall then be able to descend into the yard, and, perhaps, steal away unperceived."

"An excellent thought. But the ostler, I fear, is out in the front attending to the soldiers' horses."

"I forgot that."

"Never mind," continued Tom King; "the distance to the ground is not so great but what I can drop it easily. Then, if there is a ladder, I will place it for you."

"Stop," exclaimed Turpin; "what is that?"

He pointed to a dark figure standing in the yard as he spoke.

"It is the ostler!" ejaculated Tom King. "All is well."

Dick called him again.

"Here I is," said a voice, which Tom instantly recognised as the ostler's. "Where be you?"

"Here, at the window."

"Oh! I sees you. What do you want?"

"Joe, if you want to earn five pounds, listen to me, and do just as I tell you."

"Oh! won't I?" said Joe, as he came nearer. "What do you want?"

"A ladder! Quick! In an instant! Place it against the window!"

"Ain't got never a one."

"No ladder?"

"No; but here's some steps."

"Put them here."

"They ain't tall enough."

"Never mind; we will try to make them do."

The ostler did not waste any more time in argument, but produced the steps he had mentioned, and placed them where Dick had directed.

They were manifestly too short, but yet our friends thought they would answer the purpose.

Tom King slipped through the window, and lowered himself until his feet touched them.

Then, taking a firm foot-hold, he asked Dick to hand Maud down, and he would assist her to descend.

At the same time he turned round to the ostler, and said—

"Run into the stable and saddle our two horses as quickly as you can, and put the side-saddle on the horse we bought to-day of your master. Be quick, and you shall have not five pounds but ten!"

DICK TURPIN, MAUD, AND TOM KING ARRIVE AT THE RUINED MANSION.

The offer of this immense sum seemed for a moment or two to have a paralyzing effect upon the ostler, but, quickly recovering himself, he rushed into the stable, and began saddling the horses with maniacal speed.

He was used to his trade, and soon performed the duty.

In the meantime, in obedience to his friend's injunction, Dick Turpin assisted Maud through the window, and Tom, standing on the steps, helped her down.

She reached the ground safely and easily.

For Turpin to follow was an easy enough matter.

In fact, he almost disdained to make use of the steps at all.

So far, then, all was well, and with renewed hope they hurried across the yard into the stable.

Their satisfaction may be imagined when they saw the wonderful progress which the ostler had made in caparisoning the steeds.

Both highwaymen sprang forward to his assistance, and, in less than a moment more, all were ready.

They mounted in the stable.

But their difficulties were far from being over.

So far as their own knowledge extended, there was but one means by which the yard could be entered and left, and this was by means of the gateway.

Round this the troop of dragoons were clustered, so that it seemed absolutely impossible for them to emerge without being captured, and, if they remained in the yard, the same event would take place.

This was a dilemma truly.

They appealed to the ostler, who was, indeed, their only remaining hope.

"Quick, tell me," said Turpin; "is there any other means by which this yard can be left besides by the gateway?"

"No, that is the only one."

"Are you sure?"

"In course I is."

Our friends were in despair.

"But is there no place in the yard where the wall is so low that we could jump over it into the meadows or some thing?"

"No, but I'll tell you what there is."

"What?"

"A little door that leads into the paddock."

"The paddock?"

"Yes, that is where we turn the horses in to grass; it is just at the back of the stable."

"The very thing. But where is the door?"

"I'll show you. Follow me."

"We will, never fear; but pray be quick, as our lives are in danger."

The ostler ran out into the yard, and our friends followed him.

They walked their horses, but even then they could not help making a slight noise, which they were fearful would reach the ears of the dragoons.

Their fear was realized.

They heard a loud shout, which came from the direction of the gateway, and then a prodigious clattering of horses' hoofs on the rough stones with which it was paved.

Our friends heeded it not, but bent upon the ostler the whole of their attention.

He ran swiftly across the yard, and opened a small door in the wall.

"Through there," he cried. "You must stoop, or you will break your heads."

The caution was a necessary one.

Maud and Turpin passed through first.

Tom King followed, and, as did so, thrust a handful of guineas into the ostler's hand.

"Thank you, sir," he said. "Keep right straight across the paddock, and you will come to a bit of a fence. Jump that, and you will be in Throttle Goose-lane."

"Thanks!" said Tom. "Close the door after me; and, if you can, send the dragoons off upon a false scent."

CHAPTER CCCCXI.

SHOWS HOW TIMOTHY GOODRIDGE, THE LANDLORD, WAS OF GREAT SERVICE TO THE HIGHWAYMEN WITHOUT KNOWING IT.

TOM KING did not wait to hear the ostler's reply; indeed, he did not know whether he made any, for, as he spoke, he stooped and urged his horse forward.

In a moment he was through the narrow portal and out into the paddock.

He saw two dim figures before him, and halted.

They were Turpin and Maud.

"On—on!" he cried; "on for your lives! Keep straight across the place, and then we shall come to a hedge, on the other side of which is a country lane. On—on!"

Turpin did not need much urging.

He took hold of the bridle of Maud's steed, and followed Tom King, who took upon himself to lead the way to the hedge of which he had spoken.

Here we must, for a moment, leave them, in order to give an account of the proceedings of the dragoons.

Already we have seen how they came up in rather strong numbers to the door of the "Mountain Rill" inn.

They were the very same troop that had made the attack upon the highwaymen in Enfield Chase, and drove them from that comfortable place of shelter.

From time to time they had been reinforced by other detachments they had met with upon the road, and so their number became greatly swelled; for as soon as the other dragoons heard that the game had been fairly started, they were eager in the extreme to join in the pursuit.

However, they had lost the scent, and, in spite of all their efforts, they could not find it again.

But they had persevered untiringly, for they were convinced that in the end they must come up with the object of their search.

In this manner, the whole of the day was spent, which the highwaymen passed so snugly at the inn, and so, too, they spent the night that followed, until they arrived in the manner we have related.

The reader will bear in mind that Tom King and Dick, as they stood watching the soldiers approach, were uncertain, up to the last moment, whether they were going to stay or continue on their journey.

This inability of theirs to decide is easily accounted for.

The officer in command of the dragoons had no intention of halting at the "Mountain Rill" inn until just as he came in sight of it.

Seeing the inn reminded him that he stood greatly in need of refreshment, and no doubt his men were in the same predicament, for they had not quitted the saddle for many hours.

The horses, too, would be all the better able to perform their service if they had a bait; and so all at once the officer cried out, "Halt!" no less to the surprise than to the satisfaction of his men.

They pulled up with military promptitude, and sat still, waiting for further commands.

From this it will be seen that the dragoons had no idea that those of whom they were in search had taken up their quarters at this very identical place, so that the alarm of our friends was somewhat premature and unnecessary.

It was well, however, that they took the prompt steps they did to leave the place, as the sequel will prove.

Had they known that the soldiers had no suspicion of their presence there, they might have been tempted to remain.

Lucky, however, was it for them that they did not.

Had they lingered, the worst and most disastrous consequences might have ensued.

Upon hearing such a tremendous clattering of hoofs before his door, of course the inquisitive landlord left off in the midst of what he was doing, and hurried to the front of the house to learn what had taken place.

His surprise was not so great as might have been expected, for he was aware that for some time past the roads had been patrolled by detachments of dragoons; nor was it the first time they had made a temporary halt before his door.

He was glad enough to see them, and, in a bustling and obsequious way, ran up to the officer's horse.

"This is the 'Mountain Rill' inn," he said, "and I am the landlord, Timothy Goodridge, as you would see on the sign, if it was only a little lighter. There is the best of accommodation for man and beast."

"Of course, of course, every landlord says that," replied the officer.

"You will find that I don't say it without good cause," replied Mr. Goodridge. "Will you alight, gentlemen, or"——

"Stop a moment," said the officer, who was struck with a fresh thought. "I have a question to ask you."

The landlord assumed an expression of great importance, and prepared to listen.

"I believe," said the officer, "that you are a man who generally takes notice of all that takes place around you, especially if it is of an extraordinary or unusual character?"

"Well, yes; I generally keep my eyes open as to what is going on in the world."

"Just so. I expected as much, and so I want to ask you a question."

"I shall be glad to answer it if I have the power."

"If you possess the information we require, you will find that it will answer your purpose to place us in possession of it."

The landlord brightened up, and impatiently waited for more.

"You must know that we are on the look-out for five persons, four of whom we very much desire to capture. Now, have you seen anything of them? Can you give us any information respecting them?"

"No," replied Mr. Goodridge.

"You have not seen them, then?"

"Not as I knows of, but"——

"But what?" asked the officer, quickly, whose hopes of learning something had revived.

"You haven't given me any sort of description of these five people, so I might have seen them and I might not."

"To be sure," said the officer, "I forgot that. Well, then, one of the five is a young and good-looking woman—girl, I might also say."

"Yes, yes."

"Have you seen her?"

"Go on—go on."

The officer then proceeded to give a brief description of the personal appearance of our four friends.

He concluded by saying—

"Now, Mr. Landlord, if you can give us any information about these individuals, or any of them, you will be entitled to a reward of a hundred pounds, which will be paid to you by the Secretary of State."

Mr. Goodridge gasped for breath, and then in a nervous sort of way he said—

"Ah! ah! I have—ah!—earnt it."

"What!" exclaimed the officer. "Speak, explain yourself. What do you mean by that?"

"I have earnt it," repeated the landlord; and as he spoke he pointed in a mysterious manner to the low window on the first floor.

The officer grew impatient.

"What is the meaning of all this mummery?" he said.

"Early this morning," said Mr. Goodridge, "two men, whose appearance corresponds exactly with the description given me, arrived here on horseback. One was on a beautiful black mare, which is in my stable now."

The officer uttered an ejaculation, and sprang from his horse.

"Listen to me," said Mr. Goodridge, placing his hand on the officer's arm. "Wait, and I will tell you more."

"Quick, then, be quick! There is no time to lose."

"It's all right," said the landlord.

"Besides these two that I have spoken of, there came a girl also, on foot, and they are now all three sitting comfortably enough in that room there. I left them in it when you arrived, and they have not come down, because yonder is the stairs, and we should have seen them if they had."

This intelligence for a moment or so evidently overcame the officer.

Then, in a hasty voice, he commanded a dozen of his men to alight from their steeds and follow him into the inn, while the others remained mounted and on the look-out, in case their prey should make a dash to escape, when they would be able to intercept them.

Under the guidance of the landlord, who was elated at the idea of earning a hundred pounds so easily, he made his way up the staircase with his dozen dragoons close at his heels.

Of course, Mr. Goodridge was the first to enter the room.

When he saw the door standing wide open, when he knew he had left it closed such a short time before, his heart misgave him.

Upon entering, his worst suspicions were confirmed.

It was tenantless.

"Gone!" he exclaimed. "Gone! and all my money. Oh! I am a ruined man."

"How? what? gone?" said the officer, sharply. "What is the meaning of all this? If you do not explain everything clearly and to my entire satisfaction, I shall take you into custody!"

At this moment a shout came to their ears.

It was uttered by the dragoons without.

It was immediately followed by the trampling of many horses' hoofs upon the stones within the gateway.

"Something has happened," exclaimed the officer, and, with breakneck precipitation, he and his men descended the stairs.

The meaning of the shout was simple enough.

Those dragoons who had been left outside to watch were thoroughly on the alert for any little circumstance that might take place.

All at once they heard the trampling of horses' feet in the yard behind the inn.

The sound was slight, but yet they heard it plainly.

It suggested in a moment the thought that their prey was making their escape, so, to attract the attention of their comrades within the inn, they called out and dashed down the archway.

We must now once more, and for the last time, step back, and then all will be clear enough.

We have now explained how it was that our friends had sufficient time to make their escape into the yard, saddle their steeds, mount, and be off; and now we have to describe the proceedings of the ostler, who had the utmost inclination to serve those people in every way he could who had behaved so liberally to him.

It will be recollected that when our friends first called to him out of the window, he appeared to be out of sight and hearing, but almost immediately they saw a dark figure emerge from the gateway into the yard.

Tom recognised it in a moment as the ostler.

The reader must not suppose that Joe heard them the first time they called.

His presence in the yard was not in any way attributable to that.

Hearing the dragoons ride up to the door, he had hastily slipped on his clothes—for he had retired to rest some time ago—and made his way to the front of the inn, in order to see whether his services were required.

He had just come back to fetch a truss of hay and some water for the dragoons' horses, when our friends saw him and called out to him.

What afterwards took place we know.

The ostler, of course, preferred to attend upon our friends than on the dragoons, for he knew by experience that he was not likely to get much out of the latter.

No sooner had Tom King passed through the narrow door in the wall leading into the paddock, than he closed it after him and bolted it, muttering as he did so—

"I'll serve you all I can, blest if I won't."

The dragoons, however, were close at hand; but, from the darkness which prevailed in the yard, they had not been able to see where our friends were; besides which, the door was situated in a distant corner, the route to which was rather intricate, for the yard, like most old-fashioned inn-yards, was piled up with lumber.

The dragoons could hear no longer the sound of horses' hoofs, which had at first attracted their attention; for, of course, as soon as our friends gained the soft turf in the paddock, their horses' footsteps became inaudible.

The dragoons called loudly for lights, and dismounted, for they found the task of searching the inn-yard whilst mounted to be impossible.

The ostler, having closed the door, began to consider what would be the best thing he should do.

He feared, and not without reason, that he would be suspected of having aided the escape of the guilty parties, and he was apprehensive of the consequences of such suspicion.

What should he do?

He had but scant time for consideration, and, naturally enough, the first thought that suggested itself to him was that he should hide himself.

As a matter of course, the ostler was perfectly familiar with the inn-yard and everything it contained, having spent the greater part of his life in it.

Glancing round him, then, as well as the darkness would allow, he saw a large butt, which he remembered was empty.

This seemed a capital hiding-place, and, without further reflection, he climbed up, with the agility of a monkey, and lowered himself into it.

He did not think of the consequences of what he had done.

Should he be found, suspicion would be directed towards him with ten times greater strength than before.

He never thought of this, however.

His mind was fully occupied in felicitating itself upon its cleverness in devising such a capital place of concealment.

But he got into the butt only just in time.

The other dragoons, as well as the landlord, many of them carrying lights, made their appearance in the yard, and an active search at once commenced.

The landlord was furious to a degree.

In the first place, he called upon Joe, the ostler, in a voice of thunder.

Joe heard him, but he had too much prudence to reply,

CHAPTER CCCCXII.

JOE, THE OSTLER, IS DISCOVERED BY THE DRAGOONS, AND HAS A NARROW ESCAPE.

And he did was to crouch down still lower in the butt, as though, by that means, he could more effectually conceal himself, while he strained his sense of hearing to the utmost, in order to learn, if possible, whether he was in any danger.

Mr. Goodridge was quite surprised when he found that the ostler did not respond to his call, but, nevertheless, he made his way into the stables, the door of which was swinging wide open.

A cry of anger and horror came from the landlord's lips as soon as he entered, and he danced about in the most frantic manner imaginable, to the infinite amusement and astonishment of the dragoons, who had no idea what it meant.

The stable was empty.

At a glance, Mr. Goodridge saw that not only were the two steeds belonging to the visitors gone, but also the one upon which he had only received a small sum on account of the purchase of.

Curses, both loud and deep, issued from his lips, and once more he called frantically upon the ostler.

But, as before, he met with no response.

The officer in command strove to arrive at some conclusion from the landlord, but at last he was compelled to give up the attempt in despair, for Mr. Goodridge did nothing but curse and swear.

"Search the yard," cried the officer. "Search the yard. They are somewhere close at hand I feel confident Search all around."

The dragoons dispersed themselves immediately over the yard, and, assisted by the lights, which were carried by many of them, they proceeded to make an examination of the whole of the premises.

Before they had done much, the landlord recovered the use of his senses sufficiently to cease cursing and swearing in the stable, and he came outside looking and behaving more like a rational creature than he had recently done.

"We heard the sound of horses' hoofs in the yard here," said one of the dragoons, addressing his superior officer, "but we can see nothing of them."

"They did not pass out of the gateway?"

"Certainly not. They could not have done so without being seen and captured by us."

Mr. Goodridge was standing close by, and so turning to him the officer said—

"Now, landlord, can you help us out of this difficulty? Is there another way out of your yard, or is there some place where these fellows may have concealed themselves?"

The landlord rubbed his head perplexedly, and then he said—

"Curse that Joe! I know d—d well he is at the bottom of it."

"So I am," muttered Joe, as he heard the remark, for he thought his master alluded to the butt, having only imperfectly heard the preceding sentences. "I wonder how he knew that. It's all up now, I suppose."

Nevertheless, Joe, the ostler, had the prudence not to make the least movement.

"Who's Joe?" asked the dragoon, impatiently. "Why don't you answer my questions at once, when you know how important it is that we should not lose a moment?"

"I tell you, Joe's at the bottom of it," said the landlord again.

The ostler groaned slightly.

"Oh! lauks," he said, "it is quite certain that master knows where I be, and I expects they'll have me out pretty quick."

"Who's Joe?"

"He's the ostler. I know as well as if I had seen him, that he has shown these fellows the little door in the wall that leads into the paddock, and"——

"What, wretch!" cried the officer in a towering passion, and clutching the landlord by the throat as he spoke. "What, villain! Do you mean to tell me that there is another means of leaving the yard?"

The landlord nodded desperately.

Speak he could not, for the hold which the officer kept upon his throat made utterance an impossibility.

"It's all up, then," said the officer, as he released his hold.

Mr. Goodridge coughed violently, and then he cried—

"I know he's done it; and if he has, they're far enough off by this time, you may depend."

It was now the officer's turn to swear, and it was soon evident that he was quite as well skilled in this accomplishment as the landlord himself.

"This is all your fault," he said. "D—d if I don't believe you're in league with them! I'll take you into custody."

"It's Joe," said Mr. Goodridge; "I know it's Joe! How could it be me? I have been with you all the while, but he has been aiding them to escape."

"Where is Joe?" cried the officer. "Who has seen him?"

The unfortunate ostler, "distilled almost to a jelly by the act of fear," heard every word of the foregoing conversation.

Affairs had taken a very unpleasant turn, and he found his situation in the empty water-butt not half so comfortable as he had thought it.

"I will try to be off," he said to himself. "Master knows where I be, and he will tell the sojers. I'll cut, or they'll lock me up; for if I stay here, they will have me sure enough."

Now this was about the most unwise resolution that Joe, the ostler, could possibly have come to; for, if he had remained where he was, there was just a chance that he would not be discovered.

But, as we have seen, he was under the impression that his master was, by some means, acquainted with his hiding-place, so it was not safe, of course, to remain there any longer.

Cautiously and slowly, so as not to make the least noise, Joe, the ostler, rose to his feet.

He was then just able to see over the top of the water butt.

The inn-yard was tolerably well illuminated with the lights the soldiers carried.

He saw them standing close to the butt.

The landlord was showing them the door that led into the paddock.

The bolt was drawn instantly.

Their backs were towards the butt, and Joe thought this was the favourable moment to leave it.

He drew himself up without being either seen or heard, for the dragoons were wholly occupied by the discovery of the door and attending to the orders of their superior officer, who, having once more got upon the track of the highwaymen, resolved to renew the pursuit without delay.

It thus happened that the slight noise which the ostler could not help making, was unheeded, and he, at length, gained the summit of the wall in safety, which was only a few inches above the top of the water-butt.

But the success which had hitherto attended him, now deserted him.

The top of the wall was crumbling and decayed, and portions of it came away and rolled down into the yard.

This was a circumstance which could not fail to instantly attract the notice of the dragoons.

They looked up by common consent, and they saw Mr. Joe on the top of the wall, looking the very picture of dismayful fear.

"Present arms!" said the officer to his men, with startling abruptness.

He was obeyed instantly.

Then, turning to Joe, he said—

"Descend this moment, or you are a dead man."

The ostler glanced at the glittering barrels of the carbines presented to him.

That was enough.

As though he had been shot, he rolled off the wall.

But he took good care to fall into the paddock.

The dragoons darted through the door in a moment, and seized him ere he could rise to his feet and make a run for it, as he fully intended.

Trembling in every limb, and in a most unsavoury condition—for he had fallen into a dung-pit—he was led to the commanding officer, who looked at him sternly, while he said to the soldiers—

"Hold him firmly, my men; see that he does not escape."

The dragoons tightened their hold.

"So it is you, is it," said the officer, "who assisted the highwaymen to escape? Do you know you will be transported for life for it?"

At this terrible announcement Joe's knees knocked together, and he would have sank to the ground had he not been held up by the firm grasp of his captors.

His teeth chattered, and his eyes rolled wildly as he looked from one to the other of the stern faces which surrounded him.

"Speak," said the officer, "speak."

The unfortunate ostler made several attempts to do so, but failed.

"You admit your guilt, then?" continued the officer. "You confess that you assisted the highwaymen to escape?"

A ray of hope at this moment flashed across the ostler's mind, and he recovered himself somewhat.

"I didn't know they were highwaymen," he said, with an effort.

"But you assisted them to escape?"

"I was obliged."

"How?"

"They clapped a pistol to my head, and swore they would blow my brains out if I said a word, or refused to do all that they told me; and for fear of my life I obeyed."

This sounded such a plausible excuse, that Joe began to pluck up his courage a little, and he ventured to indulge in the hope that his case was not quite so desperate as he had imagined it to be.

"Where have they gone? Tell me, and that at once!"

"They made me show them the door leading into the paddock, and then they bolted through it like winking."

"Which way did they go?"

"Across the paddock, I think."

"But what brought you on top of the wall?"

"I was trying to get away."

"What for?"

"I was afraid I should get into trouble for what I had done. But I could not help it. If I had not obeyed them, they would have blown my brains out."

"You are sure they went across the paddock?"

"Yes."

The officer reflected a moment.

He was not altogether pleased with Mr. Joe, and he had half a mind to take him prisoner, and the only reason he hesitated to do so was because he knew what an incumbrance he would be.

"Release him," he said to his men, as soon as he had finished his reflections.

Joe was accordingly set at liberty, to his no small gratification, as the reader will easily believe.

"We will waste no more time here," said the officer. "Mount, every one of you. We will renew the pursuit without further delay; but in giving my account of this matter, I shall not omit to state my suspicions both of you, Mr. Landlord, and you, Mr. Joe."

"I am sure I am not in the least to blame," said the landlord. "That's one drop more, however, to my cup of aggravation. I am suspected of aiding the escape of those rascals who have gone off with a horse that I could have get eighty guineas for to-morrow."

"Well—well, that may be; but I have my suspicions nevertheless. I can't help it. They may be unfounded. I don't say they are not."

"I ain't to blame," said Joe, who had grown bold with success. "You would have done as I did, if you had been placed in the same position."

"I have nothing to do with that," said the officer, as he glanced round to see whether his men were mounted. "Are all here?" he added.

"All—all."

"Follow me, then; and, though these villains have got such a long start of us, it will go hard with me if I don't capture them before daybreak. Now they are out of cover again, we won't rest until we have hunted them down."

As he uttered these words, in a very determined voice, the officer of dragoons directed his horse towards the little door.

"Mind your head," said Joe. "Stoop as you go out."

The officer was thankful for this caution, for he escaped an ugly blow in consequence of it, and he began to think better of Mr. Joe.

The same caution applied to the rest.

One by one they defiled through the narrow doorway, and, when all had gained the paddock, they set forward at a sharp trot.

Joe and the landlord watched them until they were out of sight, and then the former closed the door, and bolted it carefully.

With the landlord and the ostler we have now no more to do.

Other and more important events are pressing upon us for attention.

It is, however, certain that Joe reaped a great deal more benefit from the highwaymen's visit than his master did, for he had upwards of ten pounds in his pocket, which, to one in his position in life, was an enormous sum, while the landlord had received nothing for the use of his rooms, the eatables and drinkables he had supplied, and the feeding of the horses.

All he had got was twenty guineas on account of the purchase of a horse, which he had refused fifty guineas for only the day before.

CHAPTER CCCCXIII.

DICK TURPIN AND TOM KING HAVE SOME DIFFICULTY IN FINDING A PLACE OF SHELTER.

From what has just been related, the reader will perceive that Dick Turpin and Tom King had an excellent start of their pursuers.

Without meeting with the slightest molestation they crossed the paddock adjoining the inn, and quickly arrived at the hedge of which the ostler had spoken.

As he had truly said, it was a low one, and on the other side could be seen the country lane he had mentioned.

Tom King showed the example in leaping over it.

"All is well," he cried encouragingly, as his horse alighted on the clayey ground. "There is excellent foothold."

These words were highly satisfactory to Turpin, who, nevertheless, turned towards his companion with great anxiety.

"Maud, dearest," he said, "do you think you could venture to take that leap in safety?"

"Oh! yes," was the reply, given in an encouraging tone of voice. "Do not be afraid."

As she spoke, Maud touched the horse lightly with the riding-whip.

He understood the signal, and, giving a spring, he cleared the obstruction with the greatest ease.

Maud was an excellent rider.

In former times it had been her chief delight, and scarcely a day passed without her indulging in this favourite exercise, for Squire Winberry had kept two beautiful steeds expressly for the use of Maud and Blanche.

A more formidable obstacle than the low hedge had many a time been cleared by this brave girl, and now she performed the feat to the infinite admiration of Turpin and King.

The former just pressed Black Bess upon the flank, and was by her side almost instantly.

"Which way shall we take, captain?" asked Tom King; "the right or the left? There is really no time to lose."

"Let us wait a moment," replied Dick. "Can you see anything of our pursuers?"

Both highwaymen looked in the direction they had just come.

They could see the inn, which was at no great distance, and the out-buildings attached to it, but not their foes.

"I cannot see them at all," said Tom King at length, in a tone of voice which fully expressed the amount of surprise he felt at this circumstance.

"Nor I," replied Dick. "It is very strange. I cannot make it out. When we passed through the door I thought they were close at our heels."

"They were not far behind us, that is certain," said Tom King; "but when I gave the ostler a trifle for his trouble, I asked him to send the dragoons off upon a false scent if he possibly could."

"It looks as though he had done it, too, Tom, for I cannot see them. It is quite certain they have not yet left the inn-yard."

"Let us hope, then, that they may be detained there a little longer, and improve this chance to the utmost. We shall get a good start of them, let things turn out how they may."

"Agreed. But it seems to me that if we turn to the left this lane will bring us out on to the high road again, and not far from the inn."

"I have no doubt of it," replied King, as he glanced keenly about him.

"That, then, is the road we ought of all others to avoid," continued Dick, "so we must turn to the right, and trust to our luck."

"To the right be it, then. Forward, Dick; I will bring up the rear. I must say that at any time, when I am in doubt as to which way I ought to go, I would always take the right in preference to the left."

"It is to be hoped this will not take us wrong," said Turpin.

As he spoke, he once more took hold of the bridle of Maude's steed, and allowed Black Bess to proceed at an easy gallop, which was, however, in reality, little more than a canter.

This was the pace that would be least fatiguing to Maud, and it was for this sole reason that Turpin adopted it.

The horses, too, would be able to continue it for a long time without distress.

As he had promised, Tom King brought up the rear.

He kept about twenty yards behind Maud and Dick, and every few moments he would look behind him, so as to become aware at the earliest moment when his enemies got upon their track.

But the night was a dark one, and the inn gradually faded from his sight, without his either seeing or hearing anything to excite his apprehension.

When he could see the inn no longer, and when he had convinced himself that the dragoons were not upon the road behind them, Tom increased his speed, and in another moment was riding abreast of Maud and Dick.

He lost no time in communicating the gratifying intelligence to them.

By Maud at least it was received with satisfaction.

Indeed, she could scarcely bring herself to believe that they had so completely escaped from a situation of so much peril.

But such was the case.

Nevertheless they did not reduce their speed, for they could not tell how soon their enemies might make their appearance, and the sooner they got out of that part of the country, the better it would be for their safety.

In this they at once agreed.

"We must not forget," said Turpin, "that we have yet a great deal to do. There is our appointment with Claude Duval and Sixteen-String Jack. We must not forget that."

"I had not forgotten it," replied Tom King; "to-morrow night we must be upon the agreed-on spot."

"In the meantime we must find some place of shelter; but where?"

"I think we cannot do better than occupy our minds with pondering upon this point. It is one of the utmost importance."

"It is, indeed."

"For my part, I think we cannot do better than spend the remainder of the night in journeying towards Finchley or Barnet, because the nearer we are to the spot where the meeting is to take place the better chance we shall have of keeping the appointment."

"Just so. Have you any idea how far we are off our destination?"

"None whatever."

"Nor I."

"This part of the country is almost wholly unknown to me, and I am not by any means certain whether we are not going away from Finchley instead of towards it."

"I hope not."

"It is a matter of the merest chance in the world, I can assure you."

"The best thing we can do, then, is to ascertain as soon as possible whereabouts we are."

"Undoubtedly; but I cannot exactly see how we are to do it."

"We must trust to chance."

"At any rate, it will not do for us either to pause or to change our course just at present."

"Very true. Forward, then. The night must be far advanced, and who can tell how far we may yet have to go?"

"I would give much to know what can be the reason we have not been troubled with the dragoons. That ostler must be a clever fellow to have kept them off our track."

"I wish I knew the reason of their non-appearance. As it is, I cannot help feeling mistrustful and suspicious about it."

"Pho—pho!"

In such-like talk as this did the two highwaymen beguile the tedium of their journey.

The lane which skirted the paddock belonging to the "Mountain Still" inn led into another, and so on, and they had never once crossed or came in sight of a turnpike-road, which was a rather peculiar circumstance and showed how little inhabited that part of the country was.

Up to the present moment the face of the heavens was covered with clouds, which had seemed stationary.

Now, however, a movement became perceptible; and it was evident that, ere long, the moon would break forth, for already her position in the sky was visible.

The highwaymen would much rather have dispensed with her light, as it might be the means of bringing them into danger, and yet, when the clear, pure light did break forth and bring into view the country round, they could not help experiencing a sensation of pleasure.

They were able to see the ground—the nature of the country through which they were travelling, as well as each other's faces.

This was a satisfaction to all.

The clouds now gave evident signs of completely dispersing before the slight wind which had sprung up, but the moon was verging towards the west, and would, ere long, sink beneath the horizon.

Suddenly a turn in the lane brought our friends to a spot where two other roads branched off at right angles to each other.

Which of these would have been best for them to pursue, our friends would have found it very difficult to determine, had they not caught sight of a finger-post, with three white, spectral-looking arms, which was planted just where the three roads joined.

By the distinctness with which this object was visible in the moonbeams, our friends fancied it had been recently painted.

"Now," said Tom King, with satisfaction perceptible in his tones, "we shall be able to learn at last whereabouts we are, and where we ought to go. Halt a moment, Dick; halt here underneath the shadow of this hedge, and I will ride forward and decipher, if I can, the words that are painted on yon finger-post."

"With all my heart," said Turpin, as he brought Black Bess and Maud's steed to a halt at the place which King had mentioned.

Tom now rode boldly enough into the triangular-shaped enclosure in which the finger-post was planted.

The three arms pointed, of course, in the direction of the three roads.

The one which pointed to whence they had just come, Tom took no notice of, but went up to the one on his right hand.

The letters were painted black upon it, and doubtless, in the daylight, were distinct enough, but by moonlight it was quite another matter.

Brightly as the beams had appeared to fall, Tom found, now that he was nearer, that they were sadly deficient in the defining quality.

However, he did not despair of being able to make out the inscription.

Riding as close to the finger-post as he could, he raised himself in the stirrups and caught hold of the projecting arm with one hand.

He was thus able to approach it very closely.

The first letters he was able to make out were those nearest his right hand.

They gave him but scant information.

"It's three and a-half miles to somewhere, Dick," he said, "but I'll be shot if I can make out where."

"Look again."

"I am. I can make out some more of the letters now. I can see 'n,' and 'o,' and 'th.' Ah! and here is 'r.' That makes North. It's three miles and a-half to some place beginning with North. What place can that be?"

"I cannot assist you, my friend," said Dick Turpin, "for I have no idea what part of the country we are in. There is a place called North Mimms."

"It can't be that," replied Tom King, "for there's only two more letters, and one of them is 'w.' And stop! the other is 'a.'"

"That seems an extraordinary name for a place. What do you call it?"

"I can see plain enough, now, and without being mistaken in the least. It is Northaw."

"Northaw?"

"Yes."

"Have you ever heard of such a place?"

"No."

"Have you?"

"No; and yet I think there is a village of that name some twenty miles north of London; but that can't be our whereabouts, surely?"

"I'll look on the other arm that points the contrary way, and try whether I can make that out. Yes, I can, I daresay we shall know better where we are."

Tom King, without more ado, turned his horse round and approached the other side of the finger-post.

"That ought to lead to London," said Turpin. "Does it?"

"Wait a moment, and I will tell you. Yes, you are right. I can see the word London. Oh! yes; that is the way to London."

"How far does it say we are from it?"

"Why, I can't see very well, Dick; the figures seem blurred. Wait! It's six; no, it's sixteen miles to London."

"Then I was not far out, was I?"

"No; you were remarkably near the mark. Now, Dick, where are we to go? which way are we to go?"

"If we are to follow out your idea of finding a place of shelter, somewhere near the spot appointed for our meeting with Clande and Jack, we cannot do better than take the road towards London. I suppose it is about eight miles to Finchley?"

"Somewhere about that."

"Then let us take this road to London. Clearly it is not a highway—probably some cross-country road, and, therefore, we are not so likely to meet with any interruption."

"I agree with you entirely, Dick."

"Forward, then! There is no occasion to distress our cattle, and I think we may fairly congratulate ourselves upon having for the time being completely eluded our foes."

"I think so, too; but we must not feel too secure. We may be surprised, unless we keep continually on our guard."

"We must be cautious."

"We will not go quite so far as Finchley, Dick; and it would be better if we got somewhat to the west of it, as in that case we should be all the further from Enfield Chase."

"That is a good suggestion, and it shall be acted upon. It strikes me, after all the events that have recently taken place, that it will be a long time before it will be at all prudent for us to show ourselves in that part of the country again."

CHAPTER CCCCXIV.

THE HIGHWAYMEN SUDDENLY COME IN SIGHT OF AN UNEXPECTED SPECTACLE.

At a pace which did not distress their horses in the least, and which enabled the three friends to converse together without difficulty, they performed the remainder of the journey.

Tom's suggestion that they should go as far to the westward of the village of Finchley as possible, was a very wise one, and no better reason could be found for adopting this course than that which he himself gave.

They would be further from Enfield Chase, which was in the east, and, consequently, they would be less likely to encounter any of their foes, who would have no suspicion of their being in that part of the country.

At the first available turning, our friends struck off from the road they were pursuing, and directed their course as much due west as possible.

In this they were assisted greatly by the moon, which was just upon the point of declining behind the western horizon.

This was an excellent guide to them, and they experienced a feeling of great regret when the radiant orb entirely disappeared.

Luckily for them, this did not take place until they had gone a considerable distance, and it would now matter very little if they inclined slightly towards the south, for Finchley was some distance from them.

By the time the moon had sunk, there were some faint indications in the opposite quarter of the heavens that dawn was fast approaching.

A long, bright streak of light, which perpetually increased in length and breadth, warned them of the advent of the new day.

The hour, however, was a very early one; and, in that lonely part of the country, the highwaymen did not apprehend much danger from being seen.

Still, the sooner they got under cover, the better; for the day was coming on with rapid strides.

They were now, they thought, quite as near the place of their destination as they desired to be.

At present they had not made up their minds what place of shelter they should seek; and, probably, they would not.

In such matters they preferred trusting to luck entirely.

It was not possible for them to arrange their plans to any great extent as to what they should do in the future, for they could never tell what effects the next hour would produce.

Now, however, that it was so fast becoming daylight, the necessity of finding some place where they could remain out of sight until midnight, forced itself powerfully upon them.

It would not do any longer to delay; and, therefore, as they rode along the narrow lanes, Turpin and King looked over the hedgerows on the right and left of them, in the hope that they should presently perceive something that would answer their purpose.

It was easy to tell by the expression of his countenance that Dick Turpin's mind was busily occupied about something.

His brows were knit with anxiety, and his lips moved slightly, as though he was communing with himself upon some important subject.

Tom King was too much engaged in looking about him to notice it; but, as the reader may be sure, it did not escape Maud's observation.

She looked curiously and furtively into his countenance, as though she would fain have read his thoughts, but she found this to be a task far beyond her powers.

She could tell he was suffering great anxiety from some cause or other, but there her knowledge ended.

She hesitated to question him, for she was well aware that their perilous situation demanded much earnest thought, and a double responsibility rested upon him, for in the hour of danger both looked up to him to receive instructions how they were to act.

Maud little thought that the anxiety under which Turpin laboured, proceeded chiefly from herself.

But such was the case.

It was upon her account that Turpin felt so much anxiety.

He was wondering what place he could find where she would receive those comforts of which she stood so much in need, and not only that, Dick felt that it would be quite impossible for her to accompany him in all his excursions.

Such a thing was entirely out of the question.

But, then, what should he do with her?

There was but one answer to this question.

He must find some place of refuge for her where she could remain in perfect safety while he pursued his hazardous career.

Where, however, in all the length and breath of England, was such a place to be found?

What shelter would be secure from the prying eyes of the police-officers, who were so intent upon his capture?

That was the difficulty in which our hero found himself, and this was the reason why his countenance wore such a thoughtful expression.

Thought after thought passed through his brain, but he was obliged to reject them one after another as unfeasible.

In the meantime, the day came speeding on.

The sun rose, and tinged with his golden and early beams the wintry-looking landscape, giving it an aspect of great beauty.

And during all this time they had not come in sight of a single habitation of any description.

Nothing but fields, meadows, and pasture-land met their view.

They were unable, too, to see for any great distance in any direction, owing to the rolling masses of mist which rose up from the damp earth, and floated about before the faint early morning breeze.

As the sun rose higher and gained greater power the mist would be dispersed, but, from their quantity and density, this would not be for an hour to come at least.

At length Tom King noticed that Dick Turpin did not speak, and that a long time had elapsed since he said anything.

Accordingly he turned round towards him, and then he noticed his thoughtful aspect.

"What is the matter, Dick?" he asked. "Has anything gone wrong?"

Dick started when he was addressed like one suddenly awoke from sleep.

Recovering himself instantly, he said—

"I have been wondering what would be the best place of shelter we could find. I should wish something as comfortable as possible. It is not as though we were alone; if we were, we could rough it."

"So we could, Dick; but when I turned round I was just going to ask you what place of refuge we should be able to find."

"I have no idea, though I have been perplexing my brain for some time upon that very point."

"I can think of nothing but some quiet road-side inn, where we could put up for a few hours."

Turpin shook his head.

"We must think of something better than that. Our late experience at the "Mountain Rill" ought to show us that an inn is not a place at all suited to our purpose."

"Yes, I thought of that. Now, if Tom Davis had got a place"——

"Don't mention that," said Turpin. "If that worthy fellow kept an inn now as he used to do in olden times, all our difficulties would vanish at once. He would sacrifice his own life rather than any harm should come to us."

"He would—he would. You know more of him than I do, and yet, from what little I have seen, I am sure you are right."

"Quite right. Ah! Tom, you little think what a pang it gave me when I found them reduced to absolute beggary. You will recollect—I once told you of it."

"I know you did."

"It is often in my thoughts. On that occasion I did all that was in my power to aid him, which, unfortunately, was not much. Since then, I have been so hunted about, that I have never had the least opportunity of looking after them. It is a duty which I ought to perform, and nothing that I could do would ever repay the debt of obligation I owe to him. He has saved my life more times than once."

"So you have said, Dick—so you have said. I can tell that this is a most painful subject for you to speak upon, and so let us change the topic. We have no time to pursue it now. Look how fast the sun rises in the sky. We must get under cover, and that at once. If we delay much longer we shall be seen, and then all hopes of safety in this quarter will vanish."

"That is true enough, Tom; and I know Maud would only be too glad to quit the saddle, in which she has sat for so many hours."

He turned towards her as he spoke.

With a faint, and somewhat weary smile upon her lips, she replied—

"Do not heed me; believe me, I am not fatigued; but, as Tom says, I am fearful that we should be seen and recognised now that it is broad daylight."

"Your fear is a just one, and I only wish we could remove it."

"Look yonder," said Maud, pointing over the hedge-row with her whip as she spoke. "I can see a building of some sort there. What is it, think you?"

"That, I know not. It is a strange-looking place. What do you think of it, Tom?"

"I was just looking. You see that confounded mist which keeps rolling about prevents us from obtaining anything like a clear view of it, but it appears to me to be some kind of ruin."

"It has, most certainly, a ruinous appearance. I wonder what it can be?"

"I think we cannot do better than try to get close to it," said Tom King. "If it should be a ruin it will probably be uninhabited, and if it will not afford us permanent shelter, it will do for a time."

"Agreed," said Turpin, "for I can see nothing else."

"We must look about us for some means of approach to it. It is some distance from the side of this lane, and we are on a piece of rising ground."

"Forward, Tom! Doubtless a little further on we shall come to a turning that will lead towards it."

When Maud had spoken all three had come to a halt, but now they set themselves in motion again.

The building to which she had directed their attention seemed a very large one, but it could only be seen imperfectly in consequence of the masses of mist which were floating over the meadows.

Indeed, all that could be seen of it were the chimneys and some of the higher portions of the roof.

It was these which presented a ruinous appearance.

The chimneys and chimney-pots were much mutilated, and one was completely broken away.

Such a condition of things as this seemed to indicate that the place was uninhabited.

Our friends trusted that it might prove to be so, in which case they would have no further trouble.

As they descended from the rather elevated piece of ground upon which they had halted, they lost sight of the building altogether, as the hedge-rows and the mist combined completely hid it from sight.

Both Turpin and King, however, kept on the look out for some turning which would lead them in a direction somewhere to the left of that they were now taking.

They were, however, unable to find any such turning, though they noted that the lane itself wound round gradually to the right, and seemed to promise, if they followed its devious course, that it would lead them past the building.

In this hope they pressed onward with additional speed, for they were fearful every moment of meeting with some one, and their presence in that lonely district, where strangers were scarcely seen, would be sure to be commented upon.

Should they be seen in the vicinity of this building, it would cease to promise them the least security.

At a kind of gallop, then, the three friends continued their course along the lane, until suddenly they came in sight of some large gates.

They drew rein at once.

"Is this the entrance, think you?" asked Tom King.

"I fancy so, by the rusty and dilapidated condition of the gates; but I can seen nothing of the building itself."

"Nor I."

"What do you say? Shall we enter these grounds and explore them? We may find it well worth our trouble to do so."

"I have no objection to such a proceeding. The gate hangs open temptingly, so we shall be saved any trouble in effecting an entrance."

Tom was right.

The massive iron gates, which once no doubt had been very handsome ones, were now almost eaten away with rust.

Those elaborate portions which had once given it such an appearance of elegance, were now completely filled up with oxide, and the perpendicular rods were in some places so attenuated, that they were no thicker than thread, and could have been broken as easily.

The massive stone pillars upon which the gates were hung, also exhibited symptoms of decay.

The stonework was chipped and cracked, while the upper portion, upon which some figure had no doubt been placed, had completely crumbled away.

One of the gates retained its proper position, though it was drawn sadly out of shape, but the other one had swung open and there remained.

The upper hinge had given way, and the mere weight of the mass of iron-work had caused it to sink deeply into the damp ground.

Weeds and curious creeping shrubs had grown up and around it, and now to close the gate would have been a matter of impossibility.

On both sides of the gate a row of trees had been planted, forming, no doubt, at one time, a handsome avenue.

But now winter had stripped the trees of every leaf and bud.

Nothing but the bare, dead-looking branches remained, which looked like so many arms stretched out menacingly towards those who approached.

[CLAUDE DUVAL AND SIXTEEN-STRING JACK STOP THE FARMER ON THE HIGHWAY.]

The trunks of these tall and stately trees were covered with some green, parasitic kind of moss, which seemed to flourish and look green in spite of all the bitter blasts of winter.

The ground between these trees was completely overgrown with such wild and rank vegetation as is to be found in the dampest and inmost recesses of a wood.

It was clear that a long time had elapsed since any human foot had trodden that place.

The same thing was observable in the land itself. It seemed as though it was rarely, if ever, visited.

CHAPTER CCCCXV.

DICK TURPIN, TOM KING, AND MAUD, AT LENGTH ARRIVE AT THE RUINED MANSION.

THIS very strange spectacle of desolation came somewhat suddenly upon our friends. An abrupt turn in the lane had brought them in view of it.

For at least a moment they were so surprised at the strange sight that they did not speak, but having reined in their steeds, did nothing but gaze about them.

Such a scene of ruin and neglect could scarcely have been conceived.

Its contemplation had a chilling effect upon the blood, and unconsciously our three friends shivered as though smitten with an ague.

Tom King was the first to speak.

"Well," he said, "I really do think this is about the most lonesome and cheerless spot I ever beheld. I should never have believed that such a spectacle of desolation could have existed."

"It is inexpressibly dreary," said Turpin.

"Very so, but we must not mind that. We ought to look upon these visible and unmistakable signs of the place being deserted by everyone with feelings of the utmost satisfaction, since it seems to promise us that safety and security which we so much desire."

"You are right," said Turpin. "Such is, indeed, the light in which we ought to look upon it. From the appearance of the place, I can have little doubt that these are the entrance gates leading up to the ruined building of which we caught a glimpse from the summit of the hill. I think we may be sure that we shall be able to remain here unmolested."

"It seems so. But look, Dick, what is that? Do you see that board, or whatever it is, that seems to be fixed on the bars of the gate?"

"Yes, yes. What is it?"

"That is just what I should like to know. There seems to be something painted on it. If I can decipher it, it may give us some necessary information."

"I am afraid you will not be able to do that, my friend."

"Nevertheless, I will alight and try," said Tom; "and I think, if we are to pass through the gates, you had better alight as well."

"Wait a moment. You shall look at that curious board first."

Tom King alighted from his steed in a moment, and, holding him by the bridle, led him towards the gate.

The piece of board to which he had alluded was of that shape which is generally employed for painting notices upon.

As he drew near to it, however, Tom perceived that it was in the last stage of rottenness and decay.

It looked as though the whole would have crumbled away beneath the least touch.

Still there were traces left upon its surface which showed that at some time or other an inscription had been painted upon it.

But what was its purport would now be a vain task to conjecture.

Tom could just see some letters, and one line that seemed to stretch right across the board.

After an attentive examination, and by dint of deciphering one or two of the letters, he pronounced this line to consist merely of the word "Trespassing" or "Trespassers."

"It is probable, then, that this board was simply a warning to trespassers."

"It seems very much like it. Shall we pass through the gates and try what further we can discover?"

"I think so."

"Let me advise you to alight then. If you do not, you will have a great deal of trouble in preventing your heads coming in contact with those low boughs of the trees!"

Turpin acquiesced in this, and immediately quitted his saddle.

He then assisted Maud to alight.

Taking the bridles of the horses in their hands, all three passed through the dilapidated gateway, and took their course along the neglected avenue.

They found walking by no means an easy task.

At every step they took their feet sank deeply into the soft oozy soil, and became entangled in the clinging, trailing plants that grew in such wild luxuriance in every direction.

It would, however, have been no less disagreeable had they remained on horseback, for the majestic trees, with which the avenue was lined, had been allowed to grow in all their native wildness.

The branches straggled across the avenue in the most perplexing manner and in every conceivable direction.

Even as they walked on foot they had occasionally to bend their heads or step aside in order to avoid some low-lying or interlacing branch.

As is generally the case, this avenue of trees was serpentine in shape, so that at no time could they see far before them.

As for the building, that was completely hidden from view, and they had no idea in which direction they ought to look for it.

Suddenly, however, Turpin caught sight of some of the chimney-tops, which were visible through the trees

In a moment more they vanished again.

They had now scarcely, if any, doubt that these neglected and deserted grounds, through which they were with so much difficulty forcing their way, belonged to the ruinous building they had seen from the summit of the hill.

If this was so it seemed as though the highwaymen had accidentally stumbled upon a place which would offer them every promise of safety and security.

Occupied with these thoughts, and occasionally speaking to each other, they steadily kept on along the apparently interminable avenue, wishing every moment to reach the end.

The silence which prevailed about this place was really terrible, and had a most depressing effect upon the spirits.

At almost every step they took some wild bird or animal started off swiftly, making the dried, frost-bitten branches of the trees rustle and crackle in their progress.

From all these considerations our friends were warranted in coming to the conclusion that no other feet besides theirs had trodden upon that soil for a long, long time.

How long it was out of their power to tell.

It seemed to them that the further they got from the gates the wilder and more desolate the whole place appeared to be.

At no other season of the year than the present would it have appeared more dreary and wretched.

In the glorious summer time, when the trees were all in full leaf, when the grass and shrubs were green, and when wild flowers were blooming all around, the scene would have been one that would have charmed the soul from its mere wildness—so suggestive as it was, of those times so long gone past never to return.

Now, however, that sole charm was altogether absent.

There was much in a general way to make our friends somewhat gloomy, and it required them to be light-hearted to a degree so as not to sink beneath the perils of their situation.

It is not to be wondered at, then, if this cheerless-looking place should throw a gloom over their souls.

All felt its influence, and they found all their struggles to resist it quite in vain.

The one who felt this most of all was Maud, and yet, strange to say, she was the one that exhibited it the least.

The length of this avenue must have been a mile at least, though, to our friends, owing to their impatience and the difficulties they met with at every step, it seemed more than double the distance.

At length, however, its extremity was reached, and then, and not till then, did they obtain a view of the building of which they had had two transient glimpses.

The avenue terminated somewhat abruptly upon a lawn of rather contracted dimensions.

It was surrounded by a low wall, and two steps led up to it.

But now few of the appearances which a lawn presents were discernible.

It was one tangled mass of weeds and thistles.

Upon this, however, the eyes of the highwaymen and their fair companion did not linger.

Their curiosity had been much excited with respect to this building, and now that it was fairly before them they had eyes for nothing else.

It was a strange and wild, weird-looking place, which corresponded well with the scenery that surrounded it.

A glance was almost sufficient to assure them that it was untenanted.

No human beings would take up their abode in such a place unless from the direst necessity.

All the windows were closed and protected by wooden shutters.

Upon these green moss had grown thickly, affording unquestionable proof that they had not been touched for a long period.

A door, too, presented the same appearance.

The walls were everywhere crumbling and ruinous, and threatening to fall.

It was now day, and an hour when most people would be astir; but from no one of those quaint and broken chimneys came the thinnest wreaths of smoke.

Such a silence, too, reigned all around as was quite incompatible with the presence of human beings.

It was as though the three persons who composed the little party were alone in the world.

Tom King raised his riding whip and pointed with it to the desolate building.

"What think you of that?" he asked. "It does not present a very tempting appearance, does it? and yet I should think it must be safe."

"No doubt of that," said Turpin; "but I must confess that, if I had been permitted, I should have chosen some more comfortable-looking place."

"Pho! pho! Dick; never heed that. It is all the better. We may safely say that this place, for some cause of which we are ignorant, is shunned by every one. I looked carefully about me all the way hither, and could nowhere see the least trace of a human foot."

"Nor I. And I, too, looked closely."

"Then I think we may go as far as to say that no one knows precisely that we are in this part of the country. I am sure we have passed no one who could set our enemies upon our track, and it is quite certain the dragoons who pursued us were not close enough upon our track to note the direction we took."

"I grant all that, Tom."

"Very well, and you must know as well as I do to what point my remarks lead. No one knows we are here; no one visits this place. Therefore, I say, that here we are likely to remain unsuspected and in safety."

"There does seem every probability of it, and I suppose that makes you think that we ought to overlook any of the disagreeables?"

"It ought to reconcile you with the whole of them."

"Well, come, I will not say that it does not; but it strikes me we are talking a little too soon. It would be better if we were to get nearer to the building, and ascertain first whether it is or is not tenanted; and secondly, whether we can obtain an entrance into it."

"If we can get over the first difficulty you can leave the second to me. That would be no obstacle, I know. I will guarantee to get in if there's nobody there."

"Very well, Tom. And as I think we have stood here talking quite long enough, I propose we approach the place a little closer. It is fortunate all the windows are provided with shutters, for if they were not, and anyone was within, we have stood a good chance of being perceived."

"I think that is a needless apprehension, Dick, for all the windows appear to me to be protected with shutters, which look as though they had not been touched for years."

"They have that appearance. But come, you lead the way, Tom, and we will follow."

"With all my heart," replied Tom King. And as he spoke he stepped forward, leading his horse at the same moment, and without difficulty ascended the two steps which led up to the lawn.

Dick Turpin, Maud, and the other two horses followed closely behind him.

Very little traces of a lawn were now perceptible in the piece of wild-looking ground which spread out before the mansion.

The grass upon it reached almost to their knees, and it was thickly intermingled with thistles and other weeds of a prickly character, which made walking somewhat unpleasant and disagreeable.

Disregarding these minor inconveniences, our friends struck across it in a straight line to the front of the mansion.

They did not halt until they reached the foot of the flight of stone steps, but here were compelled to pause.

"Now," said King, "a question arises. If we find, as we anticipate, that this mansion is uninhabited, and consequently make our way into it, what shall we do with our horses?"

"They must not be forgotten, certainly."

"They must not be forgotten, because we owe our present and future safety to them entirely."

"Just so. But do you think that I should have forgotten Black Bess. Still I think we had better see to ourselves first, and then attend to the horses afterwards."

"Just as you like."

"You have halted before the front-door, Tom. Do you think that the best point at which to attempt to effect an entrance?"

"Well, no—not exactly. Upon second thoughts, I think we had better go round to the back."

"I think so, too. Indeed, we ought to survey the building all round before we make an attack upon it."

"It will be more prudent by far to do so."

Having agreed upon this, they made their way round to the back of the mansion.

In doing so, they were surprised at its extent, which was much greater than they had imagined.

They kept a careful look out all the time, and it may be said with safety that no portion of the building whatever escaped their observation.

All was silent and deserted, and the rustling which they made in forcing their way through the rank vegetation sounded with ominous loudness.

At length the back of the mansion was reached.

Here they found numerous buildings, which probably served in former times for servants' offices; and, as they looked towards them, our friends felt certain that here, if anywhere, would be found the inhabitants of the place.

CHAPTER CCCCXVI.

THE TWO HIGHWAYMEN SUCCEED IN EFFECTING AN ENTRANCE INTO THE DESETED MANSION.

We are thus minute in describing the approach of the highwaymen to this deserted mansion, because the events which afterwards occurred there were of so strange, wild, and wonderful a nature as to make some such introduction necessary, lest, coming upon the reader with too much suddenness and unexpectedness, they should be deemed improbable.

It may, however, be easily believed that the awful stillness which reigned about this spot—rendered more striking as it was by their footsteps being the only sound that broke upon it—was not without producing a great effect upon the minds of the three persons who composed the little party.

There was a strange, fluttered feeling about their hearts—an indescribable tremor, which extended over the whole of their body—which indicated that their minds were worked up to a high degree of excitement.

Without knowing it, they felt a conviction that they were standing upon the threshold of a most remarkable adventure—one that would make all their former achievements seem tame and dull.

In this place let us take the opportunity of describing briefly the exterior appearance of the mansion which was destined to be the scene of these strange occurrences.

We can do so while Turpin and Tom King and Maud are occupied in walking round it and examining it.

The style, then, in which it was built is that which now-a-days is termed the Elizabethan.

But it is probable that this building, although presenting this appearance, had been built—or, at least, the greater portion of it—before Queen Bess ascended the throne of England.

Despite the aspect of desolation which hung over it, it was not without a certain picturesqueness, which would, however, have been much increased had the surroundings been more cheerful.

But the ground around, which, doubtless, once had been in a high state of cultivation, had now such an appearance of neglect that it made the building seem ten times more dreary than it really was.

In addition to this, our friends first saw it soon after sunrise on a gloomy winter's morning, so that everything disadvantaged it.

Still, its mullioned windows, its quaintly-shaped and elaborately-finished gables and chimneys, its pointed roofs, all had a pleasing look.

No doubt in former times this place had been very beautiful, for now there were so many traces of that beauty left.

But the beautiful carving with which the stonework had been adorned was now so much worn away by time that its elegancies could not be distinguished.

Indeed, the whole edifice was in a state of crumbling ruin and decay, and seemed as though in a short time it would cease to be inhabitable unless prompt and efficient steps were taken to make it so.

So much for the dwelling itself.

It was entirely surrounded by grounds of vast extent, once beautifully cultivated, but now allowed to return to primitive wildness.

All these things were noted by the highwaymen, and commented upon as they made the tour of the building.

They arrived, at length, once more at the rear, where the out-buildings were situated, without having been able to detect the least signs of the place being inhabited.

In fact, they felt themselves justified in entertaining the conviction that no footsteps besides their own had trodden there for many years.

Still, with a due and requisite amount of caution, they approached the servants' offices, for such they undoubtedly were, or rather had been.

These did not present quite such a dilapidated appearance as the rest of the structure, but probably they had been more recently erected.

Here, as elsewhere, all was still.

Seeing before them a door, which seemed to be the back entrance, our friends made their way towards it.

Upon a nearer approach they discovered that this door was overgrown with the same kind of green moss which had spread everywhere around, and which had unquestionably been engendered by the damp.

The steps, the door-posts, and the brickwork adjoining were all covered with the same parasitic growth, and it was clear that that door had not been opened recently, or traces would remain of it.

Our friends noticed, too, that where they trod the moss disappeared, being crushed into the soft earth or ground to water upon the stones.

Looking back, they could see that where this had taken place was just where they alone had trod.

This seemed proof positive that they had the place entirely to themselves.

Tom King surrendered the bridle of his horse to Dick, and mounted the three steps that led to the back door.

Upon this was a huge knocker.

As soon as he perceived it, he said –

"I don't believe there's anyone here, Dick; but still, before we break in, suppose I was to knock. That summons being so legitimate a one, would surely be attended to?"

"There can be no harm in trying," replied Turpin. "For, of course, it is important in the first degree that we should know whether there was or was not anyone within."

"Here goes, then," said Tom King; and as he spoke he seized the knocker vigorously with his right hand.

It was his intention to execute a rather startling rat-tat with it.

But, to his astonishment, he found that it required the exertion of his utmost strength to raise the knocker in the least, and then, when it was lifted about two inches from the door, it required the same, or nearly the same amount of strength, to bring it down into its former place again.

From this it was evident that the knocker had not been very lately used.

It had actually become so incrusted with rust as to make it thus difficult to move.

This was encouraging to Tom, who endeavoured to push the door open by main strength.

But in this attempt he failed most signally.

The door was as firm as a rock.

No doubt, had all the fastenings been removed, it would have been somewhat difficult to force the door open, for probably the wood had swelled with the damp and stuck it firmly in the frame.

"We must try some other place than this, Dick," said Tom.

"There is a window yonder. The hinges of the shutter before it seem to have rusted away. Suppose you try to move that."

Dick Turpin alluded to a mossy-grown shutter, which covered a small window on the ground floor.

Tom hastened towards it, and seizing the woodwork at the lower part of it, gave it a sudden jerk.

A creaking, splitting sound followed, and this encouraged him to make another effort.

Turpin, seeing that the shutter was fixed more firmly than he had fancied, let go the bridles of the horses, and came to his assistance.

One more pull, given with their united strengths, completely removed the shutter.

A small-sized, latticed window was then disclosed.

With the butt-end of a pistol Tom broke those panes which were nearest to the clasps with which the casement was fastened, and introducing his hand, undid them easily, though he found these even were covered with rust.

The window was composed of one leaf, which opened on two hinges like a door, as all windows opened before the introduction of the modern rope and pulleys.

Within, all was darkness, so that Tom could not tell very well into what sort of place it was that this window led, but it seemed to be a small-sized room.

"Here is the way into the house," he said, "and I think we may feel pretty sure that we have the place all to ourselves, or we should have seen something of the inhabitants before we had got thus far with our proceedings."

"I think we have no longer cause to feel apprehensive upon that head."

"Well, then, I think before we go any further, we ought to look to the horses. Having placed them somewhere in safety, we shall be able to enter through this window with very little trouble."

"It will be best to dispose of the cattle at once, and then we shall have that trouble off our minds."

"Do you think it would be safe to turn them loose? The grass seems very rank, but still their instinct would prevent them from eating anything injurious."

"It would, no doubt; but I fear it would be an unwise and dangerous proceeding to let them have their liberty."

"They might stray away."

"They might, but that is not what I chiefly apprehend. There would be a great risk of their being seen, and then our presence here would no longer be a secret."

"Of course. It will not do for that reason to let them loose, because our safety here will depend solely upon no one knowing anything of our whereabouts."

"Just so."

"But what is to be done?"

"Do you see that building yonder at a little distance?"

"Yes."

"That looks like a stable, does it not?"

"I have no doubt that is what it is."

"Then we will break the door open, and put the horses in there. Then there will be no fear of their being seen."

"But how about fodder?"

"Ah! that is another difficulty. There is little hope of our finding any in the stable."

"None at all, I should say."

"There is only one thing we can do. We must gather the grass as well as we can, and give it them to eat."

"I do not see what else we are to do."

"Nor I."

"Come, then; let us see if we can get into the stable."

The highwaymen then crossed what had once been a paved yard, and presently halted before the door of the building in question.

In appearance it in no way differed from the others they had seen, so far as being overgrown with moss was concerned.

But it was not a strong door, and was fastened with a padlock and chain.

As soon as he saw this, Tom knew that it would be easy enough to get into the stable, and he immediately looked about him for a stone.

There were several large pebbles at a short distance, and he selected one of them.

Holding this in his hand, he struck the chain and padlock some very heavy blows with it.

In this manner he completely shattered the padlock, and then the door opened to their hands.

As they expected, it led into a stable, which was divided into several stalls.

There was room for at least a dozen horses.

This was just what they wanted, so with all convenient speed they divested their steeds of saddle and bridle and led them up to the mangers.

There was nothing in them to eat, nor did they think it worth while to look for any fodder in the loft overhead, as, if they had found any, the chances were a thousand to one that it would be unfit for the horses to eat.

Instead of wasting their time, therefore, they went outside, and set to work in good earnest to gather a quantity of grass.

This was done with much greater ease and speed than they had expected, for the grass being of great length enabled them to take hold of it firmly, and the ground being very soft it came up by the roots with ease.

Having in this manner gathered a very large heap, they proceeded to carry it into the stable, giving each horse an equal quantity.

This was the best they could do for the present, so they left them to look after themselves.

As the reader will easily believe, it took some time to do all that we have described, and when our friends once more stood before the window through which they hoped to gain admission to the mansion, they found, on looking up to the sky, that the sun had attained a considerable altitude.

All three were much fatigued by their recent exertions, and they looked forward to a rest with feelings of great pleasure and satisfaction.

"I will get in first," said Tom King; and as he spoke he stepped on to the window-sill, for it was so near the ground that he was able to do so with ease.

In another moment he had passed through the casement and was standing in the little room—if room it was, for its dimensions were so contracted as to make it doubtful whether it deserved such a name.

"Now let Maud come," said Tom. "You can assist her on that side, and I can assist her on this."

"All right."

With Turpin's help Maud easily got on to the window-sill, and then Tom King, taking hold of her hand, enabled her to jump down.

Dick followed quickly, and closed the window after him.

The glance which they cast around them was one of very great curiosity.

It was not long, however, before they came to the conclusion that the place in which they stood had once been a butler's pantry.

But now nothing, save the damp, bare walls was left.

A small door, and seemingly a strong one, was the only means of exit.

To this Tom King at once advanced.

As he had more than half expected, it was fast.

The lock was on the inner side, and Tom ascertained, with the blade of his clasp-knife, that the bolt had been shot.

At first he tried to force the bolt back by inserting the point of his knife, but he failed, and, having broken a piece off the end of the blade in the attempt, he desisted.

Turpin then suggested that he should remove the screws which screwed the lock to the door.

This was a tedious operation, but Tom set about it in good earnest, for he could see no other means by which the door could be opened.

CHAPTER CCCCXVII.

OUR FRIENDS BEGIN TO HOPE THAT, AFTER ALL, THE DESERTED MANSION WILL AFFORD THEM SAFE SHELTER FROM THEIR FOES.

SLOWLY and steadily Tom King proceeded with his work, and at length the screws were one by one removed.

A sudden wrench, then, forced the lock completely away, and the door swung open, leaving a clear passage before them.

They shrank back, slightly, from entering the darkness beyond, but this was a feeling which they shook off almost immediately.

Turpin's duty was to remain with Maud.

She clung to him as though terrified.

And who could wonder at it, when the strange scene by which she was surrounded was taken into consideration.

Tom King, therefore, was the one who took upon himself to lead the way.

The darkness, however, was very disagreeable, and he consulted his comrade as to the expediency of lighting one of the pieces of wax-candle he had in his pocket.

Turpin consented at once, chiefly on Maud's account, who he fancied would be cheered and reassured by a light.

There might be some danger in its being seen, but he resolved to run the risk of that.

Moreover he had noticed, when outside, that all the shutters were closed, therefore the whole of the mansion would be in utter darkness.

Strangers in it as they were, they might fall into some danger while pursuing their explanations, if they had no light.

Tom King was quite willing, and then Turpin said—

"Where did you get that candle?"

"It's a brave bit, isn't it? and I have got another piece in my pocket, quite as large."

"Where did you get them from?"

"From the inn. I took them out of the candlesticks and put them into my pocket, for I thought they would come useful some time or other."

"I am glad you did so. They will prove of great service to us."

A tiny flame now appeared, which quickly increased in brightness, and then they were enabled to see about them with tolerable comfort.

They were in a short, narrow passage, from both sides of which several doors opened.

There was also a door at each end of it.

One of these doors, from the position it occupied, Tom felt certain was the one at which he had so ineffectually endeavoured to gain admittance.

Accordingly they did not trouble themselves in the least about that, but directed their attention to the one at the opposite end of the passage, and which they felt no doubt communicated with the mansion itself, for they were now only in the out-buildings or servants' offices which surrounded it.

About twenty steps took them to this door.

At a glance Tom saw that it was well secured.

When the house had been left, no matter for what reason it had been abandoned, great care had been taken to secure it from being entered, and from this circumstance alone our friends were led to believe that they were on the threshold of making some important discoveries or other.

Everything they saw was indicative of substantialness and strength.

The door before which they now stood seemed a impassable barrier to those who had not the proper tools to set to work upon it.

But Tom did not despair.

He gave Turpin the candle to hold, and with his broken knife he commenced an attack upon the lock.

He treated it in the same way as he had the preceeding one, and after some delay the way laid open before them.

As soon as the door was pushed open they perceived there was no longer any need for the lighted candle.

They found themselves at the lower end of what was evidently the entrance-hall of the mansion.

This was filled with a soft, dim, and beautiful light, the source of which they did not immediately discover.

As they advanced, however, they saw that it came in part from the fanlight over the front door, and partly from a skylight in the roof of the mansion, for the staircase was somewhat of a well-shape, and ascended to the top of the building.

Our friends gazed around them in admiration.

There were traces of grandeur and beauty visible in that deserted hall, although the hideous aspect of ruin and desolation was so obtrusive.

The dust lay thickly everywhere, thus showing that, however closely and carefully the doors had been closed, they had not been closed carefully enough to exclude this mysterious substance, which seems to possess the faculty of penetrating everywhere.

Several doors opened from this hall, but all were shut, and doubtless fastened.

They did not try any of them, but Dick said—

"I think we may safely come to the conclusion that there is no one in this house, and that we have it all to ourselves."

"Oh! decidedly," said Tom King. "If there had been anyone here, we should not have been allowed to proceed as far as we have without some notice being taken of our intrusion. You may depend, for some reason or other, this house has been shut up and deserted, and allowed to fall to ruin just as it pleased."

"That seems a very strange state of things, Tom."

"It does. But do you recollect Durley Chine?"

"I shall never forget it."

"I am reminded of it by this place. But as for finding this mansion in this state, I do not think it anything to be surprised at. Such a thing is far from being uncommon. Sometimes it is the result of caprice upon the part of the owners, and sometimes it is owing to legal proceedings, such as the property being in Chancery, or without an heir, or something of that sort."

"Doubtless," replied Turpin, "there are plenty of means by which the desertion of this place could be explained; but I do not think it worth our while to trouble our heads about them."

"Certainly not. Our own affairs, if we will only give them proper consideration, will suffice to occupy the whole of our time."

"Well, then, let us first of all try to find some place in this house where we can rest ourselves. I should prefer to try the upper floor."

"So should I, because then we should be able to command a good view of the country round."

"Let us ascend these stairs then."

"With all my heart; for it seems there is nothing for us to see on the ground-floor, without we choose to take the trouble of forcing open all these doors."

The little party now began to ascend the stairs.

Their footsteps raised strange echoes in that deserted habitation, and, as they heard them, strange thoughts and feelings filled their breasts.

But they strove, as well as they could, not to succumb to their influence, and spoke to each other upon indifferent topics.

At length the top of the staircase was reached, and here they paused.

As they had ascended they noticed that all the doors that opened from the landings were closed, and these upon the topmost flight of all were no exception.

But the doors were not of a heavy make, and the two highwaymen doubted not that they should be able to burst one open.

Tom advanced, and tried the handles in rapid succession.

All the doors were fast.

"Break one open," said Turpin, "and let us see what kind of place there is beyond."

Tom turned the knob of one of the doors, and pressed against it in a peculiar manner with his knee and shoulder.

He was in such a position as to be able to exercise his utmost strength, and he pushed firmly and steadily.

The door cracked ominously, and gave signs of giving way.

But Turpin, fancying his comrade's strength was insufficient for the task, came to his assistance.

By their joint efforts the door was quickly burst open.

It led into a small chamber, in which, to their surprise, they found a few articles of furniture remaining.

Perhaps they were deemed not worthy of the trouble of carrying away.

At any rate, there they were.

The articles consisted of a small rude table, a few chairs, and a bedstead, which was in one corner.

By the appearance of this latter object, it would seem as though it had been devoted to a servant's use.

All the things were of a more antique fashion than any our friends had ever seen, and Maud looked about her with some interest and curiosity.

"Come," said Dick, in a cheerful voice, as he took in at a glance the general aspect of the room, "we shall be far more comfortable here than I thought we should be. Here are chairs to sit down upon, and a table and a bedstead. When we have made a fire the place will be as comfortable as you please."

The cheerful manner in which Dick Turpin spoke was not without producing a due effect upon his hearers.

The chamber, rude and comfortless as it really was, assumed a more cheerful aspect.

"And here is a window," said Tom King, in the same tone of voice, "which commands an extensive view. We shall be able to see danger long before it comes near us."

This window was somewhat important to them, so they all crowded towards it.

It was a small latticed casement, unprovided with shutters, like the rest of the windows in the house.

Our friends were able to see for a long distance.

Beneath and all around them were the neglected grounds belonging to the deserted mansion.

They were in the front of the house, and with their eyes they could easily follow the route they had just come.

There was the weed-grown lawn, the avenue of trees, but not the gate by which they had entered.

That was hidden from their view by trees.

A prospect of beautiful country, many miles in extent, spread out before them, and in summer the view must have been a lovely one to gaze upon, but now all was bleak and wintry looking.

They continued to look out of the window for some time, until, indeed, their eyes had grown familiar with the different features of the landscape.

Then they turned away, and Turpin said—

"In the first place, we must find something to make a fire with, and then we shall be comfortable enough."

"I am afraid though," said Tom King, "that we shall be obliged to forego that comfort."

"You fear the smoke will be seen?"

"Yes, and if it is, the secret of our being here will immediately be known."

"I think we may reduce the smoke to a mere trifle. When we light the fire we must put on but a small quantity of fuel, and then replenish it by slow degrees, so that the smoke will leave the chimney in the form of an impalpable vapour."

"We might succeed in doing that."

"We must try, for without a fire this place will be unbearable."

"But where are we to find fuel?"

"We must look."

"Suppose we were to break open another of the doors, and cut that door up into fragments with our swords."

"That will answer the purpose admirably; and then, not only that, we might find some articles in the next room which would do for firewood."

"So we might."

While speaking our friends passed out of the room again on to the landing, and paused before another of the doors.

This was forced open in the manner we have previously described.

The chamber, however, contained no other article of furniture, save a bed, and this they never thought for a moment of destroying, since it was likely to prove so useful.

"I firmly believe," said Turpin, "that chance, in directing us to the house, has brought us to a place of permanent shelter, where we shall be able to remain in safety as long as ever we think proper."

"I hope so," said Tom King, "for such a place would be very convenient to us."

"It would, indeed; but let us carry out your suggestion. We will break this door to pieces with our swords and use it for firewood. Stand aside, and I will make the first stroke."

With their swords it was a comparatively easy matter for the highwaymen to chop the door to pieces, and they soon had such a heap of fragments lying on the floor as would last them for some time to come.

Taking a small quantity they re-entered the other room, and, placing them in the grate, set fire to them; for, as we have often remarked, the highwaymen took care never to be without the means of procuring a light readily.

With great anxiety they watched the ascending smoke, and, by the exercise of great caution, contrived to prevent it rising in large quantities.

The wood being dry made their task easier, for it soon burst into a blaze, and then the smoke was consumed.

When the fire had fairly burned up, the wood was brought and placed close at hand so as to replenish it without trouble; the rickety table was drawn up to the fire, and the chairs placed close by.

In these our friends seated themselves with manifest pleasure, for they were thoroughly wearied by their recent exertions.

All three were in high spirits, and a happier trio than those who now occupied the little room in the empty mansion could scarcely have been found.

CHAPTER CCCCXVIII.

RETURNS TO CLAUDE DUVAL AND SIXTEEN-STRING JACK, AND RELATES WHAT BEFEL THEM AFTER THEIR PARTING WITH DICK TURPIN IN ENFIELD CHASE.

SURELY the reader cannot have forgotten our old friends, Claude Duval and Sixteen-String Jack!

A long time has elapsed, however, since we last occupied ourselves with their adventures, and we think a more fitting time than the present for returning to them could not be found.

When we saw them last, as all, doubtless, well remember, was when they parted from Dick Turpin and Tom King in Enfield Chase.

They were to get off as well as they could, with the understanding that all were to re-unite upon the ill-omened spot upon the Finchley-road, which had been selected as being well known to them, and not likely to be visited by their foes.

Indeed, it was a desolate and fearful spot.

It must be understood that the day on which we leave Dick Turpin, Tom King, and Maud in the empty house, is the one preceding the night upon which the meeting was appointed to take place.

To describe the adventures of Claude Duval and Sixteen-String Jack, we shall then be obliged to go back three days.

When they parted with their three friends, they rode off with extreme reluctance, and looked back from time to time, anxious to keep them in sight as long as possible, for they thought how uncertain it was whether they should ever all meet again.

But the thick-growing trees in the chase soon hid them from their view.

Claude and Jack then occupied themselves solely with attending to their own safety.

They were close to the borders of the chase, but they knew not whether it would be safe for them to emerge into the open country.

They might suddenly find themselves assailed with a fresh danger, which might be fatal.

Upon this they held a consultation, and in the end determined to get as near the borders as they could, and then reconnoitre.

With this resolve they pushed forward slowly and cautiously, and, at length, came to a halt.

One more yard would take them beyond the shelter of the trees.

From this point they peered out, but could see nothing of their enemies.

Emboldened by this, they were about to proceed, when they were startled by the report of a gun.

"Turpin and King are in trouble," said Claude. "Let us rush to their assistance."

"Nay, nay," said Sixteen-String Jack, restraining him; "I have faith in their skill and ability to get off, and perhaps by going towards the spot from whence the sound of the shot appeared to come, so far from doing them any good, we shall only be getting ourselves into additional trouble."

"All right," said Claude Duval. "I had forgotten."

Just as he spoke, there came the clear, ringing sound of a bugle.

The reader will remember how, when, and by whom the signal was given.

Claude and Jack heard it responded to from various points around them, and they looked at each other with an expression upon their countenances which said plainly enough—

"Something imminent is going on."

Directly after this they heard the dragoons forcing their way among the trees, all of them going in the direction from which the shot had proceeded.

"I think the best thing we can do is to be off," said Claude Duval.

"So I think," rejoined Sixteen-String Jack. "We shall never have a better opportunity than the present, for our foes seem to be all going in one direction."

"They do."

"Forward, then. There is no one in sight, and we will make a bold rush to get off."

"Agreed, I am ready."

At the same moment they touched their horses lightly with their spurs, and emerged at a smart trot.

A belt of waste, uncultivated ground surrounded the forest.

It was overgrown with furze bushes and brake.

To keep on through this was not an easy matter, but the two highwaymen knew better than to hesitate.

Despite the difficulties, they would not allow their horses to reduce their speed.

It was well for them that they did not.

A loud shout rang in their ears, and, turning round in the saddle, they perceived a number of dragoons making towards them with all speed possible.

They were mounted and well armed, and it was evidently their intention to give chase.

The two highwaymen took off their hats, and waved them defiantly.

Then reaching a less obstructed piece of road, they goaded their horses with their spurs, and set forward at a speed which seemed to make all pursuit a hopeless matter.

Nevertheless, the dragoons showed that they had no intention of giving up the chase thus easily.

The prey was fairly on the road before them, and they resolved to spare no effort to hunt it down.

In this they thought they could scarcely fail, when they recollected how many bodies of dragoons were occupied in patrolling the roads, so that the highwaymen would continually find fresh and untired pursuers at their heels.

Capture, then, seemed inevitable, and, in high good spirits, the dragoons commenced the pursuit.

It was a change from the dull, inactive life they had so recently been leading.

Soon, however, they found that their own heavily accoutred horses were no match in point of fleetness for those belonging to the highwaymen, although, perhaps, they would be able to keep up longer.

It seemed to mortify them exceedingly, though, when they found the highwaymen gradually but perceptibly increasing the distance which intervened between them.

At length they got out of sight altogether, and eventually out of hearing also.

Still the dragoons kept perseveringly upon their track.

Their numbers had already been considerably reinforced, and they were well aware that, if the highwaymen continued along the road as they were then going, they must inevitably fall foul of the next patrol.

But Claude Duval and Sixteen-String Jack were not unmindful of this danger.

As soon as they had got so far ahead of their pursuers for the sound of their horses' hoofs to be inaudible, they pulled up.

"Claude," said Sixteen-String Jack, "this sort of thing will not do; if we keep on like this we shall gallop over the next lot of dragoons who are patrolling the road. We must turn aside. If we are only careful what we are about we shall distance those lumbering dragoons easily enough, for our horses are fresh and strong after their long rest."

"Let us go on more slowly, then, and the next lane we come to let us turn down it."

"We cannot do better."

Once more the highwaymen put spurs to their horses, and, at an easy gallop, swept along the smooth high road.

Both took care to keep a sharp look-out on both sides of them, and suddenly Sixteen-String Jack cried out—

"Halt! Claude, here is the very place."

They slackened speed as he spoke, and turned down a dark and narrow lane.

The darkness was caused by a quantity of tall trees which grew close together on both sides of it.

To see the ground was an impossibility; nevertheless they galloped along at a speed which seemed to evince an utter recklessness for their personal safety.

But the horses, feeling, no doubt, that all depended upon them, kept their feet admirably, by means of the wonderful instinct with which they are gifted.

Away they went, then, at a truly furious rate.

In a few minutes the end of the lane was reached, and they once more emerged upon the highway.

No sooner, however, had they done so, than they found they had run into the very danger they had been so solicitous to avoid.

Not ten yards from the spot where they emerged a troop of dragoons were trotting slowly along the road towards them.

No sooner did they catch sight of our two friends, than sudden ejaculations came from their lips, which showed that the highwaymen were recognised.

In an instant all put spurs to their horses and galloped forward.

Our friends stood no other resource than to fly before them.

A loud voice from the rear came upon their ears.

"Halt!" it said, "halt! If you refuse, we fire; and the consequences be on your heads, not ours."

Jack and Claude could not forbear shuddering slightly—not so much at the words as at the cold-blooded tone in which they were uttered.

Of course they did not halt, but urged their horses to make their utmost speed.

A long pause followed, during which their hearts seemed to stand still, and the blood in their veins to grow cold.

Then one word broke the silence, and warned them that the moment of danger had come, perhaps the last moment they were destined to spend on earth.

The one word was—"Fire!"

The command was scarcely uttered before it was obeyed.

The dragoons all had their carbines ready

Their fingers rested on the triggers

Then came the rattling discharge.

A volley of bullets flew around our friends.

The horses swerved, and plunged, and galloped away with the speed of terror.

No sooner had they fired than the dragoons came lumbering on.

In an anxious voice our friends addressed each other.

Both, however, were unhurt—at least comparatively so.

Sixteen-String Jack had been grazed on the cheek by a bullet, which had also chipped off a bit of his ear; but of so slight a misadventure as that he thought nothing of it.

"Forward, Claude, and all will yet be well. Take to the first lane on the left hand that you come to. If you turn to the right it will take you to Enfield Chase."

"Halt then," cried Claude, suddenly. "Gently. There is a lane. Go round the corner gently, and then put forth your speed."

Jack saw the turning of which his comrade spoke.

It was a few yards ahead, and he slackened speed as he approached it.

In another moment he swept round it, and then the dragoons lost sight of their prey.

But they were close enough at their heels to see where they had gone, and they, too, followed the highwaymen into the lane.

But the darkness was now baffling to a degree.

Still, the soldiers strained their sense of hearing to the utmost, and then they could just catch the dull echo of the flying steeds before them.

This encouraged them to keep on.

Of course the dragoons, as they were somewhere about twelve in number, made a great deal more noise than the two highwaymen, so that Claude and Jack could hear them come thundering after them for a long time.

By degrees, however, the sound grew fainter and fainter, until it was only at intervals that they could distinguish it.

They had traversed many lanes, as they found they led one into the other, but had not come to another public road.

For this they were glad, and the reader may be sure they would be careful how they emerged upon the next one.

They would not do so as unguardedly as they had before, the reader may depend.

At length, however, the end of the lanes was reached.

But they halted some distance from the turnpike-road, and listened.

The dull thump—thump of the dragoons' horses became more audible now that they had ceased to be in motion.

It was clear, then, that they had by no means given up the pursuit.

Every moment, then, was of importance, and our friends listened eagerly.

But no sound came from the direction which they wished to take.

Cautiously, then, they advanced a few paces, until they emerged from the lane, just far enough to be able to glance up and down the broad high road into which the lane led.

Not a soul was in sight.

Taking heart at this, the two highwaymen left the shelter of the lane altogether.

They resolved, however, not to remain on the highway a moment longer than they could help.

At a swift gallop they tore down the road.

Quickly they glanced from side to side in search of a turning.

But the uniform line of the hedgerows remained unbroken.

Suddenly before them they saw two small twinkling lights.

They seemed to spring into existence all at one.

They were approaching.

The highwaymen came to the conclusion in a moment that they proceeded from some vehicle.

"Halt!" cried Claude Duval. "Pull up, Jack—pull up! Whatever this may be that is approaching, we will pull up and allow it to pass."

CHAPTER CCCCXIX.

SIXTEEN-STRING JACK AND CLAUDE DUVAL ROB THE FARMER ON THE HIGHWAY.

Sixteen-String Jack obeyed his comrade's injunctions with remarkable promptitude.

He was, indeed, in the act of reining in his steed when Claude spoke, and so he was able to quickly bring him to a stand-still.

He, too, had become convinced of the policy of drawing on one side, and allowing the vehicle to pass.

By this means they hoped to elude the observation of those within it, who otherwise, seeing them pass, would give information to the dragoons in the rear.

As soon as they had stopped their horses, our two friends backed them as close under the hedge as they could, in order to leave the roadway clear.

Scarcely, however, had they taken up their position, than Claude Duval addressed his companion in a low tone of voice.

"Jack," he said. "Jack."

"What, Claude?"

"That vehicle which is approaching"——

"Well?"

"Shall we let it pass us?"

"To stop it would be very dangerous."

"A fig for danger. I never yet stood on the highway, and allowed travellers to pass toll free, and I can't do it."

"But the dragoons?"

"Never mind them. I am in hopes they are a long way behind us. But come, we must make up our minds quickly. In another moment it will be too late."

This was true.

Whatever vehicle it might be, it was coming along at a rather swift rate, and in something less than the time Claude had named, it would pass them.

"I think we had better not meddle with it, Claude."

"Pho! pho! How much money have you got?"

"I don't know."

"You can guess."

"It is very little."

"I thought so; but let you have ever so little, you will still have more than me."

"Indeed?"

"Yes, for I have not a fraction."

"I have only a few shillings."

"Well, then, Jack, that proves we must have money, and that at once. You can't tell what emergency may arise, and, ten to one, if we have a better chance of filling our pockets than we have got now."

"I see you are bent upon it."

"I am, Jack, and for more reasons than one. Come, you need not fear the dragoons, I am certain; and we might just as well stop whatever is coming as let it pass. We shan't increase our danger either way. Now, Jack! Quick! prepare!"

Sixteen-String Jack somewhat unwillingly took a pistol from his pocket and cocked it.

"I don't half like this business, Claude," he said; "it is too mad-brained by far. I expect every moment to hear the trampling hoofs of the dragoons' horses."

"Pho! pho! we have not heard them, Jack, since we emerged from the lane. Are you all ready?"

"Yes, I am ready."

"Then we shall have this business over in less than no time; and, can't you see, if we only get fairly off before the dragoons arrive, the cart and the man who has been robbed will detain them a moment or so."

"Yes, but it will hinder us."

"Now, Jack, there is no time for another word. We must have money, for I intend to put up at the first convenient inn we come to."

Sixteen-String Jack said no more, for really there was not time.

The vehicle which was approaching was on two wheels.

They could tell that by the sound.

They could also tell that it was drawn by one horse only.

[MAUD PASSES THE NIGHT ALONE IN THE DESERTED MANSION.]

In another moment it was nearly opposite to them, and the two highwaymen, riding out with great suddenness from the place where they had been in ambush, cried—

"Halt! halt! Pull up your horse, or you are a dead man. A dead man in a moment if you disobey. Halt!"

As these words were spoken, the two highwaymen placed themselves one on each side of the vehicle, which they could now see was a cart of rather clumsy manufacture.

An ejaculation of fear fell upon their hearing.

Claude and Jack presented their pistols full at the head of the man who sat in the cart, and who had given utterance to the cry of terror.

He was the sole occupant of the vehicle.

Whether he checked the horse, or whether the creature understood the words which our friends had uttered, would be hard to say.

At any rate, the horse stopped and looked half-terrified.

The man who sat in the cart, and who was the sole occupant of it, dropped the reins as soon as he had given utterance to the ejaculation, and assumed an attitude of the most ludicrous fright.

"Spare my life—spare my life!" he cried. "Take all I have, but spare my life!"

"Your life is in no danger," said Claude Duval; "provided you at once, and without hesitation, hand over to me whatever valuables you may have about you. Quick! your money or your life!"

The man uttered a groan by way of reply to what the highwayman said.

"I am only a poor farmer, gentlemen," he said. "Nothing more, I can assure you."

"A poor farmer! Ha! ha! That's a good joke," said Sixteen-String Jack. "Why, there never was such a thing known. Come, be quick. Hand over."

The farmer uttered another groan.

It was clear he valued his life, and did not feel disposed to throw it away merely for the sake of whatever money he might have about him.

Slowly he put one hand into his pocket.

"Be quick," cried Claude Duval. "Be quick. We cannot waste a moment. If you do not give us your money quickly, we will heave you out of the cart and take it from you; and you may depend we shan't be over gentle when we set about it."

The firm, resolute tone of voice in which Claude Duval spoke was quite enough to convince the farmer that he was in earnest, and that he fully meant what he said.

The farmer fumbled in his pocket, and presently produced a small leather bag.

Claude took it.

"This is too light," he said; "by far too light. This will not do, Mr. Farmer."

"It is all I have, good sir."

"Pho! pho! I know better. Now, look you, 'tis perfect folly for you to think of getting off and taking any of your money with you. We are determined to have it. Which will you do? Give it us, or will you compel us to take it? You will find the first the most comfortable to yourself."

The farmer uttered another groan—this time of a far more dismal character than before.

"Oh! gentlemen," he said. "Be satisfied with what you have got. If you take all, I shall be a ruined man."

"We can't help that," said Sixteen-String Jack. "Quick. Dub up. We cannot stand parleying here."

The farmer, finding all his entreaties in vain, now put the best face on the matter that he could, and from another pocket in his coat he produced another leather bag, which was not only larger, but very much heavier than the first one.

Claude took it from him in an instant.

"There, you villains," said the farmer, "you have got all now."

"I don't know that," said Claude, "and"——

"Hark! hark!" cried Sixteen-String Jack, suddenly. "Hark! I hear our foes upon the road again. We must be off without delay. Forward, Claude, for you life."

Duval listened, and in a moment became convinced of the truth of what his comrade had said.

The dragoons were on the road, and not far off, for the hoof-beats sounded with alarming clearness.

Claude did not hesitate.

Thrusting the bag which he had last received into his pocket, he turned his horse's head round at the same moment as his old comrade.

Then, touching their horses with the spur, they started off at a speed that filled the farmer with amazement.

While going at such a rate conversation was not an easy matter. Nevertheless, Sixteen-String Jack managed to say—

"Keep on, Claude, at full speed, until we come to the next turning. You may depend the dragoons will stop when they get to the cart, so we shall have some slight advantage there."

Claude did not reply.

He thought it needless, but he let Jack know he fully understood him by doing as he had advised.

They had not very far to go before they came to a narrow lane that led off at right angles from the high road in the direction they wished to take.

They turned down it without hesitation.

They paused a moment, however, and listened.

They could no longer hear the sound of the horses' hoofs beating upon the road, and they rightly surmised that they had stopped when they came to the farmer's cart.

This was sufficient.

With fresh hope and confidence they gave their horses the rein freely, and darted down the lane.

It was narrow and winding, like most country lanes are.

Suddenly, however, Claude pulled up, and, somewhat in surprise, Jack followed his example.

"What has happened?" he said. "What has happened?"

"Nothing serious, only we have just passed a spot where another lane turns out of this one."

"We have—we have."

"Let us turn back and go down it, then. I cannot hear anything of our foes. Probably they will take the turning out of the high road, as they have done before, and I think we shall stand a better chance of throwing them off the scent."

"I quite agree with you. Come!"

The highwaymen turned their horses round and retraced their steps until they came to the narrow lane of which Claude had spoken.

It was much narrower than the one from which it branched off.

They galloped along it without hesitation.

All at once, however, they were compelled to come to a full stop, and our friends looked in each others' faces with dismay.

The lane was not a thoroughfare.

It was simply a private road leading from the lane to a farmhouse which they could just discern in the distance.

There was no outlet to it.

They had the choice of either entering the grounds belonging to the farm or turning back again.

Both courses seemed equally fraught with danger.

"I should have thought of this," said Claude, taking all the blame of what had occurred to himself. "I ought to have thought of this. Instead of bettering our position, as I hoped, I have only worsted it."

"Never mind," said Sixteen-String Jack; "we must make the best of it we can. It has turned out an unfortunate circumstance, but the idea of turning down this lane in order to throw our enemies off the track was so good a one, that I am sure anyone would have adopted it as we have done."

"No doubt, no doubt. But still, we might have known that, in nine cases out of ten, these lanes which branch off thus lead only to some farm or homestead as this does."

"But what is to be done?"

"There you puzzle me. Can you hear anything of our foes?"

Both listened with great intentness, but the silence which reigned about that spot remained unbroken.

"I can hear nothing, Claude."

"Nor I."

"I have a thought. Do you remember our intention was to seek some place of shelter as soon as we could?"

"Yes."

"Well, suppose we make our way to the farmhouse yonder and ask for refuge."

"It would be dangerous."

"Why so?"

"The suspicions of the people would be excited."

"Not if we were careful, I think."

"And at this hour the inmates will be all retired to bed."

"Do you think so? Have you any idea what the hour is?"

"No."

"Well, look yonder over those trees. Do you see that faint gray streak of light? That shows the dawn to be close at hand."

"It does, it does. I had no idea it was so late."

"So early, you mean."

"Well, just as you like."

"Farming people are in the habit of rising very early at this time in the year. You may depend they are up before the dawn."

"But what excuse could you make for intruding on them?"

"That we must think of. Doubtless we shall be able to invent some plausible tale which will prevent them from having any suspicions."

"If we do not, it will be fatal to us."

"It will not do for us to turn back, will it?"

"It would be equally dangerous as going forward."

"Then forward be it, then. The dragoons may lose the scent altogether, and then if we can only remain at yon farmhouse until night, we shall be able to push on towards Finchley at an easy pace."

"It would certainly be as safe to remain at that farmhouse as at an inn."

"Perhaps safer."

"Do not, then, let us waste any more time in talking about what we shall do. Look how light it is getting, and I should not relish being hunted by daylight."

"But how are you going to excuse yourself to these people?"

"I must think."

"I don't know how it is to be done."

"I do. I have a fresh thought—quite a fresh thought.

CHAPTER CCCCXX.

SIXTEEN-STRING JACK AND CLAUDE DUVAL HAVE TO BEAT A PRECIPITATE RETREAT FROM THE FARMHOUSE.

As he spoke these words, Sixteen-String Jack, very much to the surprise of his comrade, Claude Duval, slipped off his horse, and, lying down on the ground in the lane, rolled over and over several times.

The natural result of this operation was that he speedily became completely beplastered with mud, for the lane was covered with this substance.

Having accomplished this much, Jack got up.

He then presented a very ludicrous appearance.

"Good gracious!" exclaimed Claude Duval, in a tone of voice which showed how much he was bewildered by this action. "What in the world have you done that for?"

Sixteen-String Jack seemed to enjoy his amusement, for he laughed as he said—

"It is in order to get shelter at the farmhouse without exciting suspicion."

"But how can rolling yourself on the ground and getting yourself all over mud in that style contribute towards it?"

"I will tell you, Claude; but first, as I am down, I will unfasten this gate, and as soon as you are through, I will fasten it again."

"A wise precaution," said Claude. "But shall you be able to open the gate, think you?"

"Oh! no doubt I shall."

Sixteen-String Jack felt for the fastening of the gate as he spoke.

As he had quite expected, it consisted merely of a piece of chain, which was twisted and secured in such a manner as would have puzzled a stranger to undo.

But Jack was in possession of the secret, and, with as little trouble, probably, as the farmer himself would have had, he opened the gate.

Claude passed through at once, leading his comrade's horse by the bridle.

Sixteen-String Jack then fastened the gate again, and remounted his steed.

A kind of continuation of the lane led towards the farmhouse, and along this they proceeded at a walking pace.

"Come," said Claude Duval; "tell me your intentions. You have roused my curiosity to the highest pitch."

"It is very simple," said Sixteen-String Jack, "but I think the scheme will be all the more successful for that."

"Let me hear it, then."

"When we ride up to the door of the farmhouse you must give out that I have been thrown from my horse."

"Thrown from your horse?"

"Yes. Being covered with mud from head to foot, as I am, will make it appear as though such an accident had taken place. I will also act as though I had been slightly hurt."

"Capital," cried Claude Duval, enthusiastically. "That is a capital plan. They are sure to find you shelter, and they will have no room for suspicion."

"I hope not. We can say the accident happened a little way from here, and that we made our way to the farmhouse because it was the nearest habitation."

"Just so. Jack, you deserve great credit for hitting upon such a capital device, and if those dragoons will only be kind enough to go another way, we shall be able to have a comfortable day's rest."

"Come on, then. I can't say anything about the dragoons. In that respect we must trust to our luck."

"Entirely."

"Hush! hush! Say no more. We are too close now to the house to speak with safety."

Upon this, both were silent.

The little path—for road it could scarcely be called—led right up to the farmhouse, passing through the wood on the way.

As soon as the highwaymen entered this last-named place, the door of the farmhouse was opened, and several persons appeared upon the threshold

Upon the countenances of all the utmost astonishment was depicted.

Claude hastened forward, leaving Sixteen-String Jack to follow at a more gentle pace.

Raising his hat, and making a most graceful bow, Claude addressed himself to the persons who stood at the door, but particularly to a very short, stout man, with a fiery visage.

This man, he rightly enough conjectured, was farmer, and the others members of his family.

"Excuse me, sir," said Claude, "for trespassing upon your grounds in the manner I have done, but I trust, when you hear the cause which has led me to do so, you will not be displeased."

The landlord nodded his head violently, but said nothing, though Claude fancied he got a trifle redder in the face.

At this moment Sixteen-String Jack arrived.

He halted by the side of his companion.

As may be easily supposed, the plight he was in attracted the immediate attention of those who beheld it.

Their countenances assumed an expression of curiosity.

"You see my friend here," said Claude Duval. "He is the occasion of our presence here. You see the condition he is in. It is the result of an accident. His horse shied suddenly, and threw him. Fortunately he is not dangerously hurt, but still he is much bruised and shaken. This being the nearest habitation, we made our way towards it, not doubting that you would allow us shelter for a little while, until he recovers sufficiently to resume his journey."

"Certainly—certainly," said the farmer, in a cheerful voice. "You shall, of course. You did quite right to come. Here, Jack, Tom, Bill, help the gentleman from his horse."

Three young men, apparently sons of the farmer, sprang forward as he spoke, and began to assist Sixteen-String Jack, who made believe to be very much hurt and very helpless indeed.

Claude hastily alighted, and came to their assistance.

Between them, Jack was fairly lifted out of the saddle and carried into the farmhouse.

With every imaginable care he was placed upon a large settle, which stood at one side of the fire-place.

He groaned slightly.

It will be recollected that, when the dragoons fired their volley at the highwaymen, one of the bullets had grazed Jack's cheek, and just nipped a piece out of his ear.

From this blood had flowed, thought not in very great quantities.

Nevertheless, mingling with the mud, it gave him the appearance of being badly hurt.

The farmer, who, like most of his class, was a hospitable man, was most assiduous in his attentions.

He imagined that the travellers must be persons of distinction, or they would not travel on horseback.

Before Claude was aware of it, the horses were led into the stable.

He did not wish to appear over anxious about them, lest it should give rise to suspicion, yet he felt he would have much preferred to have seen where they were disposed.

An opportunity for visiting the stables would, no doubt, very shortly occur, and so he controlled his impatience.

It would have seemed strange to have neglected his friend, who seemed so seriously injured, in order to look after the horses, which he was over and over again assured were in perfect safety.

He was compelled to rest content.

The family had not long risen, and when they had been startled by the sudden appearance of our friends, they were sitting down to breakfast.

Sixteen-String Jack acted his part to admiration.

None but a doctor could have told that he was uninjured.

The simple-minded inmates of the farmhouse, however, never for one moment dreamed of calling into question the truth of the tale they had been told, and the muddy state of Jack's vestments was to them super-abundant proof.

They washed the mud from his hands, and bathed his face.

Then the wound he had received was disclosed.

Fortunately this happened to be just such a one as would be produced by a fall from a horse, should the rider chance to fall upon a sharp stone.

This wound was carefully bathed and strapped up by the farmer's wife, while the daughters were busily occupied in cleansing the mud from his apparel.

By the time their attentions were over, Sixteen-String Jack thought fit to show himself a little better, for he was afraid, in their solicitousness for his welfare, that they would send off for a medical man, and he by no means wished to run that risk.

Accordingly, he made an effort as though to rise.

He was immediately assisted, and upon gaining a sitting posture, he declared he was wonderfully better.

A great improvement in his personal appearance was perceptible, and he spoke in a louder and firmer tone of voice than he had previously done.

At this the whole of the inmates of the farmhouse expressed themselves much delighted, and they pressed Claude and Jack to join them in the breakfast, which had been interrupted by their arrival.

The highwaymen did not hesitate to accept this invitation.

Their food for a long time past had been somewhat of the roughest, and they eyed the substantial viands which were placed upon the table with feelings of considerable satisfaction.

In less than a quarter of an hour, then, they had made themselves quite at home, and it was evident the honest farmer and his family were much delighted with their company, which was quite an event in their monotonous existence.

Sixteen-String Jack said, with a smile, that he had been by far more frightened than hurt, and made a capital breakfast.

Nevertheless, although they seemed to all outward appearance to be so thoroughly contented and happy, our friends in reality were not so.

They were a great deal too near the dragoons to be either safe or pleasant, and every now and then, when there happened to be a lull in the cheerful conversation, they listened attentively for any sound that might indicate the approach of their enemies.

But all was still; and as minute after minute passed away they gradually began to believe that they would be left unmolested.

That belief was fallacious, and they were destined to be made aware of it in a very abrupt manner.

During the breakfast Claude thought continually of the horses.

When he alighted and followed Jack into the farmhouse, they had been led off he knew not whither, though he was particularly assured by the farmer that they were all right.

Of this he had little or no doubt.

What he wanted to know was just where they were placed, so as to be able to make his way to them direct, in case any emergency should arise.

He was fidgety and anxious, and made up his mind that, as soon as ever breakfast was over, he would make some excuse to go out and find them.

But at a farm the breakfast is the principal meal, and occupied what seemed to him an intolerable time; but that was caused by his anxiety.

Besides, breakfast had hardly been begun when they arrived.

Still all continued silent, and he breathed more freely.

Whether the dragoons had lost the scent or not was a question they could not answer.

As we have said, not even an acute observer would have for a moment fancied that they were otherwise than light-hearted as they seemed, for not a trace of anxiety was perceptible.

Suddenly, however, Claude started.

Jack started at the self-same moment, as though by sympathy.

Their countenances changed slightly.

Ere they could move or speak, however, there was a hubbub of voices, and the trampling and prancing of horses' feet.

"Tracked," exclaimed Claude Duval, springing to his feet, "and done, I am afraid."

Sixteen-String Jack also sprung to his feet.

But the inmates of the farmhouse took little or no notice either of their movements or words.

The whole of their attention was directed to something that was going on outside the farmhouse, for they had one and all flocked to the door the moment the sounds we have described assailed their ears.

The two highwaymen gave one glance through the window.

That was enough.

Coming rapidly towards the house were the dragoons.

There was fifteen or twenty of them at least.

As Claude had said, they had been tracked.

Truly was the position of our friends most desperate.

"Fly!" exclaimed Sixteen-String Jack, with startling energy. "Fly! it is our only chance."

"Where? where?"

"To the back of the house. Here, this way."

"Our horses?"

"Give up all thoughts of them. I know not where they are. We must escape without them."

"Impossible. We might as well surrender at once."

While speaking these rapid words the reader must not suppose the highwaymen were idle.

They had previously noted a door that appeared to lead to the back of the house.

They darted towards it just as the dragoons reined up at the front door.

They heard them address some question to the farmer.

But what it was they knew not.

In another moment they were through the door.

There were a couple of bolts upon it, and these they shot into their sockets instantly.

They were then in a kind of kitchen which looked into the yard at the rear of the farmhouse.

A door led into the farmyard, and through this they dashed with the utmost precipitation.

"Quick!" cried Jack. "On, Claude, on. Yonder are some buildings; the stables, doubtless. On, I say; we may reach them yet in time. If we can only mount our steeds, all will be well."

Claude saw the buildings to which his comrade alluded and made all speed in that direction.

CHAPTER CCCCXXI.

THE DRAGOONS MAKE A RUSH INTO THE STABLE, AND REACH THE LOFT OVERHEAD ABOUT A MINUTE TOO LATE.

It is wonderful how much can be done under the impulse of some powerful incentive.

Had not our friends been fully conscious that their lives and liberties solely depended upon their exertions, they could not possibly have done what they did.

The time which it took them to reach the door of the stable was infinitesimal.

They thought the buildings must be stables when they first glanced at them, but as they drew nearer they became convinced of it.

The door was standing wide open, and they could see into the interior, which set all doubts at rest.

Just as they reached the door, however, a loud shout fell upon their ears.

They turned round with the rapidity of lightning.

The sight they saw was one that was quite sufficient to extinguish in their breasts the least lingering hope that they would be able to effect their escape on this occasion from their persevering foes.

Coming towards the stables at full speed was the whole of the troop of dragoons.

They learned in a moment from the farmer that two men had arrived a little while before on horseback, and their flight was discovered the moment after.

What were the highwaymen to do now?

There was no longer the faintest possibility of concealing themselves from their foes.

Where, too, where they to go?

It was a natural instinct that caused them, the moment after making this discovery, to turn round and dash with frantic speed into the stable.

It put off their danger for a moment, but nothing more.

To be sure, they slammed the door shut, and fastened it ere the dragoons could arrive, but then how were they to get out of the stable without being captured?

It was quite certain, too, that they could not stand a siege.

A dozen vigorous blows upon the frail door would demolish it.

Both were so breathless with the speed they had made, and by the imminency of the danger with which they were threatened, that they could scarcely command their voices sufficiently to speak to each other.

It would be folly to attempt to saddle their horses.

Before they could get half-way through that operation, even supposing every necessary article was at hand, the dragoons would have the door down, for the first thing they did was to strike some violent blows with the butt-ends of their carbines, which were admirably adapted to such a purpose.

What were they to do?

"The loft!" cried Claude Duval. "The loft! Let us gain that. We may then find some means of leaving this place."

"No use—no use!" gasped Jack. "We had better give in at once."

"Never while I have life!" said Claude Duval, with resolution.

"The door will be down in an instant!"

"This way—this way!" cried Claude. "It is our only chance, and, if we do no more, we shall protract our capture to the last moment, and even that is desirable. Quick! After me! This way!"

Claude hastened across the stable as he spoke, and Sixteen-String Jack followed closely after him.

The inside of the stable was tolerably light, and Claude's quick eye had detected one of those perpendicular ladders fixed up against the wall, by which the loft overhead is generally reached.

Never were those steps so quickly ascended before.

Just, however, as they gained a footing in the loft, there was a terrific crash.

The door had given way, and the dragoons, hastily dismounting, came pouring into the stable, under the conviction that they had only to make one vigorous rush, and then capture their prey.

They had never given the loft a thought, and at first they looked about them in some surprise, unable to account for the disappearance of the highwaymen.

A slight movement, however, attracted their attention to one portion of the stable.

Having reached the floor of the loft, the idea had occurred to Sixteen-String Jack to try whether the ladder was moveable.

To his joy he found it was.

He had now the means of interrupting, to some extent, the progress of the dragoons.

They would not be able to follow them either so easily and quickly as they otherwise would.

It was the movement of this ladder which attracted the attention of the dragoons.

They sprang forward quickly, hoping to be able to seize the ladder and drag it down again, but they were too late.

Sixteen-String Jack flung the ladder down on the floor of the loft, and turned to observe the proceedings of his comrade.

Claude was busily engaged in making a hole in the thatched roof.

"Help me," he cried. "We will get through here as soon as the hole is large enough."

"But what are we to do then?"

"Drop down and run for it. We shall be on the outside of the farmyard, and the dragoons will either have to come our way, or else surmount the high wall which encloses the farmyard."

While speaking, both worked with a good will at the thatch.

It was the easiest matter in the world to make a breach in it, and they were out on the roof of the stable before any of the dragoons could reach the loft.

"Look, Jack!" cried Claude, "here are the open fields, and yonder is a plantation, or wood, or something of that kind. We can drop down, and then we will run for it."

The reader must understand that the stable had a roof, one portion of which inclined towards the farmyard and the other towards the fields at the back.

It was in the last described piece of roof that the highwaymen had made a breach.

Consequently they were out of sight of those dragoons who remained on the watch in the yard.

Claude's suggestion was evidently the best that could be made, and it was immediately acted upon.

Slipping down to the edge of the roof, they held by their hands a moment and then dropped.

The distance was by no means great, and they alighted upon some fine soft turf, so that they felt scarcely a shock.

Directly they reached their feet they started off as fast as they could run across the fields, making direct for the plantation which Claude had spoken of.

It was not more than a quarter of a mile distant.

A cry from their foes let them know that they were seen.

By the exercise of very great gymnastic skill, a dragoon had succeeded in getting up into the loft, and the moment he did so he let the ladder down, which enabled his companions to follow him with all expedition.

They ran, of course, first of all to the breach in the roof, and there they saw the highwaymen running with great swiftness across the meadow.

The cry which reached the ears of Claude and Jack was uttered by the dragoons upon the impulse of the moment upon finding that their prey had got so cleverly out of their reach.

It was a cry compounded of anger, rage, and fear.

Some scrambled through the hole in the roof and rolled down recklessly on to the ground.

The others, giving the alarm to their companions, turned round and descended into the stable again.

With great expedition they remounted their steeds, and then, to their dismay, they found they would have to go round some distance to gain the meadow at the back of the stable, for the wall which we have spoken of as enclosing the farm buildings was several feet too high for them to leap.

It was no good grumbling, however, and the less time they lost, the better, for every moment was of infinite value to the highwaymen.

With the utmost speed they got round in a straggling kind of troop into the meadow at the back of the stable, but by the time they arrived here, they found the highwaymen were just plunging into the plantation.

Towards this they galloped at a tremendous rate, for they were determined not to give up the chase until forced to do so.

Our friends had got a tolerable start, however, and both felt themselves to a certain extent safe when they gained the cover of the wood, which was of great extent.

Here the dragoons would have to follow them on foot, for the trees grew too closely together for the horses to make their way between them, so that they would be upon more equal terms with their foes.

Moreover, they had a chance of getting out of sight of their pursuers, and hiding themselves somewhere.

The reader will, however, concede that the dragoons were remarkably expeditious in their movements.

They had descended from the loft, mounted their horses, rode round till they came to the gate leading out of the yard, and reached the meadow, while Claude and Jack, going at their utmost speed, had only been able to run about a quarter of a mile.

Those dragoons who had so precipitately and inconsiderately got through the hole in the roof quickly gave up their idea of chasing the highwaymen on foot.

The weight of their accoutrements, and being so encumbered with weapons, prevented them from taking two steps, while the highwaymen took three; and those who had ridden round reached the confines of the plantation before them.

The soldiers could not forbear from uttering an oath of vexation when they found the highwaymen had fairly taken shelter beneath the trees.

They knew well enough how much it would diminish their chances of effecting their capture.

Nevertheless their blood was up, and they were too much interested in the hunt to give it up, so they alighted from their horses again, and plunged into the wood.

Nothing, however, of Claude and Jack could they see; nor could they, by listening attentively, hear the least sound of their footsteps.

The case began to look hopeless.

So many ways spread out before them, only one of which could be the right, and how were they to distinguish it from all the rest?

Leaving the dragoons to get out of their difficulties in the best way they may, we will return to Claude and Jack, who were by no means out of danger yet, although they had materially bettered their position.

They had ran as they had never ran before, from the stable to the wood, which appeared to them a haven of safety.

The only thing was, should they be able to reach it time enough?

They scarcely dared to think about this.

So far they had succeeded much better than they could have hoped for.

Sixteen-String Jack was amazed, for he had felt inclined to give up at first, so hopeless did it seem to think of escape.

But by the courage and promptitude with which Claude had acted, they were now much better off.

Their heads spun round and round, however, with the violent exertion they had been compelled to make.

Perspiration streamed from every pore, and they gasped painfully for breath.

Their hearts throbbed, and the veins and arteries in their bodies swelled and threatened to burst.

But, in spite of this exhaustion, they kept on at a speed that was absolutely astounding.

As soon, however, as they got beneath the shelter of the trees, they gave a sigh of deep relief.

Success, however, only prompted them to fresh exertion.

Now was the time to render available the advantage they had been lucky enough to gain.

A glance behind them, before plunging into the wood, showed them the dragoons in the distance, galloping with tremendous speed towards them.

This convinced them that they had, indeed, no time to lose.

Choosing their path at random, for they felt that to them all would be alike, they kept on steadily in one direction.

It was important that they should do this.

In a wood it is easy enough to run round in a circle without being conscious of it.

So they kept steadily on.

The wood was of vast extent, as we have previously remarked.

Strictly speaking, however, it was not a wood, but rather a plantation or preserve.

It was the property of the lord of the manor, and it was one extremity of it which abutted upon the grounds in the occupation of the farmer, who rented all from the lord of the manor before mentioned.

As the highwaymen proceeded, they found the trees grew closer and closer to each other, while its appearance of wildness increased.

Suddenly, however, as they ran staggeringly on, Claude, who was first, caught his foot against the root of a tree, which projected slightly above the ground.

He fell down as though shot, for in his exhausted state it did not need much to take him off his legs.

Jack, who was close behind, saw the accident, but not in time to stop or turn aside, so he fell headlong over his companion.

Thus they lay, breathless, and utterly exhausted, unable to move either hand or foot.

CHAPTER CCCCXXII.

SIXTEEN-STRING JACK AND CLAUDE DUVAL DISCOVER A CAPITAL HIDING-PLACE IN THE WOOD.

CONSCIOUSNESS, however, did not abandon them, although they reached the ground with so much violence.

Although they were deprived of speech and breath, yet they were sensible of what had happened, and knew that the dragoons would quickly be upon them.

This was a terrible thought to have.

Unless they could recover themselves sufficiently to rise and seek some hiding-place, they would have all their trouble for nothing.

Indeed, what they had done with so much toil would only disadvantage them, for now they were not in such a good position to resist their foes as they were at first.

If the dragoons came up now they would make them prisoners without any trouble.

They would be bound unresistingly.

Terrible were the efforts which the worn-out highwaymen made to regain their feet.

All, however, were in vain.

They could do nothing but gasp for breath.

They were not able even to curse their own impotency.

It seemed to them, in the excited and anxious state of mind in which they were, that they laid thus helpless on the turf for a long, long time.

But this was a delusion.

In reality, hardly two minutes elapsed.

At the end of that time, they, with many struggles, rose to their feet.

They listened, but they could hear no sounds which indicated a dangerous proximity to their foes.

When they stood up they felt much better, and every second that now elapsed witnessed an improvement.

"All is well so far, Jack," said Claude Duval. "I have hopes, after all, that we shall be able to make our escape. In the first place we must find a hiding-place of some sort or other. Come, follow me."

"Do not go fast, Claude; there is no occasion for us to increase our distress by making great speed. Keep on gently. We are now, I take it, in the very heart of the wood."

"It seems so, for the trees grow close enough together."

"They do, and this undergrowth would almost serve us as a hiding-place."

"We will endeavour first to find a better, my friend."

While speaking thus, the highwaymen, at a walking pace, penetrated still deeper and deeper into the wood.

At every step the growth of vegetation became denser and denser.

This was a pleasant discovery for them to make, because they were aware of how much it would diminish the chances of their foes being able to perceive them.

Whether the dragoons had started off on some wrong track they knew not.

It seemed strange that they could hear nothing of them.

But our friends were too wary to be lulled into a sense of false security by this silence.

On the contrary, they were the more suspicious and apprehensive, for they believed that it portended some deep-laid scheme on the part of their foes.

The highwaymen, however, had left no visible track behind them.

The dragoons were not well enough skilled in woodcraft to be able to trace them by their footsteps on the grass, or by the twigs which they had broken and displaced in their progress.

It is not to be wondered at, therefore, if they wandered off in a wrong direction.

Claude and Jack, as they got more and more involved in the intricacies of the wood, looked keenly about them on all sides in search of a hiding-place, but nothing of the kind could they discover.

There was the brake, and the gorse, and furze bushes, beneath which they could have easily concealed themselves, but there was too much danger of discovery, for the dragoons would probably make a close search, and beat the underwood in all directions.

At length Claude paused.

"Jack," he said, "there is no good going on like this; we shall travel till we come to the other side of the wood, and then a nice fix we shall be in."

"What do you propose, Claude? Where is there that we can hide ourselves?"

"That is the question. It seems to me that the best thing we can do is to climb up a tree."

Sixteen-String Jack shook his head.

"I am afraid that will not prove a very good or very safe hiding-place."

"Why not? The wood is full of trees, and how are the dragoons to tell in which particular one we take up our quarters? Clearly they have no idea of our immediate whereabouts, and it would be an endless task to search the trees one by one."

"Very true, Claude, it would. I begin to think now that a tree would answer our purpose best."

"It would, you may depend."

"I should have no doubts upon the matter if it were night, but you must not forget it is broad day."

"I know it is, and that is a circumstance in our disfavour. Still, a tree served us once excellently, and I think one will again."

"I hope so. But you must remember that, when we had ourselves in one before, it was at night."

"So it was. But come, since we have decided upon what we are to do, let us look out for a tree that seems best adapted for our purpose."

"We shall not have much trouble in doing that, for we have plenty to select from. Look, yonder seems to be a regular thicket of branches. They grow so thickly together, that you can't see the sky between them."

"That will be the place, then, my friend. Come on. Hark! I am afraid we have dallied too long."

Both listened, and very faintly they could hear the murmuring of voices and the crackling of bushes, as persons forced their way through them.

"We must make haste if we are to hide ourselves."

"Yes, come on. Here we are."

Our friends were very fast recovering from the effects of their tremendous exertions.

They were able to speak to each other freely and easily, and beyond all doubt they would be able to perform the feat of climbing up the tree.

Claude and Jack paused before one, the trunk of which was of extraordinary dimensions.

They selected it because it grew very closely to four or five others, and the branches of the whole overhead united, and formed an impervious mass of branches.

Besides which they were evergreens, and their long dark leaves seemed to afford them every facility for hiding themselves.

From the fact of the trunks of the trees growing so close to each other, the highwaymen were able to climb up with tolerable ease.

The one with the large trunk had many rough inequalities in its bark.

These they grasped, and not without some difficulty, managed to scramble up.

As soon as they could reach to take hold of the branches their progress became easier, and, in less time than it takes to write it, they reached the top of the tree.

Here, however, a surprise awaited them, and it was fortunate for their personal safety that they made the discovery at the moment they did.

The tree with the large trunk was really a natural phenomenon.

Upon reaching a certain height, our friends found that very few branches actually came from it, but its upper portion was completely buried by the leaves and branches of the other trees that grew in such immediate proximity to it.

This trunk was hollow.

The whole of the inner part of the tree had completely decayed away.

Still the circle round it was of no inconsiderable thickness, and it was from this circle that the boughs of this singular tree received their nourishment.

"What do you think of that, Claude?" said Sixteen-String Jack, as he pointed to the hollow in the trunk which we have described.

"It is the most singular place I ever saw."

"What do you think of it for a hiding-place?"

"A hiding-place?"

"Yes."

"Why, I confess I should like the idea of dropping down into it. In the first place there would be the difficulty of getting up again, and then there is the danger that it is the lair of some wild beast or other, for the place seems excellently well adapted to that purpose."

"There's a good deal of sense in what you say; but with regard to the first objection, I don't think we should have much trouble in getting up again if we lower ourselves down."

"Well, perhaps not; but how if some other creature has taken up its quarters here?"

"We can soon ascertain that."

"How?"

"Drop something down. A pistol will do."

Claude took an unloaded pistol from his pocket and dropped it down the hollow of the tree.

They heard it strike against the bottom, but no other sound followed.

From this they came to the conclusion that it was empty.

It was just at this moment they were startled by some sounds, which showed very unequivocally that the dragoons were close at hand.

"Quick, Claude!" said Sixteen-String Jack. "Make up your mind at once, or it will be too late. In another moment the dragoons will be upon us."

"What do you advise?"

"I should say drop down at all risks. I consider the chances are all against the dragoons finding us in such an unlikely hiding-place. We have left no clue by which they can follow us to this place; and while we are hidden in the trunk of this tree, we shall escape a danger to which we should most certainly have been exposed if we had concealed ourselves among the branches."

"What is that?"

"Why, you may depend that the dragoons, if they heard the least stir among the branches of a tree, or if they fancied they could distinguish any dark object among them, they would not scruple to point their carbines at it and fire."

"True."

"To be sure, we might not be hit; and yet again we might one of us receive an ugly wound."

"That decides me. Let us go down into the trunk."

"Hush! Quietly! Make no more noise than you can possibly help. The dragoons are almost within sight. Do not speak again."

This good advice was taken.

Rapidly and yet noiselessly, Claude lowered himself down into the trunk of the tree.

He held by his two hands at his full length, and then, not without a slight feeling of misgiving at his heart, let go.

He reached the bottom in safety, and gave his comrade a whispered assurance to that effect; who, however, immediately cautioned him to be silent as he valued his life.

Sixteen-String Jack now lowered himself into the tree, and, in less than a moment, was standing in safety by the side of his companion.

Owing to the enormous girth of the tree, the inside portion, that was hollow, was large enough to have contained at least four persons to stand within it, though they would have had some trouble to move.

But the two highwaymen had plenty of room to move about.

They kept perfectly still, however, for fear that any movement they might make should reach the ears of their enemies, who were now very close at hand indeed.

The highwaymen would have given anything could they but have seen what was going on outside, but it was perfectly useless to think of such a thing as this, so they were forced to content themselves with stretching their sense of hearing to the utmost extent.

What they heard was far indeed from being encouraging.

On the contrary, it was calculated to produce an opposite effect.

No sooner had they placed their ears against the tree to listen, than they heard a confused Babel of voices, and the trampling of many footsteps.

Then the next sound almost shot through them like a bullet, so suddenly did it come upon them.

That word was "Halt!"

From the manner in which it was spoken our friends could tell that a soldier had pronounced it.

Why should the dragoons halt there, so close to the spot where they were hidden?

Could it be possible that they had been heard or seen?

Their hearts almost ceased to beat as they fancied this, perhaps, was the case; for the place in which they were, though good as a hiding-place, yet was bad in case the dragoons should learn they were there.

The suspense which they endured can therefore be imagined.

The command was instantly obeyed.

The trampling of feet and the murmuring of voices abruptly ceased.

"This is as near the centre of the wood as can be," said a voice, which sounded so close to our friends that they could scarcely forbear a start.

"Very well, then," said another voice, "we will commence at once."

"Shall I order the bugle to be blown?"

"Yes."

The word was given, and then, very much to the surprise of our friends, three clear notes upon a bugle were given.

The pretty musical sounds awakened a thousand echoes in the leafy recesses of the wood.

Scarcely, however, had those echoes died away than the bugle-call was responded to by several others, which seemed to come from a great distance.

Then another bugle-note was blown close to the tree.

This was repeated at brief intervals.

In their uncomfortable position in the tree, our friends heard all this, and wondered what in the world it meant.

CHAPTER CCCCXXIII.

THE OFFICER OF DRAGOONS TAKES SOME VERY EFFICIENT MEASURES TO PREVENT THE ESCAPE OF THE HIGHWAYMEN FROM THE PLANTATION.

In order to account for these inexplicable movements on the part of the dragoons, we must go back to the time when they arrived at the wood just five minutes too late.

The officer in command saw that it would be ridiculous to run through the wood at random after the highwaymen, and so he hastened to summon his men about him.

Then the plan which he adopted and the orders which he issued, were military in the extreme.

He had seen with his own eyes our friends enter the wood, and he resolved to besiege them there, and take such precautions as would effectually prevent them leaving it without his knowledge.

Accordingly he commanded the greater portion of his troop to mount, and to post themselves round the wood in such a manner as to be in sight of each other.

Then he (the commanding officer), with a few of his men, would make his way to as near the centre of the wood as he could get.

As soon as he arrived here, one should blow three loud blasts upon a bugle to announce the fact.

These sounds the others were to reply to, and then enter the wood, taking care to leave no bush unexamined in their progress.

All were to make their way towards the centre where he was standing; and, in order that they should have no difficulty in knowing where the centre was, the bugleman should blow a note upon his instrument at frequent intervals, which sound would form a capital guide to them.

This, then, was the explanation of the strange sound which the highwaymen had heard, and, as the reader will readily believe, they puzzled their brains in vain to account for it.

It was not likely that they would be able to arrive by speculation merely at the real state of affairs.

The commanding officer and the few men who were with him, all unconsciously followed almost in the very steps of the highwaymen.

They kept a sharp look-out on their way, but they were not keen-sighted enough to see anything that was calculated to excite their suspicions.

At length they reached the very tree in which the highwaymen had concealed themselves; and, judging themselves, to be in the centre of the wood, the blasts had been blown upon the bugle in the manner we have related.

The answering notes were given, and the dragoons, who had formed a circle round the wood, set themselves in motion, each one directing his steps towards the centre of the wood.

On their way they beat all the bushes with their carbines, and peered narrowly among the naked branches of the trees, but, of course, without being able to see anything, though several random and useless shots were fired.

At first the dragoons, who formed a circle round the wood, were at some considerable distance from each other, but, as they drew nearer to the centre, the circle became diminished in circumference, and they got yet closer to each other, until they were able to touch, and, finally, they were compelled to form a circle two deep.

It was a good idea to endeavour to drive the highwaymen into the centre of the wood, for they could not have broken through the ring; and had they not sought shelter as they did, or had they concealed themselves among the bushes, as they at first thought of doing, they would inevitably have been discovered.

As it was, the soldiers had all their trouble for nothing, and their officer's very clever scheme produced no results.

Ere long the centre was reached.

The men advanced to their officer in an unbroken circle, but they drove no highwaymen before them

Upon seeing this, the officer in command uttered a curse of vexation, for he made sure that this excellent scheme would answer the purpose he had in view.

But it did not.

"What is to be done now?" asked the one second in command.

"It is quite certain they are in the wood?"

"Quite, sir."

"They have hidden themselves, then?"

"I am afraid that is it."

"What are we to do then?"

"Well, the men have tramped through pretty well every square foot of the plantation without finding them, and one might just as well look for a needle in a bottle of hay as try to find them!"

"I am afraid so. But look you, I will not give up this adventure until I have captured or slain them. I am determined not to have all this trouble for nothing. My blood is up, and let them beware!"

"What do you propose, sir?"

"Let me think a moment, and you, Locksley, try if you can suggest something that you think likely to answer our purpose."

As the speakers were within a yard of the hollow tree in which the highwaymen stood, of course they overheard every word; and, with an impatience which perhaps may be conceived, they waited to hear what was further said.

A silence of some few minutes' duration ensued, and then the officer said—

"Have you thought of anything, Locksley?"

"Yes, I have thought of one scheme, sir."

"What is it? Let me hear it at once."

"I propose, then, that the men should be stationed round the wood at a short distance from each other, and ordered to keep close watch, and to give an immediate alarm if anything of an unusual character took place."

"That is just what I had thought of, Locksley," said the chief officer.

Locksley bowed.

It was generally in this manner that his superior availed himself of his suggestions.

"Then you think that is the best thing that can be done, sir?" said Locksley.

"I do."

"So do I. These villains are hidden somewhere in the wood, and no doubt, while it is daylight, will keep close enough; but as soon as night comes they will try to steal off."

"Then, Locksley, I will place such a guard round this plantation that not even a hare could leave it without my knowledge."

"You cannot do better, sir."

The officer now called his men together, and marched them off to the outskirts of the plantation, where he saw to their being posted himself.

He also took the trouble to particularly impress their duty upon them one by one.

He had not so many men under his control as he could have wished for this service.

He would have preferred to have had them much closer to each other.

This was impossible, and he was obliged to do the best he could.

The men would have to be a little extra vigilant, that was all; and he took care to impress upon them that it would answer their purpose to be so, since there would be all the fewer to divide the reward among.

The men promised to be more attentive, and with this assurance the officer had to remain content.

Let us now return to Claude Duval and Sixteen-String Jack in their perilous and uncomfortable position in the tree.

They heard the conversation between Locksley and the officer with a feeling akin to dismay.

They did not venture to speak or move, however, until some time after all the dragoons had left the spot, and then, in a low and anxious tone of voice, Sixteen-String Jack addressed his companion.

"Claude—Claude!" he said. "Can you hear me?"

"Yes—yes."

"Speak low, for fear we should be overheard. What do you think now?"

"I think we have escaped one great danger."

"Yes, unquestionably we have; but then we are threatened with one of equal magnitude."

"I fear so."

"I am certain. If we wait here till night, I am afraid shall be discovered if we attempt to leave."

823
V71k
v. 2

[DICK TURPIN AND TOM KING AWAIT THE ARRIVAL OF CLAUDE DUVAL AND SIXTEEN-STRING JACK.]

We must wait till night comes. It is some hours off yet."

"I know that."

"We cannot do better, then, in my judgment, than occupy ourselves with considering what stratagem we can adopt to elude the vigilance of the soldiers."

"But, Claude, do you forget we have lost our horses?"

"Certainly not."

"Do you bear in mind that the dragoons are mounted, and that, if we attempt to fly from them on foot, we shall be overtaken easily?"

"I know all about that, my friend, and you must not be cast down by these numerous dangers. We shall get out of them if we will only keep up our courage. Think what we have already done.

"Our escape so far is little short of miraculous, I grant."

"Pho! pho! It was brought about entirely by promptitude of action and presence of mind."

"Well, well, Claude, whatever credit there is must certainly belong to you, and I grant it to you readily enough. But what chances are there that we shall be able to keep our appointment with Dick Turpin and Tom King?"

"There are obstacles in the way of it, I confess; but then the hour fixed for the meeting is a good way off yet, and we shall have in the meanwhile to surmount the obstacles which obstruct our path."

Jack laughed.

"You take the matter very coolly, Claude!"

"I do; because, having been successful so far, I cannot help thinking we shall be able to get out of the difficulty."

"I hope we shall."

"These dragoons are but thick-headed fellows at the best of times, and so soddened with discipline that they would scarcely do anything without an officer was behind them to give the order. I grant, then, that they would obey quickly enough."

"But Claude, seriously; what do you think of doing?"

"It is certain we must remain here until night, or rather until it is quite dark. I should then recommend that we get out of this tree and creep towards the outskirts of the plantation as stealthily as ever we are able, and watch the opportunity to get off."

"What then?"

"We must steal away unperceived."

"Difficult."

"It will depend, in a great measure, upon the amount of vigilance the sentinels make use of and the darkness of the night. Now, if it should happen to be bright moonlight, it would be difficult, I grant you."

"There is no fear of that, then. The moon is in her last quarter, and does not rise until just before daybreak."

"That is all right, then."

"What about our horses?"

"I am afraid we must abandon them."

"But if we are pursued, what chance shall we have of escaping while on foot?"

"We must do the best we can. You may depend our horses are taken great care of, and if we were to go near with the intention of regaining possession of them we shall be nabbed to a certainty."

"We must give up that idea, then. I am reluctant, I confess."

"So am I, for they are a couple of serviceable, valuable animals. Luckily, however, through stopping the farmer last night, we have got enough to purchase two more, of quite as good quality."

"I suppose that is what we shall have to do."

"Wait till night comes, and we get free from the wood, we shall then be better able to see what we shall do."

"I am afraid, Claude, by the way you speak, that you under-estimate our danger."

"I don't think I do, but I should prefer that to over-estimating it."

"I suppose you mean that for me?"

"No, not particularly so; but I shall think it very strange if we are not able to get the better of these dunder-headed dragoons."

"You force me to smile."

"So much the better, then. It was very kind of the dragoons to allow us to remain at the farmhouse long enough to make such a good meal as we did. It will enable us to go some hours without food without feeling much inconvenience."

"You are right enough, there."

"Come, Jack, if we talk to each other, the time that we are doomed to spend here will pass away all the more quickly and more pleasantly than if we remain silent."

"I am philosopher enough to know that."

"Prove it, then, by acting so. I fancy you are too much cast down by our danger. It is great, I confess, but not so great as that which we have passed through unhurt, and I am in hopes that all will yet be well."

CHAPTER CCCCXXIV.

THE TWO HIGHWAYMEN ARE DETECTED IN THEIR ATTEMPT TO LEAVE THE WOOD.

In this manner, then, did the two highwaymen endeavour to wile away the time between then and nightfall.

But, in spite of all their efforts, it seemed a long and weary time.

They were cramped and tired with remaining so long in one position.

To be sure, they rested themselves as well as they could, by planting their heels firmly in the ground and leaning their backs against the tree, but that was irksome and tiresome.

During all the hours which elapsed they heard nothing whatever of the dragoons, so they came to the conclusion that they were all posted on the outskirts of the plantation.

Such was the case.

The men were scarcely less tired than our friends.

At first they were uncommonly sharp, and looked keenly about them whenever they heard the least sound, but they soon got off this when they found each time that the alarm was a groundless one.

Sounds, which at first would have attracted their utmost attention, were now allowed to pass by unheeded.

If this state of things continued, it would afford the highwaymen an additional chance of escape.

But, as all things must have an end, so had this day, which certainly seemed to Claude and Jack to be the longest one they had ever spent in their lives.

To their relief, however, darkness began gradually to steal over the face of nature.

Still they stirred not.

They calculated correctly that the dragoons would be roused into fresh attention by the approach of night.

Clearly, then, it would be best to wait until this feeling had time enough to wear off.

It was well they did so.

Soon after sunset the commanding officer went round and visited the sentinels.

He stopped before each one, and expressly bade them to be vigilant, for night having come the highwaymen would be almost certain to attempt to get off.

That they were in the wood he was certain; had they left it he must have been made aware of the circumstance, therefore he told the men that it depended solely upon the quickness of their eyesight whether they received the reward.

This had the effect of sharpening the soldiers up again a little.

It grew darker and darker, until at length night fairly came.

Still they heard nothing of the highwaymen.

No unusual sound broke the silence of the night, and they fast began to relapse into their old state of restlessness.

That Claude and Jack were heartily glad when night did come, the reader need scarcely be told.

Still they did not offer to move for a long, long time; until, indeed, they fancied the vigilance of the dragoons had again relaxed.

At length, however, they deemed it time to make a move.

As had at first been feared, they found it rather a difficult task to get out of the hollow tree, for the inner surface was just as smooth as the outer was rough.

Had there been only one person, escape would have been impossible without the assistance of some one, but as it was, Sixteen-String Jack got upon Claude's shoulders, steadying himself by the sides of the tree.

When here he found he could reach the top easily enough, and in a moment drew himself up.

Then leaning down he took hold of Claude's hands, who, by this assistance, was enabled to reach the top in safety also.

Here they paused for a moment to listen.

But all was still, and they ventured to descend.

In order to make all quite clear, it may be as well to state that this night was the one upon which Tom King had his terrible adventure on the road.

Having reached the foot of the tree, the highwaymen looked up at the sky.

The stars were twinkling overhead; and, after gazing a a moment, they perceived the pole-star.

This was enough to indicate the route they wished to take.

Their course was westward, and that was the direction which they took.

At every few steps, as they made their way through the wood, they paused to listen; and when they had assured themselves that all was well, they went once again.

It so happened, that by going in a westerly direction, as they did, they took the longest way out of the wood, which stretched out in that direction until it terminated in a point.

After some time the thinness of the vegetation, and the increased distance which appeared between the trees, warned our friends that the outskirts of the plantation were close at hand.

It behoved them now to be doubly cautious.

Their only hope of escape, and, under the circumstances, it was a very frail one, was that they should depart instantly out of the wood, unseen by any of the dragoons.

This was difficult; but, if they were once seen, their capture would be certain, for the dragoons being mounted, would overtake them in a moment, let them run as fast as they could.

Finding how near they had got to the outskirts of the wood, the highwaymen redoubled their care, and crept through the bushes with a silentness that would have done credit to a red Indian.

Lying down at full length upon the ground they crawled along like snakes.

Suddenly Sixteen-String Jack paused, and placed his hand upon Claude's arm.

He stopped immediately.

Jack pointed forwards.

Claude followed the direction of his finger.

He then found that the outer limit of the wood had been reached.

Another yard and they would be out of its shelter.

Eagerly they looked out into the darkness.

But though they strained their eyes to the utmost they could see nothing of the sentries.

Before them there seemed to be a long, flat, open space, and beyond in the distance they could perceive a number of twinkling lights.

From what they proceeded, or what they meant, our friends were equally ignorant.

They gazed at them for a few moments, for, of course, their curiosity was excited when they saw anything that they could not understand.

But gazing did not dissipate their ignorance in the least.

The one part of it seemed as though the lights proceeded from a mansion, every window of which was illuminated; but there were numerous other twinkling lights, besides these stretching in every direction, and at various irregular distances from this ground, and from each other.

The more our friends gazed at this the more they were puzzled.

Jack was about to make some remark in reference to it, when Claude abruptly checked him.

He was silent, and then there came upon his ears the faint sound of a horse's hoofs.

This was the sound which Claude's ears had caught.

The horse was coming at a walking pace.

Doubtless it was one of the sentinels.

Eagerly our friends gazed in the direction from which the sounds came.

At length they perceived, though dimly and indistinctly, the figures of a horse and rider.

Upon the latter there was some glittering object, which caught the rays of light and reflected them.

It was a dragoon, and, in accordance with his instructions, he was pacing up and down that portion of ground which had been allotted him.

The highwaymen never took their eyes off him for a moment.

Steadily he advanced, and presently arrived opposite to them.

He did not pause, but still continued on his way.

By degrees he faded from their sight, and then, in the faintest possible whisper, Claude Duval ventured to address his companion.

"Now, Jack," he said, "we have a chance to speak. What are we to do?"

"That is a sentinel."

"I know it."

"We must find out how long it takes him to go up and down his beat, and ascertain by the time when he is furthest from us. That will be the moment for us to creep out as we now are; for if we keep close to the ground, and make no noise, I will defy them to perceive us."

"Good. Listen!"

They did so, but the sound of the horse's feet died quite away, nor did they hear it again for some little time.

This was at once a proof that the soldier had rather a long distance to go.

It would now be necessary, before they moved, to ascertain when the sentinel was furthest away from the spot where they lay.

This the highwaymen ascertained by counting the time it took him to go from one end of the beat to the other, and then halving it.

They counted one hundred and thirty from the time he passed them till he returned again, so it followed that when they had counted sixty-five, he would be just about to turn round, and, consequently, at the greatest distance from them.

That would be the opportunity.

The sentinel passed them again, and once more they began to count as nearly as possible at the same rate as before.

When they had reached up to fifty they began to move.

Like two snakes they crept forward.

Their hearts beat painfully as they got out into the open space.

But though they listened with the utmost intentness they could hear no sound.

The least precipitation would ruin all, and so they did not quicken their pace, but continued to crawl on in the same slow and stealthy manner.

Soon they heard the sentinel returning, but they had the presence of mind not to allow it to cause them to hasten and so betray their whereabouts.

Although their progress was so slow, still every moment seemed to take them further and further from the wood.

They were thus congratulating themselves, when their hands came in contact with something that seemed like wire or strong twine.

It was stretched tightly, about six inches above the ground, and their hands struck against it as they crawled onwards.

Ere they could think what it was a tremendous report ensued, which was immediately followed by another.

Then two fierce blue-lights sprung up which illuminated all around for a considerable distance.

Our friends started, bewildered, to their feet.

Then bugles were blown, and the trampling of horses' feet followed.

They were discovered.

They had fallen into some snare which the cunning dragoons had laid for them.

What kind of snare it was they did not pause to think.

At that instant the bare knowledge was sufficient.

Their first thought was to run for their lives, and they set forward at a speed which was absolutely wonderful.

Upon their fleetness their safety would depend.

For a moment we must pause in order to explain to the reader by what means their discovery had been brought about.

The dragoon, Locksley, who acted as a kind of lieutenant to the officer in command of the troop, was a man most fertile in expedients.

He had set his heart upon the capture of the highwaymen, and he resolved to leave no means untried to bring about that desirable event.

Accordingly, when the men had been posted round the plantation, he began to tax his brain for some other scheme by which he could make sure of them not leaving the wood undetected.

Several plans suggested themselves to him, and at length he hit upon one which he thought would exactly answer his purpose.

The scheme was really a good one, and as soon as it was proposed to the commanding officer it was adopted and acted upon.

It was this.

A quantity of twine was procured and cut into certain lengths.

The ends of each of these pieces of twine were tied round the triggers of two loaded carbines.

Then these were planted in such a manner that the string from them was stretched tightly across the ground, so that the least pressure upon it would draw the well-oiled triggers and cause the carbines to explode.

But this was not all.

Close to each carbine a heap of inflammable matter was placed, in such a manner that the discharge of the firearm would set light to it.

This was so arranged as to light up the surrounding scene and enable them to see the highwaymen.

The reader will admit that this was a capital scheme.

Locksley thought our friends would catch their feet against the string as they were walking onwards, which would inevitably produce the discharge.

But the highwaymen touched it with their hands, and the same result ensued.

The wood was surrounded in this manner, so that unless the highwaymen were aware of what they were about, it would be utterly impossible for them to get away unseen.

The bugles were blown as a signal to the sentinels that it was no longer needful for them to watch.

And the bright light which was burning served them as a beacon, and enabled them to make their way to the right spot without delay.

CHAPTER CCCCXXV.

SIXTEEN-STRING JACK AND CLAUDE DUVAL STRUGGLE DESPERATELY AGAINST THEIR FATE.

Such, then, is the explanation of what occurred, and it will be seen that our friends were now more menaced with danger than they had been hitherto.

Those dragoons who were nearest to them at once caught sight of their flying forms, as they were brought into view by the bright light, and a pursuit at once commenced.

The highwaymen were in a state of mind that fairly baffles all description.

Still they were sufficiently master of their thoughts to know that what they had to do was to run as fast as their legs would carry them.

But they could hear the dragoons come thundering in the rear, and how were they to out-distance horses?

They kept on in a straight line.

Just before them were the twinkling lights.

As they looked they saw that their first conjecture was correct.

There was a mansion there, every window of which was lighted up with extraordinary brilliancy, as though some unusual merriment was going on within.

But the other lights remained a mystery, until, upon a nearer approach, our friends found that they were tiny lamps suspended to the branches of some trees, with which the mansion was partly surrounded.

The strains of music, too, came upon their ears, telling that some scene of great rejoicing was going on.

Seeing this, a fresh thought sprung up in the minds of the highwaymen.

In this place, where many persons were assembled, they would, doubtless, be able to conceal themselves.

It was their only chance.

Before them was a low wall, and over this they leaped with reckless agility.

They were now within the grounds of the mansion.

Heedless of the obstacles which stood in their way, our friends flew rapidly onwards, past the house, and to the other side of the grounds, where all the trees were also illuminated.

The mansion was the property of the lord of the manor, and it was a lucky thing our friends sought shelter where they did.

The dragoons saw them leap the wall, but did not follow them.

The officer had too much respect for the occupants of the mansion to disturb their merrymaking by an intrusion with his soldiers.

There was a ball there in honour of the marriage of the lord of the manor's only son, and some of the highest and noblest were present at it.

The dragoons were therefore bidden to keep a sharp look-out, while the officer, attended by one or two, dismounted and got over the wall.

They hoped, by this course, to either capture the highwaymen or drive them away from the place where they had sought refuge; and if they succeeded in doing the latter, the dragoons who were stationed outside would seize them.

On went Claude and Sixteen-String Jack, aware only of one circumstance, and that was that they had got a start of their foes.

Suddenly, however, as they ran along a path, they heard voices and approaching footsteps.

They paused instantly.

Discovery seemed imminent.

There could be no doubt some one was approaching them.

They had no resource but to turn back, for on each side the path was bounded by a thick-set hedge, through which it would have been impossible to force a way.

Accordingly they turned back.

They recollected that a moment before they had passed what looked like a summer-house.

Perhaps this would afford them a momentary shelter while the persons who were coming passed by.

They were the more inclined to do this, because they were so terribly exhausted by the speed they had made.

Into the little summer-house then, for such it was, they darted, and shut the door behind them.

A small lamp hung from the dome-like ceiling, and by the aid of this they could see about them.

There was a little round table in the centre, formed curiously of the trunk of a large tree.

There were quaint, old-fashioned seats, too, in the place.

But they glanced around them anxiously, eager to find some place of concealment which would serve to prevent them from being seen should any one chance to enter.

There was but one place that offered the least chance of safety, and that was so slight a one that they hesitated to make use of it.

But as there was no other, and as they could hear footsteps coming nearer and nearer, they were driven to make use of it.

Across one of the corners in the summer-house was a wooden screen, such as may be seen in many houses at the present day.

It formed a seat somewhat like a bench, and was furnished with a tall back, which served the double purpose of a rest for the back and a shield from currents of cold air.

As this screen was placed across the corner, there was, of course, a space behind it which was quite large enough to conceal our friends.

They pointed it out to each other, and then, as we have said, were driven by the exigency of the moment to seek shelter there.

Quickly, then, they scrambled over the back and let themselves down behind it, where, at any rate, they were out of sight.

They were only just in time.

Scarcely had they settled themselves, than the door of the summer-house was opened.

The murmur of voices fell upon the ears of the highwaymen.

They listened eagerly and intently, for they felt that all that occurred concerned them.

"Come this way, dearest," they heard a voice say in tender accents. "Let us enter here and sit down awhile. It will be a relief both to you and to me to escape from the giddy throng which have to-night assembled here."

It was a man's voice who spoke these words in that tone which a true lover ever adopts.

The highwaymen could also tell by the sound of his voice that he was a young man.

He was replied to by a faint whisper—so faint that our friends could only guess its purport.

The rustling of a dress followed, and then both seated themselves upon the very screen behind which Claude and Jack had hidden themselves.

A cold perspiration broke out upon the brows of both.

They were now prisoners, inasmuch as they could not move without discovery, and they might remain so for an infinite period of time; for how could they tell how long the lovers—for such they were—would remain seated in the arbour?

Discovery and capture were now most imminent.

Their hiding-place was too flimsy and artificial to answer their purpose.

In a moment or two the dragoons would arrive.

They would search the summer-house as a matter of course, and it would follow as a natural consequence that they would be found.

Indeed, in all probability, the space behind the screen would be the first place where they would look.

Yet there they were.

To move or to remain would both be fatal.

They could not leave without being seen by the people.

An alarm would be the result.

The dragoons would be upon the right track, and then there would be an end.

Feeling convinced that they could not possibly better their position by moving, they resolved to remain quite passive, allowing events to take their own course, and trusting wholly to their luck.

Both repented now that they had entered the summer-house at all, but that regret was perfectly useless now.

The words of the young people fell upon their ears, but still they listened to them.

Indeed, they found it impossible not to do so.

Indeed, as minute after minute glided by, and they heard nothing of the dragoons, our friends felt their hopes revive a little.

"Do you not feel more at ease here, dear Minnie?" said the young man to his companion, his voice sunk almost to a whisper. "Do you not feel more at ease here, in the silence and solitude of this place, than in the apartments of your father's mansion, among those who have met there to-night?"

There was a faint sigh, and then the young girl who had been called Minnie, said—

"Yes, Ernest."

"You sigh, dearest, in a way that seems to deny what you have said. No, no; you cannot mean that?"

"I do not, Ernest. You wrong me if you entertain such a thought; but when you mentioned my father"——

"Alas! alas!"

"I could echo your words. Oh! Ernest, although you are with me, I feel very, very wretched."

"No, no. Do not say that, Minnie dear; pray do not. I know why you are wretched. It is because you fear that"——

"I fear that my father will discover all, and then his anger will, indeed, be terrible. Oh! Ernest, I think we had better leave this place for fear we should be found here together."

"That is a groundless apprehension, dear one; I am sure it is. As you know full well, this summer-house is situated in the most retired spot in all the grounds, and is rarely visited by anyone. Then the guests are all within the house, and it is thought that you are in your chamber, suffering from sudden indisposition."

"I know all that, Ernest, but yet I cannot help feeling terrified. My heart is weighed down with a presentiment that something terrible is about to happen."

"Dismiss your fears, my dear one; you have, indeed, nothing to apprehend."

"Perhaps not, Ernest; but do you know when you met me on the staircase I was sick at heart. I had retired from the banquet, for I could not bear to contemplate my brother's happiness and think on my own misery."

"Oh! dearest"——

"I was forced to return, Ernest, and then you met me. I saw my father smile upon my brother Edgar and his new-made bride, and then I thought of you, Ernest; and —and—I knew he would never smile on us as he did on them."

A gush of tears choked further speech, and the young man strove earnestly to alleviate her anguish and cheer her spirits.

The two highwaymen were deeply touched and very much interested by what they had heard.

Fragmentary and incomplete as the story was, they were nevertheless able to fill up the missing links in the chain without difficulty.

The plaintive tone in which the young girl, Minnie, had spoken went straight to their hearts, and so deeply were they engrossed with her distress, that they to a great extent forgot their own danger.

Gradually Minnie—for by this sweet name we may as well in future call her—grew calmer as her lover continued to pour his arguments into her ear.

Her sobs ceased, and tears no longer came from her eyes.

"Be of good heart," said Ernest; "be of good heart. Let us hope that ere long things will wear a brighter aspect."

"What hope is there that such will be the case?" asked Minnie. "I tremble when I think of the anger of my father, should he by any unlucky chance discover our attachment."

"Do not anticipate evil," said her companion. It will be bad enough when it really comes."

"I know that, Ernest; but I feel so low-spirited to-night. I am sure something dreadful is going to happen."

"You think too much about your brother."

"I do think of him, and I cannot help it. Alas! his choice is approved by my father. Oh! how very, very happy he must be."

"Think not of him, dear one. Would, indeed, that your father approved of your choice! Let us hope that ere long he will do so."

Minnie shook her head.

"I am afraid that is hopeless, Ernest. But let us go now. We must part. If we were discovered here together"——

"There is little fear of that, dear one; but since you wish to leave, I will not detain you against your inclination. You are unwell; you are suffering from nervousness. I will go with you towards the house as far as I dare, and then you must retire. In the morning you will be better."

"Yes. Let us go now," said Minnie. "Let us go."

"One moment, dearest. Let us say farewell here while we are alone, for fear we should not be afforded another opportunity."

A silence followed, which was broken only by the sound of kisses, which were distinctly audible to our friends.

But hark!

The silence is broken in upon by another sound.

The lovers start to their feet with faces blanched with terror.

Claude Duval and Sixteen-String Jack draw in their breaths, and prepare themselves for the worst.

The sound grows louder and more unequivocal, until at length no doubt can be entertained of its character.

It was the measured tramp, tramp, tramp, of heavy footsteps.

CHAPTER CCCXXVI.

DICK TURPIN AND MAUD HAVE AN EXPLANATION WITH EACH OTHER.

IMMINENT and critical as the position of Claude Duval and Sixteen-String Jack now is, we are compelled to break off for a brief space and return to the doings of the chief characters in our narrative, and, having brought their adventures up to a proper point, we shall be able to revert to the summer-house, and describe the strange occurrences that there took place on that most eventful evening.

It is to the ruined mansion in which Dick Turpin and Tom King and Maud have for a time been taking up their abode, that we wish to direct the attention of the reader.

It is the day preceding the night upon which the meeting on the Finchley-road was appointed to take place, though it does not seem at present that Claude and Jack stand much chance of keeping it.

The abundant supply of firewood which Dick Turpin and Tom King had obtained by breaking up the door was a great comfort, and, by throwing small pieces on the fire, they were able to keep it replenished without causing much smoke, the escape of which from any of the old chimneys would at once betray their presence there.

They were not short of food, for both Turpin and King had carried away as many eatables as they conveniently could from the "Mountain Rill" inn, and of a small portion of this they now partook.

They resolved to be sparing, for they had not enough to last them very long, and there might be a good deal of trouble about procuring a second supply.

When this scanty meal was over, Tom King rose and announced his intention of going to look after the horses, as he was sure they required attention.

"Be cautious, Tom," said Turpin. "If you are seen it will be all over with us."

"Never fear, Dick. I will be careful. I shall not be long away."

Tom King left the room for a double purpose.

It was necessary that he should pay a visit to the horses, but he wished to leave Maud and Turpin alone, for he knew that some explanation would have to take place between them.

Dick understood him, and, almost as soon as the door closed, he said—

"Come, Maud, dearest! what do you think of this old mansion?"

"It is a gloomy, dispiriting old place; but I doubt not that it will afford us a safe shelter."

"I have every hope that it will do so. It depends chiefly upon ourselves. It is not my intention to remain here long, however. I think I shall be able to find a more comfortable abode."

"But would it be as safe?"

"Quite. Indeed I may say safer."

"Safer?

"Yes; but before we talk further upon this subject we must have Claude and Jack with us."

"It is to-night that you have appointed to meet them is it not?"

"Yes, dearest; and that brings me to the point which I wished to reach."

"Indeed!"

"Yes, you were present when the appointment was made and agreed to, and, therefore, I need not repeat anything about it."

"No, you need not. It is on the Finchley road?"

"Yes; and Claude and Jack will be there some time between midnight and daybreak."

"Just so. Well, Maud, of course we shall set out shortly before midnight. The distance we have to go is really insignificant."

"And me?"

"That is it, Maud. You are fatigued. We are about to visit a wild and dismal spot, and there may be danger. I want you, then, if you think your heart is bold enough, to remain here until we return."

"No, no; do not ask me that, pray do not."

"Come, Maud, be firm; this is foolish of you."

"Oh! do not say that. The idea of remaining here alone fills me with nameless terror."

"What have you to apprehend, dear one?"

"I—I know not."

"There is nothing to apprehend. Our absence will not be for any lengthy period, and when we return all will be well."

Maud wept.

Dick was much distressed to see these tears, but he did not know how he was to check their flow.

He sat hesitating and silent for a moment, during which Maud recovered her composure more easily than she would have done had he addressed her.

"This is weak and foolish of me," she said at length, placing her hand upon his shoulder as she spoke. "It is very foolish of me; but I cannot help it."

I know you cannot, dear one, and yet I hope you will strive to overget these idle and useless fears."

"I shall do so, never fear. I feel that it is foolish of me to think that I shall be able to accompany you everywhere you go; but you must not wonder at me, for hitherto we have never been separated."

"We have not," said Dick, as he drew her closer to him.

"We have not, and nothing save necessity shall ever part us; but on the present occasion I feel that it will be better and more prudent for you to remain here while we go to meet our two comrades. When they have joined us, then we shall be better able to arrange what is to be done in future."

"We shall. I am firm now, and I will forget my fears. But when you go, promise, oh! promise me that you will not be long away."

"I will not be a moment longer than I can help, believe me I will not."

"Every moment will seem an hour until your return."

"I know it will, for this is a dreary, wretched place, and whatever may be its advantages in some respects, I shall abandon it as soon as I can find some other place of refuge."

"Do not let me be the means of taking you into any additional danger."

"I will be careful, you may depend. And now, Maud, are you quite certain that you will not be afraid to remain?"

"No, I will not be afraid."

"That is a brave girl! We may have to run for it, and then we should be able to adopt a dozen expedients to get clear of our enemies, not one of which we should be able to put into practice if you were with us."

"No doubt, no doubt, and that alone would be quite sufficient to reconcile me to remaining here alone."

"That is a proper view to take of the case, dear one, and I am glad that you are able to look at matters in so sensible a light."

"Hush!"

"What is it?"

"I hear something."

"It is Tom King, doubtless."

"True, here he is."

At this moment Tom re-entered the apartment, taking care, before he did so, to fumble with the lock for a moment, in order not to take his companions at unawares.

"Is all right?" asked Turpin, as soon as he came in.

"Yes, Dick, all is well below. The horses seem to relish the grass, and I have given them some more of it, though I would fain have some more substantial food for the poor beasts."

"So would I. But we must see what can be done. I propose, when Claude and Jack arrive, that we hold a general council, and agree upon our future proceedings."

"It is a wise and necessary precaution to take. I have been thinking of it myself."

"It is highly necessary."

"And will you permit me to have a voice in the matter?" asked Maud, with a smile.

"Certainly," answered her husband, "we shall be very glad to listen to anything you may have to propose."

"I shall have something to propose then."

"I promise you it shall have attention."

"And I, too," said Tom King. "But, captain!"

"What, my friend?"

"You remember our little appointment?"

"Yes. I have spoken to Maud about it, and she has agreed to remain here while we go and meet Claude and Sixteen-String Jack."

"That is all right, then. It takes a load off my heart."

"Does it indeed?"

"Yes. I was afraid Maud would insist upon accompanying you, and I felt that would be running too much risk."

"Well, that apprehension is removed, then. It is a terrible place to leave her in alone. I feel that; but still she has bravely promised to remain here until we return."

"All will be well then."

With this the conversation dropped.

It was growing dusk, and as the evening came on with rapid strides, Maud grew low-spirited at the prospect of the parting.

Still, with a noble fortitude, she concealed as well as she could the real state of her feelings.

Dick noticed it, but he judged it best to say nothing in allusion to the topic.

Very wisely he talked busily and volubly respecting other matters in the hope of being successful in distracting her attention.

Still she became more and more downcast as the hour of parting approached.

Tom King busied himself in piling up a quantity of firewood close within reach of her hand, so that she could replenish the fire without much trouble.

The different things they had brought from the "Mountain Rill" were placed upon the table, and everything done to make her as comfortable as possible.

Tears now and then started to her eyes, but by an effort she restrained them.

There was a sickening and dismal foreboding about her heart that something was about to happen, and strive as she would she could not banish it.

At length the time arrived when it was necessary for them to start in order to be at the appointed spot at the proper hour.

Maud now fairly gave way, and Dick had much difficulty in soothing and composing her.

At length he placed her in the old-fashioned chair before the fire, and, kissing her, followed his comrade from the room.

For a moment Maud was too much overcome to move, but then, suddenly starting to her feet, she bounded to the top of the staircase.

Her first impulse had been to descend, but now she paused.

She felt that it could do no good; and a cold shiver swept over her.

She grasped the massive balustrades tightly in her hands, and by this means prevented herself from falling.

Recovering herself somewhat, she looked down.

As we have already said, the staircase was so constructed that when you looked over the balustrades you could see down out to the paved flooring of the hall below.

It was an anxious glance which Maud now cast down, and then she caught sight of the shadows of Turpin and Tom King as they slowly descended the stairs.

She watched them until she could see them no longer, and then she listened for their footsteps.

The faint sound which they made in crossing the hall distinctly reached her ears.

Then a door was closed, and after that all was silent.

The closing of that door seemed to knock against Maud's very heart, and for a moment or two she was incapable of motion.

Oh! what a dread and awful stillness was that which now surrounded her.

It made her blood turn cold and her heart cease to beat.

Truly did she now seem to be alone.

The feeling was a terrible one.

Alone!

Alone at the midnight hour, in that strange, deserted mansion, the very atmosphere in which seemed laden with mystery.

Oh! it was a time for all those superstitious fancies, which have a lurking-place at the bottom of every human heart, to rise up into being.

The silence was as of the grave, and she stood there in the darkness of the grave, too, for the only light there was proceeded from the fire, and this now only dully smouldered.

Maud gasped for breath, and for a moment she felt as though she was about to faint.

Doubtless she would have lapsed into insensibility had not a fresh thought occurred to her, and this was of a nature to call into re-existence all the dormant springs of action.

From the window in the room where she was to watch and wait, a view of the grounds in front of the mansion was obtainable.

She resolved to repair hither, and to take a last parting look at the forms of the two highwaymen.

It was this desire which enabled her to recover herself from her state of semi-unconsciousness—it was this which lent her strength, after quitting her hold of the baluster, to re-enter the room.

She walked straight to the window, and flung the little casement open.

The cold night air streamed in, and it fell upon her cheek with delicious coolness.

After she had taken one or two inspirations she felt much restored, and many of the terrible thoughts which had crowded about her heart and brain were dispersed.

At length a slight sound struck upon her attentive ear, and she looked out of the window with an increased intensity of gaze.

CHAPTER CCCCXXVII.

MAUD HAS A TERRIBLE AND STRANGE ADVENTURE IN THE DESERTED MANSION.

No other ear than Maud's could have detected so slight a sound; but it grew louder and louder, and she leaned out of the window to a dangerous extent, in order to hear with more distinctness.

She strained her eyes, too, and presently, assisted doubtless by her fancy, she made out the forms of Dick Turpin and Tom King, both mounted upon their steeds, and making their way across the uncultivated lawn.

The crackling of twigs as they forced their way among the bushes most unquestionably fell upon her ears.

But that sound grew fainter and fainter, until at length it died away altogether.

Still Maud did not quit the window.

She remained with her arms leaning upon the sill, looking out into the darkness.

And the darkness without was something terrible.

The moon would not rise for some hours to come, and the light of the stars was obscured with drifting clouds.

How long she remained thus dreamily gazing upon vacancy she knew not, but she was roused by the cold.

She shuddered and felt half-frozen.

Closing the window carefully, she looked round, and found the fire was on the point of extinction.

This circumstance, slight as it was, had a beneficial effect.

It roused her into action, for she was well aware of the necessity there was to keep the fire burning.

There was plenty of dry wood close at hand, and a small quantity of this she threw on; for, though it was dark, she was fearful that the smoke should betray her.

The fire would not burn, and gave her a great deal of trouble

While thus busily employed, the time passed quickly.

At length the difficulty was overcome.

The wood caught light, and a cheerful blaze sprang up.

Maud seated herself in the chair which Dick had placed for her, and leaning back she gazed upon the burning wood with half-closed eyes.

This attitude, this occupation, and the silence around her, were all well calculated to provoke thought, and, almost unconsciously, she found herself running over in her mind the strange and varied occurrences of the past.

She thought of the strange life which she had voluntarily adopted, and contrasted it with that which she had quitted without a sigh of regret.

She thought of her cousin Blanche, and wondered whether she had ever seen the son of her wicked uncle, Adrian, and, if she had met him, what had passed between them.

She sighed deeply as she thought of the poor girl's unhappy love.

It was a love which she could never indulge in.

And when she contrasted her cousin's unhappiness with her own, she felt it sink into insignificance.

These and a thousand other kindred thoughts occupied her mind until a sound struck upon her ear, which had the effect of dissipating every one of them.

She started violently, and assumed a listening attitude, while her cheeks grew blanched with fear?

What the sound was she hardly knew.

It had struck upon her ear with so much suddenness, and had so abruptly ceased, that she was unable to form any clear idea as to its character.

Anxiously, then, she listened for a repetition of it, in order to come to a more definite conclusion upon the subject.

But all was still.

The fire crackled, but no other sound broke upon the silence.

Nevertheless, with her lips parted and her hands clutching the massive carved handles of the chair, with painful tightness she stretched her sense of hearing to the fullest extent.

She seemed to have a conviction that if she was patient she should hear the sound again, and that the instant she ceased to be attentive it would make itself heard again.

She was not deceived.

The sound did come again.

But she was prepared for it, and yet she started when it came.

It was one long wailing cry.

There could be no mistaking the character of the sound, and the blood curdled about her heart when she heard it.

The cry was strangely prolonged.

It came upon the hearing, first so faintly as to be almost inaudible; then it grew louder and louder, until it almost became a shriek, after which it faded away as gradually as it had arose.

While this sound lasted Maud never drew her breath, nor did she move a single muscle.

She was spell-bound, and incapable of doing so.

When it ceased a long sigh issued from her lips; and, relcasing her hold of the arms of the chair, she sank slowly back.

Although she had listened so attentively, yet even now she was unable to pronounce from whence the sound had come, and what was its precise character.

It seemed to rise until it filled the whole atmosphere of the place, and it seemed to come from all corners of the room.

Then as to the nature of it? That was more puzzling still.

Maud was unable to form anything like an idea.

She strove to be calm, she strove to think upon what had taken place with coolness.

But both attempts were equally vain.

Her heart fluttered, and she drew her breath in short and fitful inspirations.

Had it been light instead of dark, had it been day instead of night, had she been in some cheerful room instead of that gloomy apartment in the deserted mansion, the sound she had heard would, even under these circumstances, have appalled her, and deprived her of the power of action and clear thought.

Such being the case, the reader will be able to comprehend the effect it had upon her here, at a moment when she was ready to give way to fear and yield to supernatural influences.

With parted lips, then, and with wide, staring eyes, she remained leaning back in that antique chair.

Had her life depended upon it, she could not have moved a limb.

And all this while her sense of hearing was so stretched that it became preternaturally acute.

She hoped, yet dreaded, and feared that she should hear the awful sound again.

With a strange contradiction of the mind, she felt that if she did not hear the sound again she should be wretched, and yet, if she did hear it, she should go almost mad.

In this terrible state of uncertainty and suspense she remained for some moments.

The silence was awful, for the fire had ceased to make the crackling sound which it had given out a little while ago.

The wood was almost consumed.

The blaze had ceased, and nothing but a dull, red glow proceeded from the embers.

At last Maud begins to think that she shall hear the sound no more.

A dim idea floats through her mind that it must have been caused by her fancy only.

Nevertheless, she cannot shake off the spell by which she is held down to the chair.

Then the sound came again.

She started violently, as though she had received an electric shock.

Low and faint at first, like the moaning of the wind, it came and rose gradually, until it became a shriek, so shrill, that, had she had the power, Maud would have clasped her hands over her ears and shut it out.

But she could not make the slightest movement.

The sound having reached its highest pitch, then died away with the same regular cadence as it had arisen.

With an effort Maud shook off the oppression that weighed her down, and started to her feet.

Her very lips were blanched with terror, and her eyes gleamed with fright.

"This is terrible," she said, "most terrible! I cannot endure it! If I sit here listening thus, I shall go mad; and yet what—what am I to do? What can such a cry portend?"

Maud started, and clutched the corner of the table with a nervous grasp.

She thought the sound was coming again.

But she was mistaken.

Listening fearfully, she strove to think what the sound could mean—tried to fix in her mind the direction from whence it came.

It sounded like a cry from one in great physical agony.

And yet, was it possible that any human being could give utterance to such an unearthly cry?

She thought not. She was obliged to think there was not, though she was loth to admit her conviction.

But if it was not human, what could it be?

Whence did it come, and why was she doomed to listen to it?

She had heard how terrible and shrieking cries had ere this been portents of some deadly ill.

Her heart sickened at the remembrance.

Could Turpin have fallen into some unexpected and frightful peril?

He had told her himself, and Tom King had confirmed his words, that there was danger in their enterprise.

Could it be that this sound had come to apprise her of it?

It was only for a brief time, however, that these thoughts remained tenable in her mind.

She banished them as unworthy of her.

"No, no," she cried, in a faint hoarse whisper, "I will not render up myself to any such fancies. I will not believe that there is any connexion between this sound and my absent husband. I will resist such a belief to the last moment."

She listened again.

"What shall I do?" she moaned. "To continue thus is ten times worse than death itself. The sound came from below. I think it came from below. Let the danger and the horror be however great, I will penetrate this mystery. I will learn from whence these sounds proceed, and what it is that produces them."

This was a bold resolution; but Maud felt all the calmer after she had made it.

Her mind seemed relieved of an intolerable load.

Still she trembled.

Her whole frame trembled in every limb like the quivering aspen.

She threw more wood on to the fire, and again a bright blaze sprung up.

Then, with shaking hands, she felt upon the table for the piece of candle, which she knew was there.

She found it.

Going, then, to the fire, she, after many unsuccessful efforts, succeeded in igniting it.

But her hand trembled so that the tiny flame which first hung around the wick threatened each moment to expire.

She steadied herself against the curiously carved mantelpiece, and waited till the candle had fairly taken light.

Soon the flame increased in size and brilliancy, and, with a tottering, hesitating step, Maud made her way across the room towards the door.

Her limbs threatened to sink beneath her, and more than once she had to pause to recover herself

At length she reached the head of the stairs which was, indeed, only a few steps from the door of the room in which she had sat.

Here she was again compelled to pause, for she hesitated whether to descend.

It was a fancy, more than aught else, which made her think the sound came from below, and now she stopped in doubt, and asked herself whether she was able to descend.

It was while she mentally asked this question that again there rose upon her hearing the mysterious cry.

It did not take her at unawares.

The faint moan reached her ears first, and swelled until it seemed to deafen her.

But when it had died away there no longer remained in her mind the slightest doubt that it came from below.

She could tell the sound arose, and, with a feeling of utter desperation, she grasped the balusters with her left hand, and held the candle aloft in her right, so that its beams should be dispersed as much as possible.

Then she commenced the descent, slowly at first, but by degrees courage returned to her, and she increased her pace.

The rustling of her dress upon the stairs sounded with ominous loudness in the intense stillness, and she could hear the rapid and violent pulsations of her heart.

At length the landing beneath was reached.

Here all was still, and so she continued to descend until she paused again upon the one lower still.

She listened.

A faint, far-off, ringing, clashing sound, makes itself heard.

She approaches the next flight of stairs.

It comes from below.

With her lips painfully and tightly compressed, she descends these two.

At every step she takes the clashing grows more and more distinct, until at length no doubt remains as to its character.

It is the clashing of swords, as the weapons ring together in some deadly encounter.

Paler and paler grows Maud's cheek, but still she does not pause.

Guided by the sounds, she descends the stairs, crosses the landing, and pauses before a door.

It is closed.

From the other side of it the sounds proceed.

She can hear the swords clash and clang together.

Then they abruptly cease, and again the awful, shrieking cry strikes upon her ears.

Overcome by horror and fright, Maud gives vent to a piercing shriek, and falls insensible on the threshold of the mysterious door.

CHAPTER CCCCXXVIII.

DICK TURPIN AND TOM KING REPAIR TO THE MEETING PLACE ON THE FINCHLEY-ROAD, AND WAIT IN VAIN THE APPEARANCE OF CLAUD DUVAL AND SIXTEEN-STRING JACK.

When Dick Turpin and Tom King left Maud, they made their way with all possible speed to the stables.

Here they found their horses in perfect safety, and thoroughly refreshed by the rest they had had, although their fodder had been of such poor quality.

[THE DRAGOONS ENTER THE SUMMER-HOUSE IN SEARCH OF CLAUDE AND JACK.]

The saddles and bridles were close at hand, and in a very few moments Black Bess and Tom King's horse were saddled.

This done, the animals were led out, and the two highwaymen, who were in perfect readiness for the road, mounted.

Maud was not deceived when she fancied she could hear them.

Dick looked back, but he did not catch sight of the loving face that was looking so eagerly after him.

On reaching the gate which led into the lane they paused, resolved not to emerge until they were sure that they could do so safely.

They listened, but no sound save the murmuring of the wind and the rustling of the leafless branches broke the silence that reigned about that lonesome spot.

Satisfied that there was no one near to observe them our friends gave their horses an impulse forward, and passed out into the lane.

Once here they did not pause, but swept along at a rapid speed towards their destination.

The night was profoundly dark.

It was only occasionally, when the clouds parted a little, that even a glimpse of the twinkling stars could be obtained.

But no night could be too dark for our friends, and they were pleased at the deep gloom which hung over all things.

They knew nothing whatever of the piece of country through which they were travelling, and had no other guide to the meeting-place than such bearings as they were occasionally enabled to take of the stars when the clouds parted sufficiently for them to do so.

Nevertheless, they kept on with as much confidence as they would if they had been quite familiar with their route.

Without meeting with any incident, they at length emerged into the high road.

Here they paused and looked about them, for they were by no means certain whether they were on the road leading to London through Highgate, or the one that passed through Hampstead.

It was at the point where these two roads formed a junction with each other that the meeting was to take place.

The intense darkness of the night baffled them, and they for some time looked about in vain for some familiar object.

Without a guide of some kind or other it would be difficult to proceed, for they were uncertain whether they would have to turn to the right or to the left.

This was a dilemma which they had not calculated upon.

After some moments' hesitation, Dick said—

"I think the best thing we can do, Tom, will be to turn to the right and gallop on for a little while. We shall then soon find out whether we are right or wrong."

"Yes; I suppose that must be it, and yet I wish we could have found out in some other manner."

"Because of our foes?"

"Yes. We shall run great risk of being seen, and I think you will admit that the less we gallop up and down the high road the more conducive it will be to our safety."

"There is no disputing that, Tom, but, in the present aspect of affairs, what is to be done?"

"I fear there is no help for it, Dick; but, hark! what's that?"

Dick listened, and then there came upon his ears, though very faintly, a pleasant jingling sound.

It was mingled with the tramp of horses' hoofs and the rumbling of heavy wheels.

"Do you hear that, Dick?" said Tom King.

"Yes; I hear it plainly enough."

"That is a waggon. It is approaching. When it arrives opposite to us we will stop it, and the driver will give us the information we require."

"So he will. This is a capital way of getting out of the difficulty. I should never have thought of it."

"Nor I. But hush now. We will wait in silence until it arrives opposite to us."

"Will you call, Tom?"

"If you like, Dick."

"Very well; then do so."

Both highwaymen now relapsed into silence, and occupied themselves in listening to the approach of the waggon.

The cumbrous vehicle was at no great distance when they first heard it, so it would not be long before it arrived.

In a few moments they could discern through the gloom the huge affair.

At short intervals there came, too, upon their ears the cracking of a cartwhip, as the driver urged his cattle forward.

"Hoy!" cried Tom King, as soon as the driver was within hailing distance. "Hoy!"

"Murder!" cried the driver, "it's an highwayman!"

A chorus of shrieks from the interior of the vehicle followed these words.

At the time whereof we write, the reader must bear in mind that the only means by which people in humble circumstances could perform long journeys was by waggon.

"Don't be a fool!" cried Tom King. "I'm no highwayman! I am a traveller, and want to know the way to Finchley."

In the silence of the night the clear tones of Tom King's voice sounded with great distinctness.

The alarm of the persons who were inside the vehicle subsided, and the driver repeated—

"To Finchley?"

"Yes; which is the way?"

"You are on the high road to it now. Keep on the same way as I have just come, and when you come to the fork where the two roads divide, keep to the left."

"Thanks, my friend. Here's a half-a-crown for you."

"Much obliged to your honour. Keep on, sir; you can't miss your way."

With this the driver set his team in motion again.

During the conversation Dick Turpin kept altogether out of sight.

Tom started down the road at a gentle pace, and in a few moments was overtaken by his companion.

"We are all right, then," he said.

"Yes, Dick, and we shall be there in good time, for it can't be much past midnight"

"Do you know any particulars of the murder which Sixteen-String Jack spoke about as having been committed some years ago near this very place?"

"No; I am not acquainted with any of the particulars."

"Nor I. But I thought, perhaps, you might be"

"No. All I know is that on this triangular-shaped piece of ground, formed by the junction of the two roads, a gibbet stands, and from its crossbeam, suspended in a kind of framework of iron, hangs the body of the murderer."

"Yes; I was aware of so much," said Dick, with a slight shudder. "I have seen it many times."

"So have I. The spot is well chosen in one respect, for what with the evil reputation in which the whole place is held, and what with the ghastly fruit hanging from the gibbet, no one cares to be near, especially between nightfall and daybreak."

"The meeting-place is well chosen in that respect, it is true, for I think, myself, that we are not very likely to be interfered with."

"Never fear. But look! Here we are."

As Tom King spoke these words both the highwaymen paused.

The triangular-shaped piece of ground had, indeed, been reached.

At this moment the moon, which had not long risen above the horizon, cast a beam of light through the clouds, and then the whole aspect of the horrible and dismal place was fully revealed.

Upon a small piece of ground, triangular in shape and covered with rank vegetation, was a gibbet.

As Tom King had truly said, from the crossbeam the lifeless body of the murderer depended.

The pale, sickly, yellow rays of the moon gave this object a more horrible and loathsome appearance than under any other circumstances it could possibly have presented.

Our two friends had halted not many paces from the foot of this gibbet.

They had approached it unconsciously, and were made aware of its proximity with startling suddenness.

Although they had both seen this spectacle before, and were prepared to see it now, yet when it burst so unexpectedly upon their sight, they could not avoid shuddering with horror.

But that they should give way to this feeling is not to be wondered at.

By the law of the land such was the penalty attaching to what they had done.

The horses, either from real fright, or else from some feeling communicated by their riders, trembled perceptibly, while, with erected manes and starting eyes, they glared upon the spectacle before them.

For some moments the two highwaymen remained motionless and silent.

By a fascination, whose influence they were powerless to resist, their eyes were fixed upon the body of the murderer.

Had it been day, they would, doubtless, have felt so much abhorrence that they would have turned away; but now, at night, with the pale moonlight streaming upon the gibbet and its fruit, and only partially revealing their hideousness, causing the curious fancy to imagine what was not, they felt themselves constrained to gaze.

Dick Turpin was the first to recover himself sufficiently to speak.

"This is a fearful fate for a human being to encounter," he said at length.

"It is, indeed, Dick," replied his comrade; "but, if what I have heard be true, the villain upon whose remains we are now gazing, most richly and fully deserved the fate, however fearful it may be."

"Perhaps so—perhaps so. But let us withdraw a little. I cannot bear to look upon it, it is too horrible—too sickening."

"With all my heart, Dick, for I care no more about looking at it than yourself."

"Claude and Jack have not arrived yet," said Turpin, as they removed to a spot where their eyes were no longer offended with the sight of the gibbet.

"No, they have not come. But it is full early yet. We must give them till daybreak. Doubtless, they will have some distance to come."

"I would they were here, Tom," said Turpin, "for I feel sick at heart."

"Pho! pho! Shake off the feeling. But I don't care how soon they arrive, for it won't be very pleasant to remain standing about this place till daylight."

"It will not, indeed. But, look, Tom; yonder seems to be a kind of thicket. Let us gain the shelter of that, and then we shall be much safer from observation."

"By all means let us do so; for you may depend that, ere long, some one will pass us on one side or the other."

"Exactly; and, while we are in the thicket, we shall have no difficulty in perceiving the approach of our two comrades."

"None whatever."

"Come, then."

While speaking, Dick Turpin led the way to the little thicket of which he had spoken.

It was formed by a few trees growing rather thickly together.

Beneath the deep shadow of these they directed their horses' footsteps.

They did not penetrate to any depth, however, but were content just so that their bodies and those of their steeds were concealed.

Having taken up this position, they remained quite motionless upon their steeds, awaiting the arrival of their expected comrades.

From where they stood they commanded a view not only of the road on either side of them, but also of the triangular-shaped piece of ground with the broad united road stretching beyond.

A more advantageous position could not have been found.

Of course, as soon as Claude and Jack made their appearance they would ride forward and greet them.

Until that moment arrived they would be perfectly secure from observation.

No one could have the least suspicion they were there.

When they spoke they addressed each other in low tones, although they had not heard or seen a soul.

Dick was impatient.

At least an hour had elapsed, and there were no more signs of Claude and Jack than at first.

Another hour passed by in the same manner, and then he grew truly desperate.

He pictured poor Maud alone in the deserted mansion, anxiously awaiting his promised return.

Suddenly he was aroused from these reflections by Tom King, who leaned forward and touched him on the arm.

Having succeeded in attracting his attention, Tom, without uttering a word, raised his finger and pointed straight before him.

Dick followed with his eye, and caught sight of something in a moment which had the effect of arresting the whole of his attention.

Standing on the triangular-shaped piece of ground were three men.

The outlines of their figures were dim and indistinct, being revealed only by the misty light which came from the moon, as she shone feebly through a semi-opake cloud which hung before her and obscured her brightness.

The light had a strange yellow tint, and gave a spectral-like appearance to every object which it brought into view.

These three men looked, then, more like ill-defined shadows than aught else.

Who could they be?

Surely not Claude and Jack!

They would never have brought a third person with them.

Besides, one of these men was on horseback, the other two on foot.

By their attitudes it would seem as though the one on horseback was giving orders of some description to those on foot.

The two highwaymen gazed with the utmost intentness, wondering what this could mean.

Were these men connected with them?

Did their presence then bode them good or ill?

They could not tell; for, though at times the murmur of a voice would reach their ears, the speakers were too far off for them to overhear their conversation.

CHAPTER CCCCXXIX.

DICK TURPIN AND TOM KING OVERHEAR THE DETAILS OF A MOST VILLAINOUS PLOT.

In all human probability these three men were in no way whatever connected with our friends, and yet it was wonderful what an amount of interest Turpin and King felt in their proceedings.

They made up their minds that they could not be Claude and Jack.

Clearly, then, it was no business of theirs who they were.

Likely enough, having sat so long together on their horses, waiting without seeing or hearing anything, made them feel interested and curious.

Let the cause, however, be what it would, certain is it that the two highwaymen gazed upon the three shadowy figures with all-absorbing interest.

They received an addition to their curiosity and wonder.

After speaking for a few moments, all three approached the thicket where our friends were concealed.

Seeing this, they could not avoid asking themselves the question whether, after all, their presence was not connected with them.

Should they move and attempt to get out of the way, or remain where they were and abide the issue?

After a moment's reflection they resolved upon the latter.

The three men steadily advanced, and as they came nearer and nearer their forms could be distinguished with more precision.

The one on the horse accommodated his speed to that of those who were on foot, and who walked at either side of his horse's head.

On they came, across the piece of waste ground, taking their course in a direct line towards Turpin and King, who could not help feeling a certain amount of uneasiness and alarm.

Another half-dozen paces, and then discovery would inevitably ensue.

But those half-dozen steps were destined not to be taken.

Suddenly the man on the horse cried—

"Stop! this will do. There is no occasion whatever to go any further."

The tones of his voice reached the highwaymen's ears plainly enough, for they were very close indeed to him, and they would have to keep very still to avoid discovery.

Like two statues, then, they sat upon their steeds, resolved not to lose a syllable of the conversation that was about to ensue.

One of the men on foot hastened to reply to the one on horseback who had just spoken.

He uttered his words in a tone of great affected humbleness.

"Very good, sir;" he said, "but I think it was quite a wise proceeding to remove hither. Where we stood yonder we were exposed to the full view of anyone who might pass by, and suspicion might be directed towards us. Now, however, there is no fear of our being either seen or heard; and so, sir, you can speak freely, and give us your instructions."

"And, sir," chimed in the other man, before the horseman had time to speak, "you may depend that whatever orders you may please to give us will be fully and thoroughly carried out."

"That is a comfortable assurance," said the horseman, in deep and thrilling tones, which were, however, so peculiar, that the two highwaymen felt certain that they should always be able to know the man by his voice; "that is a very comfortable assurance, indeed. But now listen to me."

"We are all attention, worshipful sir."

"I do not want you to talk, but to act. I want deeds, not words. Look here!"

The horseman produced something as he spoke, but what it was the highwaymen could not see.

He held it out in his hand.

"Look here," he continued. "Here are two bags of gold; one for you, and one for you."

He distributed them to the men as he spoke.

They took them eagerly.

The horseman continued—

"Each bag contains fifty guineas; and, when you have performed the service I require of you, you shall have two more bags containing the same amount."

"Let us know what the service is that is to be so liberally paid for."

"Come closer, and give heed to my instructions. See that, in the carrying of them out, you do not fail in a single particular."

"We'll warrant that, your honour."

"Good. You are armed?"

"Yes, worthy sir; even as you bade us."

"With a brace of pistols each?"

"Yes."

"Are they carefully loaded and primed?"

"They are, your honour."

"Enough, then; that will do. But I must have no misfires."

"What are we to do, worthy sir?"

"Peace. I will tell you. It is not the first time you have done a job of the same sort. Do you see the road yonder?"

"The one that leads to Hampstead, worthy sir."

"Yes."

"We see it."

"Good. Do you see yon hedge, which divides this piece of waste ground from the highway?"

"Oh! yes, your honour."

"Well, then, when I command you to do so, betake yourselves to that hedge and conceal yourselves behind it. You will have no difficulty in doing this."

"None at all, your honour."

"Very well. You will then each take out your pistols, and hold them in such a position as to be able to make instant use of them if necessary. You understand now what you have to do?"

"Not altogether, worthy sir."

"When we have taken up our positions"—

"You will remain as I told you. I expect a certain person, about whom you need not trouble yourselves in the least, to come this way. I will ride down the road when I have seen you placed, and come back and let you know of his approach. You will then keep watch for him, and as soon as you see some one approach on a white horse you will raise your pistols and fire all four of them. He will not escape so many shots."

"And what then, sir?" asked the man, with cold-blooded coolness, which seemed to prove the truth of what the horseman had said. "When we have shot him down, what then?"

"I shall be close at hand, and when I hear the report, I will make my way to the spot. I will give you the money I have promised, and you can then take yourselves off where you like."

"And the body on the road, worthy sir. What about that?"

"Leave that to me. Don't you trouble yourself in the slightest degree about that. Do as I tell you. Take your reward and depart."

"Very good, your honour."

"You are quite sure you perfectly understand what you have to do?"

"Oh! yes, we perfectly understand. When are we to conceal ourselves?"

"Now, at once. I do not expect him just yet, but better be too soon than too late."

"Quite best, sir."

"Go, then, and hide yourselves, and lie in readiness. I will ride down the road, and when I see him coming I will return and let you know, so as to prevent all possibility of mistake. Come, follow me to the hedge!"

With these words, the rider turned his horse's head towards the hedge of which he had spoken.

He was followed by the two men, who spoke to each other in whispers.

The two highwaymen looked after them until they were out of hearing; and then, with a slight shiver, Dick Turpin said—

"What do you think of that, Tom?"

"Why, I think that we have overheard one of the most damnable assassination plots that ever was planned."

"I think so, too, my friend. It fairly makes my blood run cold when I think of the coolness with which all three treated the subject."

"By their manner they seemed to be discussing some every-day affair."

"They did. But what a dreadful snare to lay for a fellow-creature?"

"Dreadful, indeed! I wonder who he can be?"

"Of that I can form no better idea than yourself."

"I know that, only it seemed natural to make the remark."

"I think it a most providential thing that we overheard the plot in the way we did."

"Very so, indeed. How strange that they should come to this spot for greater security."

"Very, very; but what is to be done?"

"Something must be done."

"Most certainly; for if, after hearing what we have, we were to remain here without stirring hand or foot, we should virtually be the murderers of this traveller."

"We should, unquestionably."

"But how are we to prevent them from carrying their plot into execution?"

"We must decide upon some measure, and that right quickly; for, as the horseman said, better too soon than too late."

"It is a good maxim, I grant; but you must not forget our original purpose in coming to this spot."

"To meet Claude and Jack?"

"Yes."

"They do not come."

"They do not; and their non-appearance gives me a great deal of anxiety."

"I do not know how to account for it."

"Well, we have waited for them, and for a long time, too; and, when they come, if they find us absent on this little business, they must do the same for us."

"That is it; and, now, what are we to do?"

"Time is speeding."

"Did you notice which way the horseman went?"

"Towards Hampstead."

"Then we cannot do better than follow cautiously in his steps, for that is the direction from which the traveller will come."

"We must be careful not to be seen or heard."

"We must; and that makes me think that the best thing we can do is to force our way through this thicket, which does not seem to be of very great extent, and, instead of emerging on to the Hampstead road, make our way behind the hedges that bound it; we shall then be less likely to be discovered."

"We cannot do better."

"Then let us set about it at once."

Having come to this determination, the two highwaymen pushed their way through the thicket, taking care to make no more noise in their progress than they could possibly avoid.

They were agreeably surprised to find that the thicket was much less in extent than they had imagined it to be, and a few minutes only elapsed before they emerged on the other side.

Crossing a ploughed field, Turpin and King reached the tall hedgerow which bounded the Hampstead road.

This was quite high enough to conceal them from the view of anyone in the road, for the hedge was planted on the top of a steer bank several feet in height.

At the foot of this bank was a narrow, but well-beaten, footpath, which served admirably for the horses.

The highwaymen listened, but were unable to hear anything, so at a sharp trot they made their way along the footpath, until they came to a hedge, which divided the ploughed field from another.

This hedge was no great height, so they leaped it.

They alighted on the soft turf of a meadow.

Just at this moment, the faint sounds of a horse's hoofs upon the road reached their ears.

They listened.

It was some one a little in advance of them, who was proceeding at a walking pace.

The highwaymen did not speak, but, at an easy trot, urged their horses over the turf.

In a little while they could tell they were abreast with this horseman, who, they doubted not, was the man they had overheard giving the directions to the assassins.

It was, however, too dark for them to satisfy themselves by ocular proof that they were not labouring under any mistake.

All they could do was to keep abreast with this horseman and observe all that took place.

The only thing that confirmed them in their belief that they were right, was that this man was proceeding at a walking pace.

Now this is somewhat unusual for a traveller, when making his way across the country at so late an hour.

Suddenly the rider pulled up.

Our friends imitated him instantly.

"I thought I heard something? What was it, I wonder? All is still now. It must have been my fancy. I am a fool to give way to such weakness."

There was no mistaking the voice which pronounced these words.

They were uttered in the same thrilling tones as those which they had heard when the horseman addressed himself to the assassins.

This was a great relief to our friends, who kept thinking what the consequences would be if they were so unfortunate as to make a mistake.

Now, however, all was well, and they remained motionless upon their steeds, waiting for the horseman on the road to give them the signal to advance.

But he stirred not.

They heard him speak again.

Doubtless he felt it to be a relief to his mind to speak his thoughts aloud in the silence and solitude of that place.

"I will go no further," he said; "I have come far enough already. I will wait here and listen for his approach. When I hear him coming, then it will be time enough for me to ride forward and ascertain whether it is really he, and afterwards ride back and tell my men in ambush that he is on the road. I will tell them to shoot the next horseman who passes by them."

CHAPTER CCCCXXX.

DICK TURPIN AND TOM KING RENDER THE AMBUSH BEHIND THE HEDGE ABORTIVE.

It may seem strange to our readers that Dick Turpin and Tom King in the meadow should hear with so much distinctness what the rider spoke while in the road, but we are in a position to give a very simple explanation of the cause of it.

The horseman, having halted, had backed his horse under the hedge behind which the two highwaymen stood.

Consequently they were only a few feet distant from each other, the hedge being all that divided them.

When he spoke his thoughts aloud, then, they were easily able to catch every syllable.

They had to use the utmost care to keep still, lest their presence should be discovered; and, from what the rider had said when he reined in his steed, it would seem as though he had heard something.

He would, beyond doubt, be on the alert.

It was, perhaps, lucky for our friends that they were not destined to remain for any length of time in such close quarters.

They were the first to hear the faintest clattering of hoofs which indicated the approach of another horseman.

Directly afterwards, however, the man who was on the watch heard the sound.

"He comes," he said; "he comes. He comes to meet his death."

Having spoken these words, he rode out into the road, and trotted gently in the direction in which the traveller was coming.

Our friends followed over the meadow.

It was only for a few moments that the horseman continued to trot.

He soon subsided into a walk, and the highwaymen followed his example without delay.

They were now wrought up to the highest pitch of excitement, and they felt that the events of the next few moments would be of a very startling character indeed.

The traveller, whose assassination had been so coldly planned, came on at a canter.

Our friends could tell that by the regularity with which the horse's hoofs struck the ground.

Nearer and nearer he came, until at length he passed them.

He passed his murderer, who went on steadily, at a walk.

Almost immediately, however, he turned round, and struck his spurs deeply into his horse's flanks.

The poor creature uttered a short cry of pain, and set forward at a furious gallop.

He was past his victim with lightning-like rapidity.

His errand was to tell his creatures to prepare to perform their work of death.

"Now," said Dick Turpin, "what are we to do?"

"We must apprise the traveller of his danger without delay. Quick! or it will be too late."

"But, how are we to do so? How are we to pass this hedge which divides us from the road?"

"Why, yonder, a little further on, is a gate; let us make our way through that and overtake him."

Tom King pointed to a white, wooden gate, which led out of the meadow into the highroad.

It took them but a moment to reach it.

It was padlocked.

This did not trouble Tom King.

He alighted, and, going to that end of the gate where the hinges were, lifted it up.

He lifted it off the hinges easily enough, and made a path into the road.

Mounting his own steed, he followed Dick Turpin down the road.

But he could not keep pace with him.

Dick was anxious to overtake the traveller, being fearful that his warning might come too late; and so, for once in a way, he allowed Black Bess to go at her own speed.

With a long, sweeping gallop she flew over the ground.

At such a rate it took very little time to come in sight of the traveller.

Dick's first impulse was to shout and tell him to stop; but, if he did this, the sound might reach the ears of the ambuscaded villains as well.

In another moment he was abreast with the traveller, who had accelerated his pace.

"Hold, sir!" Turpin cried, in an imploring voice. "Hold, for your life's sake, and I will tell you more. You are riding on to certain death."

This was an appeal of a character well calculated to arrest the progress of anyone, and the person to whom it was addressed reined in his steed with great abruptness, and, in a scared tone of voice, he said—

"Hilloa! there; hilloa! What is it you say, sir?"

"Halt!" said Dick, "and I will tell you all. Wait a moment, and my companion will be here, who will bear testimony to the truth of what I am about to relate to you."

The traveller halted, and looked about him in mingled surprise and alarm.

The darkness of the night, however, prevented him from being able to see Dick with any degree of distinctness

Tom King could be heard approaching, and directly afterwards he checked his panting steed.

The traveller seemed to look upon the advent of Tom King with a certain degree of suspicion, for with great swiftness he drew a sword which he carried at his side.

Whirling it around him, he said with a voice of great determination—

"I know not the meaning of all this, but do not think you have a fool to deal with."

"You need be under no apprehension from us," said Dick. "We have put ourselves considerably out of the way to render you a service; and that service is no other than the salvation of your life."

"Explain yourself, sir, I pray you," said the traveller, in an altered tone of voice. "Do not speak so imperfectly. You said before, that I was riding on to certain death."

"And so you were. Myself and my companion, having an appointment to meet two friends of ours, took up our position in a thicket from whence we could perceive their arrival without being seen ourselves. While here, three men approached. One was on horseback, the other two on foot. Knowing nothing of our presence, they spoke; and we could not avoid overhearing all that was said. The man on horseback gave the men on foot two bags of gold, each containing fifty guineas. They were to have two more bags, containing each a hundred guineas more, when they had performed the service which the man on horseback required of them. Is not this correct?" asked Turpin, addressing himself to his comrade.

"Perfectly true, in every particular," said Tom King.

"Pray proceed, sir, with your strange narrative. I know not what to think of this."

"I have little more to tell," said Dick. "The men having agreed to do what he required of them, he posted them behind a hedge, with instructions to shoot you down as you passed by."

"Shoot me down?" said the traveller, who was a young man. "Shoot me down?"

The accents of his voice were full of horror.

"Even so," replied Dick Turpin. "I heard the rider tell the men that you would be mounted on a white horse."

"Yes, my horse is white."

"I see it is, sir. With my own eyes I saw the men secrete themselves behind the hedge. They are well armed; and when their rascally employer gives them the signal that you are approaching, they will watch till you pass by, and shoot you down without mercy."

"Oh! this tale is too horrible to be true," said the young man. "This is some deep-laid scheme of your own to hold me here to answer some villainous purpose."

"You wrong us by such a supposition," answered Turpin; "and, under other circumstances than the present, I should not trouble you any further, but ride off, leaving you to your fate; but, as so serious a thing as your life is at issue, I cannot do this."

"Pray forgive me," answered the young man. "I ought not to have entertained such suspicions; but what you have told me is so very strange, that"——

"You could not help it."

"Exactly."

"Make no apologies; I should have been the same myself."

"Will you, then, sir, tell me more?"

"I will; and it so happens that I shall be able to give you some sort of confirmation as to the truth of what I say. Did not some one pass you a little while ago at a walking pace, and afterwards overtake you at a gallop?"

"Yes, sir, there did; and my mind was filled with wonder as to the cause of this when I heard you behind me."

"Well, then, sir, that man who walked his horse past you did so in order to look at you and avoid any mistake; then, having satisfied himself that all was quite correct, he wheeled his horse round, and galloped back, so as to give his men warning of your approach."

"Forgive me, gentlemen, for my suspicions. I can see that they were groundless ones."

"We pardon you readily and freely; but come, sir, tell us, have you no enemy?"

"Yes."

"You have?"

"I have. He is my sworn and bitter foe, but he would not stoop to such a midnight assassination as you have described."

"Well, sir, that you know best about; but, so far as my belief goes, it is the same enemy you spoke of who sought to do you this ill turn."

"It may be so. But this intelligence of yours troubles me greatly."

"Nay; never let it trouble you now. All is well. Knowing of the ambush you are safe. You can avoid it."

"But it is important to my interests that I keep on along this very road. How, then, am I to pass the hedge behind which these villains are concealed?"

"Oh, you need not trouble about that; we will accompany you."

"Accompany me?"

"Yes; that is, if you have no objection to our doing so?"

"I should be right glad of your company, but I cannot consent to lead you into this great danger."

"Pho! pho!" said Dick, "there is no danger whatever."

"How so?"

"I will tell you. These men I have spoken of are on the look-out for a single horseman. We will ride past the hedge, the situation of which I know full well, while three abreast. Then, take my word for it, we shall be unmolested."

"Certainly we shall," said Tom King; "and as our way lies in that direction, we will willingly go with you. You will admit there will be no more danger for three to pass by than two?"

"Well, be it so, gentlemen. I shall be for ever beholden to you. You have saved a life of more importance than you perhaps imagine. But enough, I will avail myself of your escort."

"Forward, then. We had better lose no more time. Believe me, the danger is past. We have nothing further to apprehend."

The little party now set forward at a trot.

Dick Turpin placed himself on one side of the traveller, and Tom King placed himself on the other.

"We guard you thus," said Turpin, "because your enemies are aware that you ride upon a white horse. If we are careful to keep abreast, they will have some difficulty in noting it."

"How shall I ever repay you for this service?" said the stranger, in a voice of deep emotion. "Had it not been for your friendly intervention, I should have rode on, blindly, to my death. Alas! alas! what can be the meaning of this ambush?"

"You are under no obligations to us," said Turpin. "By chance we overheard this detestable plot against your life, and it was simply our duty to ride forward and meet you, and apprise you of it."

"Had we not have done so," continued Tom King, "but have allowed events to take their course, we should have been your actual murderers."

"Silence! No more," said Turpin. "Yonder is the hedge. Ride with us freely, sir, and unconcerned. Believe me, you have nothing to fear. There is no danger; they will not molest us."

Although Turpin spoke in a voice of great confidence, the stranger was scarcely able to bring himself to believe that all was so safe as was expressed.

It was in an anxious frame of mind, therefore, that he rode the next few yards.

The two highwaymen sedulously kept him between them, and presently Dick said—

"The hedge is passed; the danger is over; but keep on a little way further. If we pause we may attract suspicion, and—bark!—what is that?"

A confused noise from the rear now came upon their ears.

It was succeeded by the beating of a horse's hoofs, coming on at a full gallop.

The stranger halted suddenly, and wheeled his horse round.

Our friends impulsively followed his example, and, at the same time, placed themselves across the road in such a manner that the approaching horseman could not pass them easily.

This, however, was not attempted.

The rider came on.

They were not certain of it, but our friends believed that this was the man with the deep, thrilling voice, who had posted the two men in ambuscade.

If so, a meeting must take place in another moment with the stranger whom their warning had saved from such deadly peril.

The climax of this strange adventure was then about to be reached, and the two highwaymen prepared to observe all that passed with a greater degree of interest than they had ever before felt.

On came the horseman at the same speed.

Then, suddenly, he checked his steed's career, and, at the same moment, there was a flash and a loud report.

He had aimed a pistol at his victim, who, not expecting such an act, sat unsuspiciously upon his horse.

CHAPTER CCCCXXXI.

DICK TURPIN AND TOM KING ARE SPECTATORS OF A SINGULAR SWORD COMBAT ON THE HIGHWAY.

FORTUNATELY, however, the bullet flew wide of its mark, for the aim had been too swiftly taken to be a sure one.

The discharge of the weapon took all three by surprise.

The young stranger was the first to recover himself.

Like a flash of light he drew his sword, and spurred his horse forward.

"Dastardly villain!" he cried, fiercely, "whoever you may be! I know you not, but"——

A loud cry came from the young stranger's lips, and checked his further speech.

At this moment the moon again broke forth and showed him the form of his adversary.

It was clear he recognised him, and the cry to which he had given utterance was clearly caused by that recognition.

He recovered himself again with great quickness, and in a loud voice he said—

"Can this be possible?"

"Yes!" cried the other, in a voice of thunder. "You now know all. You have escaped the fate I had designed for you, but you shall not escape me altogether. I have sworn to have your life, and I will keep my oath! Dastard and villain in your teeth! Take that! and if you have the courage and manhood to do so, meet me face to face with your sword, or admit yourself for ever a coward."

As he uttered these words in a loud, screaming voice, the speaker drew off his gauntleted glove, and flung it with great violence in the face of his adversary, who he thus challenged to the combat.

At the same time he alighted from his steed and drew his sword.

The young stranger lost not a moment in following his example, and, ere our friends could interfere, the combatants had crossed swords with each other.

Seeing Dick and Tom King approach, the stranger with the deep voice said—

"Ha! ha! coward! I thought so. You will fight me, but while you do so you will have these bullies at your back."

The young stranger turned round with terrible calmness, and, addressing the two highwaymen, he said—

"My friends—for such you are, although I know you not, and have never seen you till this hour—my friends, you have done me one service; now add another to it. I charge you, as you are gentlemen, to stand aloof and take no part in this affray. It must be decided between us, foot to foot and sword to sword. I am willing to abide the issue of this contest. My foe is before me, and on this night one of us must die, for it is impossible for both to live. Promise me that you will stand merely as spectators of this conflict, and do no more than see fair play between us."

"We promise," said Dick. "We cannot refuse."

"'Tis well," said the deep-voiced stranger. "I confess it is more than I expected. As you have truly said, it is impossible that both can live, and that, on this night, at least one of us must die. Come on!"

The combatants threw off their coats, and crossed their swords.

The steel clashed, and the weapons glistened in the fast-increasing moonlight.

This had all taken place so suddenly, that both Turpin and King were somewhat bewildered.

They had looked for some strange termination to this adventure, but, most certainly, not to such a one as this.

Both saw in a moment that the deep-voiced stranger had every advantage over his more youthful assailant.

He was much taller, had greater length of reach, was much more muscular.

Added to this, his sword was longer than the one wielded by his opponent.

Nevertheless, the young stranger laid his own weapon across it without a moment's hesitation.

The eyes of the two combatants sparkled with rage, and their countenances wore an expression of the most unmitigated ferocity.

As for the deep-voiced stranger, his face became perfectly fiendish.

No sooner were the swords crossed, than he proceeded to attack his adversary with the utmost impetuosity.

The young man, however, stood calmly enough upon his guard, and warded off all the desperate blows aimed at him with perfect ease.

Our two friends looked on with all-absorbing intentness.

Had the issue of the conflict concerned them nearly, they could not have watched every movement of the combatants with greater interest.

Not a single movement escaped them, and more than once they held their breath in suspenseful fear when a more than usually furious stroke was aimed at the young stranger.

Presently, however, he changed his tactics.

He no longer contented himself with remaining quietly on his guard, but in his turn assailed his foe with great vigour and determination.

Blow followed blow in such rapid succession that the highwaymen could scarcely tell by whom they were delivered, while the combatants whirled about in such rapid evolutions that their eyes were powerless to follow them.

Never once did they pause to rest, but kept on unceasingly.

How many moments this desperate encounter continued our friends had no idea.

Suddenly, however, they heard a fierce scream of anguish, and then the deep-voiced stranger fell heavily to the ground.

The young man stood over him for a moment with his drawn sword, but by degrees he lowered the point of his weapon, as he perceived that his foe was no longer able to injure him.

Dick Turpin and Tom King now ventured to approach.

The young man dropped his sword and staggered back.

He would have fallen, had not Tom sprang forward and caught him in his arms.

He feared, at first, he was wounded, but he quickly recovered himself.

He had half fainted from exhaustion, but, having rallied himself, he advanced once more towards his foe.

Here Turpin was standing.

He saw, at a glance, the wound was a mortal one.

The sword of the young man had passed completely through his heart.

Death was almost instantaneous.

Perceiving their approach, Dick said—

"All is over. He is quite dead."

"Then I call you both to witness," said the young man, "that he fell by my sword in fair fight."

"As fair a fight as could possibly be fought," said Turpin, "and yet not so, for the advantages were all on his side and none on yours."

"All is over then," said the young man. "Little did I foresee the occurrences of this night. But every moment is of importance to me. I must begone. Gentlemen, I know you not, but you have this night done me a service which I can never repay."

"We wish for no repayment."

"I know you do not. But, tell me, do you know who I am?"

"Certainly not."

"Will you swear it?"

"Unhesitatingly," said the highwaymen, in the utmost surprise.

"'Tis well. Enough. Do you know who lies there?"

"We do not. We never saw him until to-night."

"Well, gentlemen, who I am I would fain keep a secret. It is necessary that I should do so. However, should I ever see you again, I shall be able to recognise you if you wear these rings. Here is one for each of you. Wear it always. You may find it useful. Farewell! Once more, a thousand thanks for your service. Farewell!"

The young stranger, while speaking these words, first gave Dick and Tom a ring each, which they put upon their fingers, and then mounted his steed and rode away.

In a few moments he was out of sight, but the two highwaymen stood gazing in the direction in which he had gone, until the beating of his horse's hoofs upon the road was no longer audible.

Then, turning round to his old comrade, Turpin said—

"Well, Tom, my friend, what do you think of this adventure?"

"I think it is about the strangest that has ever befallen us during the whole course of our careers."

"I think you may go so far as to say it is the very strangest of all."

"It is, when the fact of our knowing so little is taken into account."

"Just so; that is what I mean. Think over what has passed. Who is the man who lies here so cold and dead? How fiercely he hated the one who has ridden away so suddenly! What was the cause of their enmity?"

"Perhaps we shall know some day, Dick: for my own part, I should like to know who the young man is that we saved from death."

"So should I. He is clearly some one of importance."

"And how he asked us whether we knew him!"

"He fancied we were acquainted with him, and had done the service with that knowledge."

"Then he never made a greater mistake."

"And these rings. What are we to do with them?"

"Wear them, by all means."

"It is possible that some day or other they may turn out to be of benefit to us—who can tell?"

"It will be best to wear them; there cannot be two opinions about that. But, come! we must not occupy ourselves too much with this strange adventure; we must think over it at our leisure."

"True; we have other things that claim our attention."

"You are right."

"But, about the body of this rascal; what shall we do with it?"

"Leave it where it is."

"I would sooner do that than meddle with it."

"I think we shall be wise to let it alone; but where are the two men, think you, who were to have committed the assassination?"

"That I know not. Most likely they have decamped with all possible speed, taking what money they had along with them."

"That sounds very probable. But what strange light is this which is creeping around us. Look."

"It is the dawn."

"Impossible."

"It is dawn, indeed. In a very little while it will be broad daylight."

"Quick—quick, then; let us make our way without an instant's delay to the appointed spot."

"Come on. I am ready. Let us hope that they are there awaiting our arrival."

With these words the highwaymen set their steeds in motion.

The reader must understand that the combat between the two strangers took place some distance from the triangular-shaped piece of ground.

Towards this the two highwaymen made their way.

It was not long before they came in sight of the gibbet with its grisly burden.

Morning was advancing with great rapidity, and objects at a distance were easily distinguishable.

Eagerly our friends looked all around them.

Their eyes travelled over every part of the triangular-shaped piece of ground.

But in vain.

They saw not what they hoped and expected to find.

Claude and Jack were not there.

At first they could scarcely believe it, but soon there was no room for doubt.

It was a moment or two before they could address each other, and then, after a painful pause, Turpin said—

"What are we to think of this, Tom? I fear the worst. I am certain that, if they had been at liberty, Claude and Jack would not have failed to be upon this spot at the appointed time; but now where are they? Alas! I fear they are captured."

"I fear so, too. The good luck we have had in eluding the dragoons they do not appear to have met with, and yet, Dick, after all, perhaps we are alarming ourselves without a cause."

"How; what mean you?"

"Why, it is dawn. Claude and Jack are not on the green yonder, that is certain, nor would they be likely to be. Would they not rather, like us, hide themselves somewhere where they could see us if we made our appearance?"

"There is some hope in that, and I hope we shall not be disappointed. Come, Tom, we will ride forward boldly on to that green spot, and halt close to the gibbet, and then if Claude and Jack are concealed anywhere, they will lose no time in discovering themselves to us."

Animated by this hope, Dick Turpin and Tom King made their way on to the green, and halted close to the gibbet.

Here they remained for some moments.

The pale, gray light of early morn, which every instant increased, revealed their forms with great distinctness.

Had Claude and Jack been concealed anywhere, they could not have failed to see them.

But no one moved.

They came not.

Turpin, at length, looked into his comrade's countenance.

"That hope is gone," he said. "Now tell us what is to be done?"

"I cannot," said Tom King. "Let us stay here a moment or two longer."

"But the danger! How can we tell who is observing us?"

"It is too great a risk. Look all around you, Dick, once more, and tell me whether you can see any signs of their approach."

CHAPTER CCCCXXXII.

THE DRAGOONS MAKE A CLOSE SEARCH IN THE SUMMER-HOUSE FOR CLAUDE DUVAL AND SIXTEEN-STRING JACK.

LET us now leave Dick Turpin and Tom King upon the lonely spot appointed for the meeting-place, and revert to the proceedings of Claude Duval and Sixteen-String Jack, who we last left in such a very critical situation.

It will, no doubt, be fresh in the remembrance of the reader, that, after a hard chase by the dragoons, the two highwaymen took shelter in a summer-house, and concealed themselves behind a screen with a tall back, which which was placed across one corner of it.

Scarcely had they concealed themselves in this imperfect hiding-place, than two persons, a young man and a girl—lovers—entered and seated themselves upon the screen, thus making our two friends prisoners.

A conversation had then taken place between Minnie and Ernest—for such were the names by which they addressed each other—to which Claude and Jack listened with great interest.

They were about to part and leave the summer-house, when they were startled by a sound, which drew a cry of terror from the young girl's lips, for there was nothing she so much dreaded as the discovery of her presence in that place in company with the young man Ernest.

The sound was the measured and regular tramp of many footsteps.

Minnie had started to her feet, so great was her alarm, and doubtless she would have darted out of the summer-house had not her lover flung his arms protectingly about her waist.

It was, then, only natural that she should cling to him for safety.

To our friends the sound was intelligible enough, and they felt quite as much alarm as the young girl, although they did not give such audible expression to it.

The dragoons were approaching; of this they were quite sure, and it was also certain that their discovery would inevitably take place.

Still they had the presence of mind not to do anything that was at all calculated to precipitate matters.

They remained profoundly still, resolved to let events take their natural course.

All they did was to shrink still closer to the soft ground of the summer-house.

An anxious moment followed, and then the door of the summer-house was flung open.

A party of dragoons entered.

They were led by the officer, whose mind was filled with vexation to think he should have to intrude with his men upon the lord of the manor's ground upon such an occasion as the present.

As soon as he entered the summer-house he caught sight of Ernest and Minnie.

The moment he did so he called out to his men to halt.

He saw directly that he had made an unwelcome intrusion, and he deeply regretted that he had done so.

A glance was sufficient to show him that Minnie was of elevated rank.

Her dress at once bespoke that, without her personal appearance, which was eminently aristocratic.

Then her companion, Ernest, though only plainly and neatly dressed, was exceedingly noble in his deportment, and he looked upon the intruders with flashing and angry eyes.

The officer of dragoons, perceiving that he had interrupted a love scene between two of the lord of the manor's guests, bowed low, while he said, in a voice of great civility and respect:

[CLAUDE DUVAL AND SIXTEEN-STRING JACK BIND THE SERVANTS TO THE TREE.]

"I ask a thousand pardons of you, fair lady, and of you, noble sir. I regret this intrusion exceedingly, and nothing but serious duty should have tempted me to make it. But know, noble sir, that myself and my men are in search of two notorious and most desperate highwaymen. We have tracked them to these grounds—almost to this very spot. We have entered this summer-house in search of them. I am sorry, very sorry"——

"Pray, make no further apologies," said Ernest, interrupting him, "but do your duty without delay. Search the summer-house and depart. It will not take you long to do so."

"Would you answer me a question, noble sir?" asked the captain of dragoons.

"What is it?"

"How long have you been in this summer-house?"

"Why do you ask that?"

"Simply because, if you have been here some time, and you have not seen the men we seek, we need not disturb you with making a search."

"We have been here some time," replied Ernest. "I could not take upon myself to say precisely how long; we have not seen the men you speak of or heard them."

"That is enough, then," replied the officer of dragoons.

"Nay, nay," said Ernest. "Stay a moment, I beseech you. They may have entered here and concealed themselves before we came in. It will not take you a moment to search the place, as there is no hiding-place in it; therefore, I pray you, do so."

"As you have no objection to such a proceeding," replied the officer of dragoons, "I should much prefer looking around me. As you say, it will not take a moment."

With these words, the officer advanced a few steps into the summer-house.

The hearts of the highwaymen sunk within them.

A moment before they had ventured to indulge in the hope that the great danger with which they were menaced would pass away, leaving them unhurt.

But the words which Ernest uttered filled them with despair again.

It was quite clear that the officer of dragoons was only too glad to avail himself of the opportunity of searching the summer-house.

Courtesy and deference to the two persons who occupied it would have prevented his insisting upon the point.

"We will not trouble you with our presence for more than a moment," he said. "This place is very small, and, as you say, contains no hiding-place."

The officer turned round to his followers, and called two of them forward.

"Now, my lads," he said, "look closely about you, and be as quick as you can."

Ernest troubled himself no further either with the dragoons or their proceedings.

He found that Minnie was in a terrible state of agitation, and it required all his attention to endeavour to calm and soothe her.

That which she had most of all dreaded had come to pass. She had been seen alone in the summer-house with Ernest when it was thought she had retired to her chamber from indisposition.

This occurrence filled her mind with the utmost alarm, and this feeling was heightened by the appearance of the dragoons, who had a very military and ferocious look.

From the description we have already given of the place, the reader must be aware that it did not take the dragoons long to perform their search.

The officer assisted them.

In less than a minute every corner was examined with a minuteness that was perfectly unnecessary, except the one across which the screen was placed.

The reason for this was simple enough.

Ernest and Minnie stood close against the screen, and the dragoons were fearful of being too intrusive.

But Ernest, perceiving that every other part had been searched without result, anticipated the wishes of the commanding officer by saying—

"You have searched everywhere but here. If you will allow us, we will step aside."

He removed a few paces as he spoke.

"Well, just for satisfaction's sake," replied the officer, "I will just jump up and have a peep behind the screen; not that I think there is the slightest probability of our finding there those we seek; but still we shall be able to say we left no portion of this building unsearched."

"Exactly!" said Ernest.

The chief officer now sprang up on to the seat of the screen.

The back was so tall that he could only just see over it then.

Of course, the corner was in profound darkness.

"I can't see anything here," he said. "I will soon satisfy myself, however, and then we will take our departure."

With these words the officer drew the long cavalry sabre which he wore by his side.

While holding it firmly by the hilt in his hand, he placed it over the back of the screen, and allowed it to hang at the full length of his arm.

He scraped it along the woodwork, and struck it against the sides of the summer-house.

These were the only obstacles he encountered.

Sixteen-String Jack and Claude Duval quite gave themselves up for lost when they heard the officer announce his intention of searching behind the screen.

Nothing could save them now.

Can the reader imagine their feelings when they heard the officer spring upon the seat?

They heard him draw his sword, and their hearts sickened at the sound.

They looked up, and saw the bright blade thrust over the back of the screen.

Closer and closer they crouched unto the ground, while, with straining eyes, they watched the movements of the sabre, as the officer waved it about in all directions.

They shuddered as its point passed within a hair's breadth of them.

Had the officer's arm been an inch longer, or had the back of the screen been low enough to allow him to lean over it, they would have been touched.

This would have discovered them, for the officer would be able to tell in a moment whether the point of his sword touched anything like a human body.

But by a miracle the highwaymen escaped

The officer had waved his sword about in every possible direction without feeling any obstruction, and he was convinced there was no one behind the screen.

Once or twice, however, they had a narrow escape, when the point of the sabre approached them so close as almost to touch.

But they escaped; and, contrary to all their expectations, the officer jumped down off the screen as he said—

"I ask you ten thousand pardons for this interruption. The rascals are not here, that is very certain, although we traced them to within a few yards of this very spot. I did not think it possible they could be here, however, as you have been occupying the place for some time. Good evening, lady, and good evening to you, sir; I am much obliged to you for your kindness in allowing me to search this place, and I again ask ten thousand pardons for the intrusion."

"Make no apologies, I beg," returned Ernest.

"Good evening, sir."

The officer bowed and took his departure, followed by his men.

The lovers stood listening to the sound of their retreating footsteps.

The ears of the highwaymen likewise drank in that sound.

They could not at present realize that they had escaped—that the dreadful danger had passed away.

But such was really the case.

It would not be possible to imagine a more hair-breadth escape.

The highwaymen owed their safety, however, unquestionably to the idea which had got possession of the officer's mind.

He had made the search more for the mere form than anything else.

When Ernest told him he had been there for some time, he jumped to the conclusion that he must look elsewhere for his prey.

How different would have been the result if he had entered the summer-house with the full conviction that those he sought were there!

He would not have rested until he had made the closest search.

He would not have been content with examining the recess behind the screen with his sword only, but he would have removed the screen itself.

Discovery would have then followed.

As it was, he missed them when the highwaymen were within arm's-length of him.

Claude and Jack had quite made up their minds they should be captured.

They determined to remain where they were up to the last moment, without moving a muscle; but, when they were found, they resolved to struggle desperately with their foes before they submitted.

It was, then, through these combined circumstances that they remained in safety.

When Ernest and Minnie had entered the summer-house so soon after them, they looked upon it as a most unfavourable circumstance.

It had proved their salvation.

It would have afforded our friends great pleasure if they could have spoken, and congratulated themselves upon what had taken place.

But they were denied this gratification.

It would not do to move until the lovers had quitted the summer-house.

This brought to their minds the unpleasant fact that, although they had escaped this time, they had not eluded the dragoons for all that.

In the contemplation of their late close danger, they forgot that their real position was in no way improved.

They had heard the officer say that he had tracked them close to the summer-house.

If so, after all the pains he had taken, and the determination he had shown, it was not very likely he would very readily abandon the search.

He would place his men on the watch so as to discover when the highwaymen made an attempt to leave the ground.

This was a very uncomfortable reflection, and each busied himself in endeavouring to decide upon some plan which would enable them to elude the vigilance of the dragoons.

They then recollected that they were totally ignorant of the nature or extent of the grounds surrounding the mansion where such a scene of festivity was taking place, and, what was worst of all, they had no horses, while their enemies were well provided with these useful creatures.

Indeed, it seemed as though the more they pondered upon their situation the more dangerous and difficult it appeared to grow.

How they were to get free they knew not, but they agreed that unless some event of a very extraordinary nature indeed took place they must be captured.

They were terribly cramped, too, in their uncomfortable post behind the screen, and yet they dared not move in consequence of the presence of Minnie and Ernest.

How long the lovers would remain they knew not, but it was quite certain they would not be able to stir until after their departure.

CHAPTER CCCCXXXIII.

CLAUDE DUVAL AND SIXTEEN-STRING JACK FIND THEIR POSITION IN THE SUMMER-HOUSE BECOMES COMPLICATED.

Such, then, is a brief summary of the disagreeable reflections which chased each other through the minds of Claude Duval and Sixteen-String Jack after the dragoons had taken their departure.

To correctly describe their position, it would be necessary to say that they were environed by danger.

Such was actually and really the case.

They almost felt inclined to relinquish hope altogether.

Their attention was, however, attracted by the lovers, whose presence now they would willingly have dispensed with, although such a little while ago it had been of such service to them.

Minnie and Ernest were talking, and the subject-matter of their discourse was of so interesting a character, that the highwaymen became completely absorbed in listening to it.

After the dragoons had left, the lovers stood for some moments looking in the direction in which they had gone, and listening to the sound of their footsteps.

But when the sounds had completely died away, Ernest led his fair companion back to the screen again.

She suffered him to do so, and to seat her upon it, and to place himself at her side.

She made not the slightest resistance.

She trembled violently, and seemed as though she was about to faint.

Ernest observed this with alarm, and strove to rouse her and cheer her up.

"Come, Minnie, dearest," he said; "do not be so alarmed. "Cheer up, dear one; there is nothing to fear. Speak to me, darling; speak to me!"

"Alas!" replied Minnie, in a faint voice, that was half-choked with tears and sobs. "Alas! dearest, what I most of all feared and dreaded has come to pass. We have been seen here together and alone, and at this time of night, too!"

"It cannot be helped, dear one," replied her lover; "and yet the fault is mine. It is I, and I only, who asked you to come hither, and then, when you did come, pressed you to stay longer than you wished."

"No, no; it is not your fault. But, oh! Ernest, what is to be done? When my father hears of this"——

"You alarm yourself unnecessarily, dear one. Those soldiers do not know us."

"How can you be sure of that? I fancy, by the manner of the officer, that he recognised me."

"Well, dearest, and what if he did?"

"My father"——

"Well, he must know of it some day, must he not? And why not to-night?"

"Oh! I tremble at the thought. The moment when he learns our attachment will be a terrible one! It is but yesterday since he spoke of you in a manner that almost broke my heart."

"He is unjust, Minnie; he is unjust. He speaks wrongly of me. It is not so long ago that he seemed to love me as his own son; at any rate, he thought he could have no better companion than myself, and now look how great the change is!"

Minnie sobbed.

"It is true my father experienced a sudden and unexpected reverse of fortune. But what of that? Except in worldly wealth I was not changed, and yet, from that unfortunate hour, how he has treated me! He has broken off the friendship which existed between me and your brother; he has forbidden me ever to approach his house; he loads me with foul epithets—as beggar, upstart, and the like! Is not this unjust?"

"Most unjust, dear Ernest," answered Minnie.

"But I have not changed either with your fortunes or with theirs."

"You have not, my darling; and if this malicious stroke of fortune has accomplished so much evil, yet there is good mixed with it, for it has proved the truth and constancy of your love."

A slight pause followed, and then Ernest continued—

"I do not want to raise false hopes in your breast, and yet I wished to tell you there is a chance of our being able to recover our lost position. I cannot tell for certain yet, and do not buoy yourself up too much with the hope, lest your disappointment should be proportionately bitter."

"I am glad there is hope, Ernest, very glad; but still I think, even if you were to gain your lost position, that my father would change again, and be as he was before. You know, as well as I do, that he has wishes of his own. In his own mind, he has already decided upon whom my hand is to be disposed."

"I do know it, dearest; and the knowledge would crush me with despair, did I not also know that you will resist so great a stretch of parental authority."

"I will resist; and yet, when I look into the future, I shudder. The prospect to me is truly full of terror. Oh! Ernest, my father's wrath will be fearful to witness!"

"Let us hope for better things, Minnie."

"I wish I could see room for hope; you know not how gladly I would seize upon any, even if it should prove to be a straw. My father's pride would prevent him from receiving you again, no matter how much your worldly prospects might be bettered. His true motive for treating you as he has is a mercenary one; but he has endeavoured to conceal it by substituting others. It would be too transparent if he was to welcome you in your fresh-found felicity after having once turned his back upon you."

"I fear you speak only too truly, Minnie," said Ernest, in a sad tone of voice. "I can see but one means, dearest, of securing our happiness."

"What is that?"

"Do not be offended with me if I propose it. It is that we both fly together from this spot. You need not fear to trust yourself with me. I love you dearer than I love my life. No harm shall come to you, and I will exert my best efforts to make you a happy wife."

"No—no, Ernest! I cannot listen to such a proposal as that. I cannot—I cannot!"

"Let me add one more word. You have said yourself that your father is unjust: then let me ask you, is his injustice to doom us to perpetual unhappiness? No—no! Ten thousand times no! He has not the right to make us wretched. We love each other truly. Happiness is within our reach; why not embrace it?"

"You cannot tempt me, Ernest!"

"But you say you have no hope. Just for a moment, dear one, let us look the terrible future steadily in the face. If we do so, rely upon it, half its terrors will disappear. You say your father will never consent to our union. I believe it. I do not think he ever will. Have you then made up your mind to forsake me, or will you consummate your happiness and my own at the same moment?"

"Oh, Ernest, I must think—I must reflect. Besides, there is no need for precipitation, and—ha!"

A piercing scream suddenly came from Minnie's lips as she abruptly paused in the middle of her sentence.

The highwaymen wondered greatly what could be the cause of it, and listened for an explanation.

It soon came.

Some other person had entered the summer-house, and they heard a stern and angry voice say—

"How now, minion? Is this the obedience you owe your father? By heaven! when I heard of this clandestine meet I refused to credit it, and came here solely to confute my informer. Come here, unworthy girl; and you, dastardly villain! prying beggar! sneaking upstart! by what right do you intrude upon my grounds?"

Another shriek from Minnie's lips followed this speech, and then her father, for such he was, sprang forward, and, seizing her by the wrist with great violence, drew her towards him.

Ernest's eyes flashed, and his hand sought the hilt of the sword that was suspended from his side.

But he recollected himself, and, in a quiet tone of voice, said—

"Had any other person save yourself, my lord, given utterance to the words which have just come from your lips, you should have paid for them with your heart's best blood. But you are her father, and I hold your person sacred."

"Ha! ha! These are the romantic speeches which have caught the ear of my foolish daughter, but they will have no effect upon me. Pah! I spit upon you, as I would upon some noxious reptile or loathsome wretch!"

"Look to your daughter," said Ernest, calmly, and without taking the least notice of the other's words. "Look to your daughter; she is fainting!"

"I will see to her, sirrah, and take better care of her for the future than I have done hitherto. Begone, villain! Quit my sight, or I will call my servants to whip you off my grounds!"

"My lord, forbear! You have no need to proceed to such extremities."

"Then go."

"Look to your daughter, my lord," repeated Ernest, in the same calm, level tone of voice.

"I will, sir. And since you promise to depart, I will allow you fifteen minutes to do so. If, after that time, you are found upon my estates, you shall be publicly horsewhipped off. And look you, sir, should you come here again in the same clandestine manner as you have to-night, beware! My servants will be instructed how to treat you if they find you."

To these words Ernest made no reply.

It cost him, however, a great effort thus to subdue his rage, for he was by nature of a violent and impetuous disposition.

But the recollection that the person who stood before him was the father of Minnie enabled him to retain his self-possession.

He stood quite still and silent.

Minnie had fainted, but her father's arm sustained her; and now he raised her in his arms and carried her from the summer-house.

Still Ernest did not move.

He gazed in the direction they had gone, and said—

"And so this is the end! All is over now. The dream of my life has passed away. Minnie, I know, is of too gentle and yielding a disposition to set herself up in vigorous opposition to her father. I dare not approach. I have lost her for ever! I have seen her for the last time!"

He paced now up and down the narrow limits of the summer-house, and gave way to the deepest grief.

"It is in vain," he muttered, "quite in vain, to think that I shall ever be able to win her father's consent. Nothing could be more impossible. And then Minnie? She will not, I am sure, become my wife without it. I must banish her from my thoughts. From this time forth I must forget all happiness that I had pictured in the future. Nothing is now before me, save cheerless, blank despair. Well—well! Perhaps it was to be so!

He sank down again upon the screen and buried his face in his hands.

He sobbed audibly, and his whole frame shook with the intensity of his emotion.

Then he raised his head.

"I will take one more glance at this place," he continued. "It is here where I last beheld her; here where she last sat! I have seen her for the last time; but the appearance of this place will be for ever imprinted upon my memory. I shall never be able to forget it. It is a sad pleasure. I will gaze for a moment longer, and then depart. I know her father's character too well to think that he would shrink from carrying out his word. I will go."

He rose to his feet.

During the time he had been thus giving audible expression to his thoughts, under the belief that he was alone, Claude Duval had been busy with his thoughts.

A fresh idea had occurred to him altogether.

He fancied he should be able to accomplish at one stroke two very desirable things.

One was to secure the happiness of those two who so fondly and truly loved each other; and the second was to accomplish their own escape.

The only difficulty he was in was how to make his companion acquainted with his intentions.

That, however, was simply impossible.

Claude, however, believed that he could carry out his scheme successfully; and so, when Ernest rose to his feet, as we have related, Claude touched his comrade, so as to attract his attention, and then, to Sixteen-String Jack's unutterable surprise, he got up.

Claude was tall, but yet, when he stood at his full height, he could not see over the top of the screen.

This difficulty, however, he soon overcame.

Taking hold of the top of the screen with his hands, he raised himself up by the muscles in his arms.

"Hish!" he said. "One moment, sir. I wish to speak to you."

It was to Ernest that Claude addressed himself, and that individual was not a little surprised to hear himself called when he felt so sure he was alone.

Claude spoke again.

"Wait a moment," he said, "I want to speak to you, sir!" I have something of great importance to communicate."

This was quite a pacific speech; but, nevertheless, Ernest, who had thoroughly recovered himself, drew his sword, and stood in an attitude of defence, as he said—

"I know not who and what you are, nor whether you speak true. If, however, you have any evil or sinister design, beware, for I am a desperate man, and one that will not bear trifling with."

"You have nothing to apprehend from me, I can assure you," said Claude, as he began to scramble over the back of the screen. "As I told you, I have something of importance to communicate, and you will find it to your interest to pay particular attention to what I am going to say."

Upon receipt of this assurance, Ernest lowered the point of his sword, and Claude stepped down on the ground.

"My comrade is with me," said Claude Duval. "Here, Jack; come over. All is well."

Ernest looked rather uncomfortable when Sixteen-String Jack responded to his companion's call, and likewise scrambled over the back of the screen.

"Pardon me," he said, "I cannot understand how you could come from behind that screen. The officer of the dragoons searched that corner."

"I know he did, sir," replied Claude, gaily; "but you see he did not find us."

"Then—then you—you are the persons of whom he was in search?"

"Just so."

"Highwaymen?"

"Exactly."

Ernest raised his sword again.

"I have already cautioned you," he said, "and I again say, beware!"

"Put down your sword, sir; you have nothing to fear from us. We are highwaymen. We admit it. You will excuse us, sir, for not having introduced ourselves properly. It is not too late to repair the omission. This, then, sir, is my old comrade in many an adventure, by name John Rann, but better known to the world as Sixteen-String Jack. As for myself, my name is Claude Duval."

Ernest gave two starts when these two names fell upon his ear.

At the conclusion of his speech, however, Claude took off his hat, and made quite a courtly bow.

Sixteen-String Jack followed his example.

It was, perhaps, mere habit that made Ernest return the bow, but he did so, and said, rather stiffly—

"My name is Ernest—Ernest Leigh, at your service."

The two highwaymen bowed again, and Claude said—

"Now, Mr. Ernest Leigh, if such is your title, I have something to say to you which I am certain will elicit all your interest."

CHAPTER CCCCXXXIV.

CLAUDE DUVAL UNFOLDS TO ERNEST LEIGH A VERY CLEVER AND INGENIOUS PLAN OF ESCAPE.

THE young man assumed an attitude of attention, in spite of the amazement and uneasiness that he felt.

He could not for the life of him imagine what this communication could be about, and his curiosity was roused to the utmost pitch.

He scarcely knew what to think of the two highwaymen.

He did not sheathe his sword, but held it negligently in his hand, and picked holes in the ground with it.

Claude perceived that Ernest was all attention, and waiting for him to speak, and felt rather confused.

He knew not how to begin, but, urged on by necessity, he said—

"I hope, sir, that your mind is clear enough to see that the fact of our being a couple of highwaymen does not incapacitate us from possessing some information which will be of service to you. Assuming this, I wish you also to understand that we contemplate no direct nor indirect attack upon your purse. A parson is not always preaching, and a highwayman is not always committing robberies."

"Proceed, sir," said Ernest; "that is quite sufficient introduction."

"I am glad to hear it," said Claude, much relieved. "That prefaces myself. To come to the point—myself and my comrade, being pursued by the dragoons, entered these grounds. While hastening onward, we suddenly heard footsteps before us. We paused and listened. The footsteps approached. If we had kept along the gravel-path, we should have been seen by the persons who were advancing. It was necessary that we should be unseen. We could not retreat over the garden-beds, for the path of which I speak was bounded on both sides by a tall quickset hedge. We had no alternative, save to retreat. Do you understand me?"

"Perfectly, but I must say I cannot, for the life of me, see how this concerns me."

"Have patience for a moment, sir. I wanted to account for our presence behind the screen yonder, which, I should think, seemed not a little mysterious to you."

"I confess it does. Pray, sir, proceed, and tell your story, after your own fashion."

"Suppose we sit down, sir. We shall be able to talk more in comfort then."

"Agreed."

Claude and Jack seated themselves upon the screen, while Ernest Leigh just rested himself against the table that was placed opposite to it.

Then Claude went on—

"Well, sir, hearing some one coming, we retreated until we came to this summer-house, which we entered in the hope that those who were coming would pass by, and leave the path clear for us. Still we thought it prudent to conceal ourselves. We looked round, but could perceive no other hiding-place than the space behind this screen. There was no time for delay, so we scrambled over the top with all speed."

"Well?"

"Scarcely had we done so, than we heard some one enter. Need I say who?"

"Myself and"——

"Just so. You came in and seated yourselves. Can you imagine our consternation? We were prisoners, for we could not even move without discovery. Not to linger over this portion of my story, placed where we were, we could not avoid overhearing every word that was said."

"But," said Ernest, "I cannot understand how you escaped the sword of the officer when he waved it about."

"We did so by a miracle. I felt it hiss past my face once or twice."

"So did I," said Sixteen-String Jack.

"But we had the presence of mind to keep perfectly still."

Ernest Leigh looked from one of the highwaymen to the other, in admiration at the cool and off-hand manner in which they spoke of their narrow escape from capture.

Claude continued—

"You will think I have been a long time in coming to the point, but I have reached it at last.

"We have—quite unavoidably—overheard all that has been said during the time we have been in concealment. What has reached our ears, though not exactly a narrative, yet embodies so many important facts, that we have no difficulty whatever in comprehending the precise position of affairs."

"Well, sir?"

"I hope you will take no objection to my blunt way of speaking; but, as you know, we have heard all. I can't see any reason why we should mince matters. I understand, of course, your relations to the young lady you call Minnie. I also know what her father's mind is."

"Ah! I had forgotten his parting promise."

"Pho! pho! Never mind him. You have, I suppose, not given up all hopes of making this young girl your wife?"

"Excuse me," said Ernest; "the subject is too painful and delicate a one to be discussed before strangers."

"But we are no strangers; we know all about it; and all I can say is, that, if you have given up all hope, you are a very different young gentleman to what I took you to be."

"Well, sir, what if I hope still?"

"Just this. I think you will find that, now her father has behaved with so much harshness to her, and, now that she knows it is madness to hope that he will ever give his consent to your union—I say, knowing all this, I think you will find that the young lady, rather than give you up, will be inclined to listen to you if you propose some well-laid plan of flight."

Ernest Leigh shook his head.

"I have no such hope."

"Pho! pho! You have—or you ought to have. At any rate, you will not give her up without making at least one effort to obtain her."

"Oh! sir, I know not what to think. I have, indeed, had no time for the reflection; and the strangeness of the events which have just occurred have set my brain in a perfect whirl."

"Then, let me think for you, and save you the trouble, for, under the circumstances you name, thought is a very difficult thing indeed. Let me propose a course of action to you. You can please yourself whether you carry it out."

"Well, sir, go on."

"If you will take my advice, the first thing you will do will be to set his lordship's commands, about quitting the grounds, at defiance. Then, in the second place, you will obtain an interview with the young lady, and, if you will only make use of some good arguments, I'll warrant she will come round to your way of thinking."

"You raise strange hopes in my breast—hopes which I dare not entertain; and yet, until you spoke, my mind was filled with nothing but despair."

"I know it, and now it is filled with hope."

"No, no; I cannot entertain such hope. You speak of impossibilities. How can I set all his servants at defiance, and obtain an interview with Minnie?"

"If you will make up your mind to do so, you will find you will not have much trouble. The old proverb says—'Love laughs at locksmiths.'"

"Well, sir, I must admit you have given me fresh hopes. I will not relinquish her hand without, at least, an effort to retain possession of it. But there is one thing I cannot understand, and that is your motive for troubling yourselves in this affair."

"If I told you that it was a disinterested motive, in all probability you would not believe me, and most certainly it would not be the truth. Our motive is to escape."

"But how?"

"Well, sir, that depends if you can succeed in persuading the young lady to fly with you; and, mind, I don't think you will fail. It will afford us an opportunity of eluding the vigilance of the dragoons. Without the adoption of some stratagem to get away, we shall, in the end, be discovered. For instance, the first thing the officer of dragoons will do, having failed to find us, will be to post his men all round this place, and give them strict injunctions to look out for us."

"I see. But how am I to help you?"

"We shall not require you to do anything more than carry off the young lady. If you fail in this, we must adopt some other plan."

"This is the strangest thing I have heard of."

"If you like," said Claude Duval, "I will give you full details of our plan."

"Pray do so, for my curiosity is roused to the utmost."

"I will do so, then, in as few words as possible. In the first place, then, we will assume that you have succeeded in persuading the young lady to fly with you."

Ernest Leigh smiled, and said—

"Well?"

"You will have to be careful what you do, for her absence would be discovered, and a close pursuit commenced."

"I suppose so."

"It is quite certain. Now, sir, the first thing I want to know—have you got a carriage?"

"No."

"No!" repeated Claude, in a disappointed voice.

"No, I have not. But is it so essential?"

"Well, yes. But do you know anyone who is here to-night with a carriage?"

"Yes, several."

"Could you borrow one?"

"I am afraid not."

"Ha! then you throw me out. But never mind; I shall, perhaps, be able to think of some means by which the difficulty may be overcome; or, perhaps, you may be able to suggest something. I will narrate to you my original plan."

"I shall be glad to hear it."

"I imagined, then, that you were one of the guests at this place, and that you would have a carriage. In the event of such being the case, I should have proposed that you called your servants aside, and ordered them to have changed dresses with us."

"With you?"

"Yes; we would then have returned, instead of the two servants, and take their places. One of us would have got up behind and the other seated himself on the box. We should then take you on your way at such a rapid rate as would defy pursuit, and accomplish our own escape at the same time, for the dragoons would never think of looking for us under that disguise."

"Bravo!" cried Sixteen-String Jack, as he clapped his hands together. "Capital!"

The reader will remember that the details of the plan thus unfolded were quite new to him.

He was delighted beyond measure.

But as for Ernest Leigh, he was completely taken aback at the boldness of it.

"Can it be really possible that you contemplated carrying out such a desperate scheme?"

"Pho! pho! my dear sir, it is nothing. Our position just at the present time is, I confess, somewhat desperate, and therefore we must employ desperate means to get out of it."

"But as I have no carriage here, and as it is not possible for me to borrow one from any of the guests, how then?"

"We shall get out of that difficulty, never fear," said Claude Duval. It struck me, however, as being a very simple way of bringing about certain desirable events."

"Claude," said Sixteen-String Jack, just one word with you."

Jack whispered something in his ear.

"Ha! To be sure. The very thing!" were Duval's comments as he listened.

Then, turning towards Ernest Leigh, he said—

"With your assistance, sir, I have no doubt we shall be able to carry out the scheme I proposed."

"In what way can I be of service to you?"

"You can give us some information, which it is necessary we should have, and of which we are, at present, deficient."

"What is it?"

"In the first place, what is the name of the owner of this domain?"

"Lord Mortimer."

"Very good. I will remember it."

"Is that all you desire to know?"

"Yes; just at present."

"Can you tell me whether any of the guests are taking their departure?"

"I cannot say for certain, but I think it very likely that, as the hour is so late, several are about to start."

"Just so. And it is usual for the carriages to remain in a kind of rank for a little time until the owners of them are in readiness."

"Yes, yes."

"Well, then, can you take me by an obscure and unfrequented road to this place?"

"Yes."

"Then I must trouble you to do so, and then we can talk a little further."

"Come on, then. I shall be right glad to quit this place. I have been expecting an interruption every moment."

Ernest Leigh went towards the door of the summer-house as he spoke.

The two highwaymen rose instantly to their feet.

"You must understand that it is essentially necessary that we should not be seen by anyone."

"All right; I can take you where you want to go over the garden-beds, and through the shrubbery. I am well acquainted with the place."

"Then your knowledge will now be of good service. Lead the way, sir; we will follow."

Ernest Leigh stepped forward, taking his way with the manner of one who was quite confident about going right.

His mind was in a very strange state of agitation, however.

Had anyone told him he would voluntarily become a companion to two highwaymen, he would have laughed the idea to scorn.

And yet, here he was.

They had spoken to him courteously and kindly.

Had they been of his own station, they could not have comported themselves in a more gentlemanlike manner.

They had spoken words of consolation to him.

They had inspired him with hope at the moment when he was utterly downcast and despairing.

In addition to this, he possessed that strong love for strange adventures which seems inherent in every human breast.

He had no doubt now about the good faith of the two highwaymen.

Had they professed that their sole object was to advantage him, he would have had his suspicions.

As it was, however, they had frankly and truly stated their own position, and shown him how, while serving him, they would achieve their escape from a difficulty which could not be over-estimated.

It would answer their purpose to befriend him.

But the reader, who must be familiar enough with the dispositions of the two highwaymen, will know well enough that they would gladly undertake so pleasant an adventure as that of assisting two young people to be happy.

With his mind occupied with these reflections, Ernest Leigh led our friends in a straight line over the garden-beds, trampling down in his course, without any remorse, the choicest and most beautiful of flowers.

By-and-by the shrubbery was reached.

Claude and Jack conversed together in low, whispering tones, and further elaborated their plan of escape.

Presently Ernest paused, and turning round said—

"If you advance a few paces further, cautiously, you will be able to see what you desire, I think."

Claude and Jack immediately stepped forward, taking care, as they did so, to make no more bustling with the twigs than they could help.

Then, looking through, they could see a broad avenue in which was a long line of beautiful carriages.

The coachmen and footmen were sitting and standing about, waiting to take their turn to drive up to the hall door, for many of the guests were taking their departure.

Claude beckoned Ernest to come nearer.

"Do you recognise any of those carriages?" he asked.

"Yes, several."

"Then we will have whichever one you like to select."

"But how?"

"Leave us to manage that. Just say which one."

"It is immaterial."

"Is there a carriage there the owner of which you owe a grudge to, because if there is it would be a good joke to make use of that one to escape with."

CHAPTER CCCCXXXV.

THE COACHMAN AND FOOTMAN BELONGING TO THE COUNTESS OF FARLAND'S CARRIAGE ARE EASILY DUPED BY CLAUDE DUVAL AND SIXTEEN-STRING JACK.

Ernest Leigh laughed silently as Claude pronounced these words, and he replied—

"Well, now you mention it, it would be a very good joke, and, strangely enough, there happens to be just before us the carriage of a certain old lady who has been the means of embittering Lord Mortimer against me more than anyone or anything else."

"That's the carriage for us, then. Which is it, sir?"

"That one just opposite with the pair of black horses, and the footman in the blue livery, faced with silver."

"I see it. All right. And now, what is the name of this lady?"

"The Countess of Farland."

"That is enough. We shall do now, never fear! The next thing will be for you to obtain an interview with Minnie, and persuade her to be the companion of your flight. Why do you sigh, sir, and shake your head?"

"I was thinking of the difficulty of the task, of which you speak with so much lightness."

"Pho! pho! A faint heart never yet won a fair lady! She loves you. That is sufficient. Rely upon it, sir, if you make up your mind to this course, you will succeed."

"I have no doubt of it," said Sixteen-String Jack. "You must not forget, sir, that chance compelled us to be auditors of what passed between you. She listened to your proposal at the first; and now that her father has interfered, depend upon it, when you renew your suit, she will consent."

"I think so, too," said Claude; "at any rate, make the effort. Were I in your place, I should not relinquish the lady without a severe struggle."

"Well, gentlemen, I will take your advice. You have filled my breast with renewed hopes. From my intimate knowledge of the premises, I have no doubt I shall be able to approach her."

"Then, when that is done, take my word for it, the rest will follow easily enough."

"But stay! We must make some further agreement. Where shall I find you?"

"I think we cannot do better than remain where we now are."

"You cannot do better."

"Then you will find us here."

"And the carriage?"

"When you arrive with the lady we will not keep you many minutes."

"Agreed, then." Farewell, sirs, for a time. I will try my fortune."

"'Confidence begets success.' Remember that in your undertaking. Bear in mind, too, that as you love this lady so dearly, your earthly happiness and her own depend upon yourself."

Ernest Leigh waved his hand and disappeared.

As soon as he was out of hearing, Claude said—

"Well, Jack, my friend, what do you think of my scheme?"

"Why, I think it as excellent a one as was ever devised."

"I like it myself; and I must say, too, that I admire your suggestion for overcoming the difficulty of getting a carriage."

"I think it can be done."

"I am sure of it. If you leave it to me I will guarantee it."

"You are confident."

"Oh! Jack, it is such a glorious thing to think how we shall pass right under the noses of these troublesome dragoons. No doubt, their officer will be cunning enough to peep into every carriage that goes out of the gates, but he would never think of looking for us acting the parts of coachman and footman."

"It is a rare scheme, Claude, a rare scheme; and, perhaps, even now we may be lucky enough to reach the gibbet on the Finchley-road before daybreak."

"Ah! I wonder whether Dick and Tom King are there, or whether they are held fast in some place or other, as we are here?"

"We cannot tell. We must wait and see. How lucky that your carriage has a pair of horses in it? They look good ones, too. They will do for us, and replace those we have unluckily lost."

"We shall want saddles."

"Oh! never mind that. Such a difficulty as that will be overcome without much trouble."

In such like conversation as this did Claude Duval and Sixteen-String Jack pass away the time which elapsed before Ernest Leigh returned.

To them it seemed an intolerable time, and they were fearful that the carriage they had decided upon making use of would start away before he came back.

They listened attentively for the slightest sound which might indicate his approach, but all remained silent.

They began to grow fidgety and impatient.

How long a time elapsed they knew not, but at length their ears were gladdened by a slight rustling sound.

They looked eagerly in the direction from which it came.

In another moment Ernest Leigh appeared.

His manner—his very walk—his attitude even showed our friends before he spoke that all was well.

Claude spoke first.

"You have succeeded?" he said.

"Yes, my friend. Contrary to my expectations, I have succeeded. I have had great trouble—first in getting access to her, and then in persuading her; but now all is arranged."

"I am very happy to hear it; but where is the lady?"

"She will be here directly. I shall return almost immediately, and she will accompany me. My object in coming here was to tell you, in order that you might have all in readiness."

"Good. We shall be ready, never fear."

"Enough, then. I will depart again."

"Stay a moment. Have you any idea how long you shall be?"

"I cannot tell to a few minutes."

"Shall you be less than a quarter of an hour?"

"No, I think not."

"Very well; in a quarter of an hour from now you can come to Lady Farland's carriage in safety and enter it. We shall be there as footman and coachman, and you can tell us then where we are to drive."

"Very good. You will be sure and perform your part?"

"Never fear for us, sir."

"We can come to the carriage-door with safety?"

"With every confidence."

"Well, you are a couple of clever fellows; and how you are going to manage it, I don't know."

"All is arranged; and now, sir, there is no time to lose."

"There is not."

"Farewell, then, for a quarter of an hour."

"Farewell."

Ernest Leigh, feeling quite like another being, turned away.

As soon as he had taken his departure, the two highwaymen set to work to carry out their scheme.

They had set themselves a great deal to do in a very short space of time.

We shall see whether they accomplished it.

They spoke with great confidence about the matter, and as though they had little fear of failure

"You stay here in readiness, Jack," said Claude Duval to his companion, "and I will go up to the carriage."

"All right, my friend. Be sure and act your part well."

"Never fear me," returned Claude.

As he spoke, he emerged from the shrubbery into the avenue.

Crossing this, he directed his steps in a straight line to the carriage.

The coachman—who was as fat as any coachman need wish to be—was sitting on his box, apparently in a doze, while the footman was standing near, conversing with one of his liveried fraternity.

Claude Duval made his way up to the footman with a confident and commanding air.

He touched him slightly on the arm as he said—

"Can you tell me whether this is the Countess of Farland's carriage?"

The footman looked at Claude from head to foot, and then, drawing himself up into what he doubtless deemed himself was an imposing and dignified attitude, he replied in a pompous voice—

"Yes, sir; this air the Countess of Farland's cawwidge."

"I thought so. The description given me was quite correct. You are one of her ladyship's domestics, I presume?"

"Yes, sir, I air."

"Yes; his lordship told me that your livery was blue, faced with silver."

The footman looked down at his attire complacently.

"If you will be good enough to step aside a moment," continued Claude, "I will deliver his lordship's message."

The footman waved his hand to the companion he had been talking with, who fell back a few paces.

"What is his lordship's pleasure?" asked the footman.

"I have just left Lord Mortimer and the Countess of Farland together. They have sent me to say that you and the coachman are to accompany me at once."

"Very good," said the footman. "You had better jump up on the box along with the coachman."

"No, no. You don't understand me."

"Oh!"

"You must not take the carriage, but come on foot with me."

"And who will look after the equipage?"

"They did not say anything about that."

"Oh! didn't they?"

"No. But I don't think they will want you for more than a minute or two. Perhaps your friend would just give an eye?"

"My friend?"

"Yes; the one you were talking to when I arrived."

"Oh! to be sure."

"Make haste, then."

"He won't mind, I know."

"That's right; ask him. There is no time for delay."

"I don't know who you are, sir, but it's a strange order. However, I suppose it will be all right?"

"Yes, you will find it all right."

The footman spoke a few words to his late companion, who replied to what he said by nodding his head.

So far, then, all was well.

The footman then came up to the coachman and touched him with his long bâton or staff.

"Hi! coachy!" he said. "You are momentuously wanted. Get down. Leonidas will have an eye on the equipage."

The coachman, hearing these words, descended from his box with as much alacrity as his obese body would allow.

"What's up?" he asked.

"We air to follow this gentleman," said the footman "so come along, because his lordship's in a hurry."

The coachman never for one moment dreamt of considering about anything.

It was enough for him to be told.

He obeyed.

Claude Duval was rejoiced beyond measure to think he had so easily succeeded in effecting his purpose.

It was more than he hoped for and expected.

He had prepared himself for a difficult task, but he found the coachman and footman fall into the snare with remarkable ease.

"Just follow me," he said to them, "and I will take you by the nearest route to where his lordship and your mistress are awaiting you."

They promised to do so.

Claude led the way to the shrubbery.

He wound his way through this.

According to the agreement which they had made with each other, Sixteen-String kept out of sight until the two servants had passed him.

As soon as this happened, he stepped silently from the tree behind which he had concealed himself, and brought up the rear.

He had no trouble in following, but he took care to keep at sufficient distance to be out of their hearing.

Claude Duval led the way with quite a confident step, and no one would have believed for a moment that he was wholly ignorant of the extent and arrangements of the grounds.

All he was intent upon, however, was to make his way in as straight a line as he possibly could to some place as far as possible removed from the mansion and the carriages.

A few minutes brought them to a very retired part of the grounds.

The coachman and footman now began to wonder whither they were being led, and a dim, uncomfortable idea that something was not altogether right took possession of their minds.

This idea soon expanded, until they became convinced that something was actually wrong.

Just as the footman was about in a whisper to intimate his suspicions to the coachman however, he was startled by feeling someone clutch him suddenly by the throat.

At the same moment he felt something cold thrust into his mouth.

Then a voice said, in tones of terrible menace and determination—

"This is a loaded pistol which I have just thrust into your mouth, and if you utter a sound above a whisper, I will pull the trigger and blow the top of your head off!"

It was Sixteen-String Jack who had thus cautiously and silently approached the footman, and seized him by the throat.

When he had finished uttering the threatening words we have recorded, he rattled the pistol against the footman's teeth, in order to give due effect to them.

Precisely at the same moment that Sixteen-String Jack thus seized the footman, Claude Duval turned round and grasped the coachman.

He held a pistol in his hand, and he presented it at his head, as he said—

"If you attempt to move or speak you are a dead man."

This speech appeared to have the effect of depriving the coachman of all his strength.

In some strange manner he collapsed and doubled up.

He would have fallen to the ground; but it so happened that a rustic garden-seat, which was close to him, received his bulky body.

There he sat, in about the most comical fashion imaginable, with his face and whole attitude expressive of the most ludicrous fright.

He opened his mouth to a preternatural width, and gasped for breath.

But he made no effort to speak.

He could tell, by the significant manner in which Claude had spoken, that the threat was not an idle one.

The footman, too, came directly to the conclusion that the best thing he could do was to make no resistance.

It is a singular thing that those persons whose lives are clearly of the least value are always the most particular in taking care of them.

Having thrown them into this state of fright, the two highwaymen proceeded to reassure them a little.

"Look here, both of you," said Claude Duval, "and pay particular attention to my words. You are in no danger; you have nothing whatever to fear—that is, if you do exactly as we command you. Do you understand?"

Claude raised his pistol as he spoke, and so did Sixteen-String Jack.

Mindful of the caution which had been given them not to speak above a whisper, the unfortunate footman and coachman contented themselves with nodding their heads in a furious manner.

Understanding by this that they understood what was said to them, Claude continued—

"Now then, listen to our commands, and obey! If you refuse, you are dead men. We want your clothes; off with them! Be quick! or we will slay you first and take them off your dead bodies!"

The two servants looked at each other in blank dismay.

A cold perspiration broke out all over them.

"Do you hesitate?" asked Claude, fiercely.

"Do you refuse?" asked Sixteen-String Jack, more fiercely still.

The response was a violent shaking of heads.

"Come, then, begin. Off with them! Quick! for your lives."

The footman groaned faintly, and took off his laced cocked hat.

The coachman divested himself of his wig and hat.

"I am glad to see you behave in such a sensible manner," said Claude Duval. "You would be perfect

[MAUD WELCOMES DICK TURPIN BACK TO THE DESERTED MANSION.]

madmen to resist; and as we are bent upon having your clothes, you may as well surrender them to us quietly as not. Come! off with the rest!"

Both seemed to be of this opinion; and, finding they could not help themselves, they began to rapidly pull off their clothes.

As soon as any garment was thus thrown down, our friends put it on, and in this manner they became gradually metamorphosed.

Sixteen-String Jack put on the footman's clothes, and Claude Duval the coachman's.

It was truly laughable to see with what eagerness they pulled off their clothes. Never before in all their lives had they undressed themselves so quickly.

In a little while the two unfortunate servants were stripped to their shirts

CHAPTER CCCCXXXVI.

SIXTEEN-STRING JACK AND CLAUDE DUVAL ENACT THE PARTS OF FOOTMAN AND COACHMAN TO GREAT PERFECTION.

THE reader must understand that Claude Duval and Sixteen-String Jack put these things on over their own, so that they could, at any time when they found it necessary, cast off the disguise which they were now so anxious to assume.

Having, by working upon the fears of the Countess of Farland's servants, succeeded in their design, another consideration forced itself upon the highwaymen, and demanded their immediate attention.

It is true by their threats they had obtained a complete mastery over these men, but as soon as they departed their influence would vanish; and then, naturally enough, the first thing the coachman and footman would think of doing would be to raise an alarm.

This would be fatal, and therefore it became clearly necessary to prevent this in some way or other.

After a moment's consideration, Claude and Jack agreed to gag them by tying their own neckcloths tightly over their mouths.

No sooner was this resolved upon than it was done.

Threatening the most terrible things they could think of if they made the least resistance, the two friends effectually put an end to all fear that the servants would raise an alarm by the tightness with which they bound them.

This was not all.

They would have to be deprived of the power of running away.

It is not to be supposed that the prevention of this presented many difficulties to the two highwaymen.

Sixteen-String Jack had a nice piece of strong rope which he had brought with him from Enfield Chase, and with this he resolved to bind them to a tree.

The poor wretches shivered in the cold night air, and their teeth chattered together like castanets.

But our friends were unfeeling and pitiless.

By using more threats, they compelled both to rise and place themselves in a convenient position against a tree.

Then with the aid of his piece of rope, Sixteen-String Jack bound them firmly to it.

As probably they did not possess the skill of the Davenport Brothers, there was little fear that they would free themselves and run off.

Then, as for calling attention to their situation by calling out, that was quite impossible, for they could not produce any articulate sound.

Having thus safely and securely disposed of them, our friends proceeded to give the finishing touches to their disguise.

The long great coat which the footman had worn was in itself quite sufficient to disguise Sixteen-String Jack without anything else, for when it was buttoned it concealed the whole of his apparel save his boots.

With Claude, however, it was different.

He had more difficulty.

There was a very great difference between his size and the size of the coachman; and the coat and waistcoat, when he put them on, like Falstaff's skin, "hung about him like a lady's loose gown."

To deceive the eyes of the man who had been left in charge of the carriage, it would be necessary to pad himself in some way.

Jack at once took off his own coat and waistcoat and gave them to him, so that all he had on were those taken from the footman.

Claude rolled them up in a very skilful manner, and, placing them in the proper position, gave himself the appearance of possessing great obesity.

"Now, Claude," said Jack, "let us be getting back. A quarter of an hour has elapsed, I am certain; and it would be a thousand pities for the plan to be spoilt, after succeeding so far, by Ernest and the lady arriving too soon."

"You are right, my friend. Come, I am ready; and a minute or two will serve to take us to the carriage."

"Forward, then, Claude, and lead the way."

At a sharp walk the two highwaymen took their way towards their destination, leaving the unfortunate flunkeys to their miserable fate.

How long they might stay there before they were found, our friends did not trouble themselves to speculate about.

They only hoped they would remain there in quiet until they had got beyond the reach of danger.

Claude had noted carefully the way he had come, so that he was able to retrace his steps without difficulty or hesitation.

Looking out on to the avenue from the shrubbery, they saw the countess's carriage just where they had left it.

They crossed over, and Claude Duval climbed on to the coachman's box with great nimbleness and agility.

The footman who had promised to look after the carriage was still there.

Seeing Sixteen-String Jack in the dark, he did not perceive the substitution that had been made.

He saw the blue livery [illegible] silver, and that was all.

"I am glad you have come back," he said. "I could not have waited a moment longer. I'm off! I suppose I shall see you to-morrow?"

Without waiting for any reply, the footman hurried off.

He had been called some time before and had already stayed as long as he dared.

Perceiving this, Sixteen-String Jack chuckled with satisfaction, for he was afraid he should not be able to deceive this fellow, who, doubtless, knew the real footman well.

Fortune seemed to favour them, however, to a degree for which they dared not hope.

The sooner, now, that the lovers made their appearance, the better it would be.

Sixteen-String Jack looked about for them anxiously.

Every moment they stayed here was fraught with danger.

The countess might call for her carriage, and then they would be in a regular fix.

Just when he had worked himself up into a perfect fever of excitement and agitation, Jack caught sight of two forms, evidently male and female, approaching him.

The obscurity was too great for Jack to be able to see with any degree of distinctness, and he was not sufficiently well acquainted with the personal appearance of Ernest Leigh to be able to say for certain whether he was one of the two approaching.

But Jack got nearer to the door of the carriage in order to be in readiness.

There was a kind of shrinking timidity and hesitation in the approach of these two figures, which made him think that he was not deceived.

In another moment they came near, and the light of the lamp belonging to the carriage falling upon them, revealed the face and form of Ernest Leigh.

Minnie was clinging heavily to his arm.

It seemed as though she had to support her steps.

What means or arguments the young man had made use of in order to induce her to accompany him in his flight Jack knew not.

It was sufficient for him that they were there.

As soon as he was quite sure that it was those who he expected who were approaching, he said—

"Quick, Mr. Leigh! Be quick, if you please. We are all in readiness, and waiting only for you. Quick! quick!"

The two lovers increased their speed.

A dozen more steps brought them to the door of the carriage.

Jack held it open for them to enter, and, putting his finger to the brim of his hat, in the most approved fashion, asked where they desired to go.

"To London," replied Ernest Leigh, without the slightest hesitation.

Jack closed the door, and, without making any reply, scrambled up on to the footboard at the back of the countess's carriage.

"To London, Claude," he said.

Claude Duval perpetrated a slight whistle, and then touched the horses with the whip.

The high-mettled creatures, impatient in the extreme at having been kept waiting so long, reared and plunged, and finally set off at a swift trot.

Claude Duval found that he had now a very difficult duty to perform.

It had only just then presented itself to his mind.

How was he to find his way out of the grounds?

The reader must remember he was totally in ignorance of them, and to take a wrong turn would be fatal.

He felt, however, that it was useless to perplex himself with this.

All he could do was to trust to his good luck for a guide, aided by keeping a sharp look-out around him.

Other carriages before him were on the move, and he thought he could not do better than follow them.

He did so, and presently found that he had reached the entrance doors of the mansion.

Here the other carriages stopped to take up their owners, and then drove off again.

But Claude did not stop.

He drove past the doors, and followed a carriage which had just started from them.

He did not doubt that if he kept close behind this he should be able to go the nearest way to the gates.

In this expectation he was not deceived.

After going a long way down a broad, serpentine avenue, he came in sight of some large iron gates.

Here there appeared to be some obstruction.

The carriage just in front stopped, and Claude was compelled to stop too.

After a brief delay it went on, but it stopped again just as it was about to pass through the gate.

Wondering what could be the meaning of this unusual proceeding, Claude looked keenly in advance, and Sixteen-String Jack stretched his body over the top of the carriage in order to catch a glance, if possible, at what was going on.

He could not make it out; but Claude, who occupied a far more favourable position, soon distinguished the forms of several dragoons mounted upon their horses.

They were ranged on each side of the gate in such a manner that every vehicle would have to pass between them.

What took place during the delay, Claude could not ascertain.

At length, however, the carriage preceding his was suffered to go on, and, not without a misgiving that after all their cleverness something had gone wrong, Claude set his horses in motion again.

Ere he had gone many yards, however, a voice cried—

"Pull up a moment, coachman."

For a moment Claude hesitated as to what he should do.

Would it be better to give his horses the whip and send them off at a gallop, or should he remain where he was and run the risk of discovery?

He did not hesitate long.

He pulled up.

He had confidence in the excellence of his disguise, and resolved to have it tested.

If he did not obey the command just uttered suspicion would be aroused, whereas by remaining he had hopes that he should be able to withstand the test.

Claude Duval and Sixteen-String Jack were not alone in feeling alarmed.

The sensation was shared in both by Ernest and Minnie.

Nor was their dismay in any way diminished when the window of the carriage was rather rudely let down from the outside.

A man's face appeared.

Ernest and Minnie recognised it instantly.

It was the face of the officer of dragoons.

He, too, evidently recognised the fugitives, for he smiled, while he took off his hat and made a low bow.

"Really, sir," he said, addressing himself to Ernest, "it seems as though I was doomed to intrude upon you to-night. On the present occasion I have no better excuse than that which I offered before. The two highwaymen, of whom we are in search, we have not yet been able to succeed in capturing. That they are somewhere in the grounds we are certain. They are quite clever enough to adopt some cunning scheme to escape, even to that of concealing themselves in a carriage, therefore I have determined to allow no carriage to depart unsearched. You can easily satisfy yourselves whether there is anyone concealed in your own vehicle, and then I will not detain you a moment longer. Be good enough then, sir, if you please, to look under the seats."

During this long time, Ernest Leigh had ample time to recover himself from any consternation he might have felt.

Willingly enough, then, he proceeded to look under the seats, and the dragoon was immediately convinced that the two highwaymen were not there.

"I ask a thousand pardons, but duty must be done," added the officer. "As soon as the guests have taken their departure, the lord of the manor will permit me to explore the grounds thoroughly. In the meantime they cannot escape. I have posted my men all round in an unbroken circle. If the villains attempt to leave they will be instantly discovered, while if they remain here until daybreak we shall be sure to find them. Good evening, sir. Some other carriages are waiting for my scrutiny."

With these words the officer of dragoons drew up the window of the carriage, and, standing aside, allowed the vehicle to pass on.

As soon as they had got to a safe distance Claude Duval crowed exultingly.

It was clear that the dragoons were completely baffled.

Much time would be spent in examining the different carriages, and there was every possibility that their flight would not be discovered until daybreak.

This, however, could not be far distant, so it behoved them to make good speed.

The horses in the carriage were of first-class quality, and the rate at which they drew the vehicle over the muddy roads was something surprising.

That both Claude and Jack were deeply grateful to Ernest and Minnie for furnishing them with the means of escape from a very dangerous position the reader need not be told.

They were, therefore, quite willing to undergo considerable danger in their behalf.

Nothing could be more unwise than for them to proceed to London, and yet Claude and Jack did not hesitate to take them there.

They drove off straight towards the metropolis.

During the ride, Ernest made Minnie acquainted with the strange incidents which had befel him since parting with her, and how it was they were performing their journey in the Countess of Farland's carriage.

It was while thus occupied that Ernest remembered that he had not asked the highwaymen whether it would be dangerous for them to drive into London.

He could not fail to be grateful to them—highwaymen as they were; for had it not been for them he would not have been so blessed as he was at that moment.

As soon as the thought occurred to him, then, he pulled the check-string.

Claude stopped at once, and Sixteen-String Jack got down and came to the door to know what was wanted.

"Excuse me," said Ernest Leigh, quickly; "when I asked you to drive to London the thought did not occur to me that it would be very dangerous for you to make your way thither. It would be dangerous, would it not?"

"I cannot truthfully say 'No' to that question," said Sixteen-String Jack; "but we are unwilling to do our service by halves."

"Never mind, you shall not drive us to London."

"We have already reached it."

"Is it possible?"

"Well, when I say we have reached it, we have very little further to go."

"What is to be done, then?"

"That I leave entirely, sir, to you. We will take you to any place you desire to mention."

"I shall mention none, because I do not wish to draw down upon you any unnecessary danger. Propose something yourself. Tell us what you would like to do."

CHAPTER CCCCXXXVII.

THE FOUR HIGHWAYMEN MEET AT THE GIBBET ON THE FINCHLEY-ROAD.

"I AM much obliged to you, sir," said Sixteen-String Jack. "If you will allow me, I will speak to my comrade, and ask him his advice."

"Do so—do so."

Jack approached Claude, and spoke to him for a few moments.

Then, returning to the door, he said—

"My comrade is obliged to confess, that, to enter London, even while so well disguised, would be placing our lives in great jeopardy, and he has proposed a plan which he would like to see carried out—that is, if it meets with your full and entire approval."

"What is the nature of the plan?"

"He wishes to draw up at the next public-house he comes to."

"I have no objection to that."

"He then wishes you to alight, and give the landlord instructions to fulfil our commands with respect to the carriage and horses."

"Well—well."

"And then he wants you to perform the remainder of your journey in a post-chaise."

"What do you want to do with the carriage and horses?"

"The carriage we would leave at the inn. The horses we would have saddled and bridled."

"I see; and you would then mount them and ride away?"

"Just so, sir; for we have an appointment of a very serious nature at daybreak this morning, and we shall have great difficulty, even then, in reaching the appointed spot in time."

"Well, I see no reason why your plan should not be adopted. I care nothing about the Countess of Farland's carriage, or her horses either; besides, you obtained both, not I. You have been kind enough to give me a ride, that is all, and I am much obliged to you."

"Don't mention that. Only, sir, you will be looked upon as the legitimate person to give orders about the disposal of the horses and carriage. All we want you to say is, that we have your full permission to do what we think proper; that, in fine, we have received our instructions from you."

"Good; drive on, then, and stop at the next public-house where a post-chaise can be obtained. Unless I mistake not, you will have to make great speed to reach the appointed spot in time—that is, if it is far distant."

"It is a long way from here, sir."

"We will waste no more time. Forward again, and stop at the next inn."

Sixteen-String Jack briefly announced to Claude Duval that his proposal had been accepted, and the vehicle was once more set into rapid motion.

It so happened that the piece of road upon which they had halted was not more than half a mile from an inn of rather pretentious aspect.

Before the door of this Claude immediately drew up.

He was somewhat surprised to find the inn open so late, or rather so early, but he afterwards learned that they were awaiting the coach which stopped there every morning on its way to London.

The landlord made his appearance with great alacrity when he discovered that a carriage had stopped before the door.

Sixteen-String Jack jumped down and assisted Ernest and Minnie to alight.

Then Ernest made a sign to Claude, who got down off his box.

Addressing himself to the landlord, he said—

"You will please have the carriage and horses taken round to the stables."

"It shall be done, sir, in a moment."

Then, turning to Claude and Jack, Ernest said—

"Follow me into the inn at once, and I will give you instructions what to do."

The ostler led the horses round to the stable, while the landlord, bowing at every step, ushered his guests into his best private room and retired.

"I have asked you to come in," said Ernest, "because I wished to say farewell, as the chances are that we shall never meet each other again."

"We are much obliged to you," said Claude and Jack. "You have been kind enough to do us a great service, for without your aid we should never have escaped."

"And without you," said the young man, warmly, "I should not feel so happy as I do at this moment. However, farewell! I know you must be anxious to be gone."

Farewells were then exchanged, and Ernest rang the bell.

The landlord appeared with an alacrity that seemed rather suspicious.

"Landlord," he said, "I have given my servants instructions how to act, and you will allow them to proceed without interference."

"Certainly, sir."

"Lead them to the stables, then, and afterwards return to me."

The landlord bowed, and led the two highwaymen to the stables.

On the way, Claude said—

"You understand what my master said to you?"

"Yes—oh! yes."

"Well, then, I want you to supply us with two saddles and two bridles."

"Very well; shall you want horses too?"

"No; we will take those belonging to the carriage; they have not come far, and are quite fresh."

"Just as you like."

"There is only one thing more. Make haste! My master is in a great hurry. We are going to ride forward in order that some preparations may be made, and he will follow almost immediately in a post-chaise."

This was all very legitimate, so the landlord spoke to the ostler and returned to the inn.

It did not take Claude and Jack long to get the two horses ready.

Mounting with all speed, they set off at a sharp trot, which became a gallop so soon as they were far enough off from the inn.

The two highwaymen took the road towards Finchley, but they had no hope of being able to keep their appointment at the proper time.

Already in the sky a faint tinge of gray was perceptible, and they had yet a long way to go.

Coming presently to a steep hill, they allowed the horses to ascend it while they occupied themselves in casting off their disguise.

This was soon done, and, in a few moments, Claude Duval and Sixteen-String Jack presented their ordinary appearance.

"This has been a night of strange adventure, has it not?" said Claude, as he threw the last portion of his borrowed garments over the hedge into a field.

"You are right there," said Jack. "I was thinking so when you spoke."

"Well, I can't help thinking we have done some good for others besides ourselves. If those two young people are not happy, they ought to be!"

"They will be happy, never fear. The only thing I am afraid of is that we shall be the means of getting them into trouble."

"I do not think so, and, besides, it cannot be helped. Come, let the horses breathe a moment on the top of this hill, and then forward again. I sadly fear that when we reach Finchley, Dick Turpin and Tom King will have left, having given over all hope of our appearance."

"We can but ride forward and see. These horses will make good speed if they are put to it, and though it is a long way to Finchley, yet I think we shall reach it before the day has much advanced."

"Well, so we shall. And there is another thing, Turpin and King may have been prevented from keeping the appointment, like we have been."

"It may be so. We have had some very narrow escapes, and, ten to one, if they have fared any better."

"Besides, they had Maud with them."

"True; so their danger will be greater than ours. Forward, my friend; I am in hopes that, after all, we shall be in time."

Once again, then, were the horses put in motion.

Refreshed even by their brief rest, they flew down the hill at a speed that would have dismayed horsemen less skilful than our friends.

A better time for performing a journey across the country without being seen could scarcely have been found.

Our friends knew that the hour before the dawn was the one in which fewest people were abroad, and they wished to take every advantage they could of it.

In spite of their efforts, however, the dull gray tint which they had perceived overspread the whole face of the heavens before they had got halfway to their destination.

With unabated speed, however, and choosing the lanes and byways in preference to the high road, they galloped on.

But the light increased with marvellous rapidity.

Presently, in the eastern horizon, they could perceive the approach of the sun.

As soon as the "god of day" was fairly above the horizon day would begin, and people in numbers be abroad.

But, as they gazed about them, the highwaymen discovered that they were in a very lonely part of the country indeed.

There was not a habitation of any kind in sight.

The horses began to show evident symptoms of exhaustion, but they still urged them on.

Suddenly Jack raised his hand and pointed.

"Yonder is Finchley," he said. "One more effort, and we shall be there."

With increased rather than abated speed, they made the remainder of their journey.

At length they slackened speed.

They had come in sight of the gibbet.

Jack pointed it out to his companion.

"That is the place," he said.

"Shade the sun from your eyes, and take a long look before you, and tell me whether you can see anything of them."

Claude held up his hand to keep off the sun-rays, and did as his comrade wished him.

"I can see no one," he said. "There does not appear to be a single human being in sight."

"Alas! that is sad news."

"It is, indeed!"

"Look again. Are you sure?"

"There is no one there."

"Then they have either been and gone again, or else have been prevented from keeping the appointment."

"Do not let us be too hasty. We are yet some distance from the meeting-place. Let us make our way to it, and then see."

This was a wise determination, but, nevertheless, it was with sad and heavy hearts that Claude and Jack approached the deserted bit of ground.

At length they arrived, and then a nearer view proved the truth of Claude's words.

There was no one to be seen.

Let us pause a moment.

We will return to Dick Turpin and Tom King.

The reader will remember that they lingered near the gibbet until early dawn.

Then, when the day began to come, they grew apprehensive of discovery.

But, for all that, they were unwilling to leave the spot.

At the request of his companion, Dick Turpin stood up in the saddle and looked all around.

But his keen eye failed to catch sight of those for whose approach he was so anxious.

Turning round to Tom King, he said—

"I can see nothing of them. They are nowhere in sight. Now, tell me what you think will be the best thing for us to do?"

"I am loath to give them up, Dick."

"So am I."

"Suppose, then, we return to the thicket again; there we shall be seen by no one, and we will wait a little longer."

"And if they do not come?"

"Then we shall be obliged to return to the empty house, and repair here as soon as it grows dark."

"I would we were there now, Tom. I am sure this lengthened absence will fill Maud's breast with alarm."

"It will, indeed; but it cannot be avoided."

"I only hope she will not be tempted to leave."

"I do not think you need fear that. But, come; let us return to the thicket. If they do not come soon, we shall be forced to give them up, and Maud, having waited so long as she has, a little longer will not make much difference."

As he spoke these words, Tom King led the way across the barren piece of ground in the direction of the thicket.

Dick Turpin followed, dejectedly.

The shadow of coming ill hovered over his heart.

He felt that something had happened of a terrible character, or else that some ill was impending over them which would presently fall.

Nevertheless he followed Tom, and concealed himself in the thicket.

Here they remained, in a state of the greatest suspense and anxiety, until, at length, the sun rose, and cast his golden beams around.

Seeing this, he said—

"Come, Tom, it is no good waiting any longer. Our return journey will be full of danger, for we shall run great risk of being seen. It is useless to remain longer; let us depart."

"I fear we shall be obliged to do so; and yet, stay. Look before you, Dick, and tell me what you can see."

Dick Turpin looked in the direction in which Tom King pointed.

In the extreme distance he could see something approaching them.

What it was they knew not—it was so far off.

They watched closely, and, after some time, made it out to be two men on horseback.

As soon as they were convinced of this, Tom was about to sally forth.

But Turpin detained him.

"Hold!" he said. "Let us wait a moment. It is true that two horsemen are coming, but they are too far off for us to recognise them. Two mounted travellers is no uncommon sight. They may even be two of our enemies."

"Your caution is a good one," replied Tom King. "We will wait here in silence until we are assured that those approaching us are our friends."

"Such will be the wisest course."

Accordingly our friends waited, until at length Claude Duval and Sixteen-String Jack—for it was indeed they who were approaching—reached the foot of the gibbet.

There was now no longer the slightest doubt, and Dick Turpin and Tom King sallied forth.

They came in sight of their companions just as Claude and Jack were beginning to give up all hope.

This unexpected meeting was a happy one.

They greeted each other with the utmost warmth.

Each one was glad to find his comrade was unhurt.

"We have had some strange and hairbreadth escapes since we parted last," said Claude Duval; "and if you could have seen us only a few hours ago, you would have thought it an impossibility for us to have reached this place."

"You must not think you have had all the adventures to yourself," replied Turpin. "You have no idea what we have gone through since we left you in Enfield Chase."

"You will excuse me for saying," interrupted Tom King, "that this open spot at broad daylight is not exactly the place fitting for talking over our adventures."

"Right!" said Turpin. "We must postpone that for another time. Follow me, my friends. We must be careful not to excite attention: fortunately, we have not far to go."

"You have some place of refuge, then?" said Claude Duval.

"Yes; Maud is there. I think the best thing we can do is not to ride all four together. Suppose I go first, along with Tom King, and you and Sixteen-String Jack follow at such a distance that we may be just in sight of you and nothing more?"

"Agreed—agreed! We shall not be near so likely to attract attention."

"Forward, then," said Turpin; "for now that it is day, the sooner we get under cover, the better."

With these words the highwaymen commenced their journey towards the deserted mansion in the manner they had agreed upon.

CHAPTER CCCCXXXVIII.

DICK TURPIN, TOM KING, CLUDE DUVAL, AND SIXTEEN-STRING JACK ARRIVE IN SAFETY AT THE RUINED MANSION.

Let us now return to Maud.

The current of events has for some time drifted away from her.

When we saw her last it was when, after hearing that strange and unearthly cry, she had mustered up courage and resolution sufficient to rise from her seat and endeavour to discover from whence it proceeded.

With trembling hands she had made her way down the spacious staircase, and was guided by the sound to a door opening from a landing far below her.

At last the door was reached, and then she heard from within the sound of clashing steel, as though persons were engaged in mortal strife.

These sounds abruptly ceased, and then that awful cry arose again, and this time came upon her ear with deafening loudness.

Overcome not only by the horrible nature of the sound itself, but by the place in which she was, Maud gave utterance to a piercing scream, and fell at full length on the landing.

She lay just on the threshold of the mysterious door.

The candle she held in her hand flew from her grasp, and, after flickering for a moment or two, went out.

Then the profoundest stillness that the imagination could ever picture, or the senses realize, prevailed in and about that deserted mansion.

It was accompanied, too, by its fitting attendant, darkness.

How long she lay thus, Maud knew not.

Time to her was then an utter blank.

Whether the strange and terrible sounds of which she had been an auditor were resumed, or whether they altogether ceased, she was perfectly ignorant.

She was unconscious of everything, even of life.

A swoon, however, never lasts very long.

Left to herself, Nature soon recovers herself, and reawakens the dormant energies.

When Maud came to her senses, though, she found that daylight was streaming full upon her.

She was puzzled and perplexed to think where she could be, and some moments elapsed before the occurrences of the night presented themselves to her mind.

Then, with great suddenness, every circumstance rushed before her mind.

In a moment she started wildly to her feet, and looked around her.

"It is day," she cried, perceiving for the first time that the light came through the window. "Day has dawned. Oh! heavens, something terrible has happened. What I have heard was a presentiment—an intimation of the occurrence of some dire catastrophe—but I—I did not understand it. Now, however, all is plain and clear enough. Day has dawned. My husband and his comrade have not returned. They are either slain or taken prisoners, for they assured me they would not be long absent, and now many hours have elapsed since they left me."

Maud tottered towards the stairs with the intention of descending.

But she found this was impossible, so wholly had her strength deserted her.

She was fain to sit on the top stair.

Clasping her hands over her eyes, she gave full vent to her grief.

She sobbed and wept as though her heart would break.

The sounds of woe made themselves heard with painful clearness all over the dismal habitation, until, at length, the whole of the building resounded with her cries of dolour.

"What shall I do?" she asked, wringing her hands bitterly. "What shall I do? Where shall I look to find him? In prison? Yes, perhaps he is in prison! It may be that his foes became acquainted with the meeting-place, and placed themselves in ambush there. Heaven help me! I know not what to do. All is uncertainty and conjecture."

It was some time before Maud could obtain the least mastery over her grief.

By degrees, however, she calmed down.

It was through pure exhaustion, nothing more.

Then she struggled to her feet.

"I will leave this place," she murmured. "To stay here is impossible. I shall go mad. I will get into the open air."

Having made this determination, Maud set about carrying it into execution.

Grasping the massive balustrade with one hand, she slowly and difficultly descended the stairs.

At every few steps, however, she was compelled to pause.

But, at length, the spacious hall on the ground floor was reached.

Gliding across this like a spectre, she made her way to the door through which they had entered.

Passing through this, she gained the little chamber, and, mounting on the window-sill, jumped down on to the ground.

When she found that the roof of the deserted mansion was no longer over her head, Maud felt wonderfully better.

The very atmosphere which filled the place had so much oppression in it, that it seemed to weigh her down like lead.

The fresh, cool, morning air revived her.

She drank it in at large draughts, and after each inspiration felt better.

The strange feelings of supernatural terror, which she had experienced in their full intensity, passed away.

She was able to think more clearly.

It was a lovely morning.

The heavens were unspotted with a single cloud, while in the trees the birds chirped gaily, as though it had been early spring and not mid-winter.

The air was balmy and fresh, while the sweet repose that reigned around came gratefully upon the senses.

But as Maud looked up, and saw the sun shining brightly over the tree tops, she sighed deeply, and then burst into tears again.

She gave her grief full vent, for in the solitude of the place she knew there was no one to observe her.

After his promise to return soon, it was only natural that Maud should think some terrible danger had befallen her husband.

Before he departed, he admitted to her that there might be peril in the enterprise, and for that reason desired her to remain in safety at the deserted house.

Nothing, she told herself, would be able to keep him away from her like this save capture.

Already she pictured him as she had once before seen him, a prisoner within one of the gloomiest cells in Newgate.

What should she do?

At one moment she thought she would fly at once from the gloomy habitation, but then a second thought restrained her.

It might be that her husband and his comrade were in danger, but they were accustomed to it.

It might be that she exaggerated the extent of that danger.

They might, perhaps, merely be prevented from returning by some officers, who they feared they could not pass unseen.

This might easily be.

If so, they would watch their earliest opportunity of rejoining her.

If, however, she left the place, they would immediately depart in search of her, and thus bring double danger upon themselves.

The result of these reflections was that, hard as she felt the task to be, Maud made up her mind to remain where she was until night came.

If they did not return then she should give up all hopes of them.

Although she made this determination, she did not attempt to re-enter the mansion.

To her it was full of horror, and she could not have remained there alone.

"I will try and find my way to the entrance gate," she said "I may, perhaps, see them coming."

To speak the truth, Maud had very, very little hope of this.

But she felt that she was giving herself some employment, and while occupied in doing something her grief was not so great.

She made her way round to the front of the mansion, and crossed the neglected, weed-grown lawn.

Then she came to the avenue, and along this she walked slowly, for she did not wish to learn too quickly that her husband was not in sight.

She was anxious to retain the hope of being able to see him as long as possible.

At length the gate was reached.

The one leaf was still sticking open, as it was when she had first seen it.

But suddenly Maud utters a cry.

Then she draws back, and conceals herself behind the buttress of the gate.

As she glanced up the lane, she saw some horsemen approaching at rather a rapid rate.

She was about to rush forth, but she restrained herself as she thought that they might be police-officers who were approaching.

It was for this reason that she sprang back, and concealed herself behind the buttress.

From this position, however, she was able to look out with little fear of being seen by those who were approaching her.

They were still at some distance, and she was not able to distinguish them with any degree of clearness.

Besides which, tears dimmed her eyes and obstructed her vision, for she fancied that the horsemen who were coming were four in number.

She was afraid to think this, lest she should be disappointed.

The sharp clatter of the horses' hoofs came upon her ears, and she dashed away the drops that filled her eyes, and by an effort prevented any others taking their place.

Then a cry of joy came from her lips.

It was, indeed, her husband and his three comrades were coming, and it needed but that one glance to show her that they were safe and unhurt.

The joy of this discovery was so great that she reeled, and her senses seemed to forsake her.

She was overpowered by her joy.

Recovering herself, however, she sprang through the gate with the agility of a fawn.

With another cry of joy, she seized Black Bess by the bridle, and then clung there, half-fainting.

Dick Turpin had been riding a little in advance of his companions.

He was anxious to get back, because he knew how great would be the uneasiness that his long absence would occasion Maud.

He was surprised, however, to see her make her appearance so suddenly, and felt vexed that she should be so incautious as to leave the house.

This feeling quickly passed away, however, when he saw how helplessly she was clinging to the bridle.

Hastily dismounting, he placed his arm round her waist.

She clung to him frantically.

Turning to Tom King, Turpin said—

"Take care of Black Bess, my friend, and I will follow you to the house."

Tom complied, and the three highwaymen passed on first, and allowed Dick and Maud to follow.

Turpin was not a little surprised at the emotion which Maud exhibited, but he was far—very far, indeed, from surmising the real motive of it.

He little dreamt what strange events had befallen her during his absence.

He imagined that it proceeded solely from his long absence and her consequent joy upon his safe return.

They walked up the avenue leading to the deserted mansion at a slow pace.

In a few minutes Dick made Maud acquainted with all that had taken place since he had parted with her, and she listened with the most eager interest to the account he gave of the traveller he had saved from such a cold-blooded assassination.

When she had heard all, she could not help admitting that Dick could not well have acted in any other manner than he had done.

He had been rewarded for waiting by seeing Claude Duval and Sixteen-String Jack make their appearance when he had given up all hopes of them.

Having satisfied her upon all these points, he proceeded to inquire how she had passed the night, and how it was he had found her standing at the gate.

She shuddered, and then made him acquainted with all those events which have already been placed at full before the reader.

Dick knew not what to think of this, and he listened with the utmost attention to the end.

When she had finished her narrative, he said—

"Maud, dearest, I am afraid you have been suffering your imagination to get the better of you. What you describe has not in reality taken place. It is merely fancy. Finding yourself alone at night in that gloomy, deserted mansion, you have yielded yourself up to supernatural fancies. I cannot wonder at it. You have every excuse."

Maud shook her head.

"It is no fancy," she said, earnestly. "I should be one of the last to let my fears get the master of me in the manner you suppose. Believe me, it is no fancy. All that I have described is as real as anything that has occurred since I met you."

Turpin smiled.

"I can see you are not convinced," pursued Maud. "But tell me this. If it was fancy, how is it I made my way down to a door on a lower storey, and there fainted? When I recovered myself it was daylight, and I still lay where I recollect falling."

"I cannot account for that," said Turpin. "We must speak upon this matter at another opportunity. In the meantime, let us quit the subject."

"Well, be it so. When I recovered my senses, and found it was daylight, and that you had not returned, I gave way terribly to grief, for I pictured the worst concerning you. To remain in the house after such dreadful events had occurred there, I felt was impossible; so I made my way out into the open air, and immediately felt better. My anxiety for your safety was so great, that I was compelled to go towards the gate, and no sooner did I arrive at it, than I caught sight of you in the distance. I concealed myself in order to make sure, and then you know the rest."

"I do know the rest," said Turpin, as he pressed her closer to him. "As for the sounds you have described, we will listen for them to-night, and if we hear them, rely upon it, we will discover from whence they proceed, and what is the cause and meaning of them."

The cool, determined tone in which Dick Turpin spoke had the effect of inspiring Maud with confidence, and she had not the slightest doubt that her husband would be as good as his word.

By the time this point in the conversation had been reached, they arrived opposite to the window through which they gained admission to the house.

Here they paused a moment, and looked towards the stable, whither Dick's three comrades had gone with the horses.

Tom King, Claude, and Jack almost immediately made their appearance, and, having closed the stable-door, came straight towards their captain.

"You have seen to Black Bess all right?" said Turpin, inquiringly, as soon as Tom King was within speaking distance.

"Yes, captain," was the reply. "She is as comfortable as the rest, but it vexes me to death to think that she has no better food than this rank grass."

"I was about to propose," said Turpin, "as soon as we get indoors, that we take into consideration, not only what we should do for provender for the horses, but for ourselves as well?"

"I think we have a great deal to talk over," said Tom King, "and the sooner we begin, the better. When we get inside, let us sit down and avail ourselves of the present opportunity, for it is impossible for us to tell when we shall have a chance again."

"I quite agree with you there," said Turpin. "I should have proposed the same course of action myself. But do not let us stand here. Enter! I will follow."

"I will show the way," said Tom King.

As he spoke, he got through the window with great agility.

He was instantly followed by Claude Duval and Sixteen-String Jack, who looked about them with great curiosity and interest, although, on the way back from the meeting-place, they had been made acquainted with the nature of the shelter that had been found.

Dick Turpin and Maud came last.

Without any trouble or delay the little party reached the entrance-hall of the mansion.

Upon seeing this place, Claude and Jack could not withhold their admiration.

It had an appearance of great splendour.

The sun had now risen to a sufficient altitude to emit his greatest light, so that, owing to the fantastically-shaped skylight at the head of the staircase, everything could be seen with great distinctness.

Let them look in what direction they would, traces of great magnificence were discernible.

The last inhabitants of that mansion had certainly been the possessors of great wealth, for they had left traces of it all around them.

Although the dust lay thickly and heavily upon every object, yet it could be seen that the decorations about the hall had been originally of the most costly and beautiful description.

The balustrade of the staircase was, of itself, a perfect marvel of workmanship.

It was most elaborately carved into curling wreaths, and in many places had been ornamented with gold.

Although Maud and Turpin and Tom King had seen the hall before, yet it had never appeared to such advantage; and even they looked around and noted with interest several objects which had previously escaped their attention.

Having gazed their fill, however, they proceeded to ascend the stairs.

They did not pause, but kept on right up to the top where the room they occupied was situated.

Just, however, when they were crossing one of the landings, Maud pressed Dick Turpin's arm slightly, while she said in a whisper, audible only to him—

"Look! look! That is the door from the other side of which those terrible sounds came. That is where I swooned; and, look! there lies the piece of candle which I held in my hand!"

CHAPTER CCCCXXXIX.

THE FOUR HIGHWAYMEN TALK OVER THEIR PRESENT AND FUTURE PROSPECTS, AND DICK TURPIN OFFERS A RATHER PECULIAR PROPOSAL FOR THEIR CONSIDERATION

THERE was something too circumstantial about the account which Maud had given of the occurrences of the night for Dick to think it was all imagination.

He felt convinced, indeed, that something of a mysterious and inexplicable character had occurred, and at all risks he resolved, when the time should come, to find it out.

He did not let Maud know that he thought this, and, when she spoke to him in the manner we have recorded at the end of the preceding chapter, he made no other reply than a simple inclination of the head, which showed that he heard and understood what she had said.

He did not pause, or if he did it was imperceptible, and he kept on behind his three comrades, who had preceded him up the staircase.

In a few more moments all three stood within the little attic chamber in which they had agreed to take up their quarters.

This now had a somewhat gloomy look, for the fire was out and the grate filled with ashes.

This disagreeable state of things was, however, soon put an end to.

Exercising the same care as before, a fire was lighted, after which the room recovered its former pleasant aspect.

More chairs were fetched from the adjoining room, and then the rather large party—consisting, as it did, of five persons—sat down to discuss their future proceedings.

All were hungry, but there was very little to appease their appetites.

Still, what there was, was equally divided.

"It is quite certain that something must be done towards obtaining some provisions," said Dick Turpin; "but I can see no other means of obtaining them than by waiting until night, when one of us, under cover of the darkness, could repair to the nearest village and procure some."

"That would be attended with considerable risk," said Tom King; "for, in a quiet country village, where everybody knows everybody, our appearance would be particularly noticed, and largely commented upon."

"You may make up your mind to that," said Sixteen-String Jack.

"But we must live, and we cannot live without food," remarked Claude Duval.

"Two well-known and incontestable truths," replied Turpin, with a smile.

"But if we are to remain here," said Jack, "we must make some good arrangement in this respect."

"That is just the difficulty I have had before my mind," said Turpin; "and now that we are all together, that is what I want to talk about."

"Proceed, captain—proceed."

"Well, then, you must know, when I first found out what kind of place this is—when I discovered how lonely and unvisited it is—I thought to myself, this is the very place for us; here we shall be able to remain safely as long as we think proper."

"I thought the same," said Tom King.

"But I soon found," continued Turpin, "that there were a great many difficulties in the way, and these so multiplied that I came at last to the conclusion that a lengthened residence here would be impracticable."

"How so?" asked Claude Duval. "For my part, so far as I have seen, I rather like the place, and I shall be very loth to quit it."

"I will tell you my objections, then."

"Go on, captain."

"The first one that presented itself was the horses. You must bear in mind that we have five of these animals now, and they have rather voracious appetites; besides, if we do not keep them in good condition, they will fail to be of the least value to us."

"Well, I admit that."

"Then, tell me, where is fodder to be found? You may say there is plenty of grass; but, then, we cannot turn them out to graze; because, if we do, they will be seen by someone, and then our residence here will be discovered."

"What other difficulty is there?"

"Why, this. While we could remain here without anyone having the least inkling of our whereabouts, I grant you, we should be safe enough; but, I take it, we cannot imprison ourselves here, and I am convinced we could not leave many times, as there are so many of us, without being seen by some person or other."

"I grant that."

"Well, then, that is almost enough to show you, I should think, that this place will not, as I thought, afford us shelter. There is the obstacle of procuring our own food. We might obtain it once or twice without attracting suspicion, but each time there would be more risk."

"True—true."

"Country people—I mean the inhabitants of little villages, such as we should find about here—are, above all human beings, intolerably curious, and they would spare no pains to find out who you were, and where you came from."

"True, too."

"To be sure, we might find someone in whom we could place confidence, but then that would be running a very great risk."

"That would never do."

"Then you begin to see that this place is untenable?"

"We do—we do; but where are we to find a place of refuge exempt from all these disqualifications?"

"My comrades," said Turpin, "I am not the one to tell you you are in a fix without being able to show you the way out of it. I have something to propose."

"Let us hear it, then."

"I will; but, first of all, I think we ought to decide as to the qualifications necessary for a secure and safe place of refuge."

"Well, captain, go on."

"In the first place, then, we shall require a shelter where we can arrive and depart without caring whether our arrival or departure is noticed or not."

"But where can that be, Dick? No, that is impossible. Let it be where it would, our safety would depend upon our presence being unknown."

"Then, in that case, you would be no better off than we are here, where discovery would be neither more nor less than fatal to us. Rely upon it, my friends, that, for the shelter to be of any service, it must possess the qualification which I have just mentioned."

"Well, we cannot see where it can be, or in what manner it could be possible."

"But, if I showed you that it was possible"——

"I am afraid there is slight chance of that."

"Wait a minute. Let me go on with the qualifications, and then, when I have done mentioning them, you will be in a position to say whether the scheme which I have to propose will answer the purpose or not."

"Very well, then; go on again."

"I will do so. The second qualification required will be that we should be able to procure just what provision we wanted, just when we liked, without exciting suspicion. A place where we could have the most tempting and delicious viands—a place where we could give the order, and directly afterwards have the table covered with delicacies, each one fit for the stomach of an epicure."

"Don't, Dick, don't!" cried Turpin's companions, in chorus.

"How can you bear to talk about such things! Do not say a word more. We are half-starved to death now, and the bare mention of anything nice to eat makes our mouths water unbearably."

Turpin laughed.

"Well, I was getting a little enthusiastic, I confess; but, under such circumstances as the present, who could avoid being enthusiastic on such a theme?"

"Oh! don't, don't. Never mind that qualification. Go on with the next."

"I think there is no need for that," said Claude Duval. "If he can name a place possessing merely the qualifications he has already named, without any others, we will be satisfied."

[THE HIGHWAYMEN FORCE OPEN THE DOOR OF THE MYSTERIOUS CHAMBER.]

"So we will, so we will!"

"Have patience, my friends," said Dick Turpin, "and hear a little further. We require a place where we could bring our horses, put them in a comfortable stable, have them properly cleaned and attended to, and where they could have plenty of good food when we came back from a long ride."

"That would be very desirable, indeed," said Tom King; "but I, for one, cannot see how such a thing comes anywhere near the bounds of possibility."

"Nor I! nor I!" cried his companions.

"A place," continued Turpin, not heeding the interruption, "where we could, when necessary, leave Maud in perfect safety and security, and where we could come and rest just whenever we thought proper, and enjoy ourselves in any way we liked."

"There, there, Dick, stop! We won't hear another word! Stop at once! We won't listen! We don't want to hear any more necessaries. If you can mention a place that possesses only one-half of the advantages you have named, we shall be doubly satisfied. Come, speak; don't keep us in suspense any longer."

"Well, I will not. Since you have decided that the qualifications mentioned are sufficient, well and good. There is, of course, no need whatever to mention any more. But I can assure you, impossible as you seem to think it, that it is quite possible to obtain a place of refuge—a home, indeed—possessing all the advantages I have named, and many more besides."

"Then let us know without delay, for this delay is dreadful."

"Well, I will tell you in a few words first, and hear what you think of it. I can proceed to the particulars afterwards."

"Do so; do so, pray."

"Well, then, my proposition, placed before you in its most simple and naked form, is that we take a road-side public-house."

"Take a roadside public-house?"

"Exactly."

"Nonsense!"

"Then you do not think the scheme feasible?"

"I don't know how it is."

"Don't be precipitate, but listen to me, and I will tell you in a straightforward manner."

"But, Dick, you forget that, in order to take a roadside inn, it is necessary to——"

"I forget nothing. I have thought it all over, and when you have heard me out you will find all your objections answered."

"Go on, then, once more."

"Well, then, I propose that we find some person in whom we can place the fullest and most absolute trust."

"Ahem!"

"Don't cough in that doubtful manner, I beg. I shall be able to get over that obstacle in a manner perfectly satisfactory to everybody."

"So much the better."

"This person, then, in whom we could place unlimited confidence, we should furnish with funds, and then instruct him to take a roadside public-house somewhere not far from London, and to do all things in a perfectly legitimate manner."

"Ah! Dick."

"When we have found the person, I don't think there would be much trouble in getting him to do this, and certainly no danger."

"No, certainly not—when you have found the person. That's where the difficulty lies."

"Oh! does it, then? I am glad of that."

"Glad?"

"Yes; because I can remove it at once. For the present, however, let it suffice to say I have found the person."

"Who is it, then?"

"That I will tell you directly. The person, having found a public-house suitable for the purpose, will open it in a perfectly straightforward way, and carry on business just as business is carried on in all the inns all over the country."

"Well, that might be."

"Very good, then. The rest follows. We should be able to ride up to the inn like ordinary travellers; we should be able to put up our cattle and have them thoroughly attended to. We should be able to come when we liked, stay as long as we thought proper, and go away just whenever it answered our purpose to do so."

"Yes; but——"

"Have patience, and hear me to the end. We should be able to do all this without exciting the least suspicion. Care would be taken to select an inn at some considerable distance from any other habitation, so that a close watch would be impossible, and where we should not have to fear betrayment to the police."

"This is all very well, Dick, but you see there is this to be said, where are you to find a man that will do all this for you?"

"That is a question I can answer with the utmost readiness. The man must be one unknown to, and unsuspected by, the police. He must always be at hand to attend to us, and the only thing we should have to do would be to be careful not to go anywhere near the public-house when pursued, so as to leave no clue to our hiding-place, for if the police once got on the scent it would no longer be of service to us."

"Well, we grant all that; but you must tell us the man in whom we should be able to place so much confidence."

"Do not you know of one?"

"Well, I know one who would be all right so far as putting trust in him goes. But then he is well known to the police, and suspected to be a particular friend and ally of ours."

"You mean old Matthew Gale, the landlord of the 'White Lion,' in Drury-lane?"

"I do."

"Ah! he would not do for us. You may depend Mr. Wriggles and his subordinates keep an eye upon all his movements."

"I suppose so. No, the person I mean is well known to all three of you as being true and faithful. I allude to poor Tom Davis, once the landlord of the 'Hand and Keys,' at Hornsey Wood."

"Tom Davis! Why, Dick, you must be dreaming."

"How?—why?"

"The same objection that there is against old Matthew applies with full force to him."

"As how?"

"Why, can you possibly forget how well known he is to the police? Has he not even been brought before a magistrate, charged with being an accomplice of ours at the time when Tom King was a prisoner in Newgate, and was not the girl Ellen with him?"*

"I grant all that," said Dick Turpin; "but I think I can give you a little information which will surprise you. Of course, you all of you remember Tom Davis perfectly well. I have no need to say a word about him. You recollect how he was taken up before the magistrate and afterwards dismissed with a caution. Mr. Tapner, the then governor of Newgate, tried all he could do to get him into trouble, but he failed in his endeavour."

"Yes; we recollect all that perfectly well, and such events having occurred, how can you for a moment consider him eligible for our purpose?"

"I will tell you. Mr. Taplow was terribly disappointed to think he should be defeated, but he determined to be revenged, so he set the officers on to the 'Hand and Keys.'

"They watched the place day and night in the closest manner, and the officers took no trouble to disguise their proceedings. It soon got known. Every person who entered the inn, no matter who it was, was subjected to a close scrutiny by the police. Now, as you may know, this sort of thing would not be relished by anybody, so Tom Davis suddenly found himself bereft of his custom. Another man came, opened a house close by, did a roaring trade, and, in the end, Tom was obliged to give up his business altogether, and the old house, which had been built by an ancestor of his more than a hundred years before, and which had been in the possession of the family ever since, passed away into strange hands."

"And what became of Tom Davis?"

"Why, he, poor man, and his wife, and the poor apprentice Ellen, who they so kindly adopted, were all turned into the streets, to beg for bread."

Dick had to clear his throat, for his voice grew husky with emotion.

The past, and all the varied occurrences pertaining to it, rose up vividly before his imagination.

Tom Davis had been a friend to him on more than one occasion, and nothing would have pleased Turpin more than to hear that he was doing well.

Perceiving his silence, Claude spoke.

"But how is it you know this?" he said. "We have heard nothing of it before. How is it you have not taken any steps to alleviate their distress?"

"Pardon me a moment, my friends," said Dick Turpin; "but so many things belonging to the past, which I had forgotten until the present moment, come surging up into my mind, that I do not feel able to continue. I will proceed directly."

The tones of Turpin's voice were husky and indistinct.

It was easy to be seen that his emotions had been powerfully excited by some recollection of the past.

His three comrades remained perfectly still and silent until he should recover himself, though they were anxious and impatient to know what it was that had moved him so greatly.

CHAPTER CCCCXL.

DICK TURPIN MORE FULLY UNFOLDS HIS PLAN TO HIS COMPANIONS.

A PAUSE of some few moments ensued, at the end of which Dick Turpin, by a palpable effort, recovered himself sufficiently to continue his narrative.

"I will begin by answering your questions," he said. "The reason that you heard nothing of all this, was because at the time I learned the particulars you were absent in France. I have never told you about it because, in some incomprehensible manner, the whole occurrence had slipped my memory, and that is why I reproach myself as I do now."

"Come—come! Cheer up, captain. You are getting quite downhearted. Let us hear more."

* See Chapter CXXXV., pages 199, 200.

"I can tell you the remainder in a few words. Early one morning, being, as it was, about an hour before daybreak, I was making my way through a densely-populated part of London. My destination was the 'White Horse'—old Matthew's, you know—in Drury Lane."

"Yes—yes."

"As I was proceeding, at a rather slow pace, through a narrow street, I was surprised by hearing a faint cry, and immediately a young girl bounded forward and pronounced my name."

"Pronounced your name?"

"Yes. At first I did not recognize this girl. Her features were familiar enough to me, and yet I could not call to mind who she was or where I had seen her. In a moment afterwards, however, I recollected. The young girl was the orphan-apprentice, Ellen, who I had so long before rescued from the brutality of her employer, and placed in the charge of Tom Davis and his wife, who, having no children of their own, adopted her for their daughter. About Tom Davis's misfortunes I then knew nothing, having only a short time before returned from Scotland, as you will remember. Knowing the circumstances under which I had left her, I was naturally much shocked and surprised to see her thus. Her apparel was ragged and torn, her face and form emaciated to a degree, and her whole appearance presenting an aspect of the direst poverty."

"Do not let it affect you, Dick; go on."

"I questioned Ellen eagerly, and then I learned from her that they had been turned out into the streets to starve, and that for a long time past they had procured a precarious subsistence by begging from door to door. When I heard that, my comrades, I felt as though my heart had been pierced with a knife, for I knew well enough that I was the sole cause of all his misfortunes."

"You must not reproach yourself too keenly, captain; you could not help it."

"Well, well! I asked Ellen where Tom Davis and his wife were to be found? She raised her hand, and pointed. I followed with my eyes the direction of her finger, and saw two figures seated on a doorstep.* I sprang instantly from the saddle and hastened towards them. But, my comrades, after all that I had heard, I was ill prepared for the sight which I beheld. I pictured things bad enough, I thought; but the reality far surpassed all that I had imagined. Without the girl, Ellen's, word, I should never have recognized the two miserable figures before me. I knew Tom Davis and his wife intimately—had seen them continually for several years—but they were so altered as to make recognition a matter of impossibility. You recollect, my friends, what a portly figure poor Tom Davis had. Well, that was at an end. His bones were absolutely fleshless, and the skin hung about them in festoons."

Dick paused again, for this narration of his friend's misfortunes was too much for him.

His hearers were much surprised, and could scarcely bring themselves to believe in the truth of what they had heard.

Turpin, however, hurried on, and hastened to bring his melancholy narrative to a close.

"You, my friends," he continued, "who know what it is to be cut off almost entirely from contact with the world, will be able to form some idea of the feeling I had for Tom Davis. He has proved himself my staunch, true friend on more occasions than I could well count. I have trusted him with my life when I could have trusted no one else with it, and felt myself perfectly secure; and then to think of the condition in which I found him! A poor wandering mendicant, with body and soul just clinging together, and without any place of shelter in which to lay his head."

"It is very, very sad. Did he know you?"

"No. I spoke to him, I touched him on the shoulder, and tried in a variety of ways to attract his attention, but failed in every one. He seemed quite apathetic to all around him. I shall never forget that night."

"And Mrs. Davis?'

"She was in quite as bad a condition as her husband, and the two poor creatures sat together upon the doorstep the very personification of want and woe. But dawn was coming on with rapid strides. The police-officers were looking out for me in every direction. I was some distance from my destination, and to traverse London streets by daylight would be neither more nor less than suicide; besides, I had some business of a very important character on hand, which would not brook delay. Finding that I could not arouse either Tom Davis or his wife to anything like consciousness, I turned again to Ellen. I told her how grieved I was to encounter such a spectacle, and yet how glad I was that I had seen them. I told her I had an affair of the utmost importance on hand, and gave her all the money I had about me, which represented a rather large amount, and bade her take lodgings in some quiet spot. Then, when she had made the old folks comfortable, I told her to bend her steps to the 'White Horse' inn and see old Matthew, and leave word with him where they were to be found. I promised that, as soon as the business I was occupied with was off my mind, I would find some means of making them comfortable for the rest of their lives."

"And did you do so?"

"I did not."

"Did not?"

"No. You may well echo my words in a tone of surprise. I did not."

"But how was that—after giving your promise?"

"I will tell you. It was almost immediately after this that I was made a prisoner and confined in Newgate."

"We remember now."

"With what has taken place after my daring escape from the great city prison you are well aware, for you have been with me nearly all the time. You must be aware that, since my escape, I have never been near White Horse-yard."

"You have not had a chance."

"Well, that is the reason I have not performed my promise. Had I thought of it before, as I ought to have done, I should have made my way there at all risks. I cannot think how it could have slipped my memory."

"There is no difficulty about that, captain. It is easily accounted for. You have been so fully occupied with other things."

"I have—I have."

"You have nothing whatever to reproach yourself with. Under the circumstances you have done the best thing you could."

"Nevertheless, the recollection quite overcame me, and I felt sure I had been guilty of neglect to one of the few friends I possess."

"Did you tell Matthew that he might expect Ellen?"

"Oh! yes; and it was from him that I learned most of the particulars of what had occurred at the 'Hand and Keys' during our absence in Scotland."

"Well, then, you may depend all is well. For your sake alone, Matthew would see to their wants without you. We shall find them all right."

"That is my only hope. If Ellen has obeyed the injunction I gave her, all will be well. And, if she has neglected it, the fault will not be yours."

"Well, I suppose not."

"Certainly not."

"But she would be sure to go. And now, my friends, do you comprehend my proposition a little better than you did a short time ago? In consequence of what I have told you, I think it is pretty certain the police have lost sight of Tom Davis. Then, his appearance is so greatly altered, that there would be no fear of his being recognized."

"Do you think so?"

"I am sure; for I did not know him myself; and who could be more familiar with his appearance?"

"Very few."

"None. And now, my comrades, having explained everything to you at full length, let me know what you think of my proposal. We shall be conferring a benefit on ourselves, and on an old friend at the same time. He would know how to conduct the business properly, and we should have to take care not to be seen arriving and departing too often."

"There is no doubt, captain, that it is the very best scheme for our comfort and safety that could possibly be devised. The only thing we fear is, that it would be impossible to carry it out."

"Why so?"

"Because there are so many difficulties in the way."

"Which are they?"

* See Chapter CCLIV., pages 366—7.

"Why, in the first place, it is quite certain, in order to obtain information about Tom Davis, we must go to White Horse-yard."

"Well, what of that?"

"Why, under the circumstances, I take it, it would be a very perilous journey."

"There would be some risk, of course; but that difficulty can be dismissed in a moment. I shall go myself."

"That's just what we expected, and dreaded to hear. You will go, and nabbed you will be to a certainty; for, rely upon it, old Matthew's house is closely watched."

"Let us leave this point for a moment, and pass on to the next obstacle."

"Why, how are we to get the public-house, and have it all fitted up and opened?"

"I shall leave that all to old Matthew and Tom Davis. We must furnish them with the funds necessary for carrying out our purpose, and they will do the rest."

"And, in the meantime, we must remain here?"

A silence now followed, during which the highwaymen occupied themselves with revolving in their minds the proposition their captain had placed before them.

Could the design be carried out, there was no manner of doubt about its being an excellent thing indeed.

They could all see that, by exercising proper caution in arriving and leaving, the place would afford them excellent security.

At length, Tom King spoke.

"I have thought the plan over," he said; "and the more I consider about it, the better it seems. There are difficulties and risks, but what enterprise worth a pin is without them? I am of opinion it can be done, and that we should be much safer there than we possibly could be anywhere else. I have only one thing to propose as a kind of amendment."

"What is that?"

"Simply that you will allow me to go to old Matthew's, in Drury-lane?"

Dick laughed.

"Then, in spite of the danger," he said, "you don't mind going yourself?"

Sixteen-String Jack and Claude Duval had been whispering to each other during the last few minutes, and the latter now said—

"Jack and myself have come to the same conclusion as Tom King, only we think——"

"That you would like to go, I suppose," said Turpin, with a laugh.

"Well, that's about it."

"No—no, my friends; I cannot consent to allow any of you to go. I feel that it is peculiarly my duty, and I flatter myself that I shall be best able to succeed."

"Well, captain, you command here, not us."

"Let me exercise my captain's power for this once. I will go, and, rely upon it, we shall succeed. There will then be no disagreeables whatever to contend with. How great a contrast it affords to our present position? Besides, we cannot tell how soon our sojourn here may be put an end to. We know not why it is that this mansion is left in its present state. We cannot tell how soon it may be visited by those who belong to it, and what more awkward event than that could possibly take place?"

"It would be very awkward."

"Of course it would, and we cannot tell how soon it may happen. Then, again, I cannot leave Maud here as I should be able to do with Tom Davis and his wife. I should know she was safe from all alarm."

"But we must remain here for some little time?"

"Yes, if we can do so. It will take some days to get everything ready, but then we shall have much to do ourselves. Considerable funds will be required for the carrying out of this project, and we must obtain them."

"In the old fashion, I suppose?"

"Most assuredly."

"Well," said Claude, "I really must confess I should relish a few adventures on the road."

"And I—and I!" said Tom King and Sixteen-String Jack.

"Well, comrades, you will have a good chance of satisfying your inclination. What I should like to manage is this."

"What?"

"To obtain sufficient money to be able to take some public-house that is already doing a quiet trade. We should then be able to step in without any trouble."

"That would be decidedly the best."

"I think so. If we had money enough, we might agree with a landlord who wanted to leave, to pay so much down, and take everything as it stood."

"That would be glorious."

"It would be the saving of a world of trouble."

"And it would be well, too, if we could buy the house itself, and then we should not be troubled with a meddling landlord."

"It would be well, as you say, to dispense with a landlord."

"How much money do you think would be required for the execution of this project?"

"I can hardly tell. Somewhere about a thousand pounds, I should think."

"That is a large sum of money."

"It is, indeed; and seems especially so when we think that we have got to obtain it all."

"That's it; for, though we might muster up a few guineas between us, the whole lot would not amount to much."

"Well, comrades, you see what has got to be done. We have not much time before us, and it is necessary that a thousand pounds should be obtained, or else the scheme cannot be carried out."

"Let us set about it at once."

"Nay—nay, let us be patient. We shall do no good by precipitation. I would wish you to bear in mind that we are all fatigued, and our horses are fatigued also. For this night I think we cannot possibly do better than remain where we are, and to-morrow night we will set out."

"And what shall we do for provisions in the meanwhile?"

"Well, that is the most awkward part of the affair. I am afraid, when night comes, one of us will have to mount, and ride off and fetch some."

"I will do that," said Tom King. "Let me go alone; and I will saddle my horse, and ride off several miles, get what I want, and come back with it—taking all the precautions I possibly can against being perceived by anyone."

"Well, Tom," said Dick Turpin, "you shall go. You had better start as soon as it gets dark."

"I shall not have long to wait, then."

Tom King spoke truly.

The short winter's day was already drawing to a close, and ere long it would be quite dark enough for Tom's purpose.

While the conversation—which we have placed at full before the reader—had been going on, Maud had sat near the fire, seemingly paying but little attention to what was going forward.

In reality, however, she was drinking in every word with the utmost eagerness.

She had said that when this consultation took place she should have a proposition to make to them.

It was that they should all quit their present mode of life for a better one.

When the moment came, however, for her to make this proposal, her heart sank within her, and she found herself unable to say a word.

She made one or two efforts, but failed each time, and finally gave up the attempt in despair.

She felt that the present was not a favourable time, either, for her to make her proposal.

She fancied that now, above all other times, they would be least of all inclined to listen to her, and so, wisely enough, deferred her purpose.

But it must not be thought that she abandoned it.

On the contrary, she determined, whenever she saw a suitable opportunity, to urge the subject with all the eloquence she was in possession of.

Turpin, however, was not forgetful of what she had said, and, turning round to her, he spoke.

"Come, Maud," he said; "now that we have done talking over our own affairs, let us hear the proposition which you announced your intention of making to us."

"Not now," she replied. "I would rather not make it now."

"Do not be afraid to speak, dearest," said Turpin, encouragingly.

"I am not afraid, only I find I have not yet sufficiently considered the subject, and I should wish to defer it to some other time."

"You shall have your own way in this," said Dick; "and now tell me whether you approve of our proposition?"

"I like it well enough. It will be better than staying here," she replied, with a shudder; "but there is the risk——"

"Never mind that; there will always be risk. When this is accomplished, however, we shall be much safer than we have ever been before."

Darkness now came on with rapid strides, and soon the different objects in the room could only be distinguished by the bright firelight.

Tom King rose to depart upon his errand.

He was accompanied downstairs by Claude Duval and Sixteen-String Jack, who went to attend to the wants of the horses, and Maud and Dick Turpin were left alone in the little chamber, not dreaming of the strange events that were to take place so soon.

CHAPTER CCCCXLI.

THE HIGHWAYMEN BREAK OPEN THE DOOR OF THE MYSTERIOUS APARTMENT IN THE DESERTED MANSION.

We think our readers will all be of one opinion with respect to the excellence of the scheme which Dick Turpin placed before his comrades, albeit it is somewhat elaborate.

Still it possessed more advantages than any other course of action possibly could.

The highwaymen were the more sensible of this when Tom King had to set out to buy them provisions.

He would not be able to procure any great quantity, and the risk would be very disproportionate to the object to be gained.

Then the horses would quickly fall away and depreciate if they did not have food of a proper quality.

The rank stuff they had lately eaten could not fail to do them injury.

At an inn, however, where they could put up, the horses would not only have proper food, but proper grooming, and the latter alone will make a wonderful difference to a horse.

Having resolved upon their plan of action, however, all they could do was to wait with patience until it could be carried out.

Tom King quickly saddled his horse and mounted.

"Now, Tom," cried Claude Duval, as he was about to depart, "let me entreat you to make haste. Recollect, we are all hungry, and that we depend upon you. If a good adventure lies in your path—never mind, pass it; come back to us."

"Should you do so, Claude?"

"Under such circumstances."

"Then so will I; and you may rely upon me coming back as soon as I can obtain the articles we require."

"We shall depend upon you, Tom."

"You can do so without fear."

So saying, Tom King put his horse in motion, and set out upon his dangerous expedition.

There was danger, because the mere fact of a man going into a shop to buy a certain quantity of provisions would be looked upon with surprise if not suspicion.

Claude and Jack watched him depart, and then returned to the little chamber at the top of the deserted mansion.

Here they found Maud and Turpin.

During their absence, Dick had thought much about the strange story Maud had told him about the unearthly sounds.

He could not attribute it all to her imagination.

The narration was too clear and circumstantial for that.

There was some mystery connected with it, and he had firmly made up his mind to find it out, or, at any rate, to try his best to do so.

He had said nothing to his comrades as yet, and resolved not to do so for the present.

His chief object in wishing to pass the night in the deserted mansion was in order to satisfy himself as to what sounds were heard.

So, when Claude and Jack entered, he turned the conversation to quite another channel.

Dick Turpin was truly a brave man.

He feared neither man nor spirit, and he felt no sensations of dread or fear while resolving upon his course of action.

The time during which Tom King was absent was occupied in talking over the scheme that had been proposed, and suggesting a few improvements in it.

While thus employed, their hours did not lag so heavily.

Nevertheless, they could not but be conscious that Tom King was a long while absent.

In their conversation they would suddenly break off, and listen when they fancied some slight sound reached their ears, but each time they would turn again and continue speaking.

At length, however, a sound came from below which they could not possibly mistake.

Someone was ascending the stairs.

Claude and Jack made their way out on to the landing, and almost immediately returned, bringing Tom King with them.

He had succeeded in his enterprise beyond all reasonable hope or expectation.

With a boldness which could scarcely be sufficiently admired, he turned his horse's head towards London.

He galloped on at full speed, and then, coming to a shop which he imagined would answer his purpose, since eatables of every description were sold in it, he paused, and purchased as many articles as he could conveniently carry about with him.

This done, he set off at full speed, and made his way by a very circuitous route to the deserted mansion, which he reached in about three hours after quitting it.

That his comrades were glad to see him safe back, bringing with him the eatables of which they stood so much in need, the reader does not require to be told.

They were all placed on the table, and, after making a rough calculation, they found they should have enough to last them two or three days.

They were, however, compelled to be sparing, because of the risk of procuring any more.

After this plain and sparing meal had been disposed of, Turpin said—

"My comrades, I have something which I wish to speak to you about, and concerning which I should very much like to have your advice."

They became attentive immediately.

Dick then, in a very clear manner, related what had happened to Maud during their absence.

With all this the reader is well acquainted, and, therefore, it is needless to repeat it.

Dick concluded with these words—

"That is just a simple statement of facts as I received them from Maud herself. It remains for you to draw your own conclusions from them."

"It is very strange," said Tom King.

"There is a mystery somewhere," continued Dick Turpin; "and I am resolved to get to the bottom of it."

"We will help you, captain!"

"Thanks, comrades! You may depend that something of a very peculiar character must have occurred here at some time or other, or else we should not find the house in the shut up and abandoned condition in which it now is. What could have been the motive for deserting so elegant a mansion I am no better able to jugde than yourselves. All I can say is, that it must proceed from the occurrence of some very unusual circumstance."

"There can be no doubt about that," said Claude Duval; "and what you have just said has had the effect of rousing my curiosity greatly. We will try to find out the meaning of all this. Can Maud point out the door from the other side of which the sounds came?"

"Certainly she can."

"Then let us go down at once and break it down. We shall then soon arrive at the heart of the mystery."

"Gently! gently!" cried Turpin; "it is never worth while to set about anything with undue haste."

"But why pause?"

"Why, I confess I should very much like to know the meaning of all this, and I should be terribly disappointed if we were to break into the room and then be able to find nothing."

"It would be aggravating, that is true; but then, what are we to do?"

"Why, let us sit here in patience, in the hope that the strange sound will make itself heard again. If it does, then we will rise and descend the stairs. If we find it comes from the other side of a certain door, we will burst it open, and find out, if we can, what there is within."

This mode of action was immediately agreed to, and the highwaymen sat in patient expectation of the ominous and unearthly cry.

Maud had to give her account over again, which she did with very great minuteness; and when she had finished, whatever doubt might have existed in the minds of her auditors was completely dissipated.

Still, time passed on, and the deep silence which prevailed in the deserted mansion was unbroken.

All were anxious and uneasy.

That strange, undefined feeling of alarm which creeps over the soul when one stands upon the threshold of a mysterious discovery, took full possession of the highwaymen's breasts.

The conversation flagged.

They spoke to each other for a moment, and then silence supervened.

All were listening.

But no sound smote upon their ear.

Suddenly all started, and Maud uttered a faint ejaculation of alarm.

The cry came.

Just as she had heard it so many times on the preceding night, it commenced faintly and slowly until it arose to a perfect scream.

Then it subsided with the same gradual cadence as it arose.

The highwaymen started to their feet, and gazed into each others' faces with consternation.

While the sound had lasted, they had been unable to move a muscle.

They seemed paralyzed.

Each one fancied he had realised in his mind, from Maud's description, just what the sound was like.

But all found they had failed most signally.

Their imagination had been quite inadequate to convey to them any notion of its character.

Never had anything so horrible, so unearthly smote upon their sense of hearing.

"That is no human sound," said Dick Turpin, who was the first to recover himself sufficiently to make use of his voice. "I will stake my life that that is no earthly sound. Hark! there it comes again."

All became silent instantly.

They had plenty of warning when the swelling sound was about to come.

This time, however, it seemed even louder and more terrible than before.

The countenances of all present were considerably paler than they were wont to be, and Turpin said, in a voice which showed how greatly he was agitated:

"Oh! this is horrible!—most horrible! If such sounds continue, farewell for ever to this house—a brief sojourn in it would be impossible. Heard you ever such a cry? Well you might be alarmed, Maud! I wonder it did not have the effect of driving you into madness."

"We must find out what this means," said Tom King, endeavouring to assume a resolute tone and manner, but it was easy to see how greatly he was moved. "Come, my friends; it will never do for us to stay here like this."

"I agree with Tom King," said Sixteen-String Jack. "Let us descend the stairs, and ascertain, if we can, from what part of the mansion the unearthly sound proceeds, and what it is that causes it."

"Yes, come," said Claude Duval, as he advanced a few steps towards the door.

"Pause a moment," said Dick Turpin. "It may be that we are about to encounter some danger. Do not run into it unheedfully. Draw your swords and be in readiness, in case you should have to defend yourselves. I mention this not that I think you will meet with anyone to combat with, but as a precautionary measure, which, at any rate, we are justified in taking."

The good sense of these words went home, in a moment, to the hearts of those who listened.

They drew their swords, and held them in such a manner as to be able to make instant use of them.

Claude Duval, too, produced a pistol.

"Now, my friends," said Turpin, "let us descend the stairs and try to pierce the heart of this mystery."

The highwaymen did not need to be told twice.

They were only too eager to obey.

Maud clung to Turpin's arm.

She trembled excessively, and it was easy to see that she suffered extreme terror.

Turpin soothed her to the best of his ability, and endeavoured to inspire her with confidence.

To some extent he succeeded, and with her still leaning on his arm, he descended the spacious staircase.

His three comrades were some distance below him, for their impatience would not allow them to linger.

Presently, however, they hesitated and paused.

They were afraid they would descend too far.

They determined to await the coming of the cry once more.

While here they were joined by Dick Turpin and Maud.

The latter looked around her for a moment, and then, pressing Turpin's arm, she said in a whisper:

"That is the door."

Dick looked in the direction she indicated, and there beheld what he believed was the door she had, on a former occasion, pointed out to him.

All were now profoundly still.

The silence of that mysterious mansion seemed to increase and intensify.

On this occasion our friends were kept waiting for some time.

But at last he came.

Before they thought the loudness of the cry was deafening, but now it absolutely stunned them.

They clasped their hands tightly over their ears, but still they could not shut out the horrid sound—which pierced their very brains.

As before, however, it slowly and gradually died away, and they removed their hands.

The four highwaymen were bold men, as many of the deeds which we have chronicled will fully prove.

But now their bravery seemed to vanish, and they glared at each other with wildly-staring eyes, while their very lips were blanched.

They could tell that, beyond all doubt, they were close to the place from which the sound emanated.

Indeed, all involuntarily turned their faces towards the identical door which Maud had pointed out.

They were certain that it was through this door that the cry came.

The reader will have noticed that, in speaking of this sound, we have been compelled to use very vague terms to express it.

The reason is that the sound itself was indescribable.

We have called it a cry, but its tone bore little resemblance to any cry that has ever saluted the reader's ears.

Still, the word is the only one that can be used, though it is altogether and totally inadequate to convey the faintest notion of it.

The cry was not a shriek—it was not a scream—it was not a yell—nor a moan—nor a groan—nor a howl—nor a wail—nor a shout.

It seemed to be composed of all these.

It seemed to borrow whatever was most horrible and dismal in each.

It is in vain, however, for us to labour on in a vain endeavour to describe that which is really and truly indescribable.

If the reader can vividly realise what has been attempted by way of description, he may be able to form some faint conception of the nature of the sound in the same way as a person could watch a tiny ripple on a lake and imagine the ocean when agitated by a storm.

The one would bear about the same comparison as the other.

What wonder is it, then, that, brave as the highwaymen unquestionably were, they felt the blood curdle in their veins, and their hearts grow as cold as ice within their bosoms.

It was merely natural that they should experience such emotions.

But now another sound of a totally different character came upon their ears.

It was a sound which Maud's narrative prepared them to hear.

It was a sound such as they had listened to many a time without feeling the least alarmed.

But now they stood as if spellbound.

Stood as if turned to stone.

They did not possess the power to move a limb, nor did they possess sufficient mental resolution to attempt to do so.

They were content to remain motionless.

All their faculties were merged into one.

That one they stretched to its fullest extent—to an extent that seemed preternatural.

That was the sense of hearing.

The sound that came upon their ears was as the clash and ring of steel.

There could be no doubt upon the point.

The sound was that produced by swords ringing and clashing against each other, while wielded by persons in deadly conflict.

Clash — clash! the sounds came with the utmost regularity and rapidity.

But there was no other sound mingled with it.

They could not hear the breathing of the combatants; they could not hear their feet as they must have advanced or retreated.

All was hushed and silent, save the furious clatter of the steel.

By degrees, however, they became conscious that the violence and rapidity of the blows abated.

It seemed to our friends as though one of the combatants was growing weary or faint of the deadly strife.

Suddenly, however, the clashing ceased.

But it was succeeded instantaneously by the cry which they had heard before, save and except that its horror and loudness were a thousand times increased.

It was too much for Maud to bear.

Dick Turpin felt her suddenly become a dead weight hanging on his arm.

He caught her round the waist, or she would have fallen.

She had swooned.

CHAPTER CCCCXLII.

THE FOUR HIGHWAYMEN BECOME SPECTATORS OF A STRANGE SCENE IN THE DESERTED MANSION.

In some respects it was a fortunate event that Maud thus lost her consciousness, for it had the effect of arousing the highwaymen from the kind of trance of horror into which they had fallen.

They immediately hastened to her assistance, and, for a moment, their thoughts had some other occupation than that of brooding over what they had just heard.

Maud seemed to be quite lifeless, and our friends were at a loss to know what to do to restore her to her senses.

They placed her upon the stairs and rubbed her hands, which were as cold as ice itself.

Still, she evinced no signs of returning animation, until Turpin, struck by a sudden thought, drew his sword and placed the blade against her face.

The steel was cold, and the contact sent a kind of shuddering shiver through her body.

Then she opened her eyes and looked around her.

She seemed terrified to a degree, and Dick hastened to speak to her.

"Do not be alarmed," he said; "pray do not. You have no cause for fear. We are with you, and are able to ward off all harm. Cheer up, dear one. Be yourself. All is well."

Hearing these words, Maud grew calmer, and allowed herself to be raised to her feet.

But she clung to Dick's arm with frantic violence.

Turpin would have descended and approached the door, but she held him back and implored him not to move.

Dick listened to her request, for he could tell how extreme her agitation was, and he by no means desired to increase it.

He turned round, therefore, to his comrades, who were standing together in a group exchanging whispers with each other.

"My friends," he said, "what we have just now heard surpasses all belief and defies all explanation. How are we to account for that awful sound, which has nothing earthly or human in it? What are we to think of the tragedy which appears to have been enacted on the other side of yon door?"

The three highwaymen made no reply.

"It is no delusion of the senses," said Turpin, "for we heard it all alike; moreover, what we have heard agrees exactly with the description which Maud has given us. What it may mean I can offer no conjecture. In the course of my life I have met with strange and mysterious occurrences, but nothing half so strange and mysterious as this."

"It is terrible," said Claude Duval, "and I shall never know what it is to rest again until I have thoroughly explored this mansion."

"We ought to have done that upon first taking possession of it," said Turpin. "As it is, we have only seen the interior of two rooms. All the others appear to be locked up."

"Then we must break into them, that's all about it," said Claude Duval. "I cannot stay here another day until I have looked into every nook and cranny."

"We will do so. And now, my friends, what do you think had better be our next proceeding?"

"To break down that door," said Tom King, "and see what there is upon the other side of it."

"Well, agreed. That shall be done. Down with the door at once!"

Turpin again attempted to move forward, but again Maud held him back.

Tom King and Sixteen-String Jack reached the door in a moment.

It was furnished with a massive glass handle.

This they turned round, but the door did not yield.

It was evidently fastened in some other manner.

"We must use force," said Jack. "Now, Tom, put your shoulder to it at the same moment as I do, and exert your utmost strength."

Tom King did so.

But the door was strongly made, and apparently, securely fastened, for it resisted all their efforts.

Both highwaymen put out their utmost strength, but the door remained immovable, and they were forced to retire from it and confess themselves defeated.

"We must find some other means," said Tom King, "or we shall never effect our object."

"That is quite certain," said Claude Duval; "but we will not be defeated. Stand aside a moment, and I will try an experiment."

Claude had a double-barrelled pistol in his hand; and holding it firmly in his grasp, he approached the door.

His comrades stood aside as he had desired them.

As soon as they caught sight of the pistol, they understood what it was that he intended to do.

"Bravo, Claude!" they cried. "Try the effect of that."

He said nothing, but, having examined the priming, placed the muzzle of the pistol near the keyhole.

Then he pulled both triggers at once.

A deafening report followed, which raised a thousand echoes in the silent mansion.

For a moment nothing could be seen but smoke.

By degrees, however, the blue vapour curled away and dispersed.

They then looked towards the door, and found that Claude's pistol had made a great breach near the lock.

A closer examination showed them that the lock had been completely blown away.

They tried the door again.

It yielded.

But they only pushed it open to the extent of about a couple of inches.

They paused then, and were irresolute.

Now that the way lay open before them—now that there was no obstacle to be overcome—now that they could, beyond all doubt, walk into the mysterious chamber, they shrank back and hesitated to do so.

The strange and superstitious ideas which had lain dormant in their breasts, were now aroused into full vitality.

What they had heard was above all things calculated to produce this effect.

They shrank from entering.

Their imaginations were busy in suggesting to them what they might see beyond.

How long this state of things would have continued is hard to say.

But it was put an end to by Dick Turpin.

He spoke.

"Courage, my comrades," he said; "the way now lies open before us. Courage—courage! I can feel that we are on the eve of making some strange and terrible discovery; and, no doubt, the same feeling has sprung up in your minds. But courage, friends, and all will be well."

These words, simple as they were, produced a wonderful effect upon those to whom they were spoken.

They shook off their superstitious fancies, and became themselves again.

"Come, captain," they cried, "you have, as you ought to do, taken the lead in this adventure up to now. We have obeyed all your injunctions. Now, continue to perform your duty. Lead the way, and we will follow."

Maud trembled and shook excessively when she heard these words, for she knew full well that Turpin would not shrink from his duty.

What, then, should she do?

She was afraid to accompany him, lest her sight should be blasted by some frightful and horrible spectacle; for somehow she had a presentiment that there was something truly terrible to be seen.

She tried to hold Turpin back, but this time it was in vain.

She dreaded equally to be left alone.

"Release me, Maud," said Turpin, quietly. "You see, my friends look to me to take the lead in this affair. You had better not come with us for fear you should see some horrible sight; and I am certain you are not able to stand the shock which it would produce."

"But I should die with terror if I remained here alone."

"Then you must accompany us."

"I am terrified to death at the mere thought of it."

"Come, Maud, this is unreasonable. We will not go far. Supposing you sit down on the stairs here; we will leave the door open, and——"

"No—no—no!" said Maud, with a shudder.

"What, then, is to be done?"

"Remain with me."

"Impossible."

"Alas! alas!"

"Come, Maud, release my arm. It is weak and childish of you to behave thus."

"I—I will go with you. But blindfold me; tie something over my eyes, so that, if there should be any horrible sight, I shall not see it. I shall be able to cling to your arm, and then I shall feel perfectly safe and secure from all harm."

Dick Turpin was well pleased when Maud suggested this means of getting out of what seemed to him to be a very difficult position. So, without saying another word, he took off his neckcloth and bound it over Maud's eyes.

It was now quite impossible for her to see.

She took hold of Dick's arm, however, and clung to it tightly.

She suffered him, in this way, to lead her wherever he chose.

Upon reaching the threshold of the mysterious apartment, Dick Turpin felt a strange, hesitating feeling come over him, and, almost without being aware of it, he paused.

But his comrades were behind him, and he recovered himself instantly.

Maud clung to his left arm.

In his right hand he held a drawn sword.

With a confident, bold step, he entered the room.

The rubicon was now passed.

He was disappointed, however, when he found that the chamber, which he had been at such pains to enter, was a very small one.

A few articles of furniture were placed against the walls, but that was all.

The chamber contained nothing else.

The highwaymen looked around them with an expression of disappointment visible on their countenances.

"What are we to think of this?" asked Turpin, as he turned round and addressed them. "There is nothing here. I never saw a room that had a more ordinary, commonplace appearance."

"Nor I," said Tom King.

"It looks to me merely like an antechamber," said Sixteen-String Jack.

"And that is what it is," said Claude Duval. "Look, yonder is a door, and, by the appearance of it, I should say that it leads into some other apartment."

"No doubt that is the real solution of the difficulty. Come, friends! let us examine the door and endeavour to open it. Doubtless, on the other side of it, we shall find a solution of all that we have heard."

His comrades hastened forward to the door as he spoke these words, and tried it.

It was fast.

They tried to shake it in its setting, but in vain.

It was as immovable as a rock.

"This is, indeed, secure," they said. "It will not move in the least, and how we are to force it open is a mystery."

"Set to work," said Turpin. "Do not let our progress be stayed by a door, let it be ever so strong a one. This anteroom, by disappointing me, has but inflamed my curiosity, and, doubtless, it has produced the same effect upon you all."

"It has—it has."

"Well, then. Try the door again. Down with it."

"I think, as a pistol did us such good service before, we had better try it again."

"Agreed."

Claude Duval now produced another pistol, the fellow to the one he had just fired, and placed it close to the keyhole as before.

Then he pulled the trigger.

The lock was blown off and shattered to atoms; but when they came to try the door, it was as immovable as before.

Clearly the mode in which it was secured was quite independent of the lock.

The next thing to ascertain was the manner in which it really was fastened.

They were not long in discovering this.

The door was nailed up, and in such a manner that those who performed the task certainly intended that the door should never be opened again.

Even our friends had some doubt in their minds as to whether they should be able to make their way into the room, beyond which they were now doubly desirous of reaching.

They were quite unprovided with the tools necessary for breaking it open, and they looked at each other inquiringly, each in the hope that his comrade would be able to suggest some expedient by which this obstacle could be overcome.

But not one could give even a hint, until Turpin, happening to glance round the little apartment in which they stood, perceived the fireplace.

On the hearth were the fire-irons, though completely covered with rust.

As soon as he saw them, he pointed them out to his companions.

"There are some weapons," he said; "doubtless they will answer our purpose. Take them, and try whether you cannot batter the door down."

His comrades sprang forward alacriously enough to seize the fire-irons, which were of a very massive make, as most things were that were used by our forefathers.

Thus armed with these unexpected implements, the highwaymen commenced a vigorous attack upon the door, which, nevertheless, threatened to be proof against all their efforts.

But our friends plied their weapons with great vigour and determination, and, after a time, the door visibly shook before the assault that was made upon it.

They also used their swords whenever practicable, and the wood flew about in large chips.

The door had evidently been nailed up from the inner side, and when they made this discovery it afforded them fresh matter for wonder.

Could any persons have imprisoned themselves there, or was there some other mode of exit from the room?

This point they were at present unable to decide.

In a few moments, however, they would have demolished the door sufficiently to make an entrance.

They redoubled the strength of their attack, and presently the last remaining opposing portion of the door fell with a loud crash, that startled even those who were in expectation of hearing it.

Without loss of time Dick Turpin led the way across the threshold.

[DICK TURPIN ON HIS WAY TO OLD MATTHEW'S IN DRURY LANE.]

His comrades followed as closely behind him as they well could.

How it was, our friends scarcely knew, but they had, one and all, made up their minds that it was into some large apartment that they were about to make their way.

The extent of their surprise may therefore be imagined, when they found that, instead of an apartment, they found themselves in a kind of long corridor or gallery.

The roof was high, and from the ceiling depended banners of all shapes and sizes, each one heavily loaded with dust.

Along the walls armour of every description was hanging.

There were shields, and helmets, and breastplates, of every imaginable character, while weapons belonging to every age and every country were arranged in numberless quaint devices.

The whole aspect of this place was so strange and so different to anything which they had ever seen before, that the highwaymen paused the moment they set foot in this gallery, and looked around them with the greatest curiosity and interest.

Wherever their eyes fell they encountered some singular object.

At regular distances on pedestals were complete suits of armour, each one, however, differing widely from the other.

There could be no mistake as to the nature of the place into which they had intruded.

It was an armoury, or rather, a place set aside for the bestowal of curious arms of offence and defence.

It was, indeed, a perfect museum of such curiosities of antiquity, and the highwaymen remembered that they had frequently heard of persons taking extreme pleasure in making such collections.

The place had evidently not been opened for many years, for dust, in incredible quantities, had collected and lodged upon every object.

It was some few moments before the highwaymen could take in a clear idea of this place, and so absorbed were they by what they beheld, that, for a moment or two, they almost forgot the occasion of their presence there.

Very soon, however, recollection came back to them.

The corridor was of great length, so long, indeed, that they could only just discern its further extremity.

All along it was furnished in the manner we have described.

Altogether, it had a very strange appearance.

The atmosphere in it, too, seemed thick and heavy, and appeared almost as though it possessed the quality of weighing down the spirits of those who breathed it.

Dick Turpin felt its influence creeping over him, and, by the exercise of a great effort, he turned round to his comrades, and said—

"Forward, my friends, forward! It is in such a strange place as this, if anywhere, in which we are to look for the solution of the mysterious sounds we have all heard."

CHAPTER CCCCXLIII.

DICK TURPIN AND HIS COMRADES MAKE A HORRIBLE DISCOVERY IN THE ARMOURY, AND FIND THE MYSTERY AND HORROR OF THEIR POSITION INCREASE.

Dick Turpin was right.

It was, indeed, in some such sombre and mysterious place as this that they would be likely to find an explanation of that which had so puzzled them.

They had heard the clash of steel, and there were swords of every description hanging around them.

But by whom were the weapons wielded?

The silence of the grave itself filled the corridor.

When Turpin ceased to speak, and his voice had died away in dull and dismal echoes, they could hear their own breathing and the beating of their own hearts with a distinctness that was absolutely painful.

With slow steps they made their way along the corridor.

As they did so, they glanced keenly about them in every direction.

Their eyes rested with interest on the curious weapons they passed on their way, but they did not pause to examine one of them.

Suddenly Dick Turpin paused.

His companions, who were behind him, instinctively followed his example, without knowing what it was that had caused him to stop with so much abruptness.

"What is it, Dick?" they asked, anxiously. "What is it?"

"Look before you," replied Turpin, pointing with his drawn sword as he spoke.

"Where—where?"

"On the floor yonder, in the very middle of the corridor, cannot you see something?"

His comrades strained their vision to the utmost.

"Something dusky and indistinct," they said.

"Yes—yes," answered Turpin; "that is what it appears to me to be. A mass of something on the floor."

"What can it be?"

"That I know not; and, I do not mind confessing to you, that I feel a strong disinclination to advance and ascertain, but I must shake this feeling off. It is a foolish one."

"Well, now you have mentioned it, Dick," said his comrades, "we can feel a very similar sensation."

"Pho! pho! We are worse than children. It is the dark, thick atmosphere of this place, its peculiar appearance and solemn stillness, which produce this effect upon our minds, and, unless we make a strong effort, and that immediately, we shall be unable to resist its influence. It will grow upon us. Come, my friends, forward. I am deceived else, or that dark, dusky, undefined mass which we can see yonder will resolve itself into an explanation of all these singular events."

Dick Turpin spoke these words with tolerable calmness, and once more grasping his sword firmly by the hilt, so as to be able to make instant use of it if necessary, he stepped carefully and slowly along the floor of the corridor.

His companions did not hesitate to follow him.

At every step they took, the dark, dusky mass became more and more plainly visible.

What could it be?

Dick's heart prompted a reply, but he refused to listen to it.

It was something that, in a confused and huddled-up heap, lay upon the flooring of that corridor.

It was quite motionless.

Closer and closer came Dick Turpin and his comrades, but as they approached their footsteps became slower and slower, until at length their advance was almost imperceptible.

They stretched their heads forward as far as they could and strained their eyes, but they were not able to define the outlines of the dusky mass.

But Turpin became more and more convinced that his original surmise was, indeed, a correct one.

How or why it was, we cannot say, but the same surmise found a home in the breasts of all his companions, and yet not a word had been spoken in reference to it.

Dick advanced closer, and then whatever lingering doubts he might have entertained were completely dispelled.

Lying before him on the floor were two human bodies.

They were plain enough to be seen now.

The indistinct mass had resolved itself.

Prepared as their minds were for what they were about to see, the highwaymen, when the sight was fully revealed to their eyes, did not manifest that amount of surprise that they would have done, had they come upon it quite unexpectedly.

The first shock, however, being over, they drew nearer still, and proceeded to look with curious eyes upon the sight before them.

Ejaculations of surprise and awe fell from their lips during this examination, for each moment brought to view some new and astonishing particular.

Let us describe this sight as well as we have power to do it.

Lying on the floor of the corridor were, as we have said, the bodies of two men.

They were both in the strangest possible attitudes.

Their faces were both turned upwards, and their limbs and bodies drawn up and contracted as though from the effect of some more than mortal agony which had seized upon them at the dying moment.

The apparel which they had on was of a fashion that had long been obsolete when the highwaymen looked upon them.

Neither of our friends could ever recollect seeing anyone in such a garb, except in some curious old picture.

The dresses had been rich ones—such, no doubt, as were worn by the noblest or wealthiest in the land; for even now, thickly covered with dust as they were, here and there the faint glitter of some ornamental jewel could be distinguished.

But something else glittered with far greater brightness than any of the jewels.

This was two swords.

Upon the brightly-polished blades of these weapons not a speck of dust appeared to have fallen.

Their brilliancy seemed to equal that of glass.

The highwaymen looked upon these weapons with silent wonder.

Looking more closely, they saw that both were hacked and gapped from the hilt to the point, thus indicating the desperate nature of the combat that had taken place.

How the highwaymen shuddered when they recollected how the clashing of steel had struck upon their ears when they stood upon the staircase.

Each of the combatants, for such they were, held his sword firmly in his grasp, as though his last impulse had been to fight.

Death had come upon them in some sudden and mysterious manner. The King of Terrors had overtaken them at a moment when their minds were full of strife; and the clutch with which they held the swords was a death grasp.

Not a word was spoken by the highwaymen when the first feeling of astonishment at what they saw had subsided.

Whether those men, whose bodies lay there so motionless and so strangely huddled up, had received their deaths at each other's hands—whether the single combat in which they had been engaged had terminated in the deaths of both of them, was more than they could tell.

It was probable, however, that each had inflicted upon the other a mortal wound, and that death had come upon them too quickly to enable them to remove from the spot upon which they had been fighting.

At any rate, there their bodies lay, still and cold in death, and in some strange manner preserved from the ravages of decay.

By looking at their hands and faces, our friends could see that the flesh had become dried up and mummified, while the skin had the colour, and appeared to have the consistency, of shrivelled parchment.

Dick Turpin was glad that Maud had consented to have her eyes bandaged.

It would had vexed him exceedingly if she had been made the spectator of so horrible a sight.

But as for Maud herself, finding that something peculiar had occurred, she felt her curiosity greatly roused, and was more than once inclined to remove Dick's neckcloth.

But, dreading that her eyes should be blasted by beholding some dreadful spectacle, and overawed by the silence which followed the ejaculations of wonderment to which the highwaymen had given vent, she resisted the inclination and remained perfectly still.

Dick Turpin was the first to speak.

It might be that he was the first to recover himself sufficiently to do so, or, perhaps, his comrades remained silent in order to hear the first words he should utter.

At any rate, after a long pause, Turpin spoke.

Maud listened eagerly to every word which came from his lips.

"My friends," said Dick, "this is a strange and unexpected sight—one that I was unprepared to see. What can be the meaning of it I am at a loss even to surmise. We shall have to spend some time, I fear, before we can approach even a reasonable conjecture."

"I fear so, too," said Tom King. "This surpasses all which I have previously met with in the whole course of my life. I cannot think, however, that the presence of these two dead bodies here can account either for the horrible sounds we heard or the clashing of steel which afterwards came upon our ears."

"And yet," said Claude Duval, "these two men have at some time been engaged in combat. They appear to have fallen by each other's hands. That the conflict was a desperate one the state of the swords will testify; but yet, as Tom says, I cannot bring myself to believe that these weapons produced the sounds we heard."

"There is a deep mystery in this," said Sixteen-String Jack; "one that at present we are totally unable to solve. We have nothing to guide us to a decision; and, then, the howling cry? Whence proceeded that?"

"I wish I could answer that question," said Dick Turpin; "but it is wholly out of my power to do so. However, my friends, let us leave these bodies here; we have seen all of them that we can see; and let us pursue our explorations in some other quarter."

"Agreed, Captain," said his comrades; "and I trust we shall be able to find some explanation of the dreadful tragedy which has clearly been enacted here."

"Yes, those two bodies are the consummation of it. I fervently echo your wish. Come, forward friends! Forward!"

Dick Turpin placed his left arm round Maud's waist, and, with his drawn sword in his right hand, passed the two dead bodies, and directed his footsteps towards the other extremity of the corridor.

This they soon reached, for it was only a few feet distant.

It terminated in a blank wall.

In this they could perceive no trace of door or other means of outlet, and they were at length forced to come to the conclusion that there was no exit in this direction.

This was strange.

Nor was there anything around them to be seen of a more peculiar character than the antique armour and curious weapons.

The highwaymen were much disappointed at this.

They had quite expected that they would have found something in connexion with the two bodies on the floor.

But there was nothing.

They lingered for a moment, and then slowly retraced their steps.

In doing this they divided themselves into two portions, one going on one side and one on the other, for they thought it not unlikely that there might be some doorway opening from the side of the corridor.

But nothing of the kind met their view.

They reached in a few moments the spot where the two bodies lay.

"How strange this is," said Turpin. "I could have declared there was some exit from this gallery at the end from which we have now come. But there is none, it seems."

"If there is," said Tom King, "it must be some cleverly concealed secret entrance."

"It is quite probable something of the kind exists. However, my friends, do not let us confess ourselves baffled. Here are the bodies; we can make nothing of them, save that they are the remains of two men who must have fallen in single combat. We must look further afield for the elucidation of this mystery."

"If we do not discover the meaning of all this," said Claude Duval, "the recollection of it will haunt us to the longest day of our lives."

"It will—it will. Come on; we will leave these two bodies undisturbed."

After casting one last lingering glance upon them, Dick Turpin and his comrades took their way along the corridor in the same manner as before.

They looked searchingly at the walls, but they could discover no traces of a door.

Without making any discovery whatever, they came to the door by which they had entered the armoury, for such it seemed to be.

Here our friends paused irresolutely.

"There seems to be but one means by which this corridor can be entered and left," said Dick Turpin, "and this is it. What are we to think of so singular a circumstance?"

"It is perfectly bewildering," said Tom King.

"It is, indeed."

"You cannot have forgotten that we found this door nailed up, and very strongly, too."

"And the position of the nails," said Dick Turpin, "clearly proved that the door was nailed up on the inner side."

"It is quite certain that those by whom the nails were driven in stood in this armoury to do it."

"That drives us to come to one of two conclusions. Either those persons, who lie still in death yonder, made themselves prisoners in this place and hammered the nails in, or else there is some other mode of leaving the corridor with which we are at present unacquainted.

"The last supposition seems to me to be the most likely one."

"And to me too."

"And yet it might not be so."

"Without some more definite information than we at present possess we cannot possibly decide."

"Very true."

"Well, then, my friends," said Turpin, "here we stand upon the threshold of the ante-room, for such I take it to be. Now, say what we are to do."

"We cannot surely have made any mistake about the place from which the sounds proceeded?"

"I do not think we can possibly have done so."

"Then I am afraid there is but little hope that we shall be able to find out anything more than we at present know. The sounds seem to have altogether ceased, and no longer afford us any clue. What, then, shall we do?"

"I do not like to be beaten thus."

"Nor I—nor I."

"You may depend there is some deep mystery in all this," said Dick Turpin. "Whether we shall be able to find it out I know not, but we will not confess ourselves baffled until we have tried our best to obtain a solution of the mystery."

"We agree with you there, captain," said his comrades; "but what shall be our next proceeding?"

"Well, now that the sounds have entirely ceased, and there appears no signs of their renewal, we have no clue to guide us to further explorations. Under the circumstances, I think we had better make our way to our quarters above, and then, if we hear anything, we can immediately descend.

"We shall have no obstructions to hinder us this time.

"We shall not, as you say. We shall be able to enter this corridor at once."

"Then I think we had better ascend. It seems that there is nothing further to be discovered by remaining here."

"No, all is still. We cannot hope to find out more than we already know."

"Come, then, ascend," said Dick Turpin. "If I live till to-morrow, I will make such a search through this old mansion, that let the secret be what it will we will unkennel it. We shall have daylight to aid us, and that alone will disclose much that the night would conceal. We will not leave a corner in this place without prying into it. Come, then, my friends, we will, if we can, snatch a few hours' repose, and then set about our task in the morning."

With these words, Dick Turpin ascended the stairs, having first removed the bandage from Maud's eyes.

His three comrades followed him.

CHAPTER CCCCXLIV.

DICK TURPIN AND HIS FRIENDS ARE BAFFLED AND BEWILDERED BY THE DISCOVERY IN THE OLD ARMOURY.

THE reader will not require to be told that the highwaymen were all exceedingly dissatisfied with the results of their exploring expedition.

It was certain, however, that they could not do better than act in the manner which had been proposed.

In a minute or two, then, they reached the upper portion of the house, and here they separated, while each one sought that repose of which they stood so much in need.

All were very—very weary, and when they awoke, the day was far advanced.

They had not been disturbed by any sound whatever.

Some time was consumed in attending to the horses, for our friends were well aware that it would never do to neglect them.

Some more of the provisions which Tom King had been so lucky to obtain the night before were divided amongst them.

"Comrades," said Dick Turpin, "have you thought over the plan of future action which I proposed to you?"

"We have—we have."

"And what is the ultimate result of your deliberations?"

"We approve of the scheme highly; it is impossible for us to do otherwise, but we wish there was not quite so much risk."

"You exaggerate the amount of the risk," said Dick Turpin. "To be sure, it looks, at first sight, a very hazardous and daring thing for one of us to make our way to the 'White Horse' Inn, in Drury-lane, but I have come to the conclusion that in reality the danger is not so great as it appears to be."

"Why not? How do you make that out?"

"In this way. After my escape from Newgate you may depend that old Matthew's crib was very closely watched indeed."

"There is no doubt about that."

"Now I think myself, and I feel pretty well sure, that the same vigilant watch would be kept up until the time when it became known, for certain, that we had taken up a temporary residence in Enfield Chase."

"And do you think it would be discontinued then?"

"I do, for they would see the uselessness of keeping it up. Since then we have been hunted about from one part of the kingdom to the other, and in such a manner that the very last thing our foes would dream of our doing would be going back to London, or, at all events, to Drury-lane."

"I understand you now. You think the officers would consider it such a mad-headed freak, that they would make up their minds that we should never attempt it."

"Just so."

"Well, there may be something in that, but there is the danger just the same."

"So there is, and so there always will be, whenever we ride out upon the road; but come, friends, this talk is idle. In your own minds you must be conscious of the immense advantages which will accrue from this proceeding, therefore I shall no longer hesitate."

"You have quite made up your mind, captain?"

"Quite. As soon as ever it gets dark to-night, I shall saddle Black Bess, and set out. If I do not return in the morning, do not be alarmed. It may be running some extra risk to return, and old Matthew will be able to find me a secure hiding-place until nightfall."

"Then, you think it probable you will remain there all day to-morrow?"

"I may do so. I merely mention the contingency in order that my non-return may excite no apprehension. When I come back, you may depend I shall be the bearer of some important news."

"We can only wish you good luck, captain."

"Leave all to me. I have hoped that we shall be able to search this old mansion thoroughly, but we have slept too late, and the days now are so very short—in an hour or so it will be quite dark."

"It will—it will."

"However, my comrades, we will occupy that hour by visiting that strange place into which we last night forced our way. I have hopes that the daylight will reveal to us what the night concealed."

"There is a chance of that."

"Come, then. Let us go at once, or we shall have no time."

Upon this the whole of the little party made their way to the corridor which they had visited on the preceding night.

Dick Turpin, in answer to Maud's queries, had told her what kind of discovery they had made; and her mind being thus prepared, she felt that she should not fear to look upon the forms of the two dead combatants.

Accordingly she accompanied them.

Upon reaching the door which led from the antechamber into the armoury or corridor, they paused in order to see whether the door really had been nailed up from the inner side.

This second investigation had the effect of assuring them that they were quite correct.

There could not be the shadow of a doubt about it.

The door had been nailed up from the inner side.

What could be more puzzling than this?

Unable, however, to come to any conclusion respecting it, the highwaymen crossed the threshold and stood within the armoury.

Seen by daylight, this place presented a very magnificent appearance, in spite of the dust with which every object was covered.

But a chill struck to their very hearts when they entered this place, which seemed more deserted than any other portion of the deserted mansion.

It was now quite easy to see to the farther extremity of the corridor, and a broad ray of light fell upon the two bodies.

Dick and his comrades began their search at once.

They examined all the walls with the utmost minuteness, in order to ascertain whether they could find any traces of another mode of leaving the armoury.

But, as on the preceding evening, they failed completely.

They could discover nothing.

The walls were perfectly uniform and even, and every square foot almost was covered with weapons of various kinds.

Then they reached the bodies.

An impulse of curiosity, which they could not resist, induced them to pause and gather round these two prostrate forms.

They were eager to learn what appearence they presented by daylight.

There was not much difference, except that they were able to see with greater distinctness.

They were able to see the expression upon the countenances of these two men.

It was that of deadly and inveterate hate.

Their brows were contracted into a deep frown, and their teeth tightly clenched together.

Upon the swords, too, near the points, could be seen the stains of blood.

This seemed to confirm the supposition that the combatants had both perished by each other's hands.

Then they noticed, too, that the floor near them was of a much darker colour than it was elsewhere, as though it had been dyed with blood.

"The mystery deepens, I think," said Dick Turpin.

"It does," said Tom King.

"Setting aside what we heard," exclaimed Claude Duval, "how do you account for the bodies being preserved in the way they are?"

"I cannot account for it."

"Nor I."

"Their garments appear to be whole and perfect. I wonder whether in any of their pockets we should be able to find anything that would give us a clue to this mystery?"

"It is possible."

"Then I will try it," said Claude Duval.

As he spoke, he stooped down and took hold of the lapel of one of the coats.

To his surprise, the moment he touched it, it all crumbled away in his fingers, as though it had been so much cobweb.

He started up in astonishment.

"You see everything is in the last stage of decay," said Dick Turpin, "which alone proves how long these bodies must have laid here, if the style of their dress was not evidence sufficient."

"By what means, then, have the bodies escaped corruption?" asked Claude Duval.

"I cannot tell," replied Turpin. "In this instance the usual course of nature has been suspended. What causes have operated to produce this I know not."

"The bodies seem to have dried in some way," said Tom King.

As he spoke, he stooped down,

There were no foolish fears of death in Tom King's mind, and he did not hesitate to take one of the dead hands in his own.

As he had more than half expected, it crumbled to dust in his grasp.

"Had we come upon this spectacle in the most casual manner," he said, "it would have afforded us ample matter for speculation; but, coupled with the strange circumstances——"

"Stay! stay!" said Turpin. "Do not be too fast to connect the sounds we have heard with these two dead bodies. I should be loath, indeed, to believe that they had anything to do with them."

"And yet what else can we think?"

"Anything but that," interrupted Turpin, hastily. "As I said before, there is some deep mystery here. Whether we shall be able to discover it or not I cannot say, but I hope we shall be able to do so, because of the feeling of satisfaction which it will give us. But come, we will look at the further end of the corridor. If we linger much longer, we shall have darkness come upon us."

With these words, the highwaymen aroused themselves, and hastened to the extremity of the corridor.

But not the slightest sign could they see of any other doorway.

In the end they were compelled to own themselves baffled, and yet Dick Turpin and his comrades could not divest themselves of the idea that there was some secret means of exit and entrance, but that it was too cleverly concealed for them to be able to discover it.

They cast one last, lingering glance at the bodies, and then, as night was coming on with great rapidity, they returned to their chamber above.

Here they partook of another scanty meal, and then Turpin said—

"My comrades, you will remain here during my absence. In your charge I leave Maud. I know I can do so safely. During the night, should the sounds which we have previously heard be repeated, I should like you to hasten down the stairs and rush into the corridor, and try to penetrate this mystery."

"We will do so."

"If, in the meantime, you can suggest any improvement to the scheme I have laid before you, I should like to hear it. Until I return, we cannot proceed further."

"We certainly cannot, captain."

"If it is possible, I shall return here before daybreak. If, however, I find I shall incur an extra amount of danger by doing so, which might be avoided by remaining in Drury-lane until the following night, I shall not hesitate to stay."

"No, it will be your wisest plan; for above all things it behoves you to look after your own safety."

"I shall make it my chief business to preserve it. I must confess, though, I should have parted with a lighter heart if we could have discovered the meaning of all that we have seen and heard."

"Do not think about that, captain."

"I shall try not to do so. Still I am always uneasy when anything occurs for which I am unable to account."

"It is very natural."

"An adventure occurred to me on the same night that I took the silver cup from Lord Mayor Fungo. You have heard me speak of it before?"

"Oh! yes; often."

"I mean the body of the man I found in the small cavern beneath the hut in the wood, which served as a haunt for a band of robbers."

"Somewhere near Wimbledon, was it not?"

"Yes. Well, that puzzled me exceedingly, and the adventure often recurs to my recollection, just because I have never been able to come to any satisfactory conclusion concerning it."

"But perhaps you may do so."

"There is some hope of that, though I fear not much. Still, I should not like the mysteries in this deserted mansion to elude us."

"They shall not, if it is possible for human beings to find them out; and, captain, while you are out on the road to-night you may depend, if we hear anything, we will hasten down the stairs as quickly as we can."

"Do so—do so; and I hope you will be rewarded for your investigations. Do not give up easily."

"We will not, you may depend. But, captain"——

"What, my friends?"

"Before you start, tell us what you think of doing."

"No more than I have said. I shall saddle Black Bess and leave here. I shall make my way by the most circuitous and unfrequented road I can find to old Matthew's at Drury-lane. When I get there, I shall talk the matter thoroughly over with him, in the hope that he may be able to afford us a few practical suggestions."

"That is all as it should be," said Tom King; "but when I started on my little mission last night, I had to give a kind of understanding that I would not allow myself to be led off into any other adventure."

"And I suppose you would like me to enter into an engagement of a like character?"

"That's it. We do not want you to incur any more danger than you may be absolutely compelled."

"Leave all that to me, my friends," said Dick Turpin; "you have trusted me before to-day."

"We have—we have."

"Rely upon it, I will do my best to perform my errand, and, if for Maud's sake merely, you may depend I shall take the utmost care not to get into trouble through being rashly adventurous."

"I suppose we cannot ask more?"

"Do not. Do you think, now, that it is sufficiently dark to answer my purpose?"

"I think so," said Tom King; "by the time you have completed your preparations night will be fairly come, and I for one would prefer to see you return before daybreak, instead of being absent during the whole of to-morrow; and if you stay till too late before you make a start you will have no opportunity."

"True—true."

As he spoke, Dick Turpin set about the task of loading and priming his pistols, so as to be able to rely upon making use of them when the critical moment arrived.

Maud watched this proceeding with silent dread.

To her the enterprise upon which Dick Turpin was about to start seemed to be of the most dangerous character conceivable.

She trembled excessively when she thought of it.

The moment of parting, too, would be a dreadful one.

At lenth Dick Turpin completed his preparations, and, turning round to his comrades, he said—

"We will shake hands and part here."

But to this proposal not one of them would consent.

"No, no," they cried, "it is night now, and there is no fear of our being seen by any prying eye. We will go down with you and see you fairly start."

Perceiving how bent they all were upon this, Dick Turpin gave his consent, for he could see no reason for opposing their wish.

Accordingly they descended the staircase.

Maud hung heavily upon Dick's arm, and he could tell that she was weeping silently.

He affected to take no notice of this, but, in a low voice, did his best to remove her apprehension by showing her that the enterprise was not so dangerous a one as she imagined.

She listened to his words, but she could not altogether credit them.

She knew that if she magnified the danger he diminished it.

Tom King and Claude and Jack hastened toward the stable, their object being to allow Dick Turpin and Maud to say a few parting words to each other.

Of this opportunity they availed themselves. Turpin had the satisfaction of perceiving that before he reached the door of the building which they had made use of for a stable he had succeeded in removing a great many of her fears.

By the time he arrived Black Bess was saddled and bridled, and in readiness for her rider.

Tom King led her out.

Dick Turpin's eyes glistened with pleasure when he caught sight of his bonny mare.

As for Black Bess, she seemed to reciprocate that pleasure, and to recognize her rider too, for she neighed slightly and arched her neck, while she pawed the ground with her forefoot impatiently.

CHAPTER CCCCXLV.

DICK TURPIN HAS A PERILOUS ADVENTURE ON HIS WAY TO LONDON.

DICK TURPIN stepped forward a pace, and patted Black Bess upon the neck.

The noble creature neighed again and tossed her head, which proved that she really did recognize her master.

He spoke a few words of encouragement to her, and she reared and pranced with evident delight.

It would almost appear that she was aware she was once more to go forth alone upon the road with her master on her back.

Dick's heart glowed at the prospect before him.

He felt that he would not have omitted that journey for worlds.

"Farewell, Maud! farewell, comrades!" he cried, in a cheerful voice. "Farewell, for a brief space of time only. Ere long I shall return, and bring with me news such as will gladden the hearts of all. If possible, I shall return before to-morrow's dawn."

"We shall be glad to see you, captain," cried his followers; "but do not run any extra risk upon that account; it would never be worth while."

"So I think; and so, once more, farewell. I am off."

Dick kissed Maud and shook hands with his comrades.

Tears sprang into Maud's eyes; and though she was much more reconciled to the parting than she had been, still she could not repress them.

Dick Turpin sprang into the saddle.

He took off his hat and waved it to his friends.

Then, at a kind of prancing gallop, which would have disconcerted any but a practised horseman, Black Bess took her way across the neglected garden at the back of the house.

The last sound which Dick heard from his comrades was a brief caution to keep clear of danger.

He tried to bring Black Bess to something more like an ordinary pace, but the noble creature's delight appeared to be so great as to be beyond the reach of all control.

In a little while, however, her excitement wore off, and by the time Dick Turpin had reached the neglected gates which led out into the lane, she walked along as quietly as he could wish.

Dick halted and reconnoitred.

Then, not being able to see or hear anything that denoted the presence of a human being, he passed out into the roadway.

The stillness of the forest itself prevailed around him.

For some distance he could proceed without fear of an interruption.

A word to Black Bess was sufficient to let her know that her rider was in readiness for her to set forward.

Rearing in the air until she was almost upright, she gave a terrific bound forward, and flew along the road at a speed that positively astonished Dick Turpin himself.

There are few things more exhilarating than a gallop on horseback across the country.

Dick felt immediately a sense of the most exquisite enjoyment.

A long time had elapsed since he had had such a gallop alone, and he enjoyed it to the utmost.

Indeed, so great was the gratification, that he made no attempt to check his mare's tremendous speed.

On the contrary, he allowed the reins to fall slack upon her neck, so that she could go at whatever speed she thought proper.

The blood seemed to circulate like lightning through every vein in the highwayman's body.

By degrees, however, as the novelty of the glorious sensation wore off, he awoke to a recollection of the fact that it was just the reverse of prudent for him to gallop along the road at such a speed.

Not without reluctance, though, he gently drew in the rein, and so diminished Black Bess's speed by degrees, until it became merely a gentle trot.

Then Dick glanced about him.

He had reduced his speed just in time.

A few yards further on he could see where the lane debouched upon the broad London road.

The highwayman's pulse beat rapidly, and he felt such an elation of spirits as he had for a long time been a stranger to.

His heart bounded freely and lightly.

He felt himself once more the bold, brave, daring knight of the road.

On such a night he felt that, let the risk and danger be what it might, he must have an adventure.

No night more fitting could possibly be found.

The air was clear and frosty.

Overhead the stars glittered with unusual brilliancy.

There was not a single cloud visible on the dark blue dome of the heavens.

The moon was absent.

She had just peeped above the horizon for an hour, and then departed to shed her silvery beams upon some other quarter of the earth.

The moon was only one day old.

The ground beneath was frozen as hard as iron.

The very piercingness of the air itself, without anything else, was calculated to raise the spirits to an infinite degree.

Dick Turpin thought that he had never felt so light-hearted and joyous in the whole of his life.

He fancied even that he was too merry for the atmosphere and the mere excitement of a gallop to have produced it.

But he drew in deep inspirations of the pure fresh air, and at each breath felt his spirits rise.

"Yes," he said to himself, as he emerged at a gentle pace into the high road, and turned his mare's head in the direction of London; "yes, I must have an adventure. I feel almost as though an adventure of more than usual interest awaits me. Most assuredly I shall not allow one to pass me by. This is, indeed, the night for a life on the road!"

The pronunciation of these last words seemed to have the effect of recalling to his mind the words of some ballad or light ditty, for almost immediately afterwards he commenced singing in a low but joyous tone.

It was merely natural that his happiness should avail itself of this vent.

The words were these.

They were sung to a lively, rollicking tune, which accorded well with their nature.

There's no life like a life on the road,
Fal la,
No life like a life on the road,
Fal la;
With bonny Black Bess,
Who all will confess
Is the steed for a life on the road,
Fal la.

There's no life like a life on the road,
Fal la,
No life like a life on the road,
Fal la,
On common or heath,
With the green grass beneath,
There's no life like a life on the road,
Fal la.

There's no life like a life on the road,
Fal la,
No life like a life on the road,
Fal la;
When the moon gives no light,
And a coach comes in sight,
There's no life like a life on the road.
Fal la.

There's no life like a life on the road,
Fal la,
No life like a life on the road,
Fal la;
"Hand over your gold!"
Cries Turpin so bold,
"For to-night I take toll on this road."
Fal la.

Dick Turpin ceased somewhat suddenly.

At the same time, too, he reined in his steed.

He assumed a listening attitude.

A faint sound had struck upon his ears while he was singing, and now he listened for a repetition of it.

It soon came.

A rumbling, grating, grinding sound.

To Dick's ears it was audible enough, though anyone less practised would scarcely have heard it.

"A coach!" he said, in tones which showed how much gratification the circumstance afforded him. "Yes, it is a coach, or some vehicle. It is a long way off, and most certainly approaching. Can I let it pass me toll-free? Surely no. Dick Turpin is on the road to-night, and requires money to carry out his plans. Hurrah for the road! As for my comrades, never mind them, I shall reach the White Horse plenty time enough."

Dick Turpin got his pistols in readiness.

He looked at the primings carefully, and was repaid for taking the precaution.

The priming of one of them had got shaken out during his gallop.

Had he been ignorant of this it might have cost him his life.

The omission was, however, easily remedied.

By the time he had made these little preparations the sound had greatly increased in loudness, and there could not be the least doubt as to the cause which produced it.

The clatter of the horses' hoofs upon the hard, frosty road and the rumbling of the wheels could be clearly distinguished.

Black Bess pawed the ground impatiently with her feet, as though she, too, knew what that sound meant.

Dick allowed her to proceed for a short distance at a walk.

Then coming to a portion of the roadway where a tall quickset hedge cast a deep shadow beneath it, he paused again, and backed his steed until they were both completely concealed by the shadow.

In this position he awaited immovably and patiently until the vehicle arrived.

His patience was not put to a very severe trial.

The coach—for such it was—came on at the rattling pace of about ten miles an hour, which, before the invention of railways, was thought to be a very wonderful speed indeed.

It was the St. Alban's coach which was approaching.

It received this designation from the fact that it ran between London and the town of St. Alban's.

It was now on the way from London.

Dick would have infinitely preferred that it was making the other journey, for he had found from experience that those coaches which came from distant places to London always afforded a better booty than those returning from the metropolis.

However, he had to take things as they came.

The coach he was determined to stop, single-handed as he was.

The booty would be acceptable for carrying out his plans, and, as we have seen, he was just in the humour to undertake any temerarious feat.

Glancing along the road, he perceived in the distance two bright, glittering, star-like lights.

Upon these he fixed his eyes.

Gradually they became larger and brighter, until at length he could see what a light they cast around them, and how clearly they brought into view the different objects upon the wayside.

The gleaming light fell with a strange effect upon the branches of the leafless hedges and on the brown trunks of the trees which fringed the highway.

Then the dim, shadowy outline of the coach itself, with the driver perched up on his high seat, came in view.

This was the moment for action.

Fixing his hat firmly upon his brows, gathering up the reins somewhat tightly in his left hand, and grasping a pistol in his right, Dick Turpin pressed his heels against the flanks of his bonny mare.

Black Bess bounded forward in the direction of the coach.

As soon as he was near enough for his voice to have full effect, Dick cried—

"Halt!—halt! Coachman, pull up! Pull up this moment, or you will have a bullet through your brain."

"Murder!" cried the driver of the stage-coach. "It's a highwayman. Murder! murder!"

But he pulled up.

"Dismount!" cried Turpin, as soon as he found he had succeeded so far. "Down into the road with you, or you are a dead man."

"Oh! cuss it!" said the driver, mutteringly, as he descended. "There will be a precious row about this; but I ain't a going to be such a fool as to sit still and be fired at like Bob Clark."

When he descended from the box, the coachman dropped the reins, so the horses were left to themselves.

As they had come from London at full speed without stopping, they were glad enough of a rest, and there was no fear that they would start off of themselves.

By this time the alarm among the passengers, both inside and out, was very great indeed, and a medley of oaths and shrieks came on the highwayman's ears.

He put into practice a ruse which hitherto had never failed him.

Apparently addressing himself to the hedge, as though there were persons concealed there, Dick cried—

"Keep your weapons ready. If anyone moves or resists, fire at once, and settle them all."

The passengers on the top of the coach, who just before had been very clamorous, became silent immediately.

They had a very wholesome and natural dread of being shot down like so many pigeons, and, under the circumstances, they thought the most prudent thing they could do was to remain perfectly still.

Having thus spoken, and perceiving that his words had produced the effect he desired and expected, Dick Turpin rode coolly and boldly enough up to the door of the coach.

In their desire to learn what was the matter, the window had been let down, and several heads had been protruded.

But seeing Dick Turpin approaching, these were rapidly withdrawn, and an attempt was made to close the window again.

The highwayman, however, was in time to prevent this.

He still held the undischarged pistol in his hand, and placing this, in an apparently negligent manner, upon the window-sill, he said—

"Ladies and gentlemen, I am really sorry to have been the cause of interrupting you on your journey, but as you know such obstacles as tolls still exist, and, for to-night I am appointed to take the money."

"Stuff! fudge!" said a voice. "Take that, and much good may it do you. I can tell you, it is all you will get out of me."

With these words, a man, who was seated in the middle of the coach, drew a pistol from his breast, and, cocking it, presented it full at the highwayman's head.

But Dick Turpin never moved.

The trigger was pulled.

The powder flashed in the pan.

But no report followed.

"Oh! that's it, is it?" cried Dick. "Then, if that's all you are able to give me I suppose I may say thank you for nothing; however, you have had your shot, and now it is my turn."

Turpin slowly raised his pistol as he spoke.

"No!—no!" cried the man who had been so fast with his fire-arms; "no!—no! Murder!"

"It would be, only I fear I shall hurt the others in the coach; however, money I must and will have, and if you will surrender quietly whatever money and other articles of value you may have about you, I will use no harsh measures; if, on the contrary, you refuse, I shall have to take what I want, and then you will find I shall be more rough than pleasant."

"But this is monstrous," said a voice. "Monstrous to a degree! Why there are, counting myself, five men in the coach; and are we to tamely submit to be robbed by one man? Pho, stuff! Assist me, and we soon prove ourselves a match for him."

"You forget my men are waiting behind the hedge," said Dick Turpin, quietly. "At a word from me they will come forward; and, when they do, you will heartily wish that the thought of resistance had never entered your heads. Come, now, take good advice, and hand over quietly. If you do not, I shall take what I want; so that, in the end, it will be all the same; and I am sure the way I have proposed is by far the best for you."

Dick Turpin dropped the reins as he spoke.

He knew he could trust to Black Bess not to move until he gave her a signal to do so.

Taking off his hat, he held it inside the coach, as he said—

"Now, ladies and gentlemen, put your money and valuables in that, and then there will be no harm done."

Not a movement was made.

Seeing this, Dick held the pistol at the head of the passenger who sat next the door, and held his hat just before him.

"Now, sir," he said, in a sterner tone of voice than he had hitherto employed, "comply with my demands, or, as surely as you are alive at this moment, you will be a dead man if you refuse or even hesitate!"

CHAPTER CCCCXLVI.

DICK TURPIN SUCCEEDS IN TAKING A GOOD BOOTY FROM THE ST. ALBAN'S COACH, AND BLACK BESS MEETS WITH A MISHAP.

The passenger thus addressed glared fearfully at Dick Turpin.

He was a big, stout, pompous-looking man, with a countenance of a purple hue.

But the close proximity of the muzzle of the pistol produced a remarkable alteration in the colour of his visage.

It assumed a dusky, bilious-looking tint.

Dick saw that he made an impression, and he hastened to improve it.

Accordingly, he pressed the muzzle of the pistol into the bloated cheek of the fat traveller until it positively touched the bone.

"Now," said Turpin, "which will you do? Will you hand over your things to me, or shall my followers rifle them from your dead body?"

A deep groan was the response.

And then, in a manner which showed how much it went against his inclination, the traveller took a pocket-book from the breast of his coat and dropped it into Dick Turpin's hat.

"Quicker, sir! quicker!" said our hero. "Recollect there are others waiting to take their turn, and I am desirous that you should all continue your journey with the least possible delay."

"Won't that do, villain?" asked the traveller.

"No hard names, if you please," said Dick, good-humouredly. "I now want that watch, the chain of which I can see dangling from your fob, and I want besides the diamond pin out of your neckcloth, and those two rings off your fingers!"

The fat traveller groaned again.

But feeling that it would be madness to resist, he complied with the highwayman's demands; for he had the good sense to value his life at more worth than the possession of a few jewels.

So he gave Dick the articles for which he had asked, though to do so went sorely against the grain.

Satisfied with this individual, Dick removed the pistol.

The fat traveller sank back in the corner, and watched his fellow-passengers with an air of savage satisfaction.

Dick took them all in turn.

The compliance of the pompous gentleman in the corner seemed to have a good effect upon the rest, who surrendered their property with no more hesitation than might have been expected.

Dick had to transfer the contents of the hat to his pockets several times.

He was overjoyed at his success.

But inside the coach he showed no favour or partiality.

He levied his contributions upon all alike, and would not leave any until they had handed over all the valuables they had about them.

Dick grew more and more elated as the money and jewels kept falling into his hat.

At length he despoiled the last passenger.

Then making a low bow with his hat, he said—

"Ladies and gentlemen, I have the pleasure of wishing you a very good evening. I am sorry to have hindered you so much, though I must say the fault is partially your own. However, our acquaintance, though very brief, has been very agreeable to me at all events, and so good night, ladies and gentlemen."

With these words Dick Turpin placed his hat upon his head.

"Oh! d—n your politeness!" he heard a voice say, but he affected to take no notice of it.

Stimulated by the success which had so far attended his efforts, Dick now resolved to turn a portion of his attention to the outside passengers.

He could see no reason why they should be allowed to escape scot-free when those inside had been obliged to pay toll so heavily.

Besides, he knew that the outsiders were often persons who carried large sums about with them.

Scarcely, however, had Dick Turpin changed Black Bess's position in order to carry out his intention than he was startled by an occurrence which we must go back a little to explain.

The reader will, perhaps, have noticed that we have made no mention of the guard of the coach.

Now as this happened on a stage-coach to be a very important functionary, the omission cannot fail to appear extraordinary.

We proceed to account for it.

The guard of a stage-coach was always provided with two articles, which might be looked upon as the insignia of his office.

A long tin horn.

A blunderbuss.

Those were the two articles.

They were suspended from the roof of the coach on either side of his seat, and were covered with wicker-work cases to protect them from the effects of the weather.

The one was to be used whenever they were approaching a village or place where they stopped, and the loud discordant noise which could be produced by blowing into it served to give timely notice of their arrival.

The other—the blunderbuss—was to be used by the guard to protect the passengers and the coach from any attack that might be made upon them.

Why, then, did not the guard on this occasion do his duty, and make use of this formidable weapon of defence?

The reason was simple in the extreme.

The guard was a prudent man.

He remembered that the road was patrolled by a detachment of dragoons.

The coach had passed them not long before it was stopped by the highwayman.

This guard, then, being aware that absolute trust was not to be placed upon the death-dealing qualities of the blunderbuss, and, knowing also that if he failed to slay the highwayman when he fired it, his life would, in all probability, pay the forfeit, he bethought himself of another plan of proceeding, which was, in his judgment, an infinitely better one.

In this belief he lost no time in putting his plan into execution.

Instead, then, of making the slightest demonstration when Dick Turpin rode out and stopped the coach, he slipped quietly from his seat into the road.

He was not perceived.

As soon as he gained his feet, he ran along the road under the shadow of the hedge, taking the direction in which they had just come.

His purpose may be guessed.

It was to run back until he either met or overtook the troop of dragoons which he had passed.

[THE MEETING BETWEEN DICK TURPIN AND OLD MATTHEW IN THE BAR OF THE WHITE HORSE INN.]

The guard calculated correctly enough that the highwayman was not likely to meet with much resistance, and that it would take him some considerable time.

While he was thus employed, the guard doubted not that by making good use of his legs he should be able to reach the dragoons, and return with them before the highwayman finished.

He succeeded beyond his anticipations.

It so happened that the dragoons, having gone to the end of their beat, were returning.

The consequence was he met them.

A very few words sufficed to make the soldiers aware of the actual state of affairs.

This was quite enough to animate them.

Without troubling about the guard, the officer of dragoons called out to his followers, and the whole troop set off at a full gallop down the road, leaving the panting and exhausted guard to come after them in the best manner he could.

The reader will now understand what it was that attracted Dick Turpin's attention when he was about to levy his contributions upon the outside travellers.

He was surprised first of all by a loud shout of gratification which came from one of them.

Dick's eyes glanced like lightning in the direction to which the man's face was turned.

Then he saw and comprehended his danger in an instant.

Only a few yards off was a troop of dragoons.

They were coming on at a full gallop.

Somehow or other Dick had forgotten all about the dragoons until he was warned by the glitter of their accoutrements as they came galloping towards him along the road.

But Dick did not lose his presence of mind.

It was clear he would have to forego his purpose of taking toll from the passengers on the roof of the St. Alban's coach.

No. 93 will be Published next Monday.

Taking a firm grasp of the reins, he spoke a few encouraging words to Black Bess, and wheeled her round.

The dragoons increased their speed by goring their horses with their spurs, until the poor beasts were maddened by the pain.

In another instant they would be upon their prey.

But Dick Turpin made Black Bess face the hedge on one side of the road.

It was no very great height, though it was planted on the top of a bank.

Still Turpin felt sure that his mare could leap it easily.

He uttered the word that was requisite to give her the impulse.

She seemed to draw her body into a small compass, and drew her head in until it almost touched her breast.

She gave one bound forward.

The next moment she alighted on the other side of the hedge.

But Dick was only just in time.

Even as Black Bess alighted on the soft turf of the meadow which happened to be on the other side of the hedge, so did the dragoons arrive on the spot.

But such was the speed at which they came, that they found it impossible to pull up just opposite the coach.

The reason of this was, that they fancied the highwayman, upon seeing them approach, would turn round and fly, and they wished to keep up their speed so as to have a better opportunity of overtaking him.

But Dick was not likely to turn back, because that would lead him away from his destination.

He wished to go in the direction of London, and so he leaped over the hedge on the eastern side of the road.

This movement, then, being altogether unexpected by the dragoons, quite disconcerted them.

They overshot their mark considerably.

Dick turned round and waved his hat in a defiant and ironical manner.

Then, letting the reins fall loosely upon the neck of his bonny mare, he uttered a few encouraging sounds, which he knew would have the effect of inducing her to make all speed.

Away, then, like some phantom horse and rider, Dick Turpin and Black Bess flew over the meadow.

By the time the dragoons entered it, Dick leaped a hedge that took him into another.

Glancing back, over his shoulder, at his pursuers, he saw, by their manner, that they intended to make a chase of it.

But Dick Turpin, unencumbered as he was in any way, felt that he could laugh all their efforts to scorn.

He laughed lightly.

"Well—well," he said, "I have been successful beyond all expectation, and I feel light-hearted in consequence. These gentlemen desire a gallop, and they shall have one. I will lead them a pretty dance though, and when they are tired out I will shoot off out of their reach."

These words will be enough to show what Dick Turpin intended to do.

Looking back once more, he found that he had got a start of at least half a mile.

While that distance was preserved between them of course it would be all right enough, for they were unable to do him any injury until they came to closer quarters.

Having noted this, he made a rapid calculation as to the speed which the dragoons would be able to make.

This speed he found Black Bess would be able to perform with ease, and without distressing herself in the least.

The dragoons' horses were much heavier than Black Bess, and consequently not able to keep up a rapid pace for so long.

Then the soldiers themselves were much heavier than Dick, who might almost have been considered a light weight.

Besides this, the dragoons were encumbered with accoutrements and trappings of various kinds, which, taken altogether, made a material difference in the weight.

It follows, then, that the speed which these horses could with difficulty accomplish, would be performed by Black Bess with the greatest ease, for she was clean-limbed as a race horse.

Dick Turpin, then, resolved to keep up such a speed that he should preserve the same distance from his foes as there then was between them, feeling confident that he could out-distance them at any time he thought proper.

This was all very well, but still a prudent person would have been more likely to have got out of danger as quickly as they possibly could.

Dick's calculation, though ingenious and correct, was unfortunately, liable to be easily deranged.

However, without troubling himself about anything more than the dragoons, who were in the rear, Dick Turpin set off with a light heart across the second meadow.

A faint shout came upon his ears.

But he heeded it not.

At a long, sweeping gallop, which made it appear as though the ground glided from under her feet, Black Bess sped over the meadows.

Dick had said that he should make his way by a circuitous route to Drury Lane, and it seemed as though he was about to be as good as his word, for the direction in which he was now going was one that took him quite away from his destination.

Still, though he directed his course to the eastward, he inclined more and more to the south.

No doubt the dragoons, perceiving that the distance was not increased, had strong hopes that they should be able in the end to run down their prey.

They were scarcely likely to arrive at the real state of affairs.

On they came, then, in the highest possible spirits, all the time on the look-out for a reinforcement.

But it so happened that Dick, though purely from chance, took a direction which led him clear of all the other bands that were patrolling the various roads.

At length, however, when he had kept this up for some considerable time, and when he felt sure that the horses of the dragoons were well-nigh exhausted, Dick Turpin resolved to put an end to the chase.

He was the more moved to do this because he was gradually nearing London, and he by no means wished to be tracked into any of the streets of the metropolis.

Accordingly he determined to urge Black Bess to put forth her utmost speed for a few moments, which would, he knew, suffice to take him out of sight of his pursuers.

"Quick, old lass," he cried, addressing Black Bess. "One more effort, and then all will be over. You shall have good rest and plenty of food, of a far better quality than you have partaken of lately."

The cheery tone of voice in which Dick spoke made a wonderful difference to the speed of Black Bess.

If she did not understand the words themselves, she assuredly comprehended the meaning of the tone in which they were uttered.

But before he started her off, Dick resolved to clear the hedge that was just before him.

As he came closer he saw that this hedge skirted a broad high-road.

Up and down this road, however, he was able, from his elevated position on the back of Black Bess, to see for a long distance.

A hasty glance in both directions satisfied him that there was no one in sight, or, at any rate, no one mounted.

If there had been, he would have most certainly perceived them.

The hedge was rather high, but still it was no great obstacle to Black Bess, who possessed marvellous powers of leaping.

She saw the obstacle before her, and a touch on the flank was all the urging she required to clear it.

Then, when she was within a proper distance, she rose lightly and beautifully into the air.

Another faint cry from the rear told Dick Turpin that this action had been perceived by his pursuers.

The next moment Black Bess alighted in the high-road.

Along this Dick resolved to continue for a little distance before taking to the fields again, as over the opposite hedge was a large expanse of ploughed land.

Over this Black Bess would only be able to go slowly, and, besides, it would fatigue her immensely.

Accordingly, Dick turned her head round and cheered her onward.

To his surprise—we might almost say horror—he felt that she limped painfully.

Black Bess had fallen dead lame!

CHAPTER CCCCXLVII.

DICK TURPIN DISCOVERS THE CAUSE OF BLACK BESS'S LAMENESS, AND HAS A NARROW ESCAPE OF HIS LIFE FROM THE CARBINES OF THE DRAGOONS.

For a moment Dick felt as though deprived of breath—of life.

He could not realise the truth of what had just occurred.

But he was soon forced to the reality of it.

Black Bess was lame.

So lame, that it was with difficulty and evident pain that she was able to put her near fore foot on to the ground at all.

What could have produced this sudden lameness?

Before the leap Dick had felt nothing of it, but he became sensible of the fact the moment she alighted

Had the leap caused it, then?

It would seem so; and yet he had not noticed that she had dropped to the ground with particular heaviness.

Certainly not with heaviness sufficient to have injured her leg.

But what an unfortunate moment it was for so unfortunate an accident to occur!

The start of his pursuers which he had hitherto preserved would soon become diminished.

He could hear them in the distance, as, with loud shouts and cries, they came across the meadows.

In three minutes they would be upon him.

What was to be done?

Black Bess made an effort to continue on her way.

But Dick checked her.

He knew the dauntless mettle of his bonny mare.

She would keep up her speed, no matter how great the pain.

But her master was not content to allow her to injure herself thus.

It was just possible that, in alighting from her leap over the hedge, she had dropped upon a stone, which would be quite sufficient to cause her sudden lameness.

Dick Turpin glanced in the direction of his foes.

He could see them coming.

He could tell, too, by their manner, that they perceived he had come to a standstill.

They were striving all they could to take the utmost advantage of it.

Having satisfied himself by this one glance as to their precise distance, Dick Turpin suddenly dismounted from his steed.

He at once proceeded to examine her injured foot.

He was not without a hope that a stone had lodged in it, and that when he removed it he should remove his mare's lameness at the same time.

As soon as he took hold of her foot this hope was dissipated.

He saw, in a moment, the true cause.

Black Bess's shoes were thin, and in alighting upon the hard road the shoe upon the near fore foot had been broken into two pieces.

One of these pieces had disappeared.

The other was twisted round in such a manner that it presented a sharp edge to the frog—the tender piece of horn in the middle of a horse's foot, so called from its resemblance to the leg of the frog when bent up.

The sharp edge of the shoe was then twisted round, so that whenever Black Bess put her foot upon the ground it pressed against this tender piece of horn.

The pain thus produced would cause her to limp.

Dick uttered a cry of rage when he saw what had happened, and now that it was too late, repented of his foolhardiness.

He wished that he had been content to gallop right away at once.

Regrets, however, were useless, and so, very wisely, he set about repairing, in the best manner he could, the mischief that had been done.

The first thing he did was to take hold of the fragment of iron shoe.

A sudden wrench enabled him to disengage it entirely from his mare's foot.

Then he looked at it closely, but could not see that she had injured herself.

No doubt her lameness was now removed.

But then another difficulty presented itself.

How was she to run without a shoe?

A gallop over the hard road would do her irreparable injury, and make her lame in earnest.

Besides, ere she had gone far the hoof would be completely knocked away, so as to make it impossible for her to proceed, even at a walk.

Truly was Dick Turpin in a dilemma.

Besides, he had no time to invent some scheme that would enable him to elude his enemies or provide Black Bess with a substitute for her shoe.

Indeed, it seemed before he could even mount again, his foes would be upon him.

They were more than half-way across the meadow, and in a moment or two more would reach the hedge.

Despite these distracting and dispiriting circumstances, Dick Turpin all at once thought of a means by which he could render Black Bess fit for the road.

He no sooner thought about the plan than he set about adopting it.

Quick as thought, he took his thick but soft felt hat off his head.

He unwound his voluminous neckcloth from about his throat.

With the same speed he put Black Bess's foot into the hat, and bound it tightly round her leg with the neckcloth.

Although he worked so rapidly, he took care to do his work securely.

It would be fatal to him if it came undone.

But he fancied, and with good reason, that if he could envelop his mare's foot in the felt hat, and tie it on in such a manner as to prevent all fear of its coming off, Black Bess would feel but little inconvenience from the loss of her shoe.

Upon the spur of the moment he could think of no other plan that seemed so likely to succeed.

Ere one would have thought it possible, he had bandaged up Black Bess's hoof.

So long as the felt remained between it and the ground, all would be well.

She would receive little or no injury and feel but slight inconvenience, for Dick had been careful, in tying on the bandage, to do it in such a manner as would not impede the free motion of the leg.

This done, he rose from his stooping posture and prepared to mount.

But while he had been occupied in the manner we have described, his enemies had not been idle.

Dick was absolutely staggered with surprise when he looked up.

We will describe what had taken place.

The dragoons became aware, almost immediately, that the object of their pursuit had met with a mishap of some kind or other.

If not, why should he pause on the road, and then afterwards dismount, for they saw him do this quite plainly.

In the hope, then, that they should be able to put an end to this long and fatiguing chase, the dragoons spared neither whip nor spur in urging their horses onwards.

But the poor creatures flagged perceptibly, nevertheless.

The dragoons kept straight on towards the hedge that divided the meadow from the high-road.

The highwayman had leaped it, and why should not they be able to do so?

They resolved to make the attempt.

But as they galloped forward, the horses, perceiving the obstacle before them, and not having strength to surmount it, swerved on one side, and came to a halt; nor could they be induced to face the hedge, even though brought round to do so several times.

Some very horrible curses came from the lips of the dragoons when they found that their horses so steadily refused to clear the hedge.

All this while Dick Turpin was engaged in binding up Black Bess's foot.

They could see him a few yards further down the road plain enough.

But what were the dragoons to do?

Naturally enough, they looked towards their leader for instructions.

He did not hesitate.

"Two of you remain here," he said, "behind the hedge Shoot the rascal down if he attempts to move, but call out first and give him warning. I will go with the rest along the hedge. If I mistake not, I saw a gate some distance further down, and when we get through that all will be easy enough."

The two men selected to remain did so, and the remainder galloped along the meadow in the direction London.

At this extremity of the field there was a gate, the officer in command of the dragoons laboured on no mistake.

The instant, then, that Dick Turpin finished his task and rose to his feet, he was startled to perceive, just on the other side of the hedge, a couple of his foes, the dragoons.

They were only a few yards' distance from him

They were mounted, and therefore were easily able to see over the hedge into the road.

Each one held a carbine to his shoulder, with the muzzles turned towards the highwayman.

"Move a single step," they said, in loud, clear tones, "and we fire! You cannot escape at this short distance, so beware. Remain where you now are, and attempt to move at your peril!"

Dick was paralysed for a moment by this address.

He did not believe it possible that his foes could so soon have got so close to him.

He was astonished, too, to see only two of the dragoons looking over the hedge.

Where had the remainder gone?

Mechanically glancing up the road he caught sight of them flying along the meadows, and going in the direction of London.

Their bright steel caps were just visible above the hedgerow.

In an instant, then, Dick Turpin understood the state of affairs.

These two dragoons had been left on guard over him while the remainder made all speed they could to the gate which led out of the field into the road, and which he imagined was at that end of the field that lay towards London.

Dick Turpin now felt himself in a very peculiar and dangerous position indeed.

It is not to be wondered at if, for a moment, he was at a loss to know what to do for the best.

But the reader may be sure that the last thing Dick Turpin would have thought of would be to remain in the road until the other dragoons came round and made him prisoner.

Such a course of proceeding as that was altogether foreign to his nature.

But death or capture seemed to stare him in the face.

He had a choice of those two evils, certainly, but how was it possible for him to escape both?

It seemed impossible.

All this flashed through Dick Turpin's mind with that rapidity of which thought is alone capable.

He looked at the dragoons.

There they sat immovably upon their steeds, with such an expression of savage ferocity upon their countenances as left Dick no sort of doubt that they would be as good as their word if he attempted to move.

How was he to mount?

Before he could seat himself in the saddle, his body would be perforated with their bullets.

Dick's fertile brain, however, suggested a means of getting free from this difficulty, though it would be a fearful risk to attempt it.

He felt, however, that his position was so bad that he could not possibly make it worse.

It may be that this feeling had the effect of inspiring him with a desperate and reckless sort of courage.

Be this as it may, however, he resolved to carry his design into execution.

The reader must understand that the dragoons were on guard on the off side of the road.

Dick Turpin had been attending to Black Bess's near fore foot.

Such, then, being the case, it follows that Black Bess was interposed between Dick Turpin and his foes.

In fact, he saw them as he stood by the side of his mare and looked over her back.

Consequently, the only portion of Dick Turpin's body which was visible to the dragoons was his head and shoulders.

Suddenly, then, Dick Turpin took hold of the pommel of the saddle with both hands, and stooped down so that his head was out of sight of his foes.

At the same time he gave utterance to a cry which he had taught Black Bess to understand.

It meant that she was to gallop forward with all her speed.

She understood the signal, and obeyed it instantly.

The dragoons were rather taken by surprise, and under the impulse of the moment, fired their carbines.

This was just what Dick Turpin calculated upon, just what he hoped for and expected.

The bullets did no injury, but went whistling harmlessly through the hedge on the other side of the road.

By clinging to the pommel of the saddle, he was able to keep up with Black Bess.

Then, suddenly swinging his body upwards, he dropped into the saddle.

This feat is by no means so difficult as it looks.

Every reader must, at some time or other, have seen the same thing done in the circus.

It is one of the easiest feats performed.

In the same way, then, as these riders take hold of the broad band fastened round the body of the horse, and, after running by the side for a moment, swing themselves on to the horse's back, so did Dick Turpin, after running by the side of Black Bess while clinging to the pommel, swing himself into the saddle.

He had many a time performed the feat in sport, and now it became useful to him.

The dragoons were quite aghast with surprise when they saw Dick Turpin perform this feat, and, before they could recover themselves, he was far off down the road.

Uttering a curse, they galloped after their companions.

Dick could tell he was unhurt, and was almost certain that his priceless mare had not received any injury.

The bullets had gone too high.

The felt hat seemed to answer its purpose admirably, and Black Bess flew along the road at one of her old sweeping gallops.

But the danger was not yet over.

Dick, of course, had taken his way along the road in the direction of London—and not away from it.

The consequence of this was, that he reached the gate that led out of the field in a very short space of time indeed.

Here were the remainder of the dragoons.

Upon reaching this gate, they found it had been very securely padlocked, doubtless with the intention of keeping out trespassers.

This lock gave them a great deal of trouble to unfasten

At last they thought of what ought to have occurred to them at first; and that was, that it would be an easy matter to lift the gate bodily off its hinges.

As soon as one proposed this it was quickly done.

But, even while they were in the act of lifting the gate, the report from the discharge of their comrades' carbines reached their ears.

The next moment they heard the clatter of Black Bess's hoofs upon the hard roadway.

They uttered a shout, and, in a disorderly throng, rode out into the highway just as the highwayman was coming.

Dick saw them, and understood in a moment that he would have to run the gauntlet between them.

He did not draw in.

On the contrary, he urged his steed to still greater exertion.

Taking the reins in his teeth, he drew his sword, and took a pistol in his left hand.

Notwithstanding this, and the violent rate at which he approached, the dragoons formed a line across the road so as to stop his progress.

On came Dick Turpin with the velocity of an avalanche.

Keeping straight in the middle of the road, he dashed into their ranks.

He fired his pistol, and waved his sword round his head.

It gleamed like lightning.

The dragoons gave way.

In another moment Dick was past them.

That danger was over, and he had sustained no injury, while he believed that his hat would be the means of protecting Black Bess's foot from injury for a considerable time.

Turning half round in the saddle, he saw that the dragoons, in spite of their defeat, seemed in no way inclined to abandon the pursuit.

So far from it, they had formed themselves into a troop, and came along the high-road at a rate that was really wonderful, considering the weight of their horses and their riders, and the distance they had already come.

CHAPTER CCCCXLVIII.

DICK TURPIN FINDS DANGER EVEN IN THE BLACKSMITH'S SHOP AT EDMONTON.

This gave Dick Turpin but little apprehension.

Had not his mare lost her shoe, he would have felt no apprehension at all.

But the events which had just taken place inspired him with confidence that the substitute would answer his purpose.

The road along which he was now galloping led direct to London; and, if he continued without changing his course, he would soon arrive there.

But it was quite certain it would never do to ride into the metropolis with a troop of dragoons at his heels.

Besides, there was great danger, that he would either overtake or else meet with somebody.

Dick determined to get a little start of his pursuers, and then change his course.

Every few minutes, then, he turned and looked back, and each time had the satisfaction of perceiving that the distance between himself and his pursuers had materially increased.

A little further, and he resolved to leave the road.

Recollecting that, on the former occasion, the dragoons' horses had not been able to leap a hedge, Dick began to look about him for a meadow into which he could leap, and so make off across the country again.

He was now approaching London in a north-easterly direction, so that, if he took to the meadows on his right hand, and kept slightly to his left, he would be able to enter London in a northerly direction, which would enable him to get to Drury Lane very well, since the spot where the British Museum stands was in Turpin's time known as Bloomsbury Fields, and fields they were in reality, continuing to High Street, St. Giles's.

Presently, seeing a meadow which was defended by a tall hedge, and the gate leading into which was some distance further on, Dick determined to leave the high-road without delay.

Looking back, he was rejoiced to find that the dragoons were a long way in the rear.

But still they were within sight and hearing too.

Black Bess showed but slight symptoms of the immense exertion she had undergone.

Dick stopped and backed her close to the ditch on the left-hand side of the road.

He turned her round to face the hedge opposite, the height of which was rather formidable.

Before he gave her the impulse forward, however, he looked down at her foot.

The felt hat seemed to have answered its purpose most admirably.

Black Bess's hoof had not yet come in contact with the hard road.

It was fully protected.

All was well, and so Dick Turpin patted her upon the neck.

Black Bess appeared to understand that the hedge was to be leaped.

She drew herself up, and then gave a tremendous rush forward.

Up into the air she rose, and dropped down lightly and easily in the meadow.

Dick Turpin wasted no more time in looking after his pursuers.

They were a long way in the rear. He was sure of that, and with this knowledge he rested himself content.

Over the soft turf in the meadow he took his way, taking care to keep in the proper direction.

With as much ease as ever, Black Bess leaped another hedge into a second meadow.

Over this she sped.

Dick urged her on to the utmost, although she showed signs of exhaustion.

He knew that just an effort now was all that was required to place him in safety.

It was after a hard gallop of some twenty minutes' duration that Dick Turpin drew rein.

He had once more reached the high-road.

He turned round, and, standing up in the stirrups, looked long and anxiously in the direction from which he had just come.

But he was not able to see the least signs of his pursuers.

Beyond doubt he had succeeded in completely outdistancing the dragoons.

Having satisfied himself that there was nothing to be apprehended in this quarter, Dick seated himself in the saddle again.

But he did not put Black Bess in motion.

By this attitude, it could at once be seen that the highwayman was in deep thought.

The subject of his reflections may be guessed.

"Shall I push on to old Matthew's, just as I am?" he asked himself. "I think the hat will last until I get there, especially if I go gently; and then when I am there, he can get her fresh shod, and yet—that will not do. No—no, that will not do. It will be too dangerous. It would, in all probability, be the means of letting the officers know where I am. No, no; I must not run that risk. I would do anything rather than anyone should know of Black Bess's presence in Drury Lane. Let me think. What shall I do? She must be shod, and to stop at any farrier's shop on the road would be fraught with danger. But it must be done! It must be. I will go on until I reach the next village, and call at some blacksmith's shop, and have new shoes put on her. I must run the risk of discovery. If I am careful I may be able to prevent him from having any suspicions of who I am. Yes, it must be so! There is no other way. Come, Bess! Cheerily, old lass! All will yet be well!"

He allowed her to proceed at a walk.

He would not go at any faster pace now that there was no longer a necessity for it.

Dick looked about him.

He was not quite certain as to his whereabouts, but doubted not ere long he should find something that would inform him where he was.

In this supposition he was not mistaken.

Before him, on the high-road along which he was travelling, he could see a number of twinkling lights, which showed him he was approaching a village.

When within some distance of it he recognised it.

It was the village of Edmonton.

This showed he was going right for his destination, for as many of our reader are doubtless aware, this village is on what is called the Great North Road, which leads from London to York.

Dick hesitated a moment as to whether he should make a detour and avoid this village, or whether he should ride boldly through it, and take the risk of doing so.

The former was the more prudent course; but Dick, after a brief consideration, resolved to adopt the latter.

The reason for this was that he hoped on the way to pass a blacksmith's forge, where he could have Black Bess's shoes attended to.

This made him decide upon running the risk.

Edmonton was now only about a quarter of a mile further on, so Dick dismounted, and removed his hat and neckcloth from Black Bess's foot, for he fancied if he went into the village bareheaded, he might attract attention.

Upon making an examination, he was pleased to find that the thick felt hat had admirably answered the purpose of protecting Black Bess's hoof from injury.

The felt had not been anywhere cut through, so that the hoof was quite sound.

This gladdened Dick's heart exceedingly.

His hat was all the worse, and his neckcloth too, but he did not care for that; such injuries could easily be repaired.

So he straightened his hat, and brushed the mud off it as well as he could, and put it on his head.

It did not look very decent, but Dick thought it would do well enough for night.

With this reflection he put on his neckcloth again, and mounted his mare.

At a walking pace, which he knew could not do her the least harm, as the road was soft and loamy, Dick Turpin took his way towards Edmonton.

It was still comparatively early in the evening, although so much had taken place after his departure from the deserted mansion.

But, then, he had started as soon as darkness fairly covered the earth, and in midwinter it is dark early.

Dick did not doubt that he should find the inhabitants of the village all astir.

It was a few minutes after this that he entered it.

The whole place was tolerably familiar to him, but, nevertheless, he looked keenly both on his right side and his left, in order not to miss the place of which he was in quest.

A village, surely, would boast one blacksmith's shop—indeed, it could hardly be a village without one.

But, though he passed houses, and inns, and shops of all kinds, he did not see one of the kind he wanted.

Just, however, as he was emerging from the village into the open country again, he caught sight of the cheerful, ruddy blaze which always marks the presence of the blacksmith's forge.

The rude shed, from the interior of which the light came, was situated several yards back from the main road.

The intervening space was used, as it appeared, for the stowage of all kind of lumber.

Through this, then, Dick threaded his way; and, upon reaching the door of the shed, alighted and held Black Bess by the bridle.

In the shed he caught sight of the dusky figure of a man.

He was standing at the anvil, hammering a piece of iron which looked white hot.

The sparks flew about in all directions, as the heavy hammer swiftly descended upon it.

The red glare of the forge fell upon the blacksmith's swarthy countenance, and afforded Dick a good opportunity of perusing its lineaments.

Dick Turpin was not altogether pleased with the physiognomy thus revealed.

It was a treacherous, crafty-looking face; and Dick felt that he could not have trusted the man upon the most unimportant and insignificant business.

But Turpin just then was not in a position to be over particular.

He would have to avail himself of the man's services—that is, if he could obtain them.

All this passed in a moment.

The blacksmith looked up, and saw some one standing on the threshold.

In a gruff, disagreeable voice, he asked what was wanted.

"I have met with a misfortune," said Turpin. "My mare has cast a shoe, and I want a fresh one put on. I have had to walk her for some distance. Yours is the first forge I have come to."

"Well, it's a nice time of night to come about such a job, I must say," said the blacksmith, grumblingly. "A very nice time, indeed. Bring your mare in, and let's have a look at her."

"All right," replied Dick. "I know the hour is late; but, if you don't mind putting yourself out of the way to oblige me, I sha'n't mind paying a little extra for the work when it is done."

"Very good, sir— very good," said the man, in a mollified tone.

He took Black Bess by the bridle as he spoke, and led her up to one side of the shed.

There was no other light than that which the fire on the hearth afforded; but the smith raked the embers together, and caused a bright blaze to spring up, which illuminated every object with the greatest distinctness.

He looked at Black Bess's feet one by one, until he came at last to the foot where the shoe was deficient.

He looked at this for some time attentively, and then, releasing it, turned round to Turpin.

"She has cast her shoe in a very strange manner," he said.

"But she has not injured her foot, I hope?"

"No, I don't think she has, though she might have done."

"She might, as you say," coincided Turpin, "for you see she broke the shoe first, and lost one part of it, and then, in some strange manner, got the other part twisted round under the frog, so that the first intimation I received of what had happened was by her suddenly falling dead lame."

The blacksmith nodded.

"So I got down and removed the piece of broken shoe, and walked her here. Fortunately, the roads are soft. I do not think she has broken her hoof much?"

"She has not, sir; she has not."

"I rejoice to hear it. I am pressed for time. Put a good shoe on her foot, and I will pay you liberally for your trouble."

"Thank you, sir; but could you put off the continuation of your journey until to-morrow?"

"No; I could not possibly do so. But why do you ask?" inquired Dick, rather suspiciously.

"Simply because I do not like to put shoes on a horse at night if can help it."

"Why not?"

"Because there is so much danger of driving a nail in the wrong way. But, however since you must proceed, I will try my best."

"Do so—do so."

"But all her shoes are as thin as paper, sir. She ought to be shod all round."

Dick knew this, and thought the present might be a favorable opportunity of having the job done, but he said:

"I am afraid I cannot stop while you shoe her all round. However, set about the one and do that. I shall know then about how long it would take you to do the three others."

"Very well, sir—I will set about it at once."

The blacksmith had taken the dimensions of Black Bess's hoof with his eye, and he now looked up to the ceiling, from which a number of shoes were suspended, in the hope that he would be able to find one that would fit already made.

If he could do so, he knew it would save a good deal of trouble.

He selected several, and proceeded to try them.

The second one was almost a fit, and required but slight alteration.

"That's capital," he said. "There's a better shoe than I could make in a hurry, and a few strokes on the anvil is all that it wants to put it right."

"I am glad to hear that."

"Where will you wait, sir?" asked the blacksmith.

"Here," said Turpin.

"Then, sir, as you are in a hurry, and I am all by myself—my apprentice having gone home—perhaps you wouldn't mind helping me a little. It would save time."

"I should be very glad to do anything that could save time," replied Dick. "In what way can I assist you?"

"By blowing the bellows to heat the shoe; and while you are doing this, I will pare her hoof, and get it all ready to receive the shoe."

"I will do that willingly, then."

The blacksmith put the shoe on the fire and covered the embers over it.

Then, for the first time in his life, Dick Turpin performed the part of bellows-blower to a blacksmith.

While working the long handle up and down, however, he took care to stand with his back to the road, so that the glare of the forge should not reveal the outlines of his countenance to anyone who might chance to be passing by.

The blacksmith set about his work in the manner of one who understood his trade, and by the time the shoe was red-hot the hoof was ready for it.

As he said, a few strokes of the hammer made the shoe of such a shape as to fit Black Bess properly.

This done, he nailed it on.

Dick was delighted.

The time occupied was really very trifling, and the highwayman determined to avail himself of what appeared to be such a good opportunity of having his mare's shoes put in proper order.

He therefore agreed to have the other three put on.

The man, who seemed to think that he had got hold of a good customer, seemed nothing loth to do the work, although the hour was so late a one.

He reached down some more shoes, and selected three that required scarcely any alteration.

He put one in the fire, and set to work to prepare another hoof.

Dick Turpin worked the bellows with right good will and while so employed forgot all about the man having such a sinister countenance as he possessed.

CHAPTER CCCCXLIX.

THE BLACKSMITH MAKES A DESPERATE ATTEMPT TO CAPTURE DICK TURPIN.

In really quite a short space of time, considering the amount of work that was done, the blacksmith put the other three shoes on.

The conversation which passed between him and the highwayman was not sufficiently interesting to warrant us in putting it before the reader.

Let it suffice to say that he had no suspicions as to who his late customer really was.

That is, not until the last moment.

Just as he was driving in the last nail into the last shoe, the thought darted into his mind that the mare he had shod was Black Bess, and that the good-tempered gentleman who stood by the forge was no other than her master, Dick Turpin, the celebrated highwayman, for whose capture so large a reward was offered.

What engendered this suspicion he could not for the life of him tell.

It came upon him with the suddenness of a lightning-flash.

To be sure, that very afternoon, while sitting in the ale-house opposite along with one of his companions, the conversation turned upon Dick Turpin and the reward offered for his apprehension.

The largeness of the sum dazzled the humble blacksmith's intellect; and as he sat listening to the conversation, he made a mental resolution that if chance so far favored him as to throw Dick Turpin in his way, it would go hard with him if he did not capture him, and that, too, without calling any other persons to assist him, with whom, of course, he would have to divide the reward.

He meant to have it all to himself if ever he had the chance, for he knew he was possessed of enormous muscular strength, and fancied he should be more than a match for any highwayman.

This much it was necessary to state, in order to give a clue to his conduct.

We have said how the suspicion occurred to him.

He clenched the nail, and let go the foot.

Then, without appearing to do so, he walked round the mare, and narrowly criticised her appearance.

It agreed exactly with the description that had been given of her.

His suspicions became confirmed.

However, he determined not to act too rashly, for he knew well the consequences would be very serious if he happened to make a mistake.

So, in order to have time to reflect a little, he went to his tool-box and took out a rasp.

With this he rasped smooth the inequalities at the edge of the shoes.

While so employed his thoughts were very busy.

From time to time, too, when he had the opportunity, he glanced towards his customer.

Dick was sitting carelessly on the anvil, waiting for the blacksmith to finish, and little dreaming of the nature of the thoughts that filled the man's mind at that moment.

While sitting thus, the dull red glow and occasional fitful flame that came from the fire on the hearth, fell upon his face and form, revealing both fully.

Dick did not notice the man's stealthy glances.

He fancied he was busily engaged upon his work.

The man's countenance was hidden in the deep shadow.

As for the blacksmith, every glance he took convinced him that the suspicion, which had darted so suddenly and strangely into his mind, was a well-grounded one.

There was most certainly five hundred pounds sitting on the anvil.

Five hundred pounds, which he had only to grasp and become possessed of!

The blacksmith was a bold man, as his actions proved.

But his boldness proceeded from two causes.

The one was his strength.

He imagined he was strong enough to obtain an easy conquest over the highwayman.

The other was avarice.

The desire of having the reward all to himself, which would be the case if he effected the capture unaided.

These were two things well calculated to inspire courage in any breast, and the blacksmith had never had the imputation of cowardice cast upon him.

Having made up his mind that there could not possibly be any mistake, he let fall Black Bess's foot, and, with the rasp in his hand, came towards the anvil, upon which Dick was seated most unsuspiciously.

Seeing the man approach, so far from thinking there was anything sinister in it, Turpin put his hand into his pocket, intending to reward him handsomely for what he had done.

The blacksmith saw his opportunity.

Dropping the rasp, he sprang forward like lightning and grasped Dick by the throat.

Our hero was completely taken at unawares, and therefore was not in a position to resist so well-considered an attack.

"Yield, villain!" cried the blacksmith, in a suppressed voice. "Yield at once, without struggling further. I am possessed of thrice the strength of such a one as you. I know you! The reward is mine! You are Dick Turpin, the highwayman!"

Until the blacksmith pronounced these last words, Dick made no attempt to stir, but sat still on the anvil.

He did not recover from the shock of surprise which the sudden and unexpected attack gave him, until the blacksmith ceased speaking.

Then he comprehended the full extent of his danger, and was prepared to face it boldly.

The blacksmith had underrated Dick's strength.

Directly he understood how things were, Turpin started to his feet, in spite of the desperate attempt the blacksmith made to force him backwards over the anvil.

Had he succeeded in doing this, he would have had the highwayman at his mercy.

But it was not to be.

Turpin succeeded in gaining his feet.

At the same time he grappled with his adversary.

Then began a struggle of a truly fearful nature.

The blacksmith was struggling for the reward of five hundred pounds.

Dick Turpin for his life.

But the blacksmith felt another incentive, of which the highwayman was in ignorance.

The blacksmith felt his honor was involved in this struggle.

After the boasts he had publicly uttered as to what he should do, should chance bring him face to face with Dick Turpin, he felt that, if defeated, he should never be able to appear before his fellow-villagers again.

Their sneers and derision would drive him mad.

This made him struggle with redoubled strength.

Round and round they went in frantic gyrations.

Sometimes with a crash they would come into violent contact with the walls of the shed, or some of the heavy objects contained in it.

Now one would seem to have the advantage.

Then the other.

Dick Turpin found that it was no child's play.

The man to whom he was opposed was, indeed, possessed of great strength, which had been developed to the utmost by the nature of his calling.

Dick had never had such an antagonist before.

The issue of the struggle was very doubtful.

The bodies of the two men were locked in a close and deadly embrace.

Which would be the conqueror?

Presently, as they whirled round and round, they reached the fire.

From this both had shrunk.

But now a feeling of utter desperation had taken possession of Dick Turpin's breast.

He shrunk from the fire no longer

By a skilful turn, he got the blacksmith's back turned towards the hearth.

Then, summoning all his strength to his aid, in order to make one last effort, Dick endeavoured to force his foe backwards on to the glowing coals.

The blacksmith resisted to the utmost.

But Turpin had the advantage of position.

Moreover, he felt himself endowed with a fresh accession of strength.

Slowly, but surely, the blacksmith felt himself being forced backwards.

Not all his efforts could prevent it.

Still he strove manfully.

But he felt the heat at the back of his head become greater and greater.

His flesh seemed to singe.

But he kept his hold of Dick's throat.

He did not release a muscle.

"Let go," cried Dick Turpin, in a guttural voice. "Let go, or I will bury your head in the fire."

The blacksmith made no reply, but ground his teeth, fixed his fingers more firmly in his opponent's throat, and strove to raise himself.

But he failed.

Dick forced him further back.

His head touched the embers.

His hair caught alight, and blazed up like a torch.

"Let go," cried Dick, again. "Let go, I say, or you will repent it."

A suppressed, guttural cry came from the lips of the half-choked blacksmith.

But that was the only notice he took of Dick's speech.

Turpin's blood was now fully up.

He was enraged, too, at the man's obstinacy.

He had the advantage, and Dick felt that if he forced his opponent's head into the fire, the pain thus caused would induce him to quit his hold.

He bore down, then, with all his might.

A terrific yell, indicating extreme agony, was the result.

Instinctively, when he felt his head burning, the blacksmith let go his grasp.

Dick released him at the same moment.

But he by no means intended to allow his antagonist to recover himself.

Seizing hold of him again, he plucked him from the fire; and then, exerting all his strength, flung him with full force into the corner of the shed.

There was a crash. Then all was still.

Dick Turpin wiped the perspiration from his brow.

"Confound the fellow," he said, panting for breath; "what an obstinate fool he was! Well, I hope it will prove a lesson to him for the future, and let him know that highwaymen are not to be meddled with with impunity."

Dick Turpin was thoroughly exhausted by the desperate struggle he had had, and he was forced to sit down upon the anvil again to recover his breath and strength.

He was soon better, and then he said:

"How lucky the fellow did not have his suspicions until he had finished shoeing Black Bess! If he had made his attack a little while ago, when he had three of her shoes off, I should have been in a very awkward situation indeed. However, it's all right now. He might have had a good reward, but he must put up now with what he has got. He has no one to blame for it but himself."

Dick was getting better.

He rose to his feet, and went towards that part of the shed where Black Bess was standing.

She uttered a sharp neigh when he approached.

"Bravo, Bess, lass!" Turpin cried, as he patted his steed upon the neck. "You are all right now, old girl, and we will be off, or it will be dawn when we reach London."

He released her bridle from the hook to which it had been fastened as he spoke.

He was about to lead her out of the shed, when a sudden thought struck him, and he paused.

"Before I go," he said, "I'll just have a look at my friend in the corner, and see how he is getting on."

With these words, he approached the blacksmith.

He was lying in the corner of the shed, in a strange, huddled-up mass.

He exhibited no signs of life or motion.

"I think you will be all right for some little time to come," said Turpin, coolly; "and when you wake up you won't be in a very good temper, I know."

With this remark, the highwayman turned on his heel and left the shed.

Black Bess followed him.

He mounted as soon as ever he got outside, and threaded his way through the heaps of lumber that encumbered the piece of ground in front of the blacksmith's shop, and presently gained the high-road.

He then immediately set forward at a trot, which quickly left Edmonton behind.

After a moment's hesitation, Turpin rode straight on through Tottenham.

But as soon as the end of the village was reached he paused.

He was undecided whether to keep straight on or turn to the right.

He finally took the latter direction, by pursuing which he should be able to make his way by an unfrequented route to Bloomsbury Fields.

He went no faster than a trot, because Black Bess was tired, and because that was a pace not so likely to attract attention as a gallop.

"I have had pretty well of adventures since I started," he remarked, mentally; "more than I thought for, I am sure. Never mind; the first was a most profitable one, and I shall have a good chance now of turning what I have taken into cash. However, they say the third time pays for all, and if, on my way, I meet another traveller, I will certainly cry 'Stand!' to him."

Having arrived at this determination, Dick looked to his ammunition, so as to be fully prepared.

While thus engaged, he passed along the Seven-Sisters' Road, and then, turning down a narrow lane on his left hand, made his way, in a tolerably straight line, to his destination.

But there seemed little likelihood that he would meet with anyone while travelling through so lonely a neighbourhood as he then was.

Ere long, however, the highwayman could perceive in the distance a number of twinkling lights, which indicated that he was drawing near to London.

Bloomsbury Fields, however, lay rather to his right, and he turned his mare's head in that direction.

It was along a rather broad cross-country road, that Turpin took his way, and as he was at so short a distance from the metropolis, he fancied he should be sure to meet with one passenger at least.

In this expectation he was not deceived.

Ere he had gone much farther, a familiar, well-known sound came upon his ears.

It was the clatter of a horse's hoofs.

Dick planted himself in the middle of the road and halted, determined to await the approach of the traveller.

On he came, at a very fast trot indeed.

Presently Dick could see something dark and shadowy coming towards him.

It was the horseman.

He, on his side, seemed to perceive something in the road before him, and slackened speed slightly so as to avoid it.

Dick spurred forward.

He held a pistol out at the full length of his arm.

"Pull up, traveller!" he cried, in a loud, commanding voice; "pull up your horse, or you are a dead man. Halt! I say. Your money or your life!"

"The devil!" exclaimed the traveller, abruptly, as he obeyed the highwayman's injunction and reined-in his steed.

"Oh, no," said Turpin, "not the devil but the toll-keeper. Come, sir, quick—to prevent violence and save time, hand over as quickly as you can whatever valuables you may have about you."

"There you are, my friend," said the traveller, "and much good may they do you. You see they lay in a small compass."

As he spoke he pulled his hand from his pocket, and levelled a long-barrelled pistol at the highwayman.

A bright flash and a loud report followed.

[MR. WRIGGLES DISCOVERS DICK TURPIN'S HIDING-PLACE.]

CHAPTER CCCCL.

DICK TURPIN AT LAST SUCCEEDS, THOUGH NOT WITHOUT GREAT DIFFICULTY, IN REACHING THE "WHITE HORSE" IN DRURY-LANE.

DICK TURPIN was too old a hand at affairs of this sort to be taken by surprise by any sudden movement.

He had his eye on the traveller, and guessed his intention.

So, the moment the pistol was levelled, he caused Black Bess to swerve suddenly on one side.

The bullet buried itself in the trunk of a tree that grew by the roadside.

Perceiving that he had failed in his attempt upon the highwayman's life, the traveller, with great presence of mind, turned his horse's head round and clapped spurs to his sides.

The animal started off at a tremendous pace, but Dick gave chase immediately.

Black Bess had very little trouble in coming up with the stranger's steed, and then she kept by his side easily enough.

"Halt!" thundered Turpin. "Halt! I say; or you are a dead man."

The traveller was wise enough to pull up, for he thought if he disobeyed the injunction the highwayman would very likely be as good as his word.

So he came to a halt again.

"Now," said Turpin, "you have had a shot at me, and you cannot do less than expect one in return."

The traveller was silent.

"However, I am not revengeful. Hand over your money and valuables. I will do you no injury."

"You take things coolly, I must say," remarked the stranger.

"Why not? But come, which will you do? Will you hand over your things to me, or will you give me the trouble to take them from your dead body?"

"Oh! curse it!"

"Curse away, sir, if you think it will do you any good."

"Well, d—n me, if you are not about the coolest hand I ever met with."

"Come, sir," said Turpin, "this is trifling, and I very soon may lose my patience."

"Here. Well, take what I have."

"I am no pickpocket," said Turpin. "I will accept anything you may choose to hand me."

"A fine distinction, truly. However, here is my purse. Take it, and let me pass."

"One moment," said Turpin, jingling the purse. "It appears to me there is very little here. The purse is outrageously light. You must find me something more. I am not satisfied."

"I assure you that is all the money I have with me."

"Well," said Turpin, "I will do what, perhaps, some of your acquaintances would not do."

"What is that?"

"Take you at your word."

The traveller laughed.

"I have a watch, and a ring or two, but no articles of any very great value. I will give them to you if you make the demand."

"Pass your watch, then."

"You will find it will fetch you little," said the traveller, as he handed over the article named. "It is very old, and is a kind of heirloom in our family."

"Then, if that is the case, and you set some extrinsic value upon the possession of it, take it back again."

The traveller was much surprised at this speech.

"It would have grieved me greatly had I been compelled to relinquish possession of it."

"Take it, then, by all means."

Dick Turpin handed back the watch as he spoke.

"Well," said the traveller, as he restored it to his pocket; "this is the most singular adventure I have ever had. For the purse I care nothing. You are heartily welcome to it. But before we part tell me your name."

"Dick Turpin," was the reply, given after a moment's hesitation.

"I thought so," said the traveller. "I thought so."

"Then good-night to you," said Turpin.

Without waiting to hear whether the traveller responded to his valedictory salutation, Dick Turpin touched Black Bess on the flank with his heel, and in a moment was lost to sight.

But not for long did the highwayman allow his gallant mare to proceed at this rapid rate. He gradually slackened her speed as he came nearer and nearer to London.

It was now necessary that he should use the utmost circumspection in his progress.

The night was far advanced, which was a favourable circumstance, since he was not so likely to meet with people on his way to his destination.

"I wonder if old Matthew's house is still watched by the police?" muttered Dick, as he paused in Bloomsbury-fields, not far from Montague House, upon the site of which the British Museum now stands. "I should very much like to be possessed of that piece of knowledge. I think it cannot be, however. It is so long since I was there, and my foes have had such a good clue to my whereabouts, that they would not hang about there any longer, and surely the last thing they would think of would be that I should make my way there to-night."

This was by no means so certain as Dick Turpin tried to persuade himself it was.

He could not overcome the unpleasant conviction that he was about to run a very great risk indeed, for should any police-officer observe him enter the "White Horse," his position would be perilous in the extreme.

The former defeats they had met with would only have the effect of making them more determined to effect their purpose.

But it was now too late to hesitate, and the thought of abandoning the enterprise upon which he had set out never once occurred to him.

At a gentle trot Dick made his way along the lane that skirted the wall belonging to the gardens surrounding Montague House, and then, turning to the left, he wound his way through a number of narrow streets, now no longer in existence, until at length he stood in High Holborn, at the top of Drury Lane.

Down this narrow and unsavoury thoroughfare he trotted without hesitation.

He kept a sharp look-out ahead, and on both sides of him, but he could see nothing that seemed at all suspicious.

Indeed, the usually busy thoroughfare was now comparatively deserted.

It was, too, intensely dark, for the inhabitants of that region were rather prejudiced than otherwise against hanging lamps from their houses, as was done in most places in the city.

But Dick Turpin knew his ground well.

Passing the top of Long-acre, he quickly came in sight of the old theatre on his right hand.

Leaving this behind, he slackened speed until Black Bess's trot became a walk, and finally he paused before the entrance of an alley on his left hand.

It was White Horse yard.

Black Bess seemed to know where she was, for she turned down this narrow thoroughfare without being guided by her rider.

Dick glanced with the utmost keenness around him, but he saw no one.

Under the full belief, then, that he had reached his destination unperceived, he pulled up before the little secret door in the wall, which we have so frequently had occasion to mention.

He dismounted rapidly, and, going to the doorpost, pressed upon the concealed spring, the situation of which was so well known to him.

This spring caused a particular bell to ring.

The highwayman awaited the result in silence.

He was kept in suspense for some time—so long, that he fancied his first signal must have been unheard.

He was about to press upon the secret spring once more, when he was startled by hearing a slight sound.

The next moment the door was opened, and old Matthew appeared.

In one hand he held a candle, which he shielded from the draught with the other.

A beam of the light fell upon the countenance of Dick Turpin, the highwayman.

Old Matthew recognised him in a moment.

A gasping sort of cry came from his lips, and he fairly staggered back several steps.

Dick took advantage of this moment to enter.

He led Black Bess in after him, and closed the door.

"Help! Murder! Good gracious! It's him, for certain. Help! Murder!"

These ejaculations came from old Matthew.

His surprise and astonishment had by no means abated, and he continued to stagger back, uttering these words in a tone of voice scarcely louder than a whisper.

Walking backwards, he did not perceive what was behind him, and suddenly he came against an empty beer barrel which was turned upon end.

He sat down upon it with a shock sufficient to knock the head in.

Then the candle fell from his grasp.

He opened his mouth and eyes to an incredible extent, and gazed upon Dick as though he had been some apparition.

"Why, Matthew," said Turpin, as he stooped down and picked up the light, "what on earth ails you, man? Be yourself. Don't look at me in that flabbergasted sort of way. What is the matter?"

"Oh, Dick," said old Matthew, "you have given me such a turn!"

"A turn?"

"Yes. I don't know now whether I am standing on my head or my heels."

"You are doing neither, old fellow; you are sitting on the top of an empty barrel. Come! Recover yourself. Here, shake hands."

Dick held out his hand as he spoke.

Old Matthew mechanically extended his.

Dick shook it warmly.

"There," he said, "it's all right. Come, come! What are you surprised at?"

"Oh! dear me!" said Matthew, with a groan.

"What in the world is the matter, old friend? There, never mind; follow me to the stable, and while we are making Black Bess comfortable we can talk a bit."

"No, no!" cried Matthew, with more energy than he had yet displayed. "Mount, mount! and ride off for your life, and never come near this place."

"What is the matter?" asked Dick, who began to fear that something serious was amiss. "Speak out now, and let me know the exact truth."

"Oh! Dick! How could you ever have been so foolhardy as to thrust your head into the lion's den in this manner?"

"Lion's den?"

"Yes, for this place is now little better."

"Oh! the officers have not done troubling you?"

"They haven't."

"Hark ye now? Tell me, and tell me truly, are there any in the house at this moment?"

"No, no, no."

"That's all right; then what's amiss?"

"Why, I don't know how it is, but the officers seem to have got it into their heads that you would pay a visit to this place sooner or later, and not a day passes, or a night either, without my having a visit of some sort or other from them."

"Is that all?"

"All, do you call it? Is it not too much? I never cared, for I didn't think you'd come, and yet here you ride up to the door as bold as ever."

"Dismiss your fears, my friend," said Turpin, shaking his hand again. "Come, let us go to the stable. I am almost confident no one observed me near this place, and I know you can conceal both Black Bess and myself if necessary."

"But the place is so closely watched," said old Matthew, whose alarm seemed to have slightly subsided. "I do not see how you could possibly get here unseen."

"And yet I firmly believe that I have done so. However, here I am, and we must make the best of it. However, Matthew, for your own satisfaction, I will tell you that I should never have come here to-night had I not felt myself, in a manner of speaking, compelled to do so."

"What has happened then?"

"Nothing serious; but come, follow me to the stable. We can attend to Black Bess, and talk over our affairs at the same time."

With a deep sigh old Matthew rose to his feet, and followed Dick down the passage which he knew so well.

He shook his head continually as he did so, and from this it may be inferred that he considered Dick Turpin in very great danger indeed.

Our hero found his way to the stable readily enough.

The reader will understand that the stable thus spoken of was a secret one, and was quite distinct from the one which belonged to the inn, and about the existence of which no secret was attempted to be made.

The stable which Dick entered adjoined it, and there was a concealed means of communication between the two.

Black Bess walked up to the manger with great readiness, which showed that she perfectly well recollected having been there before.

Dick stuck the candle in a tin sconce that was fixed against the wall.

This done, he proceeded to divest his mare of her trappings, while old Matthew busied himself in preparing for her a good feed of corn.

Turpin rubbed her down himself.

"Now, Matthew," he said, while he was thus employed, "I hope you are a little calmer. If, as I fancy, I have reached this place without being perceived by my enemies, all will be well, and I shall only have to take care how I go back again; that is all."

"I hope it is," said old Matthew, "I hope it is. But since I saw you last you have no idea what a trouble I have had with the officers. They have been a perpetual torment to me, and I have never known a moment's peace since. They make their appearance at all hours, and when they are least expected; and so far from being disheartened by their numerous disappointments, I believe they grow more eager every time!"

CHAPTER CCCCLI.

DICK TURPIN HAS SOME CONVERSATION OF A VERY INTERESTING CHARACTER WITH OLD MATTHEW IN THE ROOM BEHIND THE BAR.

DICK TURPIN listened to this statement of old Matthew's with unfeigned and undisguised regret.

"My friend," he said, "I am very, very sorry that I have intruded upon you. But I will go at once. Farewell!"

Old Matthew noticed the changed tone in which these words were spoken, and he said—

"Now, I have offended you. Forgive me; I meant nothing."

"Nay—nay; I am not offended; but I feel that I ought not to come here and be the means of perpetually embroiling you with the authorities. However, I will do so no longer, and depart."

"Fiddlestick!" cried old Matthew, with something like his old manner. "Fiddlestick, I say! Why, did you think that it was out of consideration for myself that I spoke as I did? Do you think I mind the officers coming here a bit, so long as you are not here? Nothing of the sort! It gives me a pleasure to see them take so much useless trouble. But now you are here"——

"Then, is it possible that all this alarm, and all this confusion and regret, which you have exhibited, proceeds solely from the interest you feel in my welfare?"

"Most certainly it does. The greatest pleasure I have is when I see you, but then I always think of the danger."

"But I have always escaped hitherto."

"You have, to be sure, but you have had some awfully narrow touches, and you are sure to be nabbed one of these days."

"Come, come, old boy, you must not take such a gloomy view of things. Black Bess is all right now. Let us leave her, and make our way to your little snuggery behind the bar."

"Come along then. I daresay we shall be all right until morning."

"Why? Have you closed?"

"Yes, some hours since. I had gone to bed, indeed, when I heard the bell ring."

"Then I am sorry I disturbed your repose."

"Pho! pho! Don't mention that. Come along, we shall be able to chat for some hours at least without being disturbed."

"That is a good job, then, Matthew, for I have a great deal to say."

Old Matthew and the highwayman now made their way into the house.

In a few moments they reached the little room behind the bar, in which so many startling incidents have taken place.

The fire was still burning, which showed that the place had not been left very long. Some more fuel was thrown on, which quickly caught light and burst into a blaze.

"Now, Dick," said old Matthew, "I do hope you will believe me, when I tell you that all the time you stop here you will be in the greatest possible danger; mark that, the greatest possible danger! Wriggles has firmly made up his mind to recapture you, and I do not believe he ever thinks about or does anything else."

"Well, well, Matthew, there is no need to feel afraid just at present."

"I don't know that; besides, when danger does come, it will come with very great suddenness, and so I want to prepare you beforehand, in order that when the critical moment arrives, you may know exactly what to do without having to hesitate a second."

"That is very good," said Turpin. "In the moment of peril the least hesitation might cost me my life, and, you may depend, I shall pay the greatest of attention to what you are going to say."

"I rejoice to hear you say so," replied old Matthew, in a tone of voice which showed how much importance he attached to what he was going to say. "I rejoice to hear it."

"Well, Matthew, what is it?"

"I will show you a hiding-place."

"Is it where you concealed Claude and Tom and Sixteen-String Jack?"

"They told you about that, then?"

"Yes. Is this the same?"

"Yes."

"Go on, then."

"I know no better one; and this place has been searched several times without its being discovered."

"A biding place could not have a better recommendation than that."

"It cannot, as you say. They told you about the position of it?"

"Yes."

"Then that will save me a great deal of trouble in explaining matters," said old Matthew, who, without further delay, walked up towards that corner in the room where the secret door was situated.

We have already particularly described the excellent manner in which this door was concealed, and those of our readers who may wish to refresh their memories may turn to the three hundred and fifteenth chapter of this history.

The first thing old Matthew did was to show Dick Turpin the spring, by means of which the door could be opened.

Having done so, he requested Dick to press upon it

Dick obeyed.

In a moment the door flew open, and disclosed the dark-looking little recess.

Turpin was about to enter, but old Matthew restrained him.

"Wait a moment," he said; "and let me show you all. It is highly important that I should do so, in order that your safety may be all the better secured."

"I am all attention."

"Well, then, in the first place, this spring, upon which you have pressed, looks just like the head of a nail, does it not?"

"It does; that is what I should have taken it to be."

"Very good. So would anyone else, I fancy; and you will admit that, under ordinary circumstances, seeing a nail knocked into a wall would not be likely to arouse any suspicions; but, then, there is just a possibility that some clever officer might think it meant something, and, if so, the most natural thing for him to do would be to press upon it in the way I directed you to do."

"Certainly."

"Then, in the event of such a thing as that, which is by no means unlikely, the door would fly open in a moment, and the secret would be discovered."

"But you have guarded against this in some way?"

"I have; and now that I have explained myself so far, follow me."

The pair then passed through the secret door into the recess.

Matthew shut the door.

"Now," he said, as he held up the candle, "do you see those two bolts?"

"Yes—yes."

"Well, they are well oiled and strong. Now, should you have to take refuge here, which is very likely, the first thing you must do is to shoot those bolts into their sockets as quickly and as noiselessly as possible."

"I understand," said Dick; "and so, if the spring is pressed upon, no result will follow, and so it won't matter."

"Just so. Now, that part is over, and you understand at present what you have to do?"

"Perfectly; and I feel very much obliged to you for taking so much trouble."

"Pho! stuff! Now look here. This, I fancy, will give you increased confidence in the security of your hiding-place."

"What is it?"

"Do you perceive that the door is lined with something?"

"Yes," said Turpin, as he put out his hand and touched it, "it is something soft."

"Just so. It is half a dozen thicknesses of black felt nailed closely over the door."

"What is that for?"

"To deaden the sound."

"Deaden the sound?"

"Yes. I see you don't understand me, so I will explain. When officers have any suspicion of a hiding-place in the walls, the first thing they do is to knock with the butt-end of a pistol, or an instrument provided for the purpose. If a dull sound is produced it shows the wall to be solid; if a sharp sound, it indicates a hiding-place."

"I see; and this felt?"

"This felt being placed as you see it, would cause the concealed door, when struck on the other side, to sound just like the walls on both sides of it."

"Matthew," cried Turpin, who was delighted beyond measure, "you are a genius, a real genius, upon my word. This place does you credit, it does indeed. It is most ingenious."

Old Matthew smiled with satisfaction.

It was easy to see that he thought Dick's praises were deserved.

He really took a great pride in this place, for it had stood the ordeal of so many close searches.

"I am quite satisfied now," said Turpin. "Why, I should be as safe in here as if I were a hundred miles from my foes. It is capital. It is perfect."

"Do you think so?"

"I do."

"Then," said old Matthew, "you happen to think differently to what I did. I thought to myself in this way—'Now this place is all very well, but still it may be found out;' and so I set my wits to work again."

"But the chance of being discovered is so small."

"I don't know that. I thought to myself, 'Now, this place would be quite perfect if there was some means of retreat from it if necessary;' and so I'll tell you what I did."

"You amaze me, Matthew."

"Now, you must see very clearly that you won't be taken by surprise very suddenly. As you stand here, if you put your ear to the door you will be able to hear all that is said."

"Shall I?"

"You will, easily. So you will know when you are menaced with danger. Even if the door should unluckily happen to be found out, it will take the officers a minute or two to knock it down, and that will give you plenty of time to make your retreat. Look here."

Old Matthew then turned to the back of the recess, in which, as the reader is aware, a door was situated, which led into the yard at the back of the inn.

He showed Dick how to open this door.

"Now," he said, "you can, if you find it necessary, be through that door and into the yard in a twinkling. When you are there, you could find the way to the stable."

"I believe as easily as you could yourself, Matthew."

"Very well, then. You must saddle Black Bess with all speed, and when you have done that, you must go into the ordinary stable—you know."

"Quite well."

"From there you can make your way into the passage, which leads from the stable into Stanhope-street; and then off you will be, before the officers know what has happened."

"Capital, Matthew! capital!" cried Dick Turpin, as he rubbed his hands quickly and delightedly together.

"I am glad you are pleased," said the landlord, quietly, as he led the way back into the bar again, and closed the secret door.

"Pleased!" cried Turpin. "I am more than pleased. Why, from what you have shown me, it is quite clear that I shall be safer here than I possibly could be elsewhere. Shake hands, Matthew. Let me shake hands; for you are decidedly the best friend I have got."

Old Matthew's face beamed with genuine satisfaction as he grasped the hand that was so cordially extended towards him.

"Welcome, captain," he cried. "Welcome once more to the old 'White Horse' inn, and all that it contains."

"I know it is a hearty and well-meant welcome," replied Turpin, "and I feel thankful accordingly. You have, indeed, a rare invention, and wonderful mechanical skill, too, or you could never have planned and executed such a piece of work as that."

"Draw it mild, captain—draw it mild," said old Matthew, modestly. "I have done the best I can, and it seems to meet with your perfect satisfaction."

"How could it do otherwise, I should like to know? How could it do otherwise?"

"Well, say no more about that. This is idle talk, and time is precious. Sit down in that arm-chair by the fire-side, and I will make you as comfortable as I am able."

"I am quite sure you will do that."

"I will try, captain."

Dick Turpin sat himself down in the easy-chair alluded to, and old Matthew bustled about.

In a very short time he had spread upon the table a very plentiful and tempting repast, while the table was graced with a huge flagon of the very best ale the house afforded.

Dick was hungry, and he partook of the meal heartily.

Old Matthew, too, declared that he did not mind taking a snack just for the sake of bearing the captain company, and a jollier couple than those who thus sat down in the room behind the bar could not possibly have been found in all London.

When the meal was over, spirits and hot water were produced, and the landlord, having filled his pipe and lighted it, sat down in another arm-chair, which faced that occupied by Dick Turpin.

Both were now on excellent terms with each other, and old Matthew sat puffing his pipe, and looking at Dick Turpin with undisguised admiration, for he knew the highwayman's character thoroughly, and had a warm friendship for him, as his actions would alone be sufficient to prove.

CHAPTER CCCCLII.

OLD MATTHEW FINDS A PLACE OF SHELTER FOR THE HIGHWAYMAN, AND IS RATHER ALARMED BY A KNOCKING AT THE FRONT DOOR OF THE INN.

"Now," said old Matthew, "as everything is so comfortable, just be good enough to tell me the nature of the business which has brought you here?"

"I was about to do so."

"Yet, no. I can't consent to do that yet. It is a long time since we saw each other, captain, and a great deal must have happened since we parted. Tell me all that has taken place. It is some time to daylight."

Old Matthew would take no denial, nor did Dick Turpin feel inclined to refuse so simple and so easily granted a request to one who was willing at all times to do so much for him.

And so Dick Turpin related at length all that had happened since their parting.

With the whole of this the reader has already been made acquainted, and that spares us the necessity of setting down the conversation at full length.

As may be easily surmised, much that the worthy landlord heard was of such a character as to fill him with astonishment and curiosity.

At length, however, Turpin brought his narrative down to the time when they arrived at the deserted mansion, and then he spoke of the plan which he had proposed to his companions.

Old Matthew did not require to be shown the advantages of this scheme, if properly carried out, and as Turpin had fully expected, he expressed himself warmly in its favour.

"It's a first-rate plan, Dick, it is, indeed; and I will aid you all I can to bring it to perfection. A great many difficulties stand in the way, however; but you must be aware of all that?"

"Oh! yes. And now, Matthew, I want you to tell me all you can about Tom Davis; for, do you know, I fancy he is the man."

"He is, certainly; and I can tell you all I know concerning him in a very few words indeed. When you were here last you told me you might expect to see him."

"And did he come?"

"No. He sent the young girl—Ellen they call her"—

"Yes—yes! The poor apprentice who I saved from so much ill-usage, and who Tom Davis adopted as his daughter."

"Well, she came; but it was not for a long time after I saw you. She then said that the money you had given her had sufficed to keep them in tolerable comfort up to that moment, and now, as the supply was exhausted, she had, in compliance with your instructions, come to me."

"That was right."

"I asked her how Tom Davis and his wife were, and she said much better, but that the loss of the public-house had so preyed upon their minds, and the hardships they had since endured had wrought such havoc with their bodies, that, being merely the shadow of what they used to be, they would not be themselves for a long time."

"I can easily understand that," said Dick Turpin. "I know Tom Davis's character well."

"He is a worthy fellow. However, to go on with my story. I supplied her with what she needed, of course, as I had received instructions from you to do so, and at the same time I asked her for her address, in case there should be a necessity of communicating with her."

"That was very prudent of you. She gave the address, of course?"

"Oh! yes. I have got it written down somewhere."

Matthew got up as he spoke, and reached down a kind of ledger in which he kept his accounts.

He turned over the leaves, and then he said suddenly—

"Yes, here it is. No. 4, Cain's-place, Camden Town."

"Camden Town? Then they are quite out of London?"

"Yes; and so much the better."

"As you say, so much the better. Have you seen Tom Davis?"

"Yes; twice."

"Then he came here, then?"

"No I fancy he would be above that. Tom was always very proud, and he would have felt the degradation keenly."

"Then you paid him a visit, Matthew?"

"I did. I went twice to see him, and the second time I could perceive a visible improvement. They had comfortable lodgings, and Ellen worked hard at her needle. Tom was grieving because he could not do something for himself."

"Well, we will alter all that," said Dick Turpin, gaily "Is he much altered?"

"Very much. Indeed, had I not been told who he was, I could never have recognised him."

"That is all right again, then, because the officers would not recognise him by any chance, and he could easily assume another name. Then, again, it is fortunate he has not been in the habit of coming here, and that the girl Ellen has only paid one visit to this place."

"It has turned out all for the best."

"It has, indeed. There is no reason, that I can see, why you should not carry out your scheme, nor why it should not bring you a very great amount of safety."

"I hope such will prove to be the case. You understand now why I came to see you."

"Perfectly."

"It seems you know just where to find Tom Davis, and the only obstacle that remains is the finding of sufficient money to take a public-house with."

"That need not be any obstacle."

"Still, a good round sum of money would be required, and it would be well, if such a thing was practicable, to buy the place out and out, and so do away with the supervision of a landlord."

"That would be very desirable, for landlords are generally very troublesome beings. But we must talk about that at another opportunity."

"There is plenty of time; and now, Matthew, I will tell you what I should very much like you to do."

"You have only to speak, captain."

"Well, then, I think the fact of my having remained here so long without being disturbed, is pretty good proof that my arrival was not noticed. I should like, then, to remain here all day, and set out on my return after dark."

"You are heartily welcome to do that, captain."

"I knew it; but there is something more."

"What is it?"

"I should like you to pay a visit to Tom Davis and broach the matter to him, as well as give him instructions to set about looking for a roadside inn at once."

"I will do so willingly."

"Rely upon it, if anything will rouse Tom's energies, that will. It will make a new man of him. Some funds will be required, however, and that reminds me of something else. While you are out, I want you to dispose of these little nicknacks for me."

As he spoke these words, Dick Turpin produced from his various pockets the booty he had been so successful as to take while on his way to his destination.

Matthew looked on with astonishment.

"You had better be quick," he said, "for look up. Can't you see that daylight is streaming through the shutters, and if I do not open at the usual hour suspicion will be excited."

"So it will—so it will. However, this will not take long, and when this is done, I think we have talked over everything."

Dick Turpin completely emptied all his pockets, in order to ascertain just how much he had got.

The result was highly satisfactory.

He had a large sum in cash, and this he roughly divided into two portions, the smaller of which he returned to his pockets for his own use.

Then the remainder of the trinkets, such as watches, rings, and the like, he gathered up into another heap

"You have made a rare booty, captain," said old Matthew, with sparkling eyes.

"I was in luck's way, beyond doubt."

"You were, indeed."

"And now, Matthew, do you know any place where you could take these things, and dispose of them without getting yourself into trouble?"

The landlord nodded.

"I know a first-rate place where I can get ready cash, and no questions asked."

"That is the place then; and so you understand, I leave that part of the business entirely to you."

"You have confidence in me, then?"

"More than I have in any other living human being."

Old Matthew smiled with evident gratification, as he said—

"You will find your confidence not misplaced."

"I know that well enough, my friend."

"Then I will take these things, and you may depend I shall get the best price for them I possibly can."

"But do not bring me the money."

"Not bring you the money?"

"No. I want you to take what cash there is, and put the proceeds of the trinkets to it, and then, when you have done that, to give the whole sum to Tom Davis, and instruct him about getting a public-house at once; for, through you being so well known, it would never do for you to appear in the business."

"It would spoil all directly, for I am so well known to the police, and they would guess something was up directly."

"They would. You must be especially careful to keep out of sight."

"I will do so, you may depend."

"Then, Matthew, if you will take the swag, I think we shall have settled everything."

"There is only one thing more," said the landlord, as he rapidly transferred the various articles to his pockets.

"What is that?"

"Why, what do you intend to do with yourself while I am absent? As you must be aware, it will take some time to do all that you have instructed."

"You will find it will take you the best part of the day."

"I quite expect that; but what shall you do in the meantime?"

"I can easily answer that question. For a very long time past I have not known what it is to have a comfortable sleep, and just at the present moment, do you know, I feel very tired and worn out, and a little repose would be a perfect blessing."

"Very well, then, Dick, you shall have it; and I think I can place you where you will be able to sleep in perfect security."

"That's the ticket, then."

"Will you come at once?"

"Decidedly, for I don't know when I felt so thoroughly worn out and exhausted. I had such a night of adventures."

"You did, indeed. Wait a minute, and I will fetch a candle."

"Oh! never mind. Can't you see it is daylight?"

"Yes, so it is: I had forgotten. Come along, then."

Old Matthew led the way towards the staircase, and Dick followed behind with very great willingness.

He was, in truth, quite spent, and he felt that until he had had several hours' slumber he should be fit for nothing.

When they reached the passage, the roar and clatter without told them very plainly that day had began, and that regular business was once more in full swing.

It was evidently quite time old Matthew opened his shop, or else, if he did not, his neighbours would very likely come to the conclusion that something was amiss.

Matthew led Turpin up to the top of the house to the room which he had more than once occupied, and outside the window of which existed such an easy means of reaching the roof.

There was a key in the lock on the inside; and the landlord, having shown the highwayman into the chamber, took his leave, and desired him to secure the door carefully, so as to guard against any sudden surprise.

This Turpin promised to do, and old Matthew took his departure.

Dick closed the door, and fastened it.

Then he went to the window, and looked out.

All was well, and so he threw himself, dressed just as he was, upon the bed.

He had not assumed the reclining posture a moment before he was sound asleep.

Here we will leave him for a time, while we follow the fortunes of old Matthew, who, in the expedition which he had undertaken for Dick Turpin, was destined to meet with some adventures of so singular a character that the reader cannot fail to feel deeply interested in them.

Descending the stairs, then, he hastened to the front door, with the intention of opening it and taking down the shutters.

Before he could reach it, however, he was startled by a loud knocking.

What this could mean he knew not; but it was only natural he should apprehend danger.

There was a little side window, from which he could command a view of the front door, and he hastened towards it.

Peeping through, he saw that the person who was knocking at the door was the barber, who lived on the opposite side of the way.

Like most of his profession, he was an inquisitive busybody, and the reader may be sure he was a character that old Matthew cared nothing about.

However, when he saw from whom the knocking proceeded, old Matthew felt his apprehensions vanish, and he immediately made his way towards the door, with the intention of unfastening it

CHAPTER CCCCLIII.

RELATES THE STEPS THAT OLD MATTHEW TOOK TO DISPOSE OF THE BOOTY.

DIRECTLY old Matthew began to draw the bolts, the knocking ceased.

It took him but a moment to remove the fastenings, and then he flung the door open.

The barber from over the way stood upon the threshold.

"Hullo, neighbour!" he cried, "you're all safe, I see."

"What's the matter?"

"Oh! nothing; only it's half-past nine, and, as you had not opened your shop as usual, I fancied something must have happened."

"Oh! thank you," said Matthew, as he coolly proceeded to take down the shutters; "there's nothing amiss. I am obliged to you. I had no idea it was so late, however—not the least idea in the world. The fact is I did not go to bed very early last night, and, when I did get between the sheets, I could not close my eyes a wink; but towards morning I must have dropped off, and, when I awoke, I found it was daylight."

"I am glad it's all right, Matthew," said the barber, familiarly; "but when a man does not open his house at the usual time, it is only natural to conclude that something is amiss."

"Quite natural, as you say, and I am very much obliged to you," said old Matthew, still going on with his task of taking down the shutters.

"Oh! no thanks, no thanks. It was a little neighbourly civility, that's all. But I must be off; there's a customer just gone into the shop."

"And a deuced good riddance," muttered Matthew to himself, as the inquisitive barber stepped across the road to his own shop.

Old Matthew, having caused the house to assume its usual aspect, partook of a light breakfast, and then gave the bar in charge of a young woman, who fulfilled several duties in the house, and told her he should be back shortly.

Ere he started, however, he went upstairs and made some slight alterations in his toilette, which made a decided improvement in his appearance.

For instance, he put on a blue coat, ornamented with large gilt buttons, which was never donned except upon some very extraordinary occasion.

Thus attired, and having the booty which Dick had taken from the St. Alban's coach secreted about him, the landlord set forth upon the very perilous errand of disposing of it.

This was never a very easy matter, and yet old Matthew fancied he knew a place where he could dispose of the lot with little difficulty, and for a very fair price as well.

With this hope old Matthew set forth.

It was a beautiful sunshiny morning, though the air was frosty and keen.

Still it was a morning for a walk to be one of the pleasantest things imaginable, and as he stepped briskly along the streets, it seemed as though the worthy landlord enjoyed it to the utmost.

His destination was Cheapside, and so he took his way along the Strand and Fleet-street, and round St. Paul's-churchyard.

He halted at length before a jeweller's shop, which was situated at the corner of Milk-street.

The window was filled with valuable articles of every description, and it really seemed to be the first shop in the street.

Such articles of value as the wealthy alone purchase and find use for were crowded into the window, while through the glass it could be seen that the shop was stocked with goods of the costliest description.

In a word, we may as well say that the shop before which old Matthew halted had every appearance of being a first-rate jewellers and silversmiths.

Surely our friend never contemplated disposing of stolen property in such a quarter as this!

We shall see.

Having just peeped in at the window, as an intending purchaser might do, old Matthew entered.

The half-glass door opened to his touch, and he found himself surrounded with property, the value of which must have been very great indeed.

The opening of the door set a wire in motion, which caused a little bell to ring in the little room at the back of the shop.

By the time old Matthew reached the counter, a very respectable-looking gentleman made his appearance behind it.

He was very dark, with jet-black hair, which was scrupulously parted and arranged with very great care.

His dress was plain black, though the cloth of which it was composed was of the very best quality.

A few articles of jewellery, though of a plain description, glittered here and there about his person.

He smiled blandly, and made a kind of half-bow, as he said—

"What can I have the pleasure of doing for you this morning?"

"Business, Mr. Foss—business," said old Matthew, quietly.

"Oh! ahem; excuse me. Didn't know you at first. Obliged to be careful, you know. Step this way. All right."

Old Matthew went lower down the counter.

"What have you got?" asked Mr. Foss, who was the proprietor of this first-class jeweller's shop.

"Some first-class things, and I want you to give me a good price for them."

"I will do the best I can. Let me see what you have got."

Old Matthew produced the things one by one from his pocket, and placed them on the counter.

Mr. Foss made a mental inventory of them as he did so.

"Be quick," he said; "and be careful to put all the things on that little shelf."

He alluded to a piece of wood with a ledge round it, which was on a level with the counter.

Old Matthew obeyed.

"Is anything amiss?"

"Nothing serious; only I fancy the police have got their suspicions."

"Then you ought to be doubly careful."

"I am—I am; and when they catch me I shall confess they are very clever indeed. However, if anything happens, don't be surprised."

"What do you mean?"

"Just what I say."

"But don't be so vague. You had better tell me all, and then there won't be so much fear of mischief."

"Well, then, I'll tell you. What makes me think the police are suspicious is this. When anyone enters on business, as, for instance, you have done, some person or other is sure to follow, and ask some trivial question or other."

"Then you may depend the police suspect something."

"I am afraid they do."

"Rely upon it they do."

"Well, then, if anyone should come in do not, on any account, exhibit the least surprise, no matter what takes place. I will give you a fair price for the swag."

"Is this all?"

"Not quite," said old Matthew. "I——"

"Hush!" said Mr. Foss.

Matthew turned round, and at the same moment he heard a sharp click.

The shop-door was pushed open, and a rather elderly man entered.

There was nothing peculiar in his appearance save his eyes, and these were riveted upon old Matthew instantly.

The landlord had never seen such eyes in his life.

They were like a hawk's.

He turned away with an uncomfortable feeling.

Despite, however, the injunction which Mr. Foss had laid upon him, old Matthew could not forbear starting slightly.

And no wonder.

The valuables which he had deposited upon the shelf had wholly disappeared, without leaving a trace behind.

In a moment, however, he recovered his composure.

It was wonderful to see how Mr. Foss preserved his calmness.

There was not the least flurry about him, as he walked up to the other end of the counter the moment the stranger entered.

He seemed quite unruffled, and with the same bow as he had greeted Matthew, and with just the same smile, he said—

"What can I have the pleasure of doing for you to-day, sir?"

"I see you are engaged," said the new-comer, looking scrutinizingly towards old Matthew. "I am in no particular hurry."

"Never mind, sir—never mind; I will attend to you if you will mention your wishes."

The stranger hesitated a moment, and then he said—

"I want to look at some scarf-pins, but as I am in no hurry I will take a seat and wait until you are disengaged, and then you can attend to me."

"Very well, sir," said Mr. Foss, with the same unruffled demeanour. "I shall be at liberty directly."

The stranger bowed and seated himself in a chair, but he took good care to sit with his face turned towards old Matthew, so as to observe all that went on.

This man, as Mr. Foss more than expected, was no other than a police-officer in disguise.

He had entered the shop upon a mere pretext.

In fact, Mr. Foss was suspected of having illegal dealings with stolen property, and the police were put upon the watch.

As yet, however, they had found out nothing.

But the elderly gentleman who sat so composedly in the chair, with his face turned towards old Matthew, was one of the most experienced detectives in London.

He was sure that, if there was anything going on amiss, he should detect it.

But Mr. Foss's behaviour to old Matthew underwent a remarkable alteration, which at first puzzled that individual considerably.

Going up to him, he said—

"Wait a moment, my good man, and I will give you a reply to your letter."

Old Matthew stared, for the speech was highly enigmatical to him, for he knew very well he had brought no letter.

But the landlord of the "White Horse" had all his wits about him, and he comprehended that Mr. Foss was playing some very deep game indeed.

He had no time to make any reply, for Mr. Foss, as soon as he had spoken, retired to a little glass counting-house at the far end of the shop.

He entered this place, and the rustling of papers followed

In a moment or two he came forth.

He held a sealed letter in his hand.

"Ahem!" he said, as he approached old Matthew, "you will be good enough to give this reply to your master, and tell him from me that his orders will be carefully attended to."

"Very good, sir," said old Matthew, as he took the letter and placed it carefully in his hat. "Good morning."

"Good morning," said Mr. Foss.

Old Matthew beat a retreat immediately, but without exhibiting any undue haste.

Scarcely, however, had he closed the door than the elderly gentleman started to his feet.

"Good gracious!" he cried, "there goes my friend Brown! Good morning, sir. I will call again. An old friend of mine, who I have not seen for years, has just passed the window. I must make haste, or I shall not overtake him."

With these hastily uttered words the elderly gentleman left the shop.

The moment he had disappeared Mr. Foss put his finger by the side of his nose, and slowly shook his head from one side to the other.

"No—no!" he cried. "It won't do. It won't do at all! You are sold, Mr. Officer, and I have had another escape!"

Leaving Mr. Foss to his congratulations upon his own cleverness, we will turn our attention to the disguised officer.

Of course what he said about an old friend of his having just passed the window was all gammon.

He had seen no one, but that was the best means of getting out of the shop quickly that he could think of.

He was out in Cheapside directly after old Matthew.

He saw our old friend only a few yards in advance.

"His master," muttered the disguised officer. "Bah! stuff! That's all a device. But I must find out what's in that letter. I wonder where he is off to?"

Old Matthew stepped rapidly along the pavement, elbowing his way through the passengers.

But the officer never lost sight of him for a moment.

Old Matthew kept steadily on along Cheapside, and then, watching his opportunity, he tore open the letter.

The police-officer saw the movement and smiled.

"That's how he treats his master's correspondence, is it?"

Old Matthew gave one glance at the letter, and then nodded his head, as much as to say:

"All's right."

Not even that slight action escaped the lynx-eyes of the detective.

Old Matthew walked up the Poultry, turned round to the left, crossed a street, and kept along Threadneedle Street until he came to the entrance of the Bank of England.

He passed through the solemn-looking portal, and the still more solemn-looking beadle, who stood there as though on guard, without the slightest hesitation.

CHAPTER CCCCLIV.

THE POLICE-OFFICER FINDS HE IS NO MATCH FOR MR. FOSS AND OLD MATTHEW.

THE officer did not follow old Matthew into the Bank, but crossed over and stood on the steps of the Royal Exchange, as though admiring the architectural beauties of that building.

But in reality his eyes were fixed upon the door through which old Matthew had passed, and he anxiously awaited his re-appearance.

His patience was put to rather a severe trial; but at length he saw old Matthew emerge.

That individual had a satisfied smile on his face; and, having looked around, turned as if to go in the direction of Cheapside.

The disguised officer ran down the steps, crossed the street, and entered the Bank in a moment.

He hurried up to the counter.

"My name is Hambleton," he said. "I am a detective."

The clerk behind the bank-counter became attentive in an instant.

"What is it?" he asked.

"A man was in here a moment ago. He has just left. A stout man, with a bright blue coat and gilt buttons."

The clerk nodded.

"You recollect him?"

"Oh! yes."

"What did he want?"

"Brought a cheque."

"Did you cash it?"

"Yes."

"Who drew the cheque?"

"A regular customer of ours."

"Mr. Foss, a silversmith, in Cheapside?"

"Yes. Is it a forgery?"

"Oh! no. Who was the cheque made payable to?"

"No one."

"No one?"

"That is, merely the bearer."

"Confusion!"

"Eh?"

"Let me see the cheque a moment."

The clerk went to a drawer and took a slip of paper.

"There it is."

The detective seized it eagerly, for he was not without the hope, even now, that it would afford him important information.

He ground his teeth with disappointment.

The cheque was the one generally in use.

All it said was merely this—

"Pay the bearer fifty pounds.

"EMANUEL FOSS."

"Foiled!" cried the officer. "This gives no information whatever, but it certainly confirms my suspicions. Here, take the cheque. Good morning."

So saying, the officer left the bank at full speed, to the intense astonishment of the clerk, who could not, for the life of him, make out what was meant.

Upon gaining the street, the detective ran as fast as his legs would carry him towards Cheapside.

Down this thoroughfare he hurried till he came to the corner of St. Martin's-le-Grand.

Here he paused, and was compelled to confess himself baffled, for he had not caught a glimpse of old Matthew, and it was impossible for him to tell in what direction he had gone.

We will now describe old Matthew's proceedings.

No doubt all that has occurred is understood by the reader, and, assuming so much, we need not enter into further explanation.

Upon gaining the outside of the shop, Matthew muttered:

"Clever man that Foss! Deuced clever fellow! That officer is diddled for certain! Ha! ha! Capital! I wonder how it was the swag disappeared so suddenly. It startled me, I confess, for I was not prepared for it. He must have touched a spring; and, now I think of it, I did hear a click."

Old Matthew, with his usual sagacity, had hit upon the real solution of the affair.

"I suppose this letter contains a cheque for the swag," he continued. "I don't see that elderly gent, so I'll just break the seal and make sure."

A glance showed old Matthew he was right.

The letter contained a cheque drawn on the Bank of England, and payable to bearer for the amount of fifty pounds.

"Bravo! that's a liberal price. Now I'll be off to the Bank, and get the cash, and then for my visit to Tom Davis."

At a very quick walk, Matthew took his way to the Bank, but just as he was entering, he caught sight of the officer crossing the road.

"He's after me," he thought. "Never mind, I'm safe."

The cheque was paid to him by the clerk without any hesitation, as it was Mr. Foss's usual way of doing business.

Having got the cash, Matthew departed.

He glanced around him quickly when he came out, and saw the detective standing on the steps of the Royal Exchange.

He took no notice, however, but went towards Cheapside.

[THE DESPERATE ATTEMPT OF THE OFFICERS TO CAPTURE DICK TURPIN.]

Then he glanced behind him, and saw the detective enter the Bank.

"Ah!" he said. "He's gone to make some inquiries about the cheque. Well, he is heartily welcome to do so, so far as I am concerned. I will get out of sight though, for I don't want him dogging my heels all day."

A hackney-coach lumbered by at this moment, and Matthew hailed it eagerly, and directed the coachman to drive him to Cain's-place, Camden Town.

Off went the crazy vehicle, which was, nevertheless, vastly more comfortable than the cabs which at the present day ply for hire in the metropolis.

On his way, old Matthew occupied himself with thinking over the occurrences of the morning, and in considering what he should say to Tom Davis.

It was some time before the vehicle reached its destination, and then Matthew alighted and paid the man his fare.

The reader must not consider the Camden Town of a century and a quarter ago to be the Camden Town of to-day.

At the time of our story, and for many a year after, it was nothing but a pleasant country village.

No. 4, Cain's-place, was the end house in a small row of cottages, about half-way between Camden and Kentish Towns.

Although the season was winter, and the trees destitute of leaves, yet, as the sun shone, the cottage had a pleasant look.

It seemed delightful to old Matthew after living long in Drury-lane.

There was a garden in front of the cottage, and a little wicket gate led into it from the lane.

This gate Matthew opened and passed through, and strode slowly along the gravel path.

Ellen was sitting at the window sewing.

As soon as she saw old Matthew approaching, however, she threw down her work and hastened to the door of the cottage, which she opened just as old Matthew reached it.

The landlord entered.

Tom Davis and his wife were sitting by the fire-side, but upon his entrance they looked up and feebly bade him welcome.

Their present inactive life, and the thought that they were living on the bounty of another, destroyed all their spirits.

Matthew saw with pain the condition to which his old friend was reduced, but he was cheered by the thought that he had that to say which would effect a total change.

He approached his subject cautiously.

We need not give the proposal in his own words.

The nature of it is already well known, and that is sufficient.

The reader must imagine the delight with which Tom Davis and his wife and Ellen listened to old Matthew's proposal.

We feel that we are unable to describe it.

They were delighted.

The change in Tom Davis was something to be wondered at, and serves to show how great an influence the mind exerts upon the body.

From the tottering, decrepit man he had seemed to be just before, he was suddenly transformed into what seemed like his former self.

"Hurrah!" he cried, in the exultation of his heart, "I feel quite young again! I will set about this business as soon as I can, and depend upon it I shall do my best."

"I know you will, Davis," replied Matthew; "but at the same time it will be necessary for you to be cautious to a degree."

"I will be so, never fear. I feel now as I used to feel when"——

"Well, well; never mind the past!" interrupted old Matthew, hastily; "forget even the present if you can, and wholly occupy your minds in looking to the future."

"That is good advice," said Tom Davis, "and it shall be followed."

"I rejoice to hear you say as much. You are sure you perfectly comprehend what you are to do?"

"Quite sure."

"That is enough, then. Here are sixty-three pounds, which Dick has sent. You are to take it and make use of it in case a deposit should be required. Set about your task at once. He leaves everything entirely to you. You are to act just as if you were acting for yourself, and in the meantime you shall be communicated with, and supplied with money to the extent you may require."

"And is the choice of the situation of the house left to me?"

"Yes, with these restrictions: you are to choose some place where none of us are known, and yet not too far away from London. Then, again, it must be a road-side inn, and at a distance from a village."

"All right, Matthew!" cried Tom Davis; "I know just the kind of place you want, and I will set about looking for it without delay."

"Do so—do so; and yet understand there is no reason for hurry. Dick is not yet prepared with the requisite amount of funds, though no doubt he will be by the time you have completed your arrangements."

With some further instructions of no special interest, old Matthew took his departure.

It was a long walk home, but he resolved to go there on foo

By the time he reached Drury-lane the brief winter's day had come to a close, and the sky gave indications of a rough night.

Matthew walked quickly.

He was anxious to get back, for he had been absent from home several hours, and he could not tell what disaster might have happened after his departure.

It was quite dark when he reached the door of the "White Horse," and all objects had a confused and indistinct appearance.

He had looked about him narrowly, but so far he had not seen anything at all calculated to excite suspicion.

He walked along the passage and entered the bar.

The girl whom he had left in charge was sitting down in a chair near the fire, and from her composed attitude and contented look the landlord argued that nothing of a alarming character had taken place.

With his heart lightened of a considerable load of anxiety, he spoke to the girl, who told him all was well, but that the place had been visited by several men, who came in one after another, and stood at the bar while they took some refreshment.

The girl hinted her belief that they were officers, and old Matthew thought most likely she was right.

It was enough to make him resolve to be doubly cautious.

Seeing that so far all was well, old Matthew ascended the stairs in order to change his apparel and also to pay a visit to Dick Turpin.

He knew the highwayman would feel anxious to a degree, and the time would appear very long to him in the solitude of that room.

He reached the door and tapped at it lightly with his knuckles.

He was responded to immediately by Dick, who cried—

"Is that you, Matthew?"

"Yes."

The click of the lock followed, and the next moment the door opened.

Old Matthew entered.

"Well," he said, "have you had a good rest?"

"Excellent! I feel like a new man, I must have gone to sleep as soon as I laid down, and I did not wake until about half an hour ago, and I have been putting myself in order a little.

Matthew looked at the highwayman with undisguised admiration.

Never did he look more like himself than he did at that moment.

Never did he look the character of the bold, dashing knight of the road to more perfection than he did then.

His face glowed with the ruddy hue of health, and his eyes sparkled with unusual brightness.

"Bravo!" said old Matthew. "You look yourself to-night, and no mistake."

CHAPTER CCCCLV.

MR. WRIGGLES MAKES A SUDDEN AND UNEXPECTED ATTACK UPON THE "WHITE HORSE" INN.

"No complaints, Matthew," said Dick Turpin, with a smile, for he felt more light-hearted than he had done for many a day past; "no compliments, but just tell me the result of your expedition, and after that I will trouble you for something to eat."

"Oh! dear, yes. Why, you have had nothing. I quite forgot all about that. It is very careless of me."

"Never mind—never mind; there is plenty of time."

"But there is not; and it will take a long time for me to tell you all, and while I am so engaged your wants must be attended to."

"I can wait."

"But I can't permit it. Just listen to me for a moment, will you?"

"Certainly."

"Well, then, when I came back, the girl I left in charge of the bar told me that several men had been in, who, from their appearance, she took for police-officers."

"Can they suspect my presence here?"

"That is more than I can tell. I merely mention the circumstance in order to show you how great the necessity is that you should be careful to a degree."

"All right, Matthew."

"But still I don't intend to let the officers spoil all our pleasures. I will tell you what I am going to do."

"What?"

"I am going downstairs, and I shall leave you on the first-floor landing while I go to the front door and look about me, in order to see whether the coast is clear."

"Yes—yes."

"If I find that it is all safe I shall whistle; and when you hear that sound you will understand that you are to run downstairs as fast as your legs will allow, and then whip into the parlour behind the bar. When you are once there you are safe, you know."

"Go on, Matthew. I would much rather be there than here."

"Of course you would. You can have something to eat and drink while I tell you my adventures."

"Be off with you at once."

"I am going, Dick. Follow me as far as the first-floor landing."

As he spoke old Matthew descended the stairs, Dick Turpin kept close at his heels.

They paused on the first-floor landing, and here, according to agreement, the highwayman remained, while the landlord went down to reconnoitre.

Dick's patience was not put to a very severe trial.

In less than a moment he heard a faint, clear whistle.

No sooner did the signal reach his ears, than he descended the stairs with a rapidity that had in it something marvellous.

Then he made one dash through the bar, and was in safety in the private room behind it.

"Bravo!" said Matthew, as he closed the door. "That's done well, and no mistake. No one has seen you, I feel quite sure."

Dick Turpin seated himself in one of the large, comfortable old-fashioned arm-chairs with which the parlour was furnished.

It did not take old Matthew long to produce a very tempting and substantial repast, to which he, as well as his guest, did ample justice.

It was while he was thus engaged that old Matthew told Dick Turpin all that had occurred to him during the day.

To the highwayman every word of this narrative possessed a special interest.

As soon as old Matthew had finished, he said—

"Well—well. I congratulate you, first of all, upon getting such a fair price for the booty. Why, there is not a fence in London that I know of where you could get a better."

"Nor I. He can afford to give a good price, because he is able to make so much out of the things."

"How so?"

"Well, that's more his business than mine; but I rather fancy he melts down the cases of the watches to make new ones with, and puts the works into other watches, by which means he must realize a very large profit indeed."

"He must; but he has fallen under suspicion."

"He has, it seems, though I was not aware of it until this morning. He will find it will interfere with his trade most materially, no matter what caution he employs."

"Well, never mind him for the present. I rejoice to hear that Tom Davis grasps so readily at our scheme, and I feel no doubt he will carry it out successfully."

"I hope so. But, Matthew, I have got all my work before me. A large sum of money will be required, and it must be obtained."

"Never fear for that."

"Why not?"

"With the exertions of yourself and your three comrades, you will soon get the required sum together."

"I hope we shall; and that reminds me, Matthew, that it is almost time I thought about bidding you adieu. They will expect me before dawn, and I would fain spare them all the anxiety I can."

"I suppose so," said old Matthew, with a sly smile. "Well, there is now nothing to keep you, though I shall be sorry when you go away; nevertheless, we have transacted our business."

"Yes," cried Dick, "and, thanks to you, in a most satisfactory manner; and I—but ah!—what was that?"

Dick Turpin's voice and manner considerably changed as he uttered the remaining portion of this sentence.

"What's amiss, Dick?" asked old Matthew, who was quite ignorant of the cause of the highwayman's alarm.

"I can hardly tell; but while I was speaking I happened to glance at the half-glass door which leads into the bar"——

"Yes—yes."

"And there, if I mistake not, I saw a man's face."

"A man's face?"

"Yes. He had his countenance pressed as close to the glass as it possibly could be, but the moment I spoke he vanished."

"This is serious, Dick," said old Matthew; "some danger may be impending over you. I know the officers are hanging about, and if they have seen you it is all up with us."

"I may be mistaken. Did you see anyone?"

"No; but that is easily accounted for. I was looking at the fire at the moment."

"What is to be done?"

"I don't know at present. It may be a false alarm. Perhaps it was the face of the girl I have set to mind the bar that you saw?"

"It may be so."

"However, it is well I arranged with you about beating a speedy retreat. You recollect what you have to do?"

"Perfectly well."

"That's all right then, and now remain here a moment while I make some inquiries."

"Nay—nay, Matthew. I will begone at once. There is no longer any need for me to stay, and the sooner I get back the better."

"Perhaps it may be best, and yet, after all, very likely it was"——

Old Matthew ceased suddenly.

A sound came to his ears which at once arrested further speech, and blanched his cheeks.

Dick Turpin's hand wandered to his pocket where his pistols were.

The sound was the hurried tramp of many footsteps.

"Quick—quick! Dick," cried old Matthew suddenly. "For God's sake, be quick! The officers are upon us! The secret door! Quick—quick! Remain in the recess without you are compelled to leave it by its discovery, and all may yet be well, for the house in all probability is surrounded. The secret door! Quick—quick, I say!"

Dick Turpin did not hesitate to obey the commands of old Matthew thus hurriedly and impetuously given.

He rushed across the room, pressed the spring, passed through the secret door, and closed it after him with incredible celerity.

He was only just in time.

The footsteps came nearer, and then, with a sudden crash, the little parlour-door was thrown open.

A tumultuous crowd of police-officers entered.

They were headed by our friend, Wriggles, whose countenance, perhaps in consequence of the exertions he had made, was even more purple than of yore.

Old Matthew had just had time to sink into a chair and replace his pipe between his lips, when the officers entered.

But before we go any further, we will explain how it was that the officers made this sudden irruption upon the inn.

The explanation will not take up much space.

In the first place, then, the reader may be sure that Mr. Wriggles was not exactly the sort of man to be cast down by repeated disappointments and defeats.

Had he been of such a nature, we should long since have ceased to hear anything about him.

It seemed as though he lived but for one object.

That was to capture Dick Turpin.

His frequent failures appeared to make him more determined to effect his object.

In spite of the fact that Dick Turpin had been seen in distant parts of the country, Mr. Wriggles still clung to the belief that, if he waited patiently, he should have the satisfaction of perceiving the object of his pursuit reappear at the "White Horse" inn.

For this reason, as it was no great distance from Bow-street, he was continually hanging about the spot himself.

It was also an easy enough matter for him to contrive to have men stationed there continually, so as to be upon the watch.

Nevertheless, Dick Turpin managed, by great good fortune, to turn down White Horse-yard without being perceived, and this only will account for his having remained so long unmolested.

At the precise moment when he arrived, the officer who was supposed to be on the watch was engaged in some little business of his own, for though at first the men had been vigilant enough, they had eventually grown tired of their resultless watch.

But in the morning it was noticed how late it was before old Matthew opened his house, and this circumstance was duly communicated to Mr. Wriggles.

Then, not long after, old Matthew was seen to go out, and this was a very rare circumstance, for it was very seldom he left anyone in charge of the house.

This being communicated to Mr. Wriggles, he at once came to the highly rational conclusion that something of an unusual character was going on.

Now, let that be what it might, it was highly necessary that he should know the precise nature of it.

Accordingly, he sent several of his own men disguised to drink at the bar, and peer about them, and let him know immediately if they perceived anything unusual.

This, as we know, was done, but the men saw nothing.

Still Mr. Wriggles did not despair, and he waited until old Matthew came home.

Some time after his arrival, he sent one of his men, upon whose acuteness he knew from experience he could fully rely, to drink at the bar of the "White Horse."

Accordingly this individual—or rather spy, for such he was—entered the house upon his errand.

He lounged up to the bar, and called for a glass of hot rum-and-water.

The girl served him, and he put down a shilling in payment.

While she was occupied in giving him change from the till, he endeavoured to enter into conversation with her, being not without the hope that if he could succeed he should be able to extract important information from her.

But the girl would have nothing further to say to him than brief monosyllabic replies to his questions, and as this was not what he wanted, the spy desisted.

He fixed his eyes, however, upon the half-glass door, which led into the private parlour.

But he could not obtain a glimpse of the interior, in consequence of the yellow gauze curtain that was hung across the panes.

He fancied, however, that the murmuring of voices came upon his ears once or twice, but he was not quite certain.

As it happened, his fancy did not deceive him.

At that very moment Dick Turpin and old Matthew were conversing together.

The spy sipped his hot rum-and-water slowly and in silence.

The girl, every now and then, would cast a furtive and suspicious glance upon him.

This he heeded not.

He determined not to leave the bar until he had peeped through the half-glass door, and seen who it was that occupied the parlour.

CHAPTER CCCCLVI.

RELATES, AT LENGTH, THE RESULT OF MR. WRIGGLES'S ATTACK UPON THE "WHITE HORSE" INN.

It was all very well for the officer to make this determination, but the thing was to carry it into effect.

While the girl retained her present position it was simply impossible for him to execute his design.

Chance favoured him, however, to an unexpected extent.

Some customers who were in the tap-room in the front of the house knocked loudly on the table with the bottoms of their drinking vessels, which was the mode they adopted to summon the attendant.

The girl glanced around her with an undecided expression.

She did not know what to do about leaving the bar while the officer remained standing at the counter.

She thought, at first, about calling old Matthew; and this is what she ought to have done, but, upon second thoughts—which, in this instance, at least, were not best—she determined to hasten to the tap-room, and lock the door leading out of the bar into the passage after her.

The spy watched all her movements with increased attention, for he heard the knocking, and was anxious to know what she would do, though he thought she would leave the bar.

She did so, and the spy felt that the critical moment had arrived.

He watched her along the passage into the tap-room, and then, the moment she disappeared, he hastened to the door that led into the bar.

The key was sticking in the lock, and he turned it instantly.

Then three steps brought him to the half-glass door which he so much desired to reach.

He was tall enough to see over the curtain, and he pressed his face closely against the pane.

There he saw, sitting comfortably at their ease, Dick Turpin and the landlord.

The former was sitting with his face turned towards him, so he could not possibly make any mistake.

It was, indeed, Dick Turpin, the highwayman.

The spy removed his face from the window instantly, for he fancied he was perceived.

He dashed across the bar, shut the passage door, and locked it.

He met the girl returning.

Without saying a word he made his way out of the house.

Mr. Wriggles and a body of men were in waiting.

He quickly communicated what he had seen, and Mr. Wriggles, with a self-satisfied nod, gave orders to a certain number of his men to surround the house and guard every point of exit.

This done, he gave the word "Forward!" and the whole troop rushed into the passage.

This was the sound which had caused so much alarm.

However, Dick Turpin, as we have stated, had just time to conceal himself, and old Matthew to sit down in the chair.

When Mr. Wriggles entered, therefore, all he could see was the landlord sitting down by the fire-side, calmly smoking, and exhibiting no more confusion than their sudden appearance might be supposed to cause.

But although Mr. Wriggles saw no one but old Matthew, he did not feel he was defeated.

The disappearance of the highwayman with so much suddenness pointed clearly to the fact that there was some hiding-place or other in the bar, which had escaped him in his previous examination.

But he was resolved it should not elude him now, as his information was so very precise.

"Hallo! Mr. Wriggles," cried old Matthew, with well affected astonishment, "whoever would have thought of seeing you so suddenly. What in the world is the matter?"

"Now, Matthew, my friend," said the police-officer, with ill-concealed exultation, "don't let us have any of your blessed gammon, because it will be quite thrown away. It will be no good at all—not a bit."

"Indeed. What's in the wind?"

"Now, Matthew, do for once listen to reason. You may as well be friends with me as not; and now you have an excellent opportunity of making me forget any unpleasantness that may have taken place some time back."

"Friends!" cried Matthew, "I always thought we were the best of friends."

"We shall be if you will just listen to me."

"Go on, then, I am listening."

"In the first place, then, I have thoroughly surrounded the house."

"There, there, that will do," cried old Matthew. "You are at your old games again."

"You mean you have been at your old games."

"Bah! stuff!"

"I tell you you have. Not five minutes ago Dick Turpin was seen sitting in this bar."

"Who by?"

"Me," cried the officer, who had looked through the glass door. "I seed him sitting in this here d—d identical old arm chair."

He tapped the chair with the barrel of a pistol as he spoke.

"Yes," said Mr. Wriggles, "and he can't have got far away. Certainly he has not left the house, nor can he do so without being seen and captured by my men."

Old Matthew smoked his pipe phlegmatically.

"Now, if you have got any sense," continued Mr. Wriggles, "you will just say where he is and save any further bother; if you do not, I shall be sure to find him. If you do as I want you, why you will hear nothing more about his being concealed on your premises. Think of that."

"Mr. Wriggles!"

"What?"

"Do you think I am such a fool as to run such a risk? Bah! not a bit of it. If I could deliver up Dick Turpin to you, or tell you where he was concealed, I would, but I can't; and if I can't, how can I? just tell me that."

"Very good, Matthew; very good. It won't do though; oh! dear, no; not a bit of it. I know your little game."

"All right!" said the landlord, with admirable coolness. "What do you make all this d—nable fuss about? If you think he is hidden, why don't you look for him, and not bother me with your d—d rubbish!"

"Oh! go on Matthew—go on. You'll alter your tune before long. I shall look, you may depend; and I shall not only look, but I shall find. I should have set about my search at once, only I wanted to bring you to reason if I could. I am in no hurry. I am so sure he is in this house, and that he can't leave it without being seen, that I can afford to spare a little time."

"Well, of course, Mr. Wriggles," said old Matthew, "you ought to know your own business best, and it is not for me to say a word. Conduct the search in what manner you think proper. I know you won't listen to reason."

"Listen to reason!" ejaculated the police-officer, whose easily-kindled anger was beginning to spring up. "Listen to reason! It's you that won't listen to reason."

"Stuff and nonsense! I tell you it's no good your looking. The man you want ain't here."

"I tell you he is."

"Oh! very well—very well. I give in, of course."

"Now, Matthew, once for all, and all for once, will you listen to me?"

"I am a listening."

"I don't want to make any more bother and unpleasantness than I can help. I am bound to have my man, and you ought to see that it is your best policy to give him up to us."

"Well—well."

"Will you do so, Matthew? It will save me knocking the place to pieces, and it will keep you out of trouble."

"Mr. Wriggles, once for all, and all for once, I tell you, if I could do as you wish me, I would, but I can't."

"That's a very artful speech, Matthew, and I quite understand it. However, you have chosen to be obstinate, so you will have to take the consequences upon your own head.

"On my head be it, then," said old Matthew, and then he went on smoking with greater deliberation than ever.

The landlord's calmness exasperated Mr. Wriggles to a very great extent indeed.

Finding, however, that there was no hope of inducing Matthew to disclose the secret of Dick's hiding-place he resolved to set about looking for it at once.

Mr. Wriggles had already made a tolerably good examination of the little parlour, and the traces of his former violence were still visible on the walls.

He felt, however, that he could place implicit confidence in the statement made by his spy, to the effect that he saw Dick Turpin sitting in one of the arm-chairs.

He was now invisible.

This pointed clearly to the fact that he must be concealed in some place to which ready access could be had.

While these thoughts were passing through his brain, Mr. Wriggles turned round on his heels once or twice and looked at every portion of the room.

He was considering where the hiding-place could be.

He came, at length, to the very natural conclusion that it must be somewhere in the walls; and, though he had failed to find on his former examination any traces of such a thing, he yet believed and hoped he should be more successful upon a second trial.

"Yes," he said, mentally; "there must be some secret door in the wall, and I will find it."

He put his hand into his coat-pocket and produced the hammer, one part of the head of which was elongated into a sharp spike.

He handled this weapon with evident delight, and he twirled it in his fingers while he made up his mind upon which portion of the wall he should commence his operations.

Old Matthew watched all his movements very closely, though he did not appear to do so.

He viewed the production of this hammer with great dissatisfaction.

It was a weapon well calculated to discover any secret door, no matter how well contrived.

However, he comforted himself that the secret door had already once withstood an examination with that very instrument, and he hoped that it would stand the test another time.

Mr. Wriggles looked sideways at the landlord in order to see what effect the sight of the hammer would have upon him.

But old Matthew's countenance afforded no key to what was taking place in his mind.

It was truly an imperturbable countenance.

He seemed to be looking at what was taking place with just a natural amount of curiosity.

There was one thing we ought to have stated.

Old Matthew had seated himself in the arm-chair that occupied that corner of the parlour where the secret door was situated.

The back of the chair was, indeed, in contact with the door, and he hoped, by remaining here, to prevent that portion of the room undergoing such close examination as the other.

Whether he was successful or not, or whether Mr. Wriggles observed it, we shall very quickly see.

However, with a self-satisfied air, the officer walked right up to the fireplace, choosing the side that was opposite to the one upon which old Matthew sat.

He raised his hammer and struck the wall with it.

He used the spiky part, which pierced the plaster with ease, and each time he withdrew it, a small quantity of fine mortar followed.

He resolved to go steadily all round the room in this manner.

He struck the wall just as high as his breast, and he left a horizontal distance of about a foot between each blow.

If he persevered in this manner, and, beyond all doubt, he fully intended to do so, no secret door could withstand discovery.

Old Matthew watched all this with great uneasiness.

Still he was aware that, in the event of the door being found, Dick would have a good chance of escape, and this afforded him very great consolation indeed.

Slowly and steadily Mr. Wriggles worked his way round the parlour.

His men looked on with the most intense curiosity and interest.

All had their weapons ready for immediate service, in case the necessity should arise for making use of them.

Mr. Wriggles came to the door which he had previously demolished.

There was now no secret about its whereabouts, and he opened the door.

He found the recess had been converted into a cupboard.

The man he wanted was not there, and he did not expect he would be; he merely looked in for the satisfaction of being able to say he had left no place, likely or unlikely, unexamined.

Then he went round the walls, until he came to where Matthew was sitting.

"Ahem! Mr. Gale," he said. "Perhaps you wouldn't mind getting up a moment, so that I can finish my examination. Ahem!"

CHAPTER CCCCLVII.

MR. WRIGGLES BELIEVES HE HAS MADE A WONDERFUL DISCOVERY.

"CONFOUND you!" cried old Matthew. "You're an intolerable nuisance, that's what you are! Of course, I'll get up, and you can examine the corner as much as you like. It's nothing to me, except a very great bother."

"Ahem!"

"Oh! d—n your ahems! What do you mean by it?"

"Nothing, Mr. Gale; oh! nothing. I'm just waiting for you to get up, you know; that's all; and then—why, we shall see what we shall see."

"Of course we shall," said old Matthew, as he rose reluctantly from his seat.

He knew it was no good to resist, and any hesitation, so far from warding off the discovery, would only have the effect of making Mr. Wriggles more suspicious, if that was possible.

So he got up and allowed the chair to be moved.

But he had spoken in a very loud tone of voice, so that he had given Turpin plenty of time to be upon his guard.

The obstruction to his examination being removed, Mr. Wriggles continued his operations with the hammer.

Several strokes followed, but mortar appeared after every one of them.

Can the reader imagine the feelings of old Matthew?

Can he conceive the intentness with which the landlord watched the police-officers?

He saw that another moment must inevitably disclose the secret of the recess upon which he so prided himself.

Mr. Wriggles struck another blow.

Old Matthew knew just where the door was, and he saw that the very next stroke that would be delivered would fall upon it.

He held his breath.

He had not heard the least movement, but he hoped and expected that Dick Turpin was no longer there.

Crash!

That was the sound the spike of the hammer produced as it entered the door.

It was very different to the sound produced by striking the wall.

"Ha! ha!" cried Mr. Wriggles, in a yelling voice of anticipated triumph; "ha! ha! What have we here, I wonder? Let me try again."

He withdrew the hammer, which had sunk deeply into the wood, and struck another blow a few inches off.

The same result followed.

"Just as I thought," said Mr. Wriggles, exultantly; "just as I thought. I know Dick Turpin was in this place five minutes before I entered it, and here is his hiding-place beyond all reasonable doubt. Now, Matthew, what do you think of that?"

Old Matthew shook his head.

"What are you shaking your d—d head for?" asked Wriggles, in a passion. "Do you think there's anything in it?"

"I shook my head, Mr. Wriggles," returned old Matthew, quietly, "because I was sorry to see how wrong you are."

"Wrong?"

"Yes."

"How do you mean wrong?"

"In your conclusions. You think because you have hit something that sounds different to the other parts of the wall, that you have found a hiding-place."

"Of course I do."

Matthew shook his head again, and pointed to the door on the other side of the parlour.

"Do you recollect that door?" he said.

Mr. Wriggles made a wry face.

"Ah! you do. But you don't like to talk about it. Do you recollect how confident you were, and how you disbelieved and laughed at me when I told you you would find nothing there?"

"Curse you! yes. I recollect, but I am not mistaken this time. I feel convinced that is Dick Turpin's hiding-place."

"I thought it would be no good to say anything to you," said old Matthew, with a sigh, "you are so awfully obstinate."

"Am I? Well, we will see if we can't soon set this matter at rest. And look here, Matthew."

"Well?"

"If I find him, as I know I shall, as I am sure I shall, woe be to you, that's all! I'll have you imprisoned for harbouring him in your house, and you shall suffer dearly for it.

"Alas! alas!"

"You will cry alas!"

"No, no; you mistake. I said alas! because I know how dreadful disappointed you will be."

Old Matthew's words had the effect of causi Mr. Wriggles some misgivings, but he would not allow them to be visible.

In a high, cracked tone of voice, he said—

"We will d—d soon settle it! And so I bid you beware!"

Old Matthew shook his head again, and went on smoking his pipe.

Mr. Wriggles now approached the door again, and pulling out the spike, he struck three distinct blows upon the woodwork with the hammer.

"Dick Turpin," he cried, "I call upon you in the name of our sovereign lord the king to surrender yourself unto us, his said majesty's officers of police. If you come forth, no harm will be done to you. If you refuse or resist, the consequences will be upon your head—not ours."

Old Matthew made a curious clucking movement by touching his palate with the tip of his tongue rapidly, as though to express his derision of what the officer was saying.

"What the devil are you making that a—d noise for?" asked Mr. Wriggles. "Whose chickens are you calling?"

"I was thinking what a fool you were," said old Matthew, "to stand preaching to the parlour-wall in that manner."

Mr. Wriggles's men all grinned when they heard this speech.

If anything was calculated to make the chief police-officer's exasperation complete, that was.

He actually danced with rage.

"D—n you all!" he cried as soon as he could command his voice. "We will soon settle the matter. Draw your cutlasses and cut the door down."

He sprang forward with his own cutlass as he spoke, and commenced a violent onslaught on the concealed door.

It was never intended to be proof against such an attack as that, and it speedily gave way.

Mr. Wriggles seemed to possess the strength of a madman.

But he could still hear old Matthew's contemptuous clucking, and that galled him excessively.

"Hold!" he cried. "Two of you advance and seize that man. Seize him, I say; he is your prisoner. I apprehend him upon the charge of being an accomplice of Dick Turpin's, and of feloniously concealing him in his house, contrary to law."

"You had better mind what you are doing, Mr. Wriggles. You'll have to prove your words."

"Talk to my elbow," cried the irate police-officer. "Hold him tightly, and never mind what he says," he added, addressing his men.

They obeyed him, and old Matthew was a prisoner.

Once more, then, Mr. Wriggles turned towards the door, which was already in an advanced state of demolition.

With main strength he seized one of the largest fragments and pulled it down.

The little recess was now revealed.

But it was empty.

His dismay may be imagined.

But there could be no doubt about it.

The cupboard-like looking place was empty.

Old Matthew uttered a triumphant chuckle, as I said—

"There now. What did I tell you?"

"D—n you all!" cried Wriggles. "Pull the rest of the door down, so that I can enter."

His men obeyed him, and, in another moment, the whole of the door had disappeared.

Mr. Wriggles now frantically dashed into the recess.

But he could see nothing suspicious.

It looked just such a place as he had formerly discovered.

"A light!" he cried, for he was determined not to give in if he could help it. "A light! There is some mystery here, I feel convinced, and it will go hard with me I do not fathom it."

A light was handed to him, and with this he commenced a rigid examination.

Almost the first thing he saw was the bolt that secured the door leading into the yard.

"Ha! ha!" he yelled. "What is this, I wonder?"

The bolt was not shot into the socket, but he pressed against the door, and it immediately gave way.

He found himself in the yard at the back of he inn.

Not the secret yard which Dick had entered the night before, but the public yard belonging to the inn

Mr. Wriggles struck himself some violent blows on the head.

"Done!" he cried. "Done again! Done by that infernal scoundrel, old Matthew! I can see it all now! At the first alarm Turpin would slip into that d—d cupboard, and, as soon as he found he was in any danger, he would make his way into the yard."

In this supposition, as the reader well knows, the police-officer came very near the truth.

"But, stop!" he cried; "there's hope yet. This house is surrounded by my men, and I am quite certain he could not leave it without being seen by some of them. Let me think now. Where would he be likely to go when he got out into the yard?"

This was a difficult problem to solve, but Mr. Wriggles quickly found a solution of it, though it was not the correct one.

"He's hiding himself. Perhaps he is somewhere very close at hand. Here goes for a search."

He summoned his men around him, and directed them to search the yard thoroughly.

As this was a small place, bounded by high brick walls, this was no difficult matter.

The hiding-places in it were very few.

All were peeped into, even to the water-butt that stood in one corner.

Not a sign of the highwayman, nor even a trace of his recent presence could be seen.

Mr. Wriggles was frantic.

There was but one door opening from the yard, and this he now opened.

As he was well aware, this led into White Horse-yard.

Just outside this door a man was stationed.

"Is that you, Collins?"

"Yes, Mr. Wriggles."

"Have you seen any one?"

"Not a blessed soul, sir."

"You are sure no one has come out through this door?"

"Quite sure, 'cos why, I have stood with my back agin it all the while.

Mr. Wriggles rubbed his head with a puzzled air.

"I will stand here a moment. You run up to the top of the court. Who is stationed there?"

"At the Drury-lane end, sir?"

"Yes."

"Figgins, sir."

"Go and ask him whether he has seen anything."

The man ran off, and returned quickly, for the distance he had to go was trifling.

"Well?" said Wriggles, inquiringly.

"He hasn't seen nothing, sir."

"Curses!"

"Shall I run down to the other end and ask Evans?"

"Yes, do."

The man ran down to the Stanhope-street end of the court and returned, saying—

"He hasn't seen nothing neither, sir."

"Keep a sharp look-out, then, for I shall unearth him presently."

Mr. Wriggles turned back into the yard.

But it was rather despairingly.

He began to be afraid that he was about to receive another defeat, and old Matthew another victory.

This was gall and wormwood to him, and he set about making another search in the yard, though he had little hopes that any good would result from it.

But he was agreeably disappointed.

He found what had escaped him before.

That was the narrow passage leading to the stable.

He called his men around him.

"Here is something at last," he cried. "Follow me! Fol——"

He ceased abruptly in the middle of the word, and stared aghast.

The sounds of a desperate conflict came upon his ears.

He heard the report of fire-arms, the clash of steel, and the cries of many voices.

Recovering from his astonishment, he cried—

"Hurrah! They have him at last! Follow me."

As he spoke he darted down the narrow passage followed by his men.

CHAPTER CCCCLVIII.

DICK TURPIN FINDS MORE OBSTACLES IN THE WAY OF LEAVING THE "WHITE HORSE" THAN IS AT ALL THOUGHT FOR.

In order to explain the meaning of the sounds which came so suddenly and so unexpectedly upon the ears of Mr. Wriggles and his officers, it will be necessary to revert to Dick Turpin, and chronicle his proceedings.

He had scarcely time to shoot the bolts into their sockets, after entering the recess, before Mr. Wriggles and his officers dashed into the bar.

He could imagine their surprise and dismay upon finding only one person there.

He placed his ear close against the door, and, by adopting this means, he was able to hear, with tolerable distinctness, all that was said and done.

From the first he had feared that the hiding-place would be discovered, and he prepared himself at once for instant flight.

He left the door leading into the yard so that he could push it open in a moment.

The noise which Mr. Wriggles made in striking the walls came plainly enough upon his ears.

In great suspense and anxiety, he awaited the result of this proceeding.

He laughed silently at the aggravating manner in which old Matthew behaved to the police-officer.

At length, however, he heard the demand made for Matthew to move his seat, and so of course he heard the landlord's reply, for it was purposely spoken in a very loud tone of voice.

Discovery was now imminent, and therefore it was high time to be off.

Still Dick lingered.

He heard Wriggles strike the first blow, and, indeed, he was near receiving a severe injury from the spike of the hammer, which came through the door, quite close to where he was standing.

This decided him not to remain any longer.

As noiselessly as possible, he passed through the door that opened into the yard, and closed it after him.

With all the speed he could make, he darted down the narrow passage, and in another moment he was standing in the stable, by the side of his bonny mare.

But he took care to secure the stable-door as well as he could.

This done, he took the saddle and bridle, and put them on Black Bess with a rapidity which only long practice would have enabled him to make.

But for one thing all the articles he required were close at hand.

Having properly accoutered Black Bess for the road, Dick Turpin took hold of the bridle and led her towards the door that opened into the other stable.

Through this they passed, and he closed the door carefully behind him, but he could not fasten it, as the bolts were on the other side.

Dick did not pause now for anything, for he was well aware the sooner he got clear of the "White Horse" the better it would be for him.

The entrance to the inn stables was from Stanhope-street, from which thoroughfare there was a long passage, on both sides of which were the backs of several small houses.

Upon gaining this passage Dick immediately mounted.

His weapons he well knew were in excellent order, and he could depend upon them should any emergency arise.

He loosened his sword in his sheath, however, and prepared himself for action, for he saw no reason to disbelieve the statement Mr. Wriggles had made about the house being surrounded.

He anticipated a struggle.

But his heart was light.

Having accomplished so much, he did not care one jot for the rest.

At a very slow walk he allowed Black Bess to make her way down the passage until he was within a few yards of its termination.

Then he pressed his mare's flanks with his heel, and uttered a faint cry, which he knew she perfectly well understood, and which he never made use of except when he wanted her to put forth her utmost speed.

She obeyed on this occasion with a suddenness that would have unhorsed an unpractised rider.

She bounded out of the passage into Stanhope-street like an arrow.

But here some of Mr. Wriggles' men were stationed, for Dick Turpin had been known to make a sudden appearance here more than once before.

They were, therefore, prepared for him.

Pistols were fired at the flying figure, but with what result they could not tell.

Dick did not hesitate to return these shots, and likewise to draw his sword, and slash savagely at his opponents.

These were the sounds which had attracted Mr. Wriggles' attention.

It was easy enough for him to guess at the cause of them.

UNIVERSITY OF ILLINOIS LIBRARY

There could be but one explanation, and that was that Dick was endeavouring to break through the line of men that he had posted round the house.

He called out to his men, and dashed frantically down the passage without being at all clear in his mind as to where it led, and without knowing whether it would take him to the scene of conflict.

He hastened on, however, until his progress was stayed by the stable-door, which Turpin had been prudent enough to fast

Against this he flung himself with the full force of his body, being quite regardless of the extent of the bruises he might sustain by such an operation.

The door withstood the first onslaught, though it showed signs of giving way.

A second rush, and then the way was clear before them.

Upon entering the small stable where Black Bess had been lodged, Mr. Wriggles looked about him in great surprise.

He had that night become acquainted with more secrets connected with the "White Horse" inn than he ever dreamed were in existence.

Upon the present occasion, though, he felt that he dared not linger.

A door was before him, and opening it, he found himself in what may be fairly called the legitimate stables belonging to the old inn.

The door leading into the passage was open, and seemed to indicate the route the highwayman had taken.

At this moment the sounds of conflict ceased.

Mr. Wriggles redoubled his speed, and, panting and exhausted, he reached Stanhope-street just in time to hear the clatter of horses' hoofs in the distance, and to see a dark, shadowy figure turn into Princes-street.

On the ground lay a man who, by his motionless attitude, appeared to be dead.

Two others were wounded, but not severely.

"What's all this?" cried Mr. Wriggles, suddenly. "Speak someone. Tell me what has happened."

"Dick Turpin," said one of his men.

"Death and fury! what of him?"

"Not a minute ago he darted out of the passage, but we were on the look-out for him."

"Well—well?"

"We tried to arrest his progress, and, finding we could not do that, fired, and he fired in return."

"But he has got off?"

"He has."

"Is he wounded?"

"I can't tell, sir. A great many shots were fired at him, and surely some must have taken effect. He cannot have escaped all the bullets."

Mr. Wriggles, during the foregoing brief and hurried conversation, had taken from his pocket a whistle, which he blew shrilly.

Scarcely had the sound died away, than from a contiguous thoroughfare there came a troop of horses.

All were saddled and fully equipped for service.

They were led by one man.

"Quick, all of you! Mount! mount! Follow me! He is, doubtless, hurt; but, whether he is or not, we'll give him chase; he cannot have got far ahead of us!"

The men scrambled as fast as they could into their saddles.

Mr. Wriggles was one of the first.

In a space of time, then, which anyone would have declared totally inadequate for the performance of as much, Mr. Wriggles and his men were mounted and in full pursuit of the flying highwayman.

The chief police-officer had laid all his plans well.

He had taken into his calculations the possibility of Dick Turpin breaking through the guard he had placed round the house, and seeking safety by flight.

In the event of the occurrence of this contingency, he had had a man in waiting with a troop of horses.

His instructions were, as soon as he heard the whistle, to hasten to the spot from whence the sound proceeded.

We have seen with what an amount of promptitude these instructions were carried out.

And now to turn to Dick.

When he found himself so suddenly attacked, he defended himself with great vigour and determination.

But the men hemmed him in and surrounded his steed, so he had literally to cut his way through them.

During this struggle, shots were freely exchanged.

At last, however, one stroke with his sword cut down a man who was tugging at Black Bess's bridle, and the next moment the gallant creature bounded like an antelope along the narrow street.

Whether he was hurt or not, Dick knew not.

In moments of such excitement, the blood is too hot for the body to be sensible of pain.

Whether, too, his mare had escaped injury, he was equally ignorant; but this was a point upon which he should have precise information.

Dick made his way direct to Lincoln's Inn-fields, for this, in the last century, was quite a deserted place.

Indeed, it was unsafe to walk there after dark.

Upon gaining the enclosure Dick paused and listened.

But no sound of approaching horsemen came upon his ear.

Here, then, he resolved to pause while he had the opportunity.

First, then, as to himself.

He fancied he could feel the perspiration pouring down his face and trickling into his eyes.

He put up his hand to wipe it away.

When he withdrew it, however, his fingers were wet with blood.

Even at the moment of making the discovery he became conscious of a strange feeling in his head.

He had been wounded.

He took out a handkerchief and wiped his face.

Then he endeavoured to ascertain, by the sense of touch alone, the extent of the injuries which he had received.

He found a bullet had struck the side of his head, and made a deep furrow in it a couple of inches in length at least, leaving the bone of the skull quite bare.

He felt sick, and reeled in the saddle.

But at that moment he could hear sounds which plainly indicated that a pursuit had been commenced.

He rallied himself.

Twisting the handkerchief into a rude kind of bandage, he tied it tightly round his head so as to check at least, if not to stop, the flow of blood.

This done, he moved his limbs; but was soon convinced that he had sustained no other hurt.

The next thing was to ascertain the state of his mare; and though he could hear his pursuers were frightfully close at hand, he did not hesitate to dismount and make an examination.

Everything depended upon it.

If he found his mare was unharmed, he would be inspired with a feeling of confidence which would go far to clear him of his danger.

Rapidly, then, he passed his hand over every part of her body, and, to his extreme gratification, he found she had not received the least injury whatever.

He went round and prepared to mount.

But at that moment such a frightful feeling of giddy dizziness came over him that he lost all strength, and had he not seized the pommel of the saddle with one hand and so supported himself, he must have fallen to the ground.

As it was, he was able to prevent this.

He strove to rally himself.

A strange, humming, ringing sound was in his ears, mingled with which were the hoarse cries of his pursuers and the loud clatter of their horses' hoofs.

CHAPTER CCCCLIX.

DICK TURPIN'S POSITION BECOMES DEPLORABLE INDEED.

Truly was that a critical moment for Dick Turpin.

It was only in a dreamy, half-conscious way that he heard his enemies approaching, and though he knew they were so close, yet he felt as though he was sinking away from them—far, far away—down into the very bowels of the earth.

But that feeling was only produced by the weakness consequent upon the immense quantity of blood he had lost.

What an easy prey the bold and dashing highwayman now seemed to be for those who were approaching.

He would offer them no more resistance than would come from a puny child.

His head partially rested against the flap of the saddle, and his right arm hung powerless by his side.

[DICK TURPIN AT THE GATES OF THE RUINED MANSION.]

The feeling of weakness, however, passed away.

The strange ringing sound in his ears subsided, and, as it did so, the sounds of his pursuers became more and more distinct.

Surely, now they could not be many yards off.

This conviction lent Dick Turpin the amount of strength requisite to mount his horse.

But he succeeded in seating himself only after great pain and difficulty.

At the moment he took the reins in his hand he heard a loud shout, which came from many throats.

It was followed by a brisk volley of pistol-shots.

Mr. Wriggles and his officers had just come round the corner of Duke-street into Lincoln's Inn-fields.

To their surprise they saw before them, seated on his horse, the man of whom they were in pursuit.

The shout which came upon Dick Turpin's ear came from the throats of all.

It was compounded or surprise at his unexpected appearance, rage for the losses and injury they had sustained, and hope that ere many more minutes had elapsed his capture would have been effected.

That shout, however, seemed to have upon the highwayman the effect of an electric shock.

He started, and then suddenly found himself possessed of sufficient strength to seat himself firmly in the saddle, and give Black Bess a sudden and powerful impulse forward.

She obeyed, and it was just as she gave a bound and burst into a gallop that the volley was fired.

That sudden movement most unquestionably saved Dick Turpin's life.

Had he lingered another moment, he must have fallen to the earth, with his body riddled with bullets.

As good luck would have it, however, he escaped without any additional injury.

Excitement now enabled him to contend successfully with the weakness that oppressed him.

He turned the corner of Great Queen-street like a shot, and then the next turning on his right hand took him into Holborn.

Across that thoroughfare he bounded like a shot.

He was no sooner seen than he disappeared.

He kept straight on through Russell-square, well knowing that if he persevered in that direction it would quickly take him out into the open country.

But the police-officers were close at his heels.

He had really had no start of them, and as yet they had been able to keep him fully in view.

The manner in which they laid on to their poor horses, to enable them to keep up their speed, was really dreadful to witness.

They gored their flanks, too, with their spurs until the blood trickled down into the road.

But, with Dick Turpin just before them, and with a full belief that they should capture him before long, it was not likely the officers would feel inclined to spare their horses.

In a few minutes, Islington was reached, and then the highwayman was in the country, with green trees and fields on every side of him.

At his back, however, and by unwearied exertions preserving the same distance between them, were the officers.

Every few moments, however, such a dreadful feeling of exhaustion would come over Dick Turpin, that he would reel from side to side in his saddle, and only preserve his balance with great difficulty.

But habit is a great thing, and Dick had been so accustomed to horse-riding, that he retained his seat almost unconsciously.

Every time, however, that he felt himself sway from one side to the other, he would make a strong effort to recover himself.

Fortunately he was too far off Mr. Wriggles and his followers for this state of things to be noticed.

They guessed, however, that he was wounded, but not seriously.

Most horses, when coming fresh out of the stable, and when urged to the utmost by voice, whip, and spur, will make wonderful speed, and so it was with the horses which the officers bestrode, and which Mr. Wriggles had caused to be selected on account of their superior fleetness.

This, then, will explain how it was that they were able to keep up with the highwayman so well as they did.

In a little while, however, their strength was spent, and their speed abated, nor could all the efforts of their riders cause them to go at an accelerated rate.

It was now that Black Bess's superiority made itself manifest.

With the same sweeping gallop as she had started with, and which had enabled her to keep ahead of the officers' horses, she still continued on her way, apparently not in the least exhausted, and maintaining her speed without any urging on the part of her rider.

Dick Turpin's brain was in a strange, confused state.

He was just conscious that he was pursued, and that he was flying at the top of his speed across the country, and that was about all.

Presently, however, he got so far out of the hearing of his foes that he could hear no sounds from the rear.

Having made this discovery, he shaped his course as well as he could to the deserted mansion where he knew his comrades were anxiously awaiting him.

He guessed the direction which he wished to take as well as he could.

After an hour's riding, he reached the lane which branched off from the main road and led to the dilapidated gates belonging to the ruined mansion.

By this time, however, his weakness had dreadfully increased.

Mists of blood seemed to float before his eyes and obscure his vision.

The wound he had received was a very serious one.

Blood had flowed from it in large quantities, and the handkerchief which he had bound round his head, though it checked the hemorrhage to some degree, did not stay it altogether, for, by degrees, the crimson stream forced a passage through the linen until the bandage was completely soaked.

Each moment he grew weaker and more unconscious of what was taking place.

He believed he had out-distanced the officers, and in this he was unquestionably right.

After completely knocking their horses up, Mr. Wriggles and his companions had been compelled to turn back to London and confess themselves once more defeated.

The manner in which Dick Turpin swayed backwards and forwards, while Black Bess, at a steady pace, took her way along the lane, was really fearful to witness.

It seemed as though he must inevitably fall to the ground.

By great good fortune, however, he retained his seat.

And it was now that his gallant mare displayed to the utmost the extraordinary amount of sagacity which she possessed.

She seemed to fully understand that something had happened to her rider.

But she exhibited no terror.

On the contrary, she reduced her pace to a steady walk.

Along the lane she went without being guided in the least by her almost insensible rider.

He is lying in some strange manner across her neck.

His fingers are entangled in her long silken mane, and it is by the aid of these alone that he retains his seat.

Indeed, it was wonderful how he escaped a fall.

At length the mysterious and deserted mansion appeared in sight.

But Dick Turpin saw it not.

He had not the remotest idea of where he was, being dead to all that was surrounding him.

At frequent intervals he would make an effort to rise in the saddle, but each attempt was more feeble than the last, until he became unable to lift his head from his mare's neck, though he made several abortive efforts to do so.

Guided only by her own instinct, Black Bess took her way towards the gate of the deserted mansion.

She reached it.

But to enter the long serpentine avenue leading up to the house she took a somewhat sudden turn, which had the effect of completely throwing her rider off his balance.

He was conscious that he was falling, and made a desperate attempt to save himself.

But it was in vain.

His muscles had quite lost their usual strength, and he slipped off on to the ground where he lay at full-length.

Black Bess must have felt him going, for she immediately stood as still as a statue.

From this cause, and this only, Dick Turpin fell upon the soft turf without sustaining any injury.

His feet slipped out of the stirrups, and, after one ineffectual attempt to rise, he rolled over on to his back with extended arms.

And so he lay, without sense or motion; and anyone to have looked at him, would have declared he had ceased to exist.

Such was not the case, however.

The mysterious essence called life still inhabited that body, though the tenure by which it held possession was frail indeed.

Black Bess trembled, and held her head close to her rider's breast.

But he stirred not, and the gallant creature still remained in the same position.

She could tell something was amiss.

And so, in the intense silence of that solitary spot, lay Dick Turpin, almost lifeless, with no one to watch over him and defend him from any danger with which he might be assailed save his gallant mare.

Those in the deserted mansion who were, beyond a doubt, so anxiously expecting him, were profoundly ignorant of his arrival.

Nor was there any means by which they could be informed of it, for the last thing they would have thought of would have been the occurrence of so strange a catastrophe.

How easy a prey was the gallant highwayman now!

His foes would have but little trouble in effecting his capture.

Was he destined to fall thus into the hands of his foes?

We shall see.

Suddenly Black Bess started.

She raised her head and projected her ears forward, while her neck was outstretched and her nostrils expanded.

Some slight sound has struck upon her sensitive ears, and now she listens intently.

At length the sound becomes plainly audible.

It is the clatter of horses' hoofs.

Louder and louder becomes the monotonous sound, which, once heard, can never be mistaken.

It is plain that the sound is approaching, and rapidly, too; so rapidly that, in another moment, the rusty dilapidated gates will be reached.

CHAPTER CCCCLX.

RELATES WHAT TOOK PLACE AT THE DESERTED MANSION AFTER THE DEPARTURE OF DICK TURPIN.

Ere we explain who it was approaching the deserted mansion at that unusual hour, it is necessary that we should go back a little.

We would wish to take the reader to the deserted mansion, and describe the strange events which took place after Dick Turpin's departure.

In a former chapter we have described how Maud and Tom King and Claude Duval and Sixteen-String Jack watched Dick Turpin ride away.

As he disappeared all those foreboding feelings which had sprung up in Maud's breast, when Dick first spoke of his intended expedition, returned with full force, and she felt that she could have given worlds for the power to call him back.

Under the impulse of the moment, she did call out in an imploring voice, but as she did so she became conscious that it was too late, for Turpin had already disappeared from view.

Tears sprang into her eyes, but she dashed them impatiently aside, and strove to school herself to be calm.

And who shall say that the presentments of evil were unfounded?

Were they not indeed more than realized, for she never imagined things half so bad as they really were.

It is probable that, if she had been alone, Maud would have stood for some time on the spot where she had bidden adieu to her husband, but she was aroused by Tom King, who said, in a cheerful voice—

"Come, come! We will not linger here now. Dick has gone, and we can do nothing more than await his return with what amount of patience we possess. Come, let me lead you to the house."

Maud suffered Tom King to take her hand in silence, and the little party at once bent their steps towards the deserted mansion, which, let its faults be what they might, was certainly a more comfortable place than the open air.

In a few moments, then, all were seated in that room at the top of the house in which they had taken up their quarters.

The fire was replenished, and the chamber had quite a comfortable look.

It was no more than natural that the conversation should turn upon the strange sights and sounds which they had all seen and heard.

But they could do no more than speculate upon it, and having only slight grounds, their speculations were soon exhausted.

All felt curious and anxious to know whether on this night there would be a repetition of the strange, howling cry, which had so startled and alarmed them.

This they could only ascertain by patient waiting.

The conversation then turned upon the scheme for the future which had been suggested by their captain, and then Claude Duval said—

"My comrades, I know you will agree with me about the excellence of the scheme, and all that; but still a considerable sum of money will be required before we can carry it out."

"True, true."

"In my humble opinion, then, the sooner that money is obtained the better, because one can never tell what to-morrow may bring forth."

"What are you driving at, Claude?" asked Sixteen-String Jack. "You may as well speak out at once, and say what you mean."

"Well, so I may; and I can tell you what I want to say in a very few words."

"Speak, then."

"Well, you know Dick's instructions when he left us were that we should remain here until he returned?"

"Yes, yes."

"But it is easy to see why he gave such instructions. He wanted us to take care of Maud, and guard her from any injury."

"And quite right, too."

"I admit that, of course; but, then, it appears to me that it does not require three of us to perform this duty."

"What do you mean?"

"Why, simply this. I propose that two of us mount our horses, and go out on the road to-night, and try how much booty we can obtain, while the third remains here for the purpose of keeping guard; and, in my humble judgment, one is quite sufficient for such a purpose."

This proposal or suggestion provoked a great deal of remark; but one thing was quite clear, and that was that it was relished by all.

"The chief difficulty I can see," said Tom King, "is who shall stay at the house. I must confess I should not like to be the one left behind."

"Nor I—nor I."

"Of course not. No one would; but it is quite certain one must."

"We can get over that difficulty," said Claude Duval; "we will draw lots and abide by the result."

"Agreed."

"Let us settle it at once, then. The sooner those start who Fortune allows to do so the better."

The truth of this was at once assented to, and they set about making their preparations to draw lots.

Tom King was not the only one who had no desire to remain behind. Both his comrades wished to go quite as much as he did, but they knew full well that the undesired duty of keeping guard must devolve upon one of them.

By common consent the superintendence of the lot-drawing was entrusted to Claude Duval.

He took from his pocket several guineas, and from them selected three, each of which was stamped with a different year.

"Here," he said, "are three guineas, and we shall soon settle our luck with them. One is dated 1714, another 1722, and another 1725."

"But what are you going to do with them, Claude?" asked his comrades.

"I will show you," he replied. "I will put them in my hat thus, and put my hat on the table. Now that is done, you will please take a coin each, and hold it concealed in your hand; then, when the word is given, you must show what you have got."

"Well?"

"And the one who is unlucky enough to draw the lowest number—that is to say, the guinea with 1714 on it, will have to stay behind and keep guard."

This was a very fair way of settling the matter, as Claude's comrades at once admitted.

The coins were now placed in the hat and the hat put on the table.

Then walking up to it, the highwaymen each took a guinea without looking at it, and held it within closed hands as Claude had directed.

Had their lives depended upon the issue, they could not have manifested a greater amount of eagerness.

Then they opened their hands.

Claude Duval uttered an oath.

"I am in for it," he said. "Look, here is 1714!"

It was so.

Claude Duval, who was probably the one who was least of all willing to stay and keep guard, found it to be his lot.

He did not grumble, however, because he knew the arrangement must be abided by, or it would be of no use.

"Lucky fellows," he cried to his companions. "But never mind; I have one consolation, and that is, that I shall be out upon the road to-morrow night."

"So you will, Claude; but, above all things, keep good guard, for if anything amiss were to happen Dick would be displeased, because even now we are disobeying his orders."

"Never fear for that. You leave it all to me. I will undertake that all is safe, and I hope you two will take care of yourselves."

"You may depend upon that," replied Tom King, who, as well as Sixteen-String Jack, was carefully employed loading his pistols.

In a few moments they were ready to descend.

They bid adieu to Claude and Maud in the chamber, and would not permit the former to accompany them to the stable, as he desired to do.

The reason for this was that Maud would have been put to the trouble of descending also, and they wished to spare her this trouble, for after what had occurred, it was impossible for her to remain in the house alone.

After a few more parting words, Tom King and Sixteen-String Jack descended the stairs, and made their way to the stable.

It took them only a few moments to caparison their steeds, and this done, they led them out and mounted.

Side by side they made their way down the long, winding avenue, until at length they paused just before the dilapidated gates.

"Is there anyone about, Jack?" asked Tom King.

"I think not," was the reply. "We had better wait here a moment and listen."

This was done, but no sound came to their ears, save that which the wind produced as it whistled through the branches of the leafless trees.

"It is all right," said Tom King, at length, "and now, Jack, what shall we do? Shall we keep together, or shall we separate?"

"Just as you like."

"Nay, nay! I should like to have your opinion."

"Well, then, I think, as we are going out solely with the intention of getting as much booty as we can, we had better separate."

"That is what I think. I fancy, if we both go different ways, we shall obtain more than if we were to go together."

"You may depend upon it."

"Then we will part, Jack. Take care of yourself, and do not attempt too much. Above all things, keep clear of the dragoons, by whom, I dare say, the road is well watched."

"All right, Tom. Good-bye! We will part here at the gates."

"And return by daybreak?"

"Yes, yes; of course."

With these words the highwaymen again set their steeds in motion.

Passing through the gates, Sixteen-String Jack turned round to the left, and Tom King to the right.

Once more, bidding each other farewell, they started off at a rapid pace, and were soon out of hearing of each other.

Whether Dick Turpin would have sanctioned these proceedings it is very hard to say.

He would have endeavoured to make them sensible of the great amount of danger they would incur.

It will be our task to follow the fortunes of both highwaymen on this eventful night.

Strange incidents befell them, and the peril they encountered was greater than they had anticipated.

The reader will please to bear in mind that the night of which we are now speaking is the one upon which Dick Turpin stopped the St. Alban's coach single-handed, and afterwards had so narrow an escape from capture.

As stated in a former chapter, the new moon had set shortly after Dick set out, and now all was dark, save the faint and uncertain illumination that came from the stars.

A better night for such an expedition as that upon which Sixteen-String Jack and Tom King had set out, could scarcely have been found.

CHAPTER CCCCLXI.

SIXTEEN-STRING JACK HAS A DARING ADVENTURE ON THE HIGHWAY.

We confess we scarcely know whether to give the precedence to Tom King's adventures or to Sixteen-String Jack's.

Perhaps it had better be the latter.

After parting, then, with his comrade in the manner we have related, he took his course along the lane in a westerly direction.

He had never been this way, and had but a rude idea as to where it would lead him.

By keeping due west, however, he knew he must sooner or later emerge upon the Edgware-road, and this was the locality he had decided upon as the scene of his night's exploits.

Ere he had gone very far Jack found, as he had more than expected, that the lane came to an abrupt termination.

There was evidently no thoroughfare, and the only purpose the lane served was to form an approach to the deserted mansion, and, perhaps, to some of the meadows on the estate surrounding it.

There was rather a high fence across the end of the lane, over which could be seen a large expanse of meadow land.

After a moment's deliberation, Sixteen-String Jack determined to push straight across this, until he should reach another lane or cross-road.

The fence was too high for him to feel inclined to run the risk of jumping his horse over it, more especially as there was a gate close by, through which he could pass without difficulty.

Accordingly he dismounted, and, having opened the gate, he led the horse into the meadow, and then closed it again.

"Now for a gallop, just to circulate my blood," he said, as he sprung into the saddle again. "The ground is as smooth as velvet."

With these words he touched his horse with the spur, and the really beautiful creature started off at a gallop, that soon took him to the extremity of the meadow.

Beyond this, however, another appeared, which was merely separated from it by a low hedge.

Over this the horse bounded in gallant style, and then their onward course was continued until they arrived at a rather broad cross-road.

Jack walked his horse along until he came to a gap in the hedge, and then he forced his way through.

A glance up at the sky enabled him to ascertain which was the direction he ought to take in order to reach the Edgware-road, which was, at the time of which we write, a very long way out of London, and only dotted here and there with houses.

Still there was considerable traffic upon it, because it was the high-road to so many places.

Jack listened first; and, as he could hear no sound indicating the approach of anyone, he did not hesitate to push on towards his destination with all speed.

It was not upon such a road as he was now travelling that Jack expected to find a booty worth taking, and his anticipations were confirmed, for he reached the highway without having met with a soul.

But now it was highly requisite that he should call into play every care and caution.

When, therefore, he saw the high-road was before him, he slackened his speed and kept as close under the hedgerow as he could.

It was well that he did so, for, when about a dozen paces from the corner, there came upon his ear the tramp of many horses' feet.

This sound was quite sufficient to induce Jack to come to a halt there and then.

The cross-road was, however, a very narrow one and profoundly dark; for, not only were the hedgerows on either side of it of an unusual height, but it was bordered by trees, which cast a deep shadow on the ground.

Along the side of the bank upon which the hedge was planted was a dry ditch of tolerable width.

In this ditch Jack's horse stood, while the person of the highwayman himself was quite undistinguishable from the mass of foliage so close to which he stood.

But from this position he was able to command a good view of the road, and he would be able to see anything that passed along it.

Silent and motionless Jack remained here, shading his eyes with his hand, and listening intently to the sound of the horses' feet, which grew plainer and plainer every moment.

They were evidently approaching.

In less than a moment more the horsemen came in sight.

At a pace which could neither be called a walk nor a trot—for it was between the two—they passed by at the top.

Jack saw their forms plainly enough, for they had nothing but the light sky behind them.

A glance told him they were dragoons.

And even if he could not have seen their uniforms as he did, the jingling of their accoutrements would have been quite sufficient to inform him upon this point.

Several of them appeared to look towards the spot where Jack was standing, but the highwayman felt tolerably certain that he was invisible to their eyes.

He counted the troop—which was one of those who had been commanded to patrol the roads—and found that it consisted of an officer and twelve men.

They were quickly out of sight, but Jack did not venture to leave his place of concealment until they were out of hearing as well.

"I must be careful," he said. "There is more danger than I looked for. It would be no joke to encounter so many well-armed men single-handed."

This was true enough, and, in the event of such contest taking place, there could be no doubt about its result.

At last the sounds died away in the distance, and then the highwayman ventured to leave his place of concealment.

But he did so slowly and thoughtfully.

"I think I had better push on towards Watford," he muttered. "That is a part which has not been visited lately, and is some distance from London. Ten to one if the dragoons are patrolling the roads beyond it. I will try to find out, at any rate."

Having now made up his mind what to do, Jack increased his pace.

The Watford road branched off in an angular direction from the Edgware road, and after looking about him for a minute or two, Jack came to the conclusion that he was several miles from Stanmore, the name of the village where the roads divide; and, consequently, in order to reach Watford, he would still have to make his way in a straight line across the country.

But such a course of proceeding as this was far from distasteful to Jack. It suited him better than the high-road.

First assuring himself that the Edgware road was clear, Sixteen-String Jack emerged into it.

Crossing straight over to the other side, he made his way along until he came to some place which would allow him to enter the meadows beyond.

Coming presently to a spot where the road was bounded by some wooden palings, he put his horse to it, and made him leap over.

The rest was easy enough.

The ground beneath his feet was soft yet firm, and so the gallant steed flew over the meadows at a gallop.

It was about a quarter of an hour after this that Sixteen-String Jack emerged on to the high-road a little way below Watford.

He could hear nothing, however, indicative of the approach of a traveller, and so he kept on down the road until he came to a narrow lane that turned out of it.

Just within the mouth of this lane he paused, resolved to wait until an opportunity occurred, when he would pounce out upon his prey.

He was not kept long in suspense.

By the time he had finished making an examination of his weapons, and getting himself into a state of readiness, his quick ear caught a sound, which he knew in a moment was produced by the rapid approach of some vehicle.

As it came nearer and nearer, he discovered that it ran upon four wheels, and was drawn by at least two horses.

Further than this he was scarcely able to go.

To be sure, he knew it was not a stage-coach that was coming. The rapidity of its approach, as well as the evident lightness with which it rolled over the ground was quite sufficient to assure him of that.

"It's a post-chaise," cried Jack, as he grasped the pistol tightly, "and coming from London, too. Bravo! I am in luck. What a pace they are coming at! But perhaps they changed horses as they came through Watford, and these are fresh. Oh! yes, it is a post-chaise, certainly."

Jack was quite certain he was not mistaken, so he crept a little nearer to the high-road.

Glancing in the direction of the coming vehicle, his gaze was immediately attracted by the lamps, which seemed to burn with unusual lustre.

They lighted up the banks and hedgerows on each side with a strange effect.

They brought, too, partially into view the outlines of the chaise, and the horses by which it was drawn.

Then, somewhat to his surprise, Jack found that the latter were four in number, and that one of them was mounted by a postilion.

Seeing this raised Jack's spirits considerably, for he felt more certain of obtaining a booty that would repay him for his enormous risk.

It would be no easy thing to check the progress of a vehicle coming at such a rate as was this post-chaise; in fact, to bring it to a stop suddenly was simply impossible, but Jack soon made up his mind what to do.

He had tried the plan before, and knew well that it answered the purpose perfectly.

The post-chaise was now close enough for him to set about putting his design into execution.

Accordingly, Jack trotted out of the lane, and took his way gently along the road in the same direction as the post-chaise.

While doing so, he took care to keep close on the left or near side.

His pistol was consigned for the time being to his pocket.

In his left hand he held the reins.

His right hand and arm hung loosely by the side of him, in readiness for the service he designed them to perform.

He held his feet in such a manner that, when the right moment came, he could touch his steed sharply upon the flank, and cause him to set forward at full gallop.

By the time he had completed these arrangements, the post-chaise was close behind him.

In another moment the glare of the bright lamps shone upon him, and he could hear the loud breathing of the horses.

The postilion saw the rider thus suddenly come into view, and uttered a shout.

It was not one of fear, but one of warning to the horseman to get out of the way.

It was just then that Sixteen-String Jack touched his horse with the spur.

With a snort of pain the animal bounded forward, and the highwayman had no trouble in keeping abreast with the two leading horses.

His right hand he now held in readiness.

Watching his opportunity, he seized hold of the bridle of the horse nearest to him.

Then, guiding his own steed so as to curve round, he caused the other to obey the movement.

This was sufficient to alter the course of the carriage entirely, and in less than a moment it was broadside across the road.

CHAPTER CCCCLXII.

SIXTEEN-STRING JACK TAKES A GOOD BOOTY, AND FINDS HIMSELF IN A POSITION TO RENDER THE LADY IN THE POST-CHAISE AN IMPORTANT SERVICE.

HAVING thus cleverly succeeded in bringing the post-chaise to a standstill, Sixteen-String Jack produced a pistol from his coat-pocket. He held it close to the postilion's head.

"If you are a wise man," said the highwayman, "you will let the horses alone. If you attempt to set them in motion, I will blow your brains out, if I have to gallop after you a hundred miles to do it!"

The postilion guessed by Sixteen-String Jack's tone that he fully meant what was said, so he dropped his whip, and clasping his hands together, roared heartily for mercy.

Jack now rode up to the coachman, who was sitting on the box with an expression of utter bewilderment visible upon his countenance.

"You heard what I said to the postilion," he cried. "Drop the reins, and, as sure as you move, I will blow your brains out!"

The coachman dropped the reins in a moment.

It was pretty evident that he did not intend to disobey the highwayman's injunctions.

Having settled these preliminary matters, Sixteen-String Jack, with the cocked pistol still in his hand, rode up to the door of the post-chaise.

But ere he could let down the window, as he fully intended to do, it was opened by someone within.

The moment the glass descended, Jack thrust the pistol into the carriage.

"Death! death!" he said. "Death will be the portion of whoever resists! Save your lives, and hand over whatever valuables you possess!"

"Death! death!" said a masculine voice from within, mimicking Jack's tones. "Death to those who interfere with peaceable people!"

Like a flash of light, something bright and glittering was thrust out of the window of the post-chaise.

It was a rapier.

Jack had not anticipated this prompt and resolute attack; and, therefore, he was taken completely by surprise.

He had no time to move to avoid the point of the weapon, which was thrust forth with amazing swiftness.

Fortunately for him, however, the thrust was too hasty to be accurate, and instead of the cold steel piercing through his heart, as the inmate of the carriage no doubt fully intended it should, it went a little wide of the mark, passing between Jack's left arm and his body, close to the breast.

It ripped up the skin in its progress, but beyond that the highwayman sustained no injury whatever.

And now Jack exhibited a presence of mind that was, under the circumstances, really wonderful.

The instant he felt where the rapier was, he pressed his left arm tight against his side.

Then causing his horse to wheel round suddenly, he snapped the blade, leaving the traveller with the hilt and little more in his grasp.

Jack lifted his arm, and the broken blade fell to the ground.

He was at the window again immediately.

"Now, sir, he said, "you have made an attempt upon my life when I was least of all prepared for it. Why should not I do the like with you?"

There was no reply.

"You will find it difficult to answer that question. But I don't want to wrangle, neither do I desire violence. To prevent the latter you must at once hand over to me your purse, watch, rings, and jewellery."

"You are an infernal rascal," said some one, in a voice that seemed half-choked with passion. "How I missed you I am at a loss to think."

"Suffice it you have done so. Come, sir, I am impatient, and have other business to do to-night."

"Curses!"

"Your money. Quick."

"I wish I had more weapons."

"You are best without them. But, come, this will not do. I will count three, and if before I pronounce the last word you do not place your purse in my hand, I will take it from you; and I shall not be over gentle in my treatment, depend upon it."

While speaking these words Jack perceived for the first time that the post-chaise was occupied by two persons.

One of them was a man—by his attire unquestionably a gentleman, even if he did not possess some higher title.

His hair was thin and white.

His countenance was puckered all over with numberless wrinkles.

His body was shrivelled and bent, and, in a word, he presented every appearance of extreme age, though it was certain that the greatest possible pains were taken to conceal the ravages which time had wrought.

Jack was rather surprised that one so old, and apparently so feeble, should have acted in so resolute a manner.

The other occupant of the post-chaise was a female.

She was sitting on the seat opposite to the old gentleman, and in the corner near the other window.

Her countenance Jack could not see, but from the outlines of her form, he came to the conclusion that she was not yet old enough to lay claim to the title of womanhood.

Jack could not see her face because it was buried in her hands.

She was bending forward, as though in deep dejection or grief, and the highwayman fancied he could hear faint, stifled sobs.

In what relation the pair stood to each other he knew not, nor did he pause to inquire.

In spite of himself, he could not help feeling a considerable degree of interest and curiosity.

He felt sure there was some mystery in what he saw.

Sixteen-String Jack saw all this, and made these reflections while uttering the words we have recorded; and now, in a monotonous tone of voice, he said—

"One!"

The elderly traveller gnashed his teeth.

"Two!" cried Jack.

As he spoke the last word, he raised his pistol and levelled it carefully, as he added—

"When I pronounce the next word, I fire."

"No—no," cried the female in the further corner of the carriage, removing her hands from her face and clasping them together in an attitude of supplication. "Have mercy upon us! Spare our lives, and you shall have what you desire!"

The tone in which these words were spoken, Jack thought was the sweetest he had ever heard.

He was confirmed, too, in his supposition about the youth of this female.

She was a mere girl, but so beautiful in form and feature, and with such an expression of trusting innocence upon her countenance, that Jack felt that nowhere could her equal in real loveliness be found.

Almost involuntarily he raised his hat as she spoke, and, bowing low, he said—

"I regret that you should be so much alarmed. Believe me, however, I contemplate no violence—that is, if my demands are complied with."

"Give him gold," said the girl, timidly, addressing her companion.

"Silence," he cried, roughly. "What is it to do with you?"

She shrank back abashed.

Jack was so enraged with the traveller for speaking in so harsh a tone of voice to the young girl, that it was with the greatest difficulty he could keep his hands off him.

Controlling himself, he cried—

"Enough—enough! Hand me your purse, or, as surely as I now speak, if you refuse, I will take what I want from your dead body! Quick, before I say three!"

With a deep groan the traveller thrust his hand into his pocket and produced a purse.

Jack snatched it from his trembling grasp.

"Bah!" he cried, contemptuously. "This will not do. I would advise you for your own sake not to trifle with me. You will be the sufferer in the long run."

"It's all I have."

"Don't tell a lie over such a thing. People who ride in post-chaises are better provided to meet the expenses of the journey than you would make out yourself to be."

"Why risk your life for what wealth you have about you?" said the young girl, indignantly. "If you gave him the whole of the large sum which you carry with you in the carriage, you would not feel the loss. What proportion does it bear to your vast, ill-gotten wealth?"

A scream of anger came from the traveller as the girl spoke, and he sprang forwards as though he would inflict some personal violence upon her.

If this was his intention, it was effectually prevented by Jack, who seized his arm, saying—

"Come, come! I feel less disposed than ever to dally now. Hand over the money of which the lady has spoken!"

"Oh! curse you," said the traveller, addressing his companion. "But wait till I get you home, you minx! You shall suffer dearly for this, depend upon it. Only wait! only wait!"

"I hope you will accept my thanks for the valuable information you have given me," said Sixteen-String Jack, addressing the young lady, and speaking in a tone of the greatest respect. "Were it not for you, he would find himself more hardly dealt with than he is. It is for your sweet sake that I forbear."

The lady shrank back still further as Jack spoke.

But the patience of the highwayman was now completely exhausted.

The intelligence that there was a considerable sum of money in the carriage made him impatient; and, moreover, he was anxious to bring the adventure to a close lest he should be interrupted by some other travellers.

Thrusting the barrel of the pistol somewhat rudely into the traveller's mouth, to the great detriment of his false teeth, he cried—

"I will dally no more! Give me the money, or I will blow the top of your head off!"

"It is in vain to threaten him," said the young girl. "He values his wretched money more than he does his still more wretched life. He will not speak, but I cannot sit here and see him murdered for his obstinacy. You will find the money in that valise under the seat."

She pointed to a small portmanteau as she spoke, a portion of which was just visible.

To seize this took Jack but an instant; but the traveller, apparently rendered desperate by the imminent danger of losing his treasure, stooped down, and clutched the valise as well.

Sixteen-String Jack was not inclined to put up with any interference of this kind, so he wrested the valise from the old man's hands, and, swinging it round, struck him rather a sharp blow on the head with it.

A shriek came from the young girl as she witnessed this action, and, springing forward, she cried:

"Oh! you have killed him. This is wrong of you, after your promise."

"Fear nothing, fair one!" said Sixteen-String Jack. "He is not hurt, believe me. Accept my best thanks. I heartily wish it was in my power to render you some equivalent service in return."

Jack uttered these words quite seriously.

To his surprise, however, the young girl clasped her hands together, and looked imploringly into his face.

But she did not speak.

Still the action was sufficient to let the highwayman know that she desired something.

"Speak, speak!" he cried. "You can trust me. If there is anything that I can do to serve you, command me freely. I am quite in earnest in what I say, and would willingly go through fire and water to serve one so truly beautiful!"

And as he spoke, Jack placed his hand upon his breast and made another deep and courtly bow.

CHAPTER CCCCLXIII.

THE YOUNG LADY IN THE POST-CHAISE MAKES SOME EXTRAORDINARY REVELATIONS TO SIXTEEN-STRING JACK.

It would seem that Sixteen-String Jack had hit the old gentleman in the post-chaise a harder blow on the head with the valise than he had either thought for or intended.

He laid quite still upon the floor of the carriage without offering to make the slighest movement.

As for the young lady, after Jack spoke, she looked at the prostrate form and shivered as she did so.

Then raising her eyes, she fixed them upon the highwayman's countenance with such expressive earnestness that, had he been attempting to deceive her, some signs of confusion must have made themselves visible upon his features.

But as Sixteen-String Jack fully meant what he said, he underwent the scrutiny unflinchingly.

Still the young girl was irresolute, though Jack fancied that proceeded more from timidity than aught else.

"Speak!" said Jack, again, for he was anxious to reassure her, if possible. "Have no doubts whatever of my good faith. You wish to make some request; let me hear you. Speak freely."

A gush of tears came from the lady's eyes as these words fell upon her ear.

Half-sinking down upon her knees, she cried:

"Save me! oh! save me! Save me, if you have the power to do so. Save me, and I shall be eternally your debtor."

"Save you?" repeated Jack. "From what—from whom?"

"From him."

She pointed as she spoke to the still prostrate form of her travelling companion, and, as she uttered these words, an unmistakable expression of deep and utter loathing swept over her lovely face.

"Tell me how I can save you from him," said Jack. "What is it you require?"

"Oh! I shall be compelled to enter into some explanations, and yet I would fain be spared so unpleasant a task."

"I do not wish to pry into your affairs, far from it," said Sixteen-String Jack. "All I want to know is in what way you require to be saved from him. What power has he over you?"

"He has bought me!"

"Bought you?" repeated Jack, in tones of the utmost astonishment. "You must surely be dreaming. We are in England. How could he have bought you?"

The young girl dashed the tears from her eyes as she said:

"I know we are in England; but he has bought me nevertheless."

"How—how?" asked Jack, whose curiosity was raised to a still greater extent than ever it had been before. "Explain yourself, lady, for I confess I am totally at a loss to understand you."

"You will comprehend all, I think, when I tell you that he who lies so still at my feet is my husband."

"Your husband?"

"Yes, he has been so for twelve hours. Look at him, and look at me. He is white-haired and old; he trembles on the very brink of the grave, into which it would be a charity for him to fall. I stand merely on the threshold of life. I have not crossed it yet. What is there prepossessing in that old man, think you, to tempt a young girl like myself to be his bride?"

And again there came over her features the same expression of intense loathing and abhorrence.

Jack was so surprised at her words, that though she paused after asking him this question, he could not recover himself sufficiently to make her a reply.

Perceiving this, she went on.

As she did so her manner became even more excited than before.

Her cheeks grew red, and her eyes sparkled in the dim light that filled the interior of the carriage like two stars.

"It was no natural impulse that brought us together. As I told you before, he bought me, and by making me his wife has completely wrecked my happiness."

"Be calm," said Jack; "be calm, I pray you. This excitement in one like yourself seems in the highest degree unnatural. It is a strange thing to interfere between husband and wife; but, if the service you require of me is to rid you of him, I——"

"Nay, nay; do not misunderstand me. Listen a moment, and I will make all clear. I will tell you how it was that I consented to become his wife."

Jack bowed.

Pointing to the form which lay at her feet, she continued:

"He is a money-lender, a usurer, and, as a matter of course, immensely rich; but he knows not how to enjoy his ill-gotten wealth. He is a miserable, pitiful miser. There is only one human attribute which he possesses, and that belongs more to beasts than man. It is sensuality; and, to satisfy his unholy desires, will part with his money freely. You marvel at my words, but it is necessary for my justification that I should speak freely. Knowing all this respecting him—knowing it full well—what, think you, was it that induced me to stand before God's altar and become his wife?"

This question was asked with even still greater vehemence than before, and Jack's bewilderment at what he heard very rapidly increased.

The lady did not seem to require any answer to this question.

It was because she panted for breath that she paused.

Quickly recovering herself, she went on with her strange narrative.

"You look at me," she continued, "as though you thought me mad, but I am not; though if this goes on, I care not how soon I may be, if in my madness I could forget both past and present, and become perfectly indifferent as to the future. If that is madness, there is nothing I so much yearn for."

Jack shuddered when he heard one so young and so beautiful pronounce such a dreadful wish, and he wondered what she could have endured to bring her mind into such a state as to wish for that which is universally deemed a calamity.

Perceiving, however, that her excitement increased rather than abated, he strove to soothe and quiet her.

"Once more," he said, "let me entreat you to be calm. This violent excitement cannot fail to be harmful in the extreme. Although you have raised my curiosity to the highest pitch, I would rather that you ceased at once than you should so terribly excite yourself."

"You are right. This violence is as foolish as it is useless. As temperately as I can, I will tell you that which you should know, and then I will appeal to you for your opinion. When you understand everything, I will call upon you again to save me, and see whether you will do so."

"Nothing would give me greater joy than to serve you all I could," replied Sixteen-String Jack. "But excuse me if I remind you that time is fleeting, and that I run great danger in lingering here. Therefore, I should be glad if you would speak quickly."

"I will—I will, for I am truly desperate. You are the only friend I can see a chance of making, and I cling to you even as a drowning man would cling to a straw to save him from sinking. Now listen."

"I am listening to every word."

In a tone of voice, the even calmness of which contrasted strangely with her previous vehement excitement, she went on—

"I have told you he is a money-lender. In an evil hour my father applied to him for assistance, and from that moment was hopelessly in his power. Deeper and deeper he got in debt to him, until all hope of being able to repay so gigantic a sum was at an end. My father had this horrible consciousness upon him, and trembled when his debtor approached. He, too, knew it and pressed for payment. Then, when he had driven him to the utmost, he told him there was one means by which the debt between them could be cancelled."

Jack nodded.

Matters were becoming clearer now.

"That means, I need scarcely tell you, was the sacrifice of myself. He desired me for a bride. Bitter were the tears my father shed when this proposition was made to him. But it was in vain; he was in that wretch's grasp, and he exerted his power to the utmost. I need not enter into the sickening details of my story. I have no heart to do so. Let it suffice to say that in the end I consented to make the sacrifice."

With a groan, the young girl clasped her hands tightly over her face.

"Then you were bought," said Jack, indignantly; "and the rascal deserves hanging for forcing you in to such an odious marriage!"

"But, oh!" cried the young girl, in tones of heart-rending pathos, "if I could only tell you what I have suffered since this morning! Too late I found that I had done wrong. I ought not to have succumbed to such a fate. I ought not to have destroyed my own happiness. But, oh! the agony of my soul when I pronounced the words too late. Yes, yes, it was too late!"

A flood of tears at this moment came to her relief.

After this Jack had no difficulty in understanding the nature of the service the young girl required of him.

The reader may be sure that Jack's sympathies were all on the side of the young girl.

The story was somewhat imperfect, but he was able to supply the missing links easily enough.

That he pitied her heartily, and that he would do all he could to ameliorate her position was quite certain.

He waited until the violence of her flood of tears was over, and then he said—

"Tell me, tell me in what manner I can aid you?"

"Alas! I know not. I am his wife!"

"In name only."

"But still his wife."

"True."

"And if I returned to my father's house he would have power to take me away from there?"

"Most certainly he would."

"Alas! alas!"

"But, tell me," said Jack, "is there not a further cause for your grief than you have named?"

"What mean you?"

"Is there not someone who at this very moment is shedding bitter tears at your fate, and whose happiness is wrecked as completely as your own?"

"There is—there is; that is, I believe—I mean, I hope there is."

"Just so. And that is who, had you been left to your own choice in the matter, you would have selected as your husband?"

The young girl was silent.

"I am right," said Jack. "Now, who this is, I know not. I only hope he is worthy of one so peerless as you are."

"But why these questions?" she asked hesitatingly.

"Simply for this. If you will take my advice—I may be wrong, you know—but if you will take my advice, you will make all speed to where your lover is to be found—and doubtless you know that well enough—and when you have found him, the best thing you can do is to leave the country instantly, and go somewhere where you will never be found, and where your husband, if he deserves the name, will have no power over you."

Once again the young girl clasped her hands over her face, but this time it was in deep thought.

"Do you like my advice?" asked Jack, after a pause; "because, if you do, I will put you on the way of joining your lover, and when I have done that, I must leave you to yourselves."

"Oh! yes—yes! I consent. And yet my heart revolts at such a course. Still, it is not too late to recover the false step I have taken; anything would be better than a life of misery with that man."

"I quite agree with you, and don't think you will be much to blame if you follow my advice. You were entrapped into this unnatural marriage, or rather you were forced into it by circumstances which had no right to urge you, and therefore I consider you quite justified in acting in your own defence."

"My own defence?"

"Yes. Do not allow yourself to become the victim of circumstances. Stand boldly up before them, and you will achieve a victory. You would commit a sin were you to allow yourself to be driven further by that which ought to have no power over you."

"I will go—I will go!" said the young girl, making up her mind suddenly. "I feel that you are right, and I will go. But tell me how I am to reach a—a——"

"Your lover. I will put you in the way of that."

"And my husband?"

"No longer call the polluted wretch by such a name."

"He will pursue us."

"No doubt; but if you will leave that to me, I will take care he does not overtake you."

CHAPTER CCCCLXIV.

THE YOUNG LADY IN THE POST-CHAISE AGREES TO FOLLOW SIXTEEN-STRING JACK'S ADVICE.

THESE last words were uttered in a very significant tone, and the young girl, with an air of perfect fright, said—

"Surely, you—you would not——"

"I won't hurt him," replied Jack; "but still, at the same time, I will put it out of his power to overtake you, that is, of course, if you feel inclined to follow my advice."

A struggle now evidently took place in the young girl's mind as to what she should do.

Naturally enough, she shrank from leaving her husband and flying to her lover.

It was in the highest degree repugnant to her.

But it was clear she had but two alternatives.

Either she must follow the highwayman's advice.

Or else she must make up her mind to live with her husband a life of misery and wretchedness, in comparison with which death would have been delightful.

What wonder is it, then, that looking at things in this light, and with Jack's arguments ringing in her ears, that she should, after a slight hesitation, decide in favour of the former?

"I will go," she said; "I will leave him, for I feel I could do anything rather than remain with him."

"Then you will excuse me for saying," said Sixteen-String Jack, "that I think you have come to a very wise determination, and I will help you so far as ever it lies in my power."

"Thanks, thanks. But why should you take this interest in my happiness?"

"Simply because I cannot help doing so," replied Jack, bluntly. "You must not forget that you did me a service in letting me know the nature of the contents of this valise, and I am anxious to return the favour as well as I am able."

"What will you do?"

"I will tell you what you shall do."

"What? Oh! what?"

"Take heed and attend to my instructions, for if you omit to carry them into effect your husband may overtake you, and no law can separate you from him."

[TOM KING'S ENCOUNTER WITH THE TWO FOOTPADS.]

The girl shuddered again.

"In the first place, you will make your way to where your lover is to be found. You know where he is?'

"Yes; in London."

"Very well. You will go there as fast as this post-chaise will carry you."

"But——"

"Never mind your objections just at present. Leave it all to me, and I will make every necessary arrangement."

"I will."

"As soon as you arrive, you will explain to him as briefly as possible what has taken place, and, if he loves you with the same amount of fervour as I am sure you love him, he will jump into the post-chaise along with you, and you will make all speed to the nearest seaport town, and get on board a vessel bound for some foreign country. After that I leave you to yourselves."

"But my father?"

"Eh?"

"My father?"

"You must leave him."

The young girl wept.

"Without a farewell?" she murmured.

"Yes; forget him. Although he is your father, he is not worthy to be remembered by you. He sold you like a slave."

The girl sobbed bitterly.

"And," continued Jack, solemnly, "you must not think, simply because he is your father, that he is entitled to any extra degree of consideration in that respect. You are not bound to love and respect him for that alone, and when he ceases to act uprightly, he loses his claim upon your love."

"But," said the young girl, between sobs and tears, "my father owes that man money. What will become of him when I am gone?"

"Why, it will be out of his power to make another such iniquitous bargain. Besides, you were married, and that will cancel the obligation. If he loses you after your marriage, that is his look out, and not your own."

"Heaven help me," said the young girl. "I know not what to do. I feel half-maddened with grief and despair."

"Act as I have advised you," said Jack; "and then, when you have leisure for reflection, you will rejoice that you followed my directions."

"Then I will be guided by you, for you can have no end of your own to gain by proposing such a course."

"None whatever, believe me."

"Then I consent."

"That is sufficient. Remain where you are a moment while I make the requisite arrangements."

Jack dismounted, and led his steed to the side of the road, where some short, sweet grass was growing, and which he fell to eating with great apparent relish.

Convinced that he would not stray far from that spot, Jack troubled no further about him.

Breaking open the valise, he found it contained a large sum in gold, neatly tied up into little cylindrical parcels.

Taking two of these, Jack closed the valise and strapped it on to the saddle.

Then going to the coachman, he said—

"Look here, coachy; you have acted like a sensible man in this affair. Do you see this? Take it."

Jack held out one of the little packets.

"They are guineas," he said; "twenty, at least. Put them in your pocket—they are yours."

Rather amazed at this unexpected piece of good fortune, the coachman stared at the highwayman.

But he consigned the guineas to his pocket for all that.

"Of course you understand I shall want you to do something for the money I have just given you."

The coachman nodded.

"I want you to turn back and drive to London with all speed. The young lady will give you further directions when you arrive there. Do you consent?"

"In course I do; leastways, that's if Jem is agreeable."

"Who's Jem?—the postilion?"

"Yes."

"I thought so. I will soon make it all right with him."

Sixteen-String Jack now made his way up to the postilion, to whom he gave the second packet of guineas.

He had no trouble in getting him to consent.

All this being arranged, Jack prepared to turn back to the chaise, when he was startled by a rapid succession of piercing screams.

Beyond all doubt they came from the interior of the vehicle.

"The old gentleman's up to some of his devilment," he muttered, as he hastened towards the door.

To open it was the work of a moment only, and then his eyes fell upon a scene which fairly took him by surprise.

The old gentleman who Jack thought was lying insensible at the bottom of the post-chaise, was now on his legs again, and really looking very little the worse for the hard tap on the head he had received.

So completely was his attention occupied by what he was about that he did not notice the opening of the door.

"So, so, you jade! you Jezebel!" he screamed. "That is the way you behave, is it? Very fine to rob me! But you shall smart for it! Don't think you are going to have things all your own way! Take that, and that! Curse you! Take that!"

While speaking these words, the old wretch had thrust his fingers into the young girl's beautiful hair, and, with the other hand, he struck her some heavy blows in the face.

But not for long was he permitted to exercise his brutality.

With a cry of anger, Jack scrambled into the vehicle, and seized him behind by the collar with a grasp that would have required ten times the strength the old man possessed to shake off.

"You abominable old rascal!" cried Sixteen-String Jack, in tones of the greatest rage. "Take that, and that, you wretch, and tell me how you like it!"

The old man uttered a howl of rage and pain, and released his hold of the young girl's hair.

"Under any other circumstances I should have scorned to touch you," said Sixteen-String Jack. "But I could not keep my hands off you, when I saw you ill-treating this lady in such a brutal manner. Have you not done her enough injury already?"

A regular coward was this old man.

He made no attempt to strike Jack, or even to struggle with him, but cowered down tremblingly, while he prayed that his life might be spared.

"I'll teach you a lesson," said Jack, "and one that you won't forget in a hurry, I'll be bound."

"Mercy! mercy!"

"Lots of that."

The old man groaned.

"Come along," cried Jack, "you shan't encumber this post-chaise any longer."

As he spoke, the highwayman began to drag him out violently.

He uttered dismal howls and shrieks, and strove to save himself by clutching at the cushions.

But it was all in vain.

The bare idea of setting his strength in opposition to Jack's was ridiculous.

In another moment he was in the road.

The young girl—we do not like to call her his wife—came to the door of the post chaise.

She seemed sick and faint, and her face exhibited palpable signs of the brutal ill-treatment she had received.

Nevertheless she pleaded for him.

"Do not injure him," she cried. "Do not injure him! I forgive him freely. Keep him secure while I depart, and nothing more.

"Do you hear that, you hoary-headed old villain?" said Jack, as he shook him violently to and fro. "Do you hear that? If anything would make you ashamed of yourself, that ought to do so. Do you hear, you old miscreant?"

"Mercy! mercy!"

"Oh! you may depend upon having plenty of that. And now, lady, commence your journey; and, as you value your future happiness, do not lose a moment. The coachman will drive you back to London, and, when once you are there, you must give him further instructions."

"Thanks—thanks," said the young girl, weeping freely. "You have been a friend in need to me. You appeared when I least expected one. Keep this in remembrance of me."

The young girl took from her finger a ring, which she handed to the highwayman, who accepted it with a bow.

"Farewell," he said. "I hope your future will be as happy as the present is wretched."

"Farewell," she cried. "I shall never forget you."

"Drive on, coachman," cried Jack. "To London with you as fast as your horses will take you."

The coachman flourished his whip, and in less than another moment the post-chaise disappeared round a curve in the road.

Jack looked after it until he could see it no longer, and then he turned to the old man, who, he had agreed, should not overtake the young girl.

He had watched the disappearance of the chaise in silence, but, as soon as he perceived the highwayman turn round wrathfully towards him, he sank down upon his knees, and sued for mercy in the most abject manner.

Sixteen-String Jack took no notice whatever of his appeal, except that he tightened his grasp somewhat.

He looked all around him at the different objects by which he was surrounded with a meditative air.

Suddenly, however, he heard the dull trampling of horses' feet in the distance, and, after listening a moment, he said—

"The dragoons, I fancy. I must be careful, or I shall get into trouble yet."

CHAPTER CCCCLXV.

SIXTEEN-STRING JACK DISPOSES OF THE OLD GENTLEMAN IN A VERY CLEVER AND INGENIOUS MANNER INDEED.

EVIDENTLY the old man heard the sounds which indicated the approach of several horsemen, for he assumed a listening attitude, and at the same time threw off a great deal of his abjectness.

He had everything to hope from any persons who came by, and he trusted that he should be rescued from an unpleasant position, for he had made up his mind that he was about to be subjected to a great deal of ill-usage.

Sixteen-String Jack, however, was not likely to allow those who were coming to interfere with his proceedings, and he at once made up his mind as to the course he should pursue.

It was quite conjectural on his part when he said that those who were coming were dragoons.

This was, however, most likely correct, and therefore it behoved him to get out of the way.

The greatest necessity existed for him to be speedy in all his movements, for it was evident, from the sound of the horses' hoofs, that the riders were not far off and were coming at a sharp trot, so that they would soon reach the spot upon which he stood.

Upon the spur of the moment, Sixteen-String Jack could think of no better plan than that of getting behind the hedge, and by threats compelling the old man to be silent until the dragoons had passed.

The difficulty was how to do this.

The hedgerows on both sides of the road were high and very thickly planted, so that there was no hope whatever of being able to force a way through them.

His only hope was that there was a gate not far off.

In this hope he compelled the old man to follow him along the road while he also led his horse by the bridle.

To his great joy he perceived a large white gate a little further on.

Upon reaching it he felt about for the fastenings, and found them of the simplest character, consisting merely of a hasp and staple through which an iron pin, attached by a chain to the gate post, was passed.

Jack opened this gate in a moment, and, passing through, closed it after him and replaced the fastenings.

Then, holding the old man by the back of his collar with one hand, and the bridle of his horse with the other, the highwayman led the way along the meadow, keeping as close as possible under the hedge.

After going a little way, he came to a halt.

The dragoons were now not many yards off.

Securing his horse to a stout twig, Jack took from his pocket a loaded pistol.

He cocked it instantaneously.

Then, thrusting the muzzle somewhat roughly into the old man's ear, he said—

"Now, I am a man that when I say a thing I fully mean it, so just listen to me. You may think of calling out to those who are approaching and so attracting them to our hiding-place, but you had better forego any such intention, for, as sure as you make the attempt, I will blow your brains out."

The old man gnashed his teeth.

"It is a disappointment to you, I daresay, but you must not think that you have a fool to deal with. I have a great mind to blow your brains out now without further provocation, and if you raise your voice to a whisper or make any sound likely to attract notice, that moment I shall pull the trigger, so beware."

Jack said no more, for the dragoons were now so close that they might have heard his voice.

Sixteen-String Jack had but little doubt that if he kept perfectly still, the dragoons would pass by unsuspectingly.

The hedge did not grow so thickly as to prevent him from seeing into the road, and so he turned his face in that direction.

The old man trembled and shook.

But he was perfectly silent.

Something in the tone of the highwayman's voice, and in his manner, told him he was in earnest, and that he would neither scruple nor hesitate to carry his threat into effect.

A glance through the hedge now showed Sixteen-String Jack that the horsemen were really dragoons.

They were chatting carelessly to each other, though he could not tell what they said.

To his joy they all passed by, and in a little while were out of hearing.

"That danger is over," said Sixteen-String Jack, "and now, sir, rise and follow me. I must dispose of you somehow or other, and prevent your making a pursuit after the post-chaise."

"Let me go, let me go," said the old man; "I won't trouble her any further. I did not call out, you know."

"And a good job for yourself that you did not, let me tell you. However, make no more bother. Rise, I say, and follow me."

With many groans the old man rose to his feet.

Jack untied his horses and led him by the bridle, and the old man by the collar as before.

He was rather at a loss how to dispose of him so as to make it out of his power to commence a pursuit with any chance of success.

In the hope, however, that ere long he should be able to find out something that would answer his purpose, he directed his steps across the meadow, preserving a direction that would take him back to the deserted mansion.

In this manner the meadow was crossed, and another, and another beyond it.

Jack was beginning to get tired of this sort of fun, but still he could not see any place where he could dispose of the old man.

Suddenly, however, he perceived in the distance a windmill.

He changed his course, and made straight for it at once.

Here he fancied he would be able to imprison his companion for a length of time sufficient to answer his purpose.

Upon a nearer approach, however, Jack saw what he had at first failed to notice, namely, that the building seemed to be in the last stage of decay.

This did not matter much; perhaps it was even better.

Ere long the mill was reached.

Jack's first care was to secure his horse, and when that was done he looked about him for some means of gaining admission to the interior of the mill.

A slight examination showed him a flight of crazy-looking steps which led up to a door.

So insecure, however, did they appear that he hesitated to risk his neck by attempting to ascend them, but as he could not perceive any other means of entrance he was forced to try it.

His companion, too, seemed to have the greatest possible amount of objection to ascend the ruinous steps, but he was compelled to yield to the wishes of his captor.

The steps creaked ominously beneath their tread, but did not give way.

Jack dealt the door at the top a kick, to which it at once yielded.

It flew open, disclosing an intensely dark space beyond.

There was a level floor beyond the threshold, and on to this Jack stepped, though not without due caution.

By pushing the door open to its extreme width, he was able to obtain sufficient light to see about him.

He was in a chamber the full size of the mill, in the centre of which he could just perceive the dark outline of the machinery.

It was Jack's intention to convert the windmill, for the time being, into a prison, though he could not at present see how he should be able to secure his prisoner in such a way as to render it impossible for him to make his escape.

A slight search, however, showed him some sacks, and the brilliant idea of putting the old man into one of them at once occurred to him.

It would be necessary, of course, to bind his hands, but this there would be little difficulty about, for Jack had some cord in his pocket that would answer the purpose admirably.

No sooner did this thought occur to Jack than he proceeded to put it in execution.

So dexterously did he perform the feat of binding the old man's arms behind his back, that it was done before he was aware of it.

He beheld this proceeding with dismay, and wondered what would be done next.

He was not long left in doubt.

Jack picked up one of the sacks and slipped it over his head in a moment.

The old man struggled desperately, but all to no purpose.

Jack tripped him up, and he fell rather heavily to the floor.

The next thing that the highwayman did was to pull the sack over his feet and carefully secure the mouth of it with some cord.

A dismal howl came from within.

Taking no notice of it, however, Jack dragged the sack along the floor as though it contained so much grain, and finally deposited it in the most distant corner he could find.

"There," he said, "you won't trouble any one for some time to come, I rather think. When the miller comes he will be too frightened to let you out, and I should not be at all surprised if the mill was to be set down as haunted from this day. Good-bye to you. I'm off."

The old man addressed something to the highwayman in a supplicating tone of voice.

But he took no notice of it.

Cautiously making his way to the door, which he closed behind him, Jack descended the crazy steps, and in another moment was by the side of his horse.

He stood as though about to mount, and fell into a train of thought.

"What shall I do now?" he said to himself. "I have had a strange adventure, but I think a profitable one. So far as I can judge this valise contains a large sum of money. I think, therefore, that under the circumstances, the best thing I can do is to let well alone, and make my way back to the deserted mansion with all speed. I will go straight across the country. That will be safest. And I shall have no time to spare," he added, as he looked up to the sky. "I shall have to make good speed to reach my destination before dawn."

This was true.

Sixteen-String Jack had a long way to go, and the night was much further advanced than he had thought for.

The adventure with the post-chaise had occupied a great deal of time.

Having made up his mind as to what he should do, Jack sprang lightly to the saddle, and took his way at a hard gallop over the meadows.

By adopting this course he was well aware he was much less liable to meet with any interruption.

Nor was he likely to encounter the dragoons, whose duty consisted simply in patrolling the high roads.

He had a long ride before him, but he performed it without meeting with any accident, and without the occurrence of any incident that deserves record.

On his way, his thoughts were pretty well employed in thinking over the details of his strange adventure.

He rejoiced at the part he had taken in the affair, for he could not think of the beautiful young girl becoming an inmate of the old man's house without a feeling of abhorrence.

Most fervently did he wish that she would find her lover, and that they would both succeed in leaving England before the old man had time to prevent them from doing so.

That they would be happy he had little or no doubt.

The adventure was a pleasing one, not only on account of the service he had been able to render the lady, but also because he had obtained a larger booty than he had for a moment hoped for.

Occupied with these reflections, he passed through the gates leading to the deserted mansion in safety, and having attended to his horse, ascended the stairs, and found Maud and Claude Duval awaiting him.

Tom King had not returned.

CHAPTER CCCCLXVI.

TOM KING SETS OUT ON HIS EXPEDITION, AND HAS A RARE ADVENTURE WITH THE TWO TRAVELLERS, BUT IS FORCED TO FLY FOR HIS LIFE.

HAVING brought the adventures of Sixteen-String Jack up to this point, it is now necessary that we should, for a time, follow the fortunes of Tom King, and relate what occurred to him on that eventful night.

After parting with his comrade, Tom trotted up to the top of the lane.

Here he paused, reflectively.

"What shall be the scene of my doings to-night?" he muttered. "I ought to have asked Jack which way he intended to take. It won't do for us both to be on the same road. Which way shall I go?"

Tom King could not make up his mind for several minutes, but at last he said—

"At all risks, I will try the Oxford-road. We have not visited it lately, and I am almost sure to find a better booty there than anywhere else. It shall be the Oxford-road."

Having made up his mind to this point, Tom King set spurs to his horse, and went off in the direction of his destination.

He avoided the high roads, because of the danger there was of falling in with some of the troops of dragoons.

But although this was a safe course, it was not a profitable one, for in the narrow lanes along which he took his way, there was but little likelihood of meeting with a traveller.

Without any accident, Tom King at length gained the Oxford-road.

He emerged into it some little distance above the toll-gate at Tyburn, now long since swept away.

At this hour of the night the gate was closed.

Tom rode up to it boldly enough, and knocked smartly against the door of the wooden toll-house with his whip.

An irascible-looking man opened the door in response to the summons.

"Tuppence! tuppence!" he cried.

"All right," cried Tom. "Open the gate, and when you see me again just recollect me. Here's a guinea for you."

As Tom spoke, he placed in the man's hand the coin he had mentioned.

The toll-taker touched his hat and opened the gate.

"I'll recollect you, sir. The guinea won't be thrown away. Perhaps, some time or other it might answer my purpose to fumble with the lock, or drop the key, or something of that sort, if anyone was in a particular hurry to come through."

"You would find such a thing answer your purpose very well," replied Tom King. "It would pay you better than taking your share of the reward among the officers."

"Oh! cuss them officers, say I. They are more trouble to me than a little. They calls me up at all manner of hours, and passes through without so much as tipping a fellow a blesssed mag."

"It's just like them," said Tom King. "They are a shabby set of rascals, every one of them."

"They are—they are."

"Do you think you should know me again?"

"Well, rather, I should think."

"Then, if I want to come through in a hurry some night, it will pay you better to let me do so than to try and stop me."

"Lor' bless you, sir, I knows that."

"Good night, then. There is another guinea for you, and don't forget I am out on the Oxford-road to-night, and may have to return this way."

"Good night, sir, and many thanks to you," said the toll-keeper, respectfully.

In another moment Tom King had passed through the gate, and was trotting swiftly along the road.

The highwayman was well enough pleased to find that the toll-taker was inclined to behave in so friendly a manner towards him, and considered the two guineas he had given him as money well invested.

Tom King was well aware how advantageous it was to have a toll-keeper for a friend; for to be able to pass through the gate quickly and unmolested would probably be equivalent to escaping death or capture.

Moreover, as the man had himself hinted, it would be in his power to delay the officers for a minute or two should he be hard pressed, and a minute's delay at such a crisis is a very important thing indeed.

Keeping a keen look out on both sides of him, and well enough satisfied with what he had done so far, Tom King kept steadily along the broad, level Oxford-road.

Ere long the heavy grating of wheels made itself heard, and the next moment the highwayman perceived in the distance the flashing of two star-like lights.

"What is this, I wonder?" he said. "It promises to be an adventure. I will draw on one side and see."

With these words Tom King backed his horse under the hedge on one side of the road and waited.

Louder and louder grew the crushing, grinding sound which the wheels produced, and which is so plainly audible in quiet country places.

What kind of vehicle it was that was approaching London at this rapid rate, Tom King knew not until he heard a long winding blast upon a horn.

"The Oxford coach, beyond all doubt," he muttered. "That blast upon the horn is no doubt a signal to the toll-keeper at Tyburn. I will let it pass. A coach on a well-patrolled road is too dangerous a thing to be meddled with single-handed. It goes against the grain to let it pass, but on this occasion I am inclined to think discretion the better part of valour. I will ride on and let it pass."

Under the circumstances, we think this was a very wise and prudent resolution for Tom King to come to

As he spoke he left his place of concealment, and rode quietly along the road.

It was not long before he met the rapidly-advancing stage-coach, which was, as he had expected, the Oxford mail.

It seemed to be full both inside and out, and rolled by with great velocity.

In an instant it was far behind.

Tom King did not like to allow anything to pass him, but on the present occasion the risk was too great.

"Never mind," he muttered, by way of consoling himself. "I shall not go far along this road without meeting with something worth taking, I know."

He trotted on very leisurely.

Contrary to his expectations, he went some distance further without meeting with anyone, and he was beginning to grow very impatient, when all at once the clatter of horses' hoofs reached his ears.

"Now for an adventure," he said, as he settled himself more firmly in the saddle, and drew a pistol from the holsters.

Tom trotted on in the same unconcerned manner as heretofore, keeping as well as he could in the centre of the road.

In a few moments he perceived something dusky in advance, which almost immediately afterwards resolved itself into the forms of two horsemen.

"The devil!" said Tom. "I am not in luck's way to-night, that is certain. Why don't they separate? However, I don't intend to let them pass me untried, although it is not the easiest thing in the world to stop two mounted men at once."

This was obviously true, but Tom King resolved to make the attempt in spite of the difficulty.

The advancing travellers, perceiving the manner in which he monopolized the centre of the road, drew on one side in order to allow him to pass.

But, to their unbounded astonishment, instead of doing this, Tom King wheeled his horse before them and paused suddenly.

Both were compelled to draw rein in order to avoid a collision, and under the impulse of the moment, they did so.

Tom King dropped the reins, and, producing a couple of pistols, held one at each of their heads, crying aloud as he did so—

"Stand! or you are dead men. Stand and deliver! Your money or your life!"

So suddenly was all this done, that the travellers had no time to recover from the surprise into which they had been thrown.

But the last words the highwayman uttered seemed to have the effect of restoring them to their senses, for one said—

"This is cool, d—n me if it isn't."

"No foolery," said Tom King. "If you like to hand me your purses, well and good; if you do not, you must take the consequences."

"And so must you," said the other traveller, who produced a pistol with great swiftness, and levelling it at the person of the highwayman, pulled the trigger.

But the ill-made fire-arm only flashed in the pan, as the old flint-and-steel pistols often did.

Had it not been for this chance circumstance, Tom could not have escaped a serious, if not fatal, wound.

Luckily he was unhurt.

Preserving his coolness, he said—

"I forgive your attack upon me on condition that you drop the pistol at once."

The traveller obeyed.

But his fellow-companion, perceiving how Tom's attention was distracted from him, also drew a pistol, and was in the act of taking aim with it, when Tom saw what he was about.

As quick as thought he struck the traveller's arm upwards.

He was just in time.

The pistol exploded with a loud report, but the bullet with which it was charged wounded nothing but the air.

"Go on, gentlemen," said Tom King, with a coolness which had something unnatural about it. "When you have done making a noise with those playthings we will proceed to business."

"You are a bold rascal," said the one whose pistol had flashed in the pan. "Here, take my purse; you deserve it."

He handed Tom a purse as he spoke.

Tom took it, and consigned it to his pocket with an air of great satisfaction.

"And here is mine," said the other traveller; "and after that I hope you will allow us to pass on in safety."

"In a moment," said Tom King, as he pocketed the second purse; "but the fact is I have a perfect mania for jewellery—a perfect mania, I assure you. I perceive you both carry watches. I must really trouble you to hand them to me."

"Well, d—n your impudence!" they both cried. "What next?"

"One thing at a time is my motto," said Tom. "Be quick, or"——

The highwayman paused suddenly.

The two travellers uttered cries of satisfaction.

Then there came a loud shout, and the rush of many horses.

Tom looked before him, and could just distinguish, though dimly, the outlines of a body of horsemen.

"The dragoons!" he cried.

At the same moment he turned his horse's head towards London, and, clapping spurs to his horse's sides, set off at a gallop that seemed to bid defiance to all pursuit.

The travellers drew on one side quickly, as they shouted—

"A highwayman! a highwayman! After him! Quick! quick! A highwayman!"

The troop of dragoons, for such they were, needed no cries on the part of the travellers to urge them to greater exertions.

Already they were flying along at the very top of their speed, their accoutrements making a jingling accompaniment.

Before them they could plainly see the outline of Tom's form, and they called aloud upon him to stop.

Of such a demand as this the reader may be sure Tom took no notice.

Away he went, intent only upon one thing.

That was to urge his horse forward at its utmost speed.

"On! on!" cried the chief officer of the troop of dragoons. "On! on! Do not flag! Spare neither whip nor spur! Tyburn toll-gate is only a little way further on, and there we shall have him, you may depend. Forward! forward!"

Encouraged by these words, the dragoons goaded their horses in a still more dreadful manner than before, in the hope of coming up with the object of their pursuit when he reached the toll-gate.

But they could not conceal from themselves the unpleasant fact that in spite of all their efforts the highwayman was rapidly increasing the distance between them, until he got out of sight, and out of hearing, too.

Under the belief, however, that they should come up with him at the toll-gate, they increased rather than relaxed their exertions.

CHAPTER CCCCLXVII.

TOM KING HAS GOOD REASON TO REJOICE AT HAVING CONCILIATED THE TOLL-KEEPER, AND FINDS HIM A FRIEND IN NEED.

UNDOUBTEDLY the best thing Tom King could do, was to turn and fly in the manner we have described.

The road was smooth and level, so he was not afraid to urge his horse to put forth his utmost speed.

There was only one thing that Tom King wished, and that was that he was flying towards the country, and not towards London as he was.

Had it been the former, he would have stood a much better chance of getting off.

The hedges on both sides of him were of such a height as to make leaping them quite out of the question.

The only thing that gave the flying highwayman any consolation, was that he was rapidly out-distancing his pursuers—so rapidly as to make it a matter of no doubt that he would escape them altogether.

But there was this danger to be considered.

The troop at his heels was only one of several that would be posted along the Oxford-road, and, if he kept on to a certain distance, he would run full tilt into another troop.

Should he do this, his position would be perilous and awkward in the extreme.

Death or capture was the certain result.

How was he to escape this hideous danger?

He could not go to the right or to the left.

If he kept on, he would encounter another troop.

If he held back, he would be overtaken by those in the rear.

Truly was Tom King in a serious dilemma, and he glanced anxiously from side to side, unable to tell what to do.

Suddenly he came in sight of the white toll-gate stretching across the road.

He congratulated himself upon having made friends with the toll-man in the way he had, for he made sure of being able to pass through quickly, while his pursuers would be detained as long as possible.

But, in reality, this was not much.

Tom King, in fact, began to despair.

In another moment he reached the toll-gate.

Scarcely had he reined in his horse, than the toll-keeper came forth.

"You are soon back again, captain," he said, as he thrust his key into the padlock with which the gate was secured.

"Yes—yes. Be quick; I am hard pressed. There's a troop of dragoons in full cry after me."

"The devil there is, captain. But just listen to me a moment."

"I cannot. Every moment is of inestimable value."

"I know that. But let me tell you that if you keep on along the road towards London you will overtake another troop of dragoons in less than five minutes."

While speaking these words, the toll-keeper had opened the gate and Tom had passed through.

The highwayman was about to clap spurs to his steed and gallop on, when the words uttered by the toll-man came upon his ears.

He paused at once.

"I must fight it out," he said, "and I may as well do it here as anywhere else. Hark! they come."

The dull sound made by the hoofs of the dragoons' horses striking the ground came with painful plainness upon their ears.

"Hi! captain—captain!" said the toll-keeper, as he locked the gate again, so that there was one obstacle between Tom and his foes. "I s look here; don't go for to talk of fighting it out with a lot of sojers. Why, they would shoot you as dead as a nut."

"I can't help it," replied Tom King, re-priming his pistols. "Flight is fruitless, and I will not yield without a struggle."

"Listen to me, captain, and I'll toll you what to do."

"What? what?"

"Why, I will show you how the toll will bilk the dragoons, for the dragoons have bilked the toll many a time."

The toll-taker seemed to think this an excellent joke, and laughed at it heartily.

"Now, captain," he cried, "are you a mind to trust me? If you are, say the word, and I'll guarantee to get you out of this fix. Be quick! or else it will be too late."

"I will trust you," said Tom; "and if you really do show me a way to escape, you shall have something more substantial than my thanks for a reward."

"All right, then. There's no time to explain, but you leave all to me with confidence. Jump off your horse. Be quick! the dragoons will be upon us in another moment, and if you are seen the scheme won't answer."

Tom hesitated to dismount, but something in the toll-keeper's manner made him think he was sincere, so he hastily slipped out of the saddle.

What the toll-keeper intended to do, or how he was to achieve his escape, he had not the remotest idea.

"Take your horse by the bridle, and follow me," said the toll-man, speaking with extreme rapidity. "Make haste, or you will be too late, after all."

Tom did not want urging.

The dragoons he could see were not many yards distant.

The toll-taker led the way to the door of his little wooden house in the centre of the road.

Tom followed him closely, leading his horse by the bridle, as he had been requested.

"Come in, captain, come in," cried the toll-keeper. "The place is just big enough. Come in."

Tom obeyed, and led his horse into a small room, which was barely large enough to hold them all three.

The toll-keeper shut the door.

"What do you intend to do now?" asked Tom King, who felt far from comfortable in his present quarters. "Give me an insight into your plan."

"All right. When the dragoons come, I shall"——

At this moment there was a sudden uproar outside.

There came the sound of many loud voices.

The trampling of horses' feet, as the animals were hastily brought to a standstill.

Then succeeded a terrific banging with the butt-ends of carbines upon the wooden walls of the toll-house.

They were delivered with almost sufficient violence to batter them down.

"Open! open!" cried a stentorian voice. "Gate! gate! Open, I say!"

The toll-keeper turned towards Tom King, and placed his finger in a very waggish manner by the side of his nose.

"All right," he whispered. "Leave me to settle them. The only thing you've got to do is to remain perfectly quiet and silent. Don't move, and don't let your horse move, as you value your life!"

Bang! bang! bang! came the knocking again.

Then the same stentorian voice renewed a demand for the gate to be opened.

The toll-keeper sallied forth.

"Hullo! hullo!" he said. "What the devil's the matter? Are you going to knock the house down? What's the matter?"

"Open the gate, you idiot!" roared the chief officer, "and be quick about it. We are after a highwayman, you dolt! and if we don't make haste, we shall not overtake him."

"Oh! all right, all right," said the toll-keeper, advancing with the key in his hand. "You quite scared me. I could not think what was the matter for a moment or two. There you are, sir."

The toll-keeper opened the gate as he spoke, and the dragoons passed through.

"Did you say you were after a highwayman, sir?" he cried.

"Yes—yes! Have you seen him?"

"I don't know."

"Has he passed here?"

"How can I tell? Just listen a minute. Is he a dashing captain sort of chap, mounted on a beautiful bay horse that can fly over the ground like a deer?"

"Yes—yes! He outrun us. Have you seen him?"

"Well, I seed a chap about ten minutes ago, or maybe more. He was what I describe, and mounted on a bay."

"Go on—go on."

"I is going on, isn't I? Well, I heerd somebody coming, and I looked out and saw him. A dashing captain sort of chap, mounted on a beautiful bay horse."

"D—n you, you said that before."

"Oh! did I? Well, on he came, like the wind, and when he came to the gate, instead of stopping and axing me to open it for him, as I thought he would, he didn't draw in a bit, but gives a kind of a whistle, and up went the horse in the air, and dropped down on this side of the gate."

"He jumped the gate, then?"

"Yes, he did, cuss him!"

"What next?"

"Why, away he went up the road towards London, as though the devil was at his heels. Tuppence!" I cries, "tuppence! but, cuss me, if he took any notice whatsomever."

"Come on, my men," cried the officer of dragoons. "This is important information. Our horses have breathed a little. Forward—forward! We shall not overtake the rascal, but we shall be in at the death, for if he keeps along the road he will fall foul of Godfrey's troop, and then it would be all over with him. Forward—forward!"

The chief officer set the example of pushing on at a gallop, and in another moment the dragoons were far away down the road.

The toll-keeper, as soon as they were at a safe distance, went through some rather remarkable evolutions.

In the first place, he put the end of his thumb against the tip of his nose, and spread out his fingers fanwise.

Then he expanded his cheeks with wind, and suddenly put both hands to his sides.

Then his whole body shook violently, and though no sound came from his lips, it was evident he was enjoying a hearty laugh at the expense of the dragoons.

The capers he cut were really fantastic; but after a moment or two he ceased, and then entered the toll-house.

The moment he opened the door, Tom King sprang forward and clasped him by the hand.

"Thanks! thanks!" he said. "You have, indeed, saved my life! A thousand thanks! The scheme was a most excellent one."

"How jolly green they must be! But, captain?"

"What?"

"If you are to be safe and keep me out of trouble you must be off at once."

"I would not compromise you for worlds."

"That's a crackjaw sort of a word; but never mind, I know what you mean well enough. You push right on towards Oxford as quick as you can, for they will soon find out that you have not gone towards London. They will overtake the other troop immediately."

"I hope you will not be suspected of what you have done."

"Oh! never fear. I have only got to swear that I saw you, and stick to it. They will think you took to the meadows, or something of that sort."

"True, true. So they will. My best thanks, however, are your due. Without your aid I do not see how I could possibly have escaped."

"Well, do not linger. You cannot tell how soon they may return, and the further you are off the better."

"I will go at once; and to prove to you that I appreciate the service you have rendered me, take these two purses, and make the best use you can of their contents. I don't know how much there is, but when I come by this way again I shan't forget you."

"Thanks," said the toll-keeper, as he pocketed the purses. "Now, then, be off with you."

"Lead the way, then."

Tom King took his horse by the bridle and followed his new friend out into the open air.

He mounted immediately.

"Good-bye, captain," cried the toll-taker, as he opened the gate. "Push on as fast as you can. You have nothing to fear from me. I won't set the dragoons upon your track."

"I know that," said Tom King. "Good night. The next time I come by I shall remember you."

CHAPTER CCCCLXVIII.

TOM KING RESCUES A LADY FROM TWO FOOTPADS, AND FALLS INTO A TERRIBLE DANGER HIMSELF.

With these words, Tom King pressed his horse into a gallop, and in a few minutes the toll-gate was left behind.

"That's what I call a lucky escape," he said to himself. "I knew it was good policy to be friends with the toll-keeper, but I did not think he would be in a position to render me a service so soon. He has saved my life, that is certain, and I will show him that I know how to be grateful for it."

The highwayman now began to look rather anxiously about him in the hope that he should see a chance of taking another booty, for though his former adventure had been a profitable one, yet, as he had given the toll-taker both the purses which had been surrendered to him, he was no richer than he was before.

Tom was not forgetful of his object in taking to the road, and as the night was rapidly fleeting away, it would be necessary for him to make use of the time intervening between then and daybreak.

From some reason or other, however, the Oxford-road was on this night more deserted than he had ever remembered to have found it.

He rode on for a long distance without meeting with a soul.

Every now and then he would draw rein, and compel his horse to halt for a moment.

Then he would listen for some sound that would foretell a traveller's approach.

But in vain.

He was now beginning to regret that he had allowed the stage-coach to pass him unmolested.

While his mind was occupied with these regrets, he once more brought his steed to a standstill.

Even as he did so, there came upon his ears a loud and piercing shriek.

The cry evidently came from female lips, and from some distance in advance.

Another and another shriek followed in rapid succession.

"This promises an adventure," cried Tom King; and as he spoke the words he clapped spurs to his horse's sides and galloped at full speed along the road.

In less than a moment he perceived something in the distance, which at once had the effect of bringing an angry exclamation to his lips.

In the road before him was a lady seated upon a beautiful bay horse.

She was struggling desperately with two men.

The horse was plunging and rearing in a manner that threatened to throw his rider.

But she maintained her seat admirably.

She was attacked by two rough-looking men, one of whom held her steed by the bridle, while the other seized her violently by the arm and held a pistol in a threatening manner towards her.

Well might such a spectacle as this call forth an angry ejaculation from the lips of Tom King.

What could be more cowardly than for a couple of great, hulking fellows to dart out upon a young and defenceless girl and threaten her in the manner they evidently were.

It was part of Tom King's creed always to treat the fair sex with chivalrousness, and no female stood in need of a protector while he was by.

No matter how great the danger was to himself, he would have defended them without hesitation.

But, to waylay and rob a solitary, unprotected female, was in the highwayman's eyes a crime of no common magnitude.

He was rejoiced to think that fortune had favoured him so far as to permit him to be on the road when such an outrage took place.

As he made his horse fly over the ground, he produced a couple of pistols, which he cocked ready for immediate service.

The thundering sound of his horse's hoofs reached the ears of the two villains, and they looked up aghast.

But Tom was upon them in a moment.

"Dastardly cowards," he said, at the top of his voice; "release the lady, or you are both dead men."

"Help—help!" cried the lady on the horse, who felt inspired with fresh courage when she heard Tom King's voice, and witnessed his intrepid behaviour.

"Hold the gal, Joe," cried one of the ruffians; "and I'll soon settle this young spark's hash for him. I'll learn him to come interfering."

"Will you, indeed?" said Tom King, as the man came towards him. "Perhaps you will take that, and tell me whether you would like any more of the same article."

As he asked this question, Tom King struck the man a couple of terrific blows on the head with the butt-end of one of his pistols.

The first blow made him reel, and upon receiving the second he fell prostrate in the roadway.

The man who had been called Joe by his companion, uttered an angry shout when he saw the fate of his comrade, and, releasing his hold of the lady's bridle, he seized a gun which was resting against the trunk of a huge tree that grew by the roadside.

He grasped the gun by the barrel, for that was the part that came readiest to his hand, and swinging it round his head, made a blow at Tom King before he was aware of the attack that was thus made upon him.

By a nimble movement he escaped the blow; but the stock of the fowling-piece alighted rather heavily upon his horse's neck.

The man finding he had missed his aim, gave vent to another ejaculation of rage, and, recovering his weapon, swung it round his head a second time.

Tom's blood was now fully up, and before the man could bring the gun down, he raised a pistol rapidly to a level and fired.

The report was rather tremendous, and the lady uttered another scream. It was echoed by one from the man, who threw up his arms wildly, and then fell to the earth, where he writhed about in a manner that was horrible to witness. Tom King having thus disposed of his two assailants, turned round to the lady on whose behalf he had been thus exerting himself.

By the time he did so, she had succeeded in calming her steed, which was now as quiet and docile as it had before been restive and unmanageable.

"Thanks, sir—thanks," she cried, as Tom King approached her. "I know not how to express the extent of my gratitude. You have done me a service which I can never repay, and a service, too, of a much more important character than it can possibly appear to be."

"No more thanks, lady," said Tom King, as he took off his hat and made a respectful bow. No more thanks. The service which I have rendered you is one which anyone, gifted with a spark of manly feeling, would perform."

"Still I cannot help feeling very — very grateful," replied the lady, "although I am at a loss how to express myself."

"Do not trouble yourself to do so," said Tom King, gaily. "You are heartily welcome to the service which I have performed for you, and if there is anything else that lies in my power to do, command me freely."

Tom King made another low bow as he spoke.

The lady acknowleged the salute by an inclination of the head.

"I thank you," she said, gently; "but there is nothing more."

"Pardon me," said Tom King; "but I ought to have asked you the question before. Have you received any injury at the hands of those men?"

"No; I am unhurt."

"That is fortunate; not only for you, but for them. They should have suffered dearly for any violence."

"They are already punished."

"But not half as they deserve to be. And now, lady, one question more. Do you journey further along this road?"

"Only a short distance."

"Then, if that is the case," said Tom King, "as I am travelling in the same direction, perhaps you would permit me to become your escort."

"If such is the case, I shall only be too glad to avail myself of your protection, for I confess I am greatly alarmed by what has just taken place."

"No doubt—no doubt. Have you recovered sufficiently to resume your journey?"

"Yes—yes. Oh! yes. I wish to push onward without loss of time."

"I am ready, then."

The lady set her steed in motion, and at a gentle trot the pair took their way along the broad Oxford-road.

That Tom King was running a very great amount of danger by offering to be this lady's escort, the reader will not require to be told, though from his calm demeanour no one would have suspected it. Under the circumstances, however, he could scarcely avoid making such an offer.

After a slight pause, the lady spoke:

"I accept of your protection with all the greatest readiness and gratitude," she said, "because what has happened makes me fearful of further interruption."

"Indeed," said Tom King, as he looked to his pistols.

"Yes, and when I said a little while ago that you had rendered me a more important service than you imagined, what I meant was that it is highly necessary that I should reach my destination with all possible speed, and had it not been for your fortunate presence, I should have been much delayed."

"I see! I see. Would you like to increase your pace?"

"Not just yet. I have scarcely recovered from my fright."

"It was a dastardly attack," said Tom King. "I suppose plunder was their object."

"I suppose so; but it is more than I can tell. It may be that it was intended to delay my return to the hall. I have come at full speed from London."

"There is a mystery here," muttered Tom King to himself, whose curiosity was greatly roused by the words which had just been uttered—"there is a mystery here, and it will go hard with me if I do not penetrate it."

Then in a louder tone of voice he added:

"What were their motives for such a cowardly attack doesn't matter. They fully deserve the punishment which they have received. As for any other attack, I think you may make yourself easy."

"Thanks—thanks! It is not far that I have to go, and——"

"Hark!" said Tom King, suddenly. "What was that?"

"What?—what?"

"Do you not hear it?" said Tom King. "Someone comes."

And now there rose upon the still night air the unmistakable sounds of horses' hoofs. They were approaching, and evidently in great numbers.

Something in Tom King's manner must have struck the lady as being strange, for she looked at him keenly for some moments in silence.

Then, when the sound grew more and more distinct, she said:

"All is well—all is well. Now, I know those sounds well. It is the dragoons who patrol the road."

Tom King knew this well enough, without being told, and he felt very uneasy.

It was evident he did not look upon their approach with the same amount of satisfaction as the lady did.

"Yes," he said, with a forced laugh. "It is the dragoons, no doubt. They make a great show of patrolling the road, but it seems to me that in one respect, at least, they are like police officers—they are never in the way when their presence would be beneficial."

"Nay, there you are unjust," said the lady, warmly. "I know they have been of the greatest service in protecting us from the attacks of bands of highwaymen, who made the roads impassable."

Tom smiled.

"And yet you were attacked by two men," he said.

He spoke these words lightly, and, as it seemed, half jestingly.

The lady little imagined what his feelings were at that moment.

The dragoons were now very close at hand.

Tom's position was ticklish in the extreme.

Had he turned and fled he would have been pursued immediately, and all chance of following up his adventure with the lady would be at an end.

On the other hand, if he remained he ran a very great risk indeed of being recognised.

It was the rule for the dragoons to allow no persons to pass unquestioned, and how would Tom pass through such an ordeal?

A careful and correct description of his personal appearance had been industriously circulated among the soldiers, and doubtless they had taken care to impress all the particulars upon their minds.

At the very first glance, perhaps, they would recognise him, and then how perilous would his position become.

There was no time for flight, however, nor was there much time for deliberation, for the dragoons now were very close at hand indeed.

Under this aspect of affairs, Tom King resolved to make a virtue of necessity, by putting a bold face on the matter, and riding along the road with a lady.

With a degree of calmness which cannot sufficiently be admired at, the highwayman spoke freely to his strange companion, trotting along as though nothing whatever was amiss, and as though he was not in any sort of danger.

Two minutes elapsed, and then the dragoons arrived.

Tom King's heart beat quickly and his face flushed a little, when he heard the commanding officer call out to the dragoons and bid them halt.

With a clattering sound the whole troop came to a standstill, and then the officer rode up to Tom King and the young lady.

"Pull up!" cried the officer; "pull up for a moment. My orders are not to allow anyone to pass me on the road without challenging them. Would you be kind enough to rein in your horses for a moment?"

TOM KING'S ADVENTURE WITH THE MELANCHOLY STRANGER.

The lady stopped her horse at once, and Tom King could do nothing more than follow her example.

Five minutes more would decide his fate.

Should he be recognised, his death or capture was inevitable.

Escape would be out of the question.

What wonder is it, then, that his heart should beat more quickly and painfully than it was wont, and that his frame should exhibit traces of agitation?

This was so slight, however, as not to be noticeable, and by the time his steed had stopped, and the officer approached him, he was quite calm, and he saluted him with one of those deep, courtly bows which were then the fashion.

The officer replied to the salute, and then he said—

"There is a little form which we are instructed to go through, but we will not detain you for a moment. It is that you should furnish us with your real names and some proof of your identity. This proceeding may seem strange, but the reason is that, in spite of all our care and patrolling, highway robberies are nightly committed on the road, and we are determined to put a stop to them by adopting the measure I have mentioned."

CHAPTER CCCCLXIX.

LIEUTENANT GRENNE IS CLEVERLY DELUDED BY TOM KING.

THESE words, uttered by the officer of dragoons, revealed another dilemma.

There was, to be sure, just a chance that Tom King would be able to pass through their ranks unrecognised; but now that something like a passport was demanded, the danger was immensely increased.

Indeed, detection seemed certain.

Had any of his comrades seen him at this moment, literally hemmed in on all sides as he was by his foes, they would have trembled for his safety.

We tremble ourselves.

A sort of pause followed the utterance of the speech with which the last chapter concluded, during which the officer sat waiting, and glancing alternately from Tom King to the lady by his side.

The latter, perceiving that her new acquaintance did not speak, said—

"I believe I have the pleasure of knowing you, Lieutenant Grenne?"

"Indeed," said the officer, in a changed manner, and with the accents of his voice slightly tinged with pleasure; "indeed, miss, your voice is familiar to me in the extreme."

"My name is Minton"——

"Of course, Miss Minton of the Hall yonder. I must really apologise, but I did not recognise you at first, or I should not have stopped you."

"No matter, lieutenant," said the lady, who, now that she has avowed her name, we may as well call Miss Minton. "No matter; it is best to perform your duty to the letter. I, for one, shall be glad when you have captured the highwaymen."

"But I shall not, if it affords me the chance of such pleasant meetings as these."

"A truce to your compliments, lieutenant," said Miss Minton, her voice showing, plainly enough, that she was quite the reverse of displeased. "Are you satisfied? Can I pass on?"

"Most certainly. I should have recognised you had it not been for the darkness of the night, or I should say morning, rather; and besides, I scarcely expected to see you at such an unusual hour."

"I daresay not. No apologies. We shall be always glad to see you at the Hall when duty permits."

"Many thanks. You may depend I shall avail myself of the invitation. This gentleman is a friend of yours, I presume?"

"Oh! yes; though our acquaintance has been short, being half-an-hour long, at most."

"Oh! indeed," said the officer, turning towards Tom King with quite a changed expression, "a friend only half-an-hour old?"

"Yes," said Tom King, coldly. "I have had the honour of the lady's acquaintance for about that length of time."

"Oh! indeed, sir."

"And in fact"——

"Perhaps, then," said Lieutenant Grenne, "you would have no objection to let us know who you are?"

"None whatever, sir; but my humble opinion is, if it is your duty to guard these roads, it would be much better if you were to ride on."

"And pray sir, what the devil have you got to do with my duty?"

"Very little, perhaps; but if you will appeal to the lady, she will tell you under what circumstances our acquaintance took place."

"Oh! yes—yes, lieutenant. I owe this gentleman a very deep debt of obligation, indeed. He has rendered me a most important service. A little way further down the road, towards London, I was stopped by two men, who would have robbed, and perhaps murdered me, had it not been for this gentleman."

"Stopped on the road? What, by robbers?"

"I suppose so. At least, I do not know what else they could be."

"They were robbers, depend upon it," interjected Tom King. "I think I have done for them both, for a little time, at least. You will find them lying on the road, I rather fancy."

"This is serious," said the lieutenant.

You will now understand what I meant," continued Tom King, who perceived the advantage he had gained. "You see, in spite of your patrolling and needlessly stopping peaceable travellers, this young lady was stopped by two men within a mile of her own residence."

The lieutenant was aggravated by the way in which Tom spoke, but he could say nothing.

"It is quite true," said Miss Minton. "When this gentleman saw how I was attacked, he rode forward and had a desperate conflict with them. He was victorious, and he left the men lying senseless on the road."

"I will ride off at once. I hope these will prove the gentlemen of whom we are in search. Nevertheless, sir, perhaps you would be kind enough to tell me who you are."

"Certainly, sir; my name is Queen."

"Queen?"

"Yes; Sir Thomas Queen. I am a baronet, and justice of the peace. I am on my way from London to my own residence at Burnham, in Buckinghamshire. Perhaps you may know the place?"

All this was said with so much readiness, and without the slightest hesitation, that the officer of dragoons believed it at once. And the announcement that he was a baronet and a justice of the peace, quite accounted for the manner in which he had spoken.

In a very respectful voice, Lieutenant Grenne said—

"I have not the honour of knowing either your name or your residence, but your word is quite sufficient. It is easy to distinguish a gentleman."

"Thank you for the compliment. And now, lieutenant, if you will condescend to be guided by me, you will ride off down the road without any more delay in search of the two rascals. I would return with you myself, and point out the spot where the outrage took place, but I have promised this lady to escort her to her home; and I am, moreover, anxious to push on towards Burnham, having been considerably delayed."

"All right, Sir Thomas. I am off. I hope you will meet with no further interruption."

"Thanks."

"Good evening, Miss Minton. Pray do not lay the blame of the outrage that has been perpetrated upon my shoulders."

"I shall do," said the lady, with a light laugh, "if you do not capture the wretches, and bring them to justice."

"I will try my best to redeem myself so far. Once more, good night. Now, my men, forward!"

With a clatter the troop of dragoons rode off down the road, and, as they did so, Tom King drew a long breath, for he thought what a narrow escape he had just had.

The lieutenant could not have been very well acquainted with his appearance, but his failing to recognise him will not be wondered at if it is borne in mind that the night was a very dark one, and that he did not recognise the young lady, Miss Minton, until she declared herself, and yet he was personally acquainted with her.

Then, again, the intelligence that Miss Minton had been stopped disconcerted him, and he was in consequence less cool and clear-sighted than he usually was.

And so, from a combination of strange circumstances, the dragoons rode by Tom King without having the least suspicion concerning him.

He smiled when he thought of the name by which he had declared himself, and which was so easily suggested by his real one.

That was about the most daring piece of the whole business, for, for a moment, Lieutenant Grenne had been suspicious.

Take it altogether, it was about the strangest adventure he had had.

Still, he was amused at it now the danger was past.

The lady rode on for a few yards in silence.

Fancying she was, perhaps, waiting for him to speak first, Tom said—

"It seems, then, that you and this young officer of dragoons are old acquaintances?"

"Well, scarcely, Sir Thomas," replied the young lady, in a more friendly manner than she had hitherto addressed him. "I have known him but for a short time; that is, since he has been appointed to patrol this road.

"Not a very pleasant occupation for a soldier, I should think."

"Oh! he grumbles about it dreadfully, and declares he will make short work of the highwaymen if he should be lucky enough to meet with one of them."

"Ah!" said Tom.

"And I should think he would, too; for he is a brave young fellow."

"Ah!" said Tom, again.

"Dear me, what a strange ejaculation. What do you mean by that?"

"Oh! nothing."

"But, Sir Thomas, if you will look before you, you will see the gabled roofs of a building. That is Minton Hall."

"Your residence."

"Exactly; and I hope, sir, you will not refuse to enter and receive my father's thanks for the service you have done me."

"Nothing would give me greater satisfaction—that is to say, at any other time than the present moment. But, the fact is, I am extremely anxious to reach Burnham. I ought to have been there hours ago, but I have been delayed in one way or the other, so that really I must decline your invitation."

"I am sorry for that; but you will, probably, be passing by this way soon."

"Oh! yes. I am on the road frequently."

"Then, will you promise that when you pass again, you will call?"

"Oh! certainly. I shall have great pleasure in doing so."

"Thanks. And now, Sir Thomas, while we perform the rest of the journey, I should like to ask your advice."

"My advice?"

"You are surprised, no doubt. But, if I recollect right, you said you were a justice of the peace."

"Ah!"

"That strange word again."

"Excuse me. It's a habit I have got. It means yes."

"Oh! indeed. Well, as you are a justice of the peace, I thought I would ask your advice upon a matter which has very much perplexed me."

"I shall be happy to render you all the assistance in my power."

"I knew that, and it emboldened me to address you."

"Do not fear to speak freely," said Tom King. I will promise to keep secret anything you may confide in me."

"Well, then, Sir Thomas, it concerns my being out at such an hour as this alone. That must have seemed strange to you."

"I confess it did."

"In asking your advice, I shall explain it. To be brief, late last night I received a letter—an anonymous letter."

"Indeed!"

"I have it with me now, but there is not light enough to read it. However, I will make you acquainted with its contents as nearly as I can recollect."

"That will, perhaps, answer the purpose quite as well."

"I hope so. The writing was in a man's hand, and commenced abruptly—

"'Your brother is in great danger—in danger of his life. It is in your power to save him. If you wish to do so, you will hasten to his chambers in London. You must get there at least two hours before dawn, or you will be too late, and he will surely perish. Be speedy and secret.'"

"Was that all?"

"Yes; and, I think, almost the very words."

"It is a mysterious letter."

"Very. I pondered over the contents, and at length resolved to set out; and I did so, as you see."

"And did you find your brother?"

"No. You must understand he is studying for the law, and he has chambers in the Temple. I went there."

"Were you in time? Were you there two hours before daybreak?"

"Oh! yes; three at the least."

"And he was not there?"

"No. And he had not been seen since early on the preceding evening."

"And what did you do then?" asked Tom King, whose interest in this strange narrative rapidly increased.

"I made all the inquiries I could," was the reply, "and then I resolved to gallop back home, which I have done."

"And you could neither see nor hear anything of your brother?"

"Nothing."

"How strange!"

"Now, sir, I want to ask your advice. What had I better do? What does it all mean?"

"I am quite puzzled to say," replied Tom King. "It is really a most mysterious affair from first to last. But stop a moment. I have an idea. It was on your return that you were attacked by those two men?"

"Yes, it was."

"Did they demand any money from you?"

"No. It appeared as though they desired to drag me from the saddle. All took place so suddenly, however, that I cannot recollect perfectly."

"It is my opinion, then," said Tom King, "that the letter was written for the purpose of decoying you from your home—for what purpose or for what reason such an outrage should be planned, I am not able to hazard an opinion."

"But," said Miss Minton, "if my abduction was the end in view, why was I suffered to proceed in safety as far as London?"

"That is a difficult question; perhaps you set out earlier than was expected?"

"It might be so."

"Have you an enemy? Do you know anyone who would stoop to such an act?"

The lady paused, and for a moment hesitated.

Then she said—

"No; I know no one who would be guilty of so great an outrage."

"Then I must confess myself baffled."

"I was afraid so," said the lady, with a sigh. "I am perfectly bewildered. But, stay! These are the gates leading to the Hall. Are you sure you will not enter?"

"I cannot to-night."

"Farewell, then, for you have told me you were anxious to reach home, and I have no right to detain you any longer. For all that you have done in my behalf, I trust that you will accept my best and deepest thanks. I told you what had occurred, in the faint hope that you might be able to throw some light on this extraordinary affair."

"I deeply regret that it is not in my power to do so."

"I am sure you do; and, once more expressing my thanks, I say farewell."

"Farewell, too," said Tom King. "Before we part, however, I should like to free you from the deception I have played upon you. I am not what I have declared myself. I am one of those highwaymen whom you hope your friend, Lieutenant Grenne, will speedily bring to justice."

"Impossible."

"It is quite true."

"You a highwayman?"

"Yes."

"And your name?"

"Tom King."

CHAPTER CCCCLXX.

TOM KING HAS A MYSTERIOUS ADVENTURE WITH THE MELANCHOLY STRANGER.

WITHOUT waiting to hear what the lady would say after hearing this announced, and without waiting to see what she would do, Tom King touched his horse with the spur, and set off at a gallop in the direction of London.

Once, and once only, he glanced over his shoulder, and when he did so he saw her sitting upon her steed and looking after him, her face and attitude expressive of the utmost astonishment.

After this Tom King did not look back, so what became of her he knew not.

He had terminated the interview somewhat abruptly.

The reason was that he was warned it was time to break up the conference by seeing in the eastern horizon some long pale beams of light, which indicated that dawn was at hand.

He had a long way to go to reach the deserted mansion, and by the time he arrived there he felt quite certain it would be daylight, and broad daylight, too.

Clearly, then, it was the best and wisest thing he could do.

He had, strangely enough, learned more than he had ever hoped to become acquainted with.

The simple chance of his having declared himself to be a justice of the peace had induced Miss Minton to make a confidant of him, and in a matter which was well calculated to perplex anyone.

When he had obtained all the information, however, which it was in her power to give, and when he saw those harbingers of the coming day, Tom King determined to be off without any more delay.

He had revealed his true person for several reasons, and one of them was that he had nothing whatever to fear from the declaration

He felt tolerably certain that the lieutenant in command of the dragoons would learn how neatly and easily his prey had slipped through his fingers, and Tom rejoiced in the prospect of the amount of annoyance and vexation which he would feel.

"I have had a fine night of it," he muttered to himself, as he galloped along the road; "a very fine night, indeed. Here I am, with daylight shining on me, and on my way back, and not a penny richer than I was when I set out. I have had all this danger for nothing—absolutely for nothing. Was ever anybody known to have such bad luck? But let a traveller show himself, and let him be who he may, and let the danger be as great as it likes, I will stop him, and, what is more, take every penny he has about him!"

With this resolution, Tom continued on his way, though he shaped his course nearly in a straight line to his destination.

On his way his mind was occupied with thinking over all that the young girl had said.

The adventure, take it altogether, was one well calculated to provoke thought and find materials for reflection.

And now the dawn advanced with great rapidity.

Streak after streak of grayish light shot up from the horizon, and shed a pale glimmer upon the still sleeping earth.

Although indulging in the reflections which we have mentioned, he kept a sharp look-out around him, and presently an ejaculation came from his lips.

At the same moment he quickened his horse's speed, and turned his head in a slightly different direction to the one he had been pursuing.

The reason of this was, because he had seen a single horseman emerge from the shadow of a copse, and take his way across a piece of open ground of considerable extent.

In the dim, dawnlight his figure, and that of his steed, looked hazy and indistinct, and as they crossed the piece of common or heath, they looked more like some shadowy, spectral horse and rider than aught else.

It was, then, this which had brought the exclamation to Tom's lips, and which had caused him to press his horse to make still greater exertions.

The rider, be he who he might, was at a considerable distance, and Tom saw that a hard gallop was inevitable if he was to overtake him.

This was nothing.

He was intent only upon one thing, and that was to come up with him, and demand whatever money and valuables he carried.

With this intention away he flew.

The traveller, however, did not look back, and seemed perfectly unconscious of the fact that someone was pursuing him.

His steed was going at a kind of half gallop, a speed very comfortable to the rider, who sat in the saddle as though plunged in deep and melancholy thought.

The common or heath, across which he was taking his way in a diagonal direction, was covered with soft, crisp turf, upon which the horse's hoofs produced scarcely an audible sound, so that the highwayman was enabled to get very close to the traveller before the latter was aware of it.

Upon a closer approach, Tom King discovered that he was quite a young man, being, indeed, just about to enter into manhood.

His attire was plain and simple, and dark in hue.

At his side he carried a long, straight sword.

But it was this stranger's countenance that attracted Tom King's attention.

No one could gaze upon the delicately-formed features, with the expression of pensiveness upon them, without feeling immediately and deeply interested.

Tom at once wondered what could have produced so profound a melancholy in one so handsome and so young.

In spite of this, however, he did not feel in the least inclined to forego his intention.

He was rendered desperate by the want of success he had had throughout the night.

Spurring his horse still more, he in a few bounds was side by side with this young man.

"Halt! halt!" he cried, levelling a pistol at him as he spoke. "Halt! I say. Your money or your life!"

Almost mechanically, as it seemed, the traveller pulled up his horse.

"You will have but a poor booty from me," he said, in sad tones. "I have nothing about me of any greater value than my sword, and that I shall struggle to prevent you from taking possession of."

The words were spoken sadly, quietly, and yet firmly.

Somehow, he could not tell why, Tom King fully believed what this young man said.

He would have staked his life he spoke the truth. There was such an air of earnest ingenuousness about him. Nevertheless, Tom could not control his disappointment, and he said—

"Do you carry no trinkets or ornaments?"

"No, none," was the reply. "Look and satisfy yourself."

With these words, the melancholy stranger unclasped his riding-cloak, and allowed Tom King a full view of his person.

It fully bore out the truth of what he had just said.

He carried no trinkets or ornaments about him, and Tom, glancing at his hands, saw that there was not a single ring upon any one of his fingers.

Looking, however, to the hilt of his sword, he saw that it was ornamented in a most elaborate and expensive manner, and must have been worth a very large sum of money.

It seemed strange, Tom thought, for anyone carrying such a weapon, to have no articles of value about him whatever, and so he said—

"Come, sir, if you have nothing else, I am sure you carry a purse. Hand me that."

"It is not worth your taking," was the answer. "It contains less than a guinea, in silver. However, take it; here it is, and I feel that I could ask you to take my life as well, if it would be of the slightest benefit to you."

These words were spoken in a tone of even greater dejection than before; indeed, the young man seemed as though his heart was breaking.

Tom felt his disappointment and vexation subside in the intense desire which he felt to learn the cause of this young man's deep sorrow.

He could not account for anyone, occupying the station in life that he evidently did, being out upon the road in such a penniless condition.

The stranger put an end to Tom's speculations by saying—

"Come, sir, here is my purse. Take it, and let me be gone, as the errand I am upon will admit of no delay."

"Nay, you are free to pass."

"But, my purse?"

"Keep it. I would not deprive you of anything; indeed, I feel as though it would give me a pleasure if I could be of some assistance to you."

"Indeed!" said the stranger.

Without another word he replaced the purse in his pocket and set his horse in motion.

"No luck again," muttered Tom King, as he turned round with the intention of retracing his steps. "No luck again! Well, after this, I will give up altogether, and go straight back. It is quite certain fortune is against me. That is clear enough. She is truly called a fickle jade, for such I ever found her."

At this moment he was startled by a dull sound in the rear, and he immediately faced about.

To his surprise, he found the melancholy stranger close to him.

Reining in his steed, the latter said—

"You are surprised, no doubt, that I should have galloped after you; but the fact is I want to speak to you for a moment."

"I am entirely at your service," said Tom King, and as he spoke he raised his hat, and made a deep and respectful bow.

The traveller returned the salute with that air of melancholy which seemed to pervade all his actions.

Some slight surprise was also visible when he saw the graceful manner in which Tom bowed.

"I was convinced," he said, "that you were no common robber, and if I needed any confirmation your behaviour would supply it."

Tom made no other reply to this highly flattering speech than to bow again.

"I have hastened after you in order to ask a favour. I am impelled to do so, because I can see that you have the bearing of a gentlemen."

How true this remark was!

It sent a sharp pain through Tom King's heart when he heard it, for it had the effect of bringing the past vividly before him.

There is something in the deportment of a real thoroughbred gentleman which can neither be defined nor imitated.

Tom King had been born and had lived a gentleman, and the bearing he had then acquired—or, rather, which came to him as by a sort of natural instinct—had never left him, and, in spite of all his efforts to disguise it, it would at times peep forth.

This melancholy traveller had detected it, not only in his speech, but in the manner in which he had comported himself.

The stranger had paused, but finding that Tom said nothing, he continued—

"That you have also the feelings of a gentleman, I do not doubt, although you appear in the singular character of a highwayman."

"I cannot tell what the tendency of these remarks may be," said Tom King, "but if it is in my power, I shall be glad to render you any service you may ask, for I have experienced from the first a strange feeling of sympathy for you."

"And I for you. And now to tell you in a word or two, for time is precious, the nature of the favour I wish you to grant me."

"I am all attention."

"In order, then, to convince you that all is just and honourable, I will tell you who I am—the cause of this deep melancholy—and then ask you the favour. You will then be able to say whether you will grant it or not."

"I shall grant it, no doubt."

"Well, then, to begin with. My name is Roderick Minton."

Tom King could not help starting violently when this surname fell upon his ear.

It was the same as had been given by the young lady he had saved from the two men.

The coincidence was a most remarkable one, and he prepared himself to listen with redoubled interest.

The sudden movement did not escape the notice of the traveller, but he made no remark concerning it.

He continued to speak in the same plaintive tone of voice.

"By birth and education," he said, "I am a gentleman. I am the only son of Frederick Minton, of Minton Hall, at no great distance from this place. Having a fancy for the law, however, I have taken chambers in the Temple, in order to prosecute the study of it. So much for myself."

"Enough—enough," said Tom King; "this explanation is not needful. Let me hear the nature of your request."

"In one moment. I have an only sister, for whom I have a more than brotherly affection. Some time since, a suitor presented himself, and demanded her hand. His name was Godfrey Royston. My father referred him to my sister for his reply, at the same time stating that he had not the slightest intention of biasing his daughter's inclinations. He presented himself to my sister, and was rejected. After this we met as of old, and I saw no change in his manner; but I was warned by one who knew him, and who stated him to be of a treacherous, revengeful disposition, and, above all, one who never overlooked any slight that might be put upon him. After receiving the caution, I resolved to be careful. Not many days afterwards, however, I and Godfrey met. At first all went well; but, eventually, we quarrelled. To give you the grounds of the quarrel, or to relate the particulars concerning it, would take too long to tell now, for the rapid advance of the morning warns me to be brief. In a word, then, we quarrelled, and a challenge was the result. We agreed to fight a duel. The weapons chosen were swords. We agreed to meet at a spot which was scarcely ever visited, and where we should have no fear of interruption. We were each to be attended by one second. It was to be a duel to the death. And now to the cause of my sadness and melancholy. Ever since the challenge I have experienced such a feeling of depression as I had before not the least conception of. I seemed at once to lose all my spirits, and I tried in vain to recover them. The duel is to take place at sunrise this morning. In spite of myself my dejection has increased, and this morning it received a great accession. I received last night, or rather early this morning, a letter from the friend who had promised to act as my second, to say that he should be compelled to decline. I had my doubts about the genuineness of this letter, for it seemed so strange to me that my friend should alter his mind so suddenly, and then not to let me know of it until the last moment. There was no time to obtain another second, so I made my way to the residence of my friend, for I could not help thinking the letter was a forgery. Why I should think this, I know not, for I was at a loss to find a motive which could induce anyone to send me such a forged communication. However, I went to my friend's house. He was not at home, and had not been seen for several hours. I could gain no information as regards where he was to be found. This seemed to confirm my suspicions. By this time, however, the hour had arrived—passed, indeed—when it was necessary for me to set out in order to reach the appointed spot in time, and I was unwilling to allow my opponent the advantage of being able to say that I was late. And so, being unable, upon the spur of the moment, to find another second, I set out alone, resolved to attend the duel without the company of a second. But all the way I have experienced a feeling of depression for which I am quite unable to account. I feel, indeed, as a man would feel who was being led out to execution. I am no coward, though I have never yet been in an encounter where my life was at stake. I feel that if I had a second with me my dejection would vanish, and I should once more become myself. And now that I have told you all, you can probably guess the nature of the favour I was about to ask at your hands."

CHAPTER CCCCLXXI.

IN WHICH TOM KING BECOMES THE SPECTATOR OF SOME VERY SINGULAR EVENTS WHICH TAKE PLACE IN THE OLD QUARRY.

TOM KING had sat perfectly still upon his horse while the melancholy stranger spoke.

He made not the slightest attempt to interrupt him, but listened attentively.

The story which he told was in itself simple enough, and yet Tom felt deeply interested, so deeply, indeed, that he forgot his own danger in being abroad at that hour.

What he had heard was, he felt certain, nothing more than the prologue to some act of more than common interest.

Of course, he had not failed in an instant to identify this melancholy young man as the brother of Miss Minton.

It was this that made him start.

How events would develop themselves was, of course, more than he could tell; but that something strange would result he felt certain.

As soon as the young man had finished speaking, however, Tom King hastened to reply—

"I can easily guess your request," he said, "and feel great pleasure in acceding to it. If you are willing to accept of my services, I shall be very glad to act as your second."

"Thanks! thanks!" replied young Minton. "It is true we are strangers to each other, and that our acquaintanceship has begun in a very strange manner. Nevertheless, under the circumstances, I shall be much obliged to you if you will consent to act in that capacity."

"I consent willingly enough. Is it far that you have to go?"

"No; I had almost reached my journey's end when you stopped me."

"Let us proceed at once, then; for, if you are to keep your appointment, you have no time to lose. The sun will rise shortly."

"I suppose so. Come, sir, set forward. I am ready."

"If it pleases you, as we have not far to go, let us proceed at a canter. We shall then be able to converse with each other; for, strange as it may seem, I have something to say which will form a kind of commentary to what you have just told me."

"Indeed! is it possible that you are acquainted with me?"

"No, not exactly that; but, without further preface, I will recount to you the particulars of an adventure I had not long ago, and which intimately, I believe, concerns yourself."

"Pray proceed, sir, for you have greatly awakened my curiosity."

Tom King then related to the young man the particulars of the attack upon his sister in the lane.

He told him how he had rescued her; how, to save himself from imminent danger, he had announced himself under a false name; and how, in consequence of that, the young lady had appealed to him, and asked him his advice upon a matter which had puzzled her exceedingly.

The young man listened to this extraordinary narrative with mingled feelings.

Then Tom continued.

"I must confess that, when she asked me what I thought of all this, I was puzzled to reply, but I hazarded an opinion that the anonymous letter had been sent to her with a view to secure her abduction. I had then little grounds for such a belief, but what you have since told me confirms me in it."

"How so?"

"It may seem strange, but I connect the two letters together. I believe that both came from the same hand."

"But for what motive?"

"I think I can tell you. Did you not say that this Godfrey Royston was a rejected suitor of your sister's."

"Yes—yes."

"And that you had received a bad character of him, and been cautioned to beware?"

"Yes, too."

"Well, then, I believe the whole to be a scheme of his to gratify his revenge."

"But how about the disappearance of my friend—the one who promised to be my second in the duel?"

"That is strange, I admit; but, granting that the letter you received was a forgery, it is only natural to still further suppose that he was decoyed away in some manner, and prevented from keeping his appointment. Rely upon it, that those who would forge a letter would not scruple to do that, and I much fear that even worse remains behind."

"You seem to fancy, then, that this strange dejection to which I have been a prey has some special meaning."

"I do; for I am one who has been taught, by long experience, the folly of disregarding presentiments. I do not hesitate to say that I fully believe in them."

"Then mine was a presentiment?"

"Yes: a foreboding of great danger about to happen. It is to be hoped, however, that by keeping strictly upon our guard we may be able to avert it."

"I hope so, too."

"And now, there is one more question. When you have replied to it I shall perhaps be able to make something from the tangled threads of this strange affair."

"What is the question?"

"Where is the spot appointed for the duel?"

"It is close by."

"In an unfrequented spot?"

"Yes; but you must think nothing of that. We wished to be secure from interruption."

"Yes—yes; I know. What place is it, though. A wood?"

"No; a quarry."

"A quarry?"

"Yes."

"What a strange place for such a meeting."

"It seems so; but I ought to explain. It presents little of the appearance of a quarry. Very many years, indeed, have elapsed since it was worked. Tradition almost forgets it. Some extensive operations must, however, at some remote period have been carried on here, for the place is both deep and vast. All the stone has been dug up and carried away, so now the sides and the bottom are covered with dense, luxurious vegetation, the growth of many ages upon a rank soil."

"It must be a wild, romantic spot."

"It is, indeed; and picturesque in the extreme. But you will see it shortly, and then you will say a more appropriate spot could not possibly be found. You will say it is a misnomer to call the place a quarry, but it retains its name from what it once has been."

"That is easily enough understood. But I should have thought that a picturesque, romantic spot, such as you describe, would be the resort of many pleasure-seeking persons."

"At one time it used to be, but some years ago it was made the scene of a most horrible and brutal murder, and since that time it has been shunned by almost everyone. Many firmly believe that it is haunted."

"You have quite raised my curiosity about this old quarry, so much so that I forgot for the moment that there were other and more important things to talk about."

"You must be speedy, for the sun is about to rise. Look how fiery red the east now is, and yonder, by that clump of trees, is the excavation I have spoken of."

Young Minton pointed to a group of trees about a hundred yards distant.

"Well, then, I must be brief in what I say. Beware of your opponent. It is my impression that he has some sinister end in view, therefore I say, beware!"

"I will be careful."

"You have need to be; for although I have never seen him, my impression concerning this Godfrey Royston is that he is a very unscrupulous personage."

"What do you advise?"

"You must meet him, of course. But be all the time fully upon your guard. If I must give my own opinion, it is that he has removed your second in order to be better able to carry out some nefarious design he has in hand. I believe he intended to carry off your sister, but, happily, in that he has been foiled."

"Yes, through you, my friend."

"Friend! You forget yourself. I am a highwayman."

"Nevertheless, you have fully established your claim to my friendship."

"Be it so, then; and now a fresh thought has struck me."

"What is it?"

"Should you not like to know whether these suspicions which you have of Godfrey Royston are just or unfounded?"

"I should, indeed. I would give much to obtain such knowledge."

"I will tell you how I think it may be gained."

"How?"

"In this way. If our suspicions are well grounded, he will expect to see you arrive at the quarry this morning without a second."

"He would, assuredly."

"Then my presence in that capacity would, in all probability, have the effect of deranging his plans."

"If we are right."

"Just so. But it would, I fancy, be very desirable to know whether we are right or wrong."

"Very, indeed. But I don't see how it can possibly be managed."

"I will tell you. What are the weapons chosen?"

"Swords."

"I thought I heard you say so. Well, such being the case, you will have a chance of defending yourself. Are you well-skilled in the use of the weapon?"

"I have practised well. But what is the drift of your remarks?"

"I propose that you should descend into the quarry alone, as though you had no second with you. Keep a wary eye upon your opponent, and, if he tries any mischief be ready to defend yourself."

"And you?"

"With your consent I will conceal myself somewhere close at hand, and, should circumstances render it necessary, I will interfere."

"Agreed. I am well pleased with such an arrangement."

"I am glad to hear you say so. But, pray bear in mind that my suspicions are very strong. Do not relax your vigilance in the least, or permit yourself to be thrown off your guard by any circumstance. I have the worst possible opinion of your foe."

"You may depend I shall be careful. Forewarned, forearmed, you know."

"Of course. Rely upon it, by adopting this measure, we shall arrive at the whole truth of the affair."

"I consent—I consent. But where shall you conceal yourself."

"In the most fitting situation I can find. I should like to be where I can see and hear all that passes without being seen myself, and also where I should be able to render you ready assistance if it was required."

"The latter, I fancy, will be difficult; but we shall see when we arrive."

"We are full early."

"True; and yet I think the sun will rise in a minute or two at most. Yonder is the brink of the quarry."

"Then, if agreeable to you, we will dismount here, and secure our horses to this tree."

"Agreed."

The pair dismounted, and the horses were secured as proposed.

"It may be," said young Minton, "that my adversary has already arrived. If so, it will spoil our plot if we are seen together. Do you wait here, therefore, and I will go on in advance. You follow me cautiously to the brink of the abyss, and if you lie down you will be able to look over."

"Yes—yes!"

"If I see nothing of my foe I will give a low whistle, and when you hear it you will descend with all speed and conceal yourself somewhere close at hand."

"I understand."

"Pause here, then, and as soon as I disappear over the brink, follow."

Tom King promised compliance with this request, and young Minton set forward.

The distance to the brink of the old quarry was merely a few yards, so the distance was quickly passed over.

When he saw him disappear, however, Tom King felt a strange foreboding sensation come over him, and he wished some other arrangement had been made.

He feared some harm would befall the young stranger, who he already began to like, though so short a time had elapsed since their first meeting.

He darted forward in a moment, though he was careful to sink down, as he had been directed, and look over the brink while lying face downwards.

By adopting this precaution it was scarcely possible for him to be seen by anyone who might happen to be below, since only a part of his head and the upper portion of his face was visible.

Looking down Tom perceived that young Minton had already descended to a considerable depth by means of a rude and precipitous winding path.

The scene which the highwayman beheld from this point was one of rare sylvan beauty.

Below him was a huge, irregular-shaped dingle, which, as the young Minton had truly said, was completely overgrown with dense vegetation.

Here and there huge masses of rock jutted boldly out, thus relieving the monotony of the scene.

Take it for all in all, it was as delightful and picturesque a spot as could be found all over England.

The depth of this excavation was in proportion to its vast extent.

The consequence was, that a kind of gloom rested near the bottom, for there was not yet light enough in the sky to illuminate this singular place.

As he continued to gaze, however, Tom's eyes became more and more accustomed to the obscurity, so that he was able to follow the movements of young Minton with great ease.

Down he went, still lower and deeper down, until at length he paused upon a small plateau, formed by a ledge of rock.

Upon this, however, dust and seeds had from time to time fallen, so that now it was covered with soft fine turf.

It was here that young Minton paused.

Drawing his sword, he looked around him, and Tom expected every moment to hear the faint whistle arise from the depths below.

But he was disappointed.

Young Minton started, and uttered a faint ejaculation. Tom saw he was looking across to the opposite side of the quarry, and he followed his gaze in that direction.

He then caught sight of the form of a man who was making his way down into the quarry in the same way it seemed as young Minton had done.

"That is Godfrey Royston, I suppose," Tom muttered to himself; "and he is alone, too. That confirms my suspicions. How carefully he descends! I wish I had not made that arrangement with young Minton. He is a long way off me if anything should occur I fear I could render him but little assistance. He must look to himself, however. For my own part, I will get a couple of pistols ready; but it seems from this point I can be nothing more than a mere spectator of what goes on below."

CHAPTER CCCCLXXII.

TOM KING IS A WITNESS TO A TERRIBLE TRAGEDY IN THE OLD QUARRY.

THE aspect of affairs in the old quarry was curious and peculiar, and promised to become more and more so every moment.

As Tom King had truly said, he was a long way off to render any assistance should circumstances arise such as would make his appearance necessary.

However, it was too late now to make any alteration, and regrets were worse than useless.

Having placed a couple of pistols on the turf beside him, in such a position that he could seize them instantly should occasion render it necessary, Tom laid himself down quite flat, and peeped cautiously over the edge of the abyss.

The time it had taken him to put his pistols in order for instant service was very short, and when he once more looked into the quarry, he found that the new comer was still some distance from the little plateau upon which young Minton was standing.

From his attitude, and from the appearance of the place, Tom judged that this little plateau was the spot selected for the encounter.

He was confirmed in this supposition by perceiving that the individual who he had made up his mind was Godfrey Royston, made his way towards it, while young Minton stood quietly on his guard awaiting his arrival.

The sun had by this time risen, and a material increase in the amount of light was the consequence, so that Tom could see right down in the depths of the quarry with great distinctness.

It must be understood that the plateau we have referred to was about two yards square, and was situated about half-way down the quarry.

On one side of it was the sharp edge of a precipice which descended to a frightful depth.

The highwayman, who was by such a singular concatenation of events destined to be a spectator of this scene, felt all his attention absorbed in watching Godfrey Royston—for he indeed it was.

As he came nearer and nearer to the plateau, and as the sun climbed higher in the sky, Tom was able to observe his personal appearance.

He was a young man, tall, thin, and, for an Englishman, unusually swarthy.

His walk was ungainly, and his limbs were just the reverse of well-knit—his joints having the appearance of being loose.

Nor was his face—at least, what portion of it that was visible—a pleasing one.

His plumed hat was drawn down over his brows, and his chin was buried in the ample cloak that was loosely wrapped around him.

He made his way over the unlevel ground with more agility than one would have given him credit for.

Just below his cloak could be seen the polished tip of the scabbard of his sword, and Tom noticed that Godfrey's right hand was kept in a constrained manner underneath his cloak.

After having seen him, Tom felt his previous suspicions intensified.

He felt that he was a man capable of any amount of villainy.

How far Tom King was correct in his estimate, we shall quickly see.

He wished he could whisper a caution in the ear of young Minton, but, unfortunately, it was not in his power.

His only hope was that the young man was fully on his guard.

By this time, Godfrey Royston arrived upon the plateau.

At the same moment, the sun made his appearance above the edge of the quarry, and sent down a rosy beam of light upon the spot which had been selected for the conflict.

Upon his arrival, Godfrey Royston saluted his opponent with a slight inclination of the head.

He was responded to by a bow that was equally formal.

Then Godfrey Royston, having reached to within about a dozen paces of young Minton, paused and spoke.

His voice came upon Tom's ears with peculiar clearness.

The sound, of course, had a tendency to ascend, and the air was remarkably pure, while as deep a silence reigned in and about that old quarry, as could well be conceived.

"You are surprised to see me here alone and unattended," Godfrey said; "and it seems you are in the same position; but the friend who promised to be my second, failed to keep his appointment with me this morning, and having had to search for him is my excuse for being late. I am not much behind my time, however, and I trust I have not kept you waiting long."

All this sounded plausible enough, but Tom King's suspicions in nowise abated, and he looked down upon the combatants with an interest that had now reached fever point.

Young Minton did not make any verbal reply to Godfrey's speech.

He merely bowed in token that he had heard what the other had just said, and he waved his sword as though to bid his adversary proceed.

And then Tom noticed that there had come over his new friend a fresh accession of that deep despondency from which he was suffering when he first accosted him.

He deeply regretted seeing this, for he believed, and not without reason, that it would give Godfrey the advantage over him.

"My search was an unsuccessful one," continued Royston. "I could not find my friend, and so I came here alone, for I felt I could rather do that than incur an imputation upon my courage. But you are alone and unattended, too. Can it be possible that so extraordinary a coincidence can have taken place? Has your friend disappointed you?"

"He has," said young Minton, in a tone of voice with so much sadness in it that it went direct to Tom King's heart. "He has failed me. A duel without witnesses on either side I cannot possibly engage in, as the consequences would be serious to the survivor. Our meeting must be put off until we can stand fairly face to face."

"It must be as you say," replied Godfrey Royston, who still kept his right hand concealed beneath his cloak. "It is a most vexatious occurrence, but I suppose the only thing we can do is to mutually apologize to one another for the defection of our friends. Ha! What is that at the top of the quarry? Look up!"

These last words were spoken with a very rapid change both in voice and manner.

As a matter of course young Minton started and looked up.

Not only were the words spoken well calculated to cause anyone to do so, but he fancied in a moment that his adversary had perceived Tom King peering over the edge of the abyss.

Tom King thought the same, for Godfrey Royston looked up when he spoke.

It was, then, only natural that he should draw back, and his gaze should be no longer directed into the depths of the quarry.

Almost as he did this, the thought darted into Tom's mind that Godfrey Royston had spoken these words with a sinister intention, and he resolved to peep over again, even at the risk of being seen.

Before he could carry this resolution into effect, however, the intense silence which prevailed about that spot was broken by the loud and ringing report of a pistol.

Tom echoed the sound with a groan.

It was at this instant that he peeped over.

Upon the little plateau one person alone was standing.

It was Godfrey Royston.

Young Minton had disappeared.

Godfrey's hat had fallen to the ground, and his cloak hung loose from his shoulders, so that his face and form were more distinctly visible than they had yet been.

His counteuance was distorted by such an expression of demoniac exultation that it made Tom shudder to look upon it.

Godfrey's hand was no longer hidden beneath his cloak.

His right hand and arm were now in full view.

In his hand he held a pistol, from the muzzle of which the faint blue smoke was curling in fantastic wreaths.

The sun's rays shone glitteringly upon the long and highly polished barrel.

It was for an infinitesimally small space of time that Godfrey Royston stood in this position, for Tom saw him directly after the shot was fired.

And now, with a guilty glance around, the murderer crossed the little plateau with shrinking steps.

He made his way towards that side of it which was bounded by the precipice.

He paused on the brink, and shading the sun from his eyes with one hand, peered down into the depths below.

What had taken place during the moment that Tom King ceased to look scarcely requires to be recorded.

Godfrey Royston, by whose connivance both the seconds had been kept from the scene of action, spoke in the manner we have described, for the purpose of throwing his victim off his guard.

He succeeded only too well.

Quickly and unsuspectingly young Minton raised his eyes, and, at the moment he did so, Godfrey drew his hand from beneath his cloak and fired the pistol, which he had held there concealed, cocked, and ready for instant use.

Young Minton saw his danger, for he looked down again quickly, but he was too late to save himself.

Instinctively he darted back to avoid the bullet.

But it was too late, and he fell backwards over the precipice into the frightful depths below.

It was easy for Tom to surmise what had occurred, although he had not actually witnessed it, and so enraged did he feel to think that such a treacherous and cold-blooded murder had been perpetrated, that he seized one of the pistols he had placed handy to his grasp, and fired it at the figure of the murderer below.

The aim was too hasty a one to be effective at such a distance.

But the sound was sufficient to apprize Godfrey of his danger, and he turned round with a shriek of dismay.

It is a thousand wonders that he did not fall over the precipice after his victim, for the start that he gave almost threw him off his balance.

He recovered himself, however, and turned to fly.

But Tom King was determined that he should not escape.

Taking up his other pistol, he levelled it with greater care, and then fired after the flying form of the dastardly murderer.

This time the shot told.

With a loud scream, Godfrey Royston threw both his arms in the air, and then fell, writhing on the ground like some wounded reptile.

All that we have been compelled to describe at some length, occurred with marvellous rapidity.

As soon as he he had fired this last shot, Tom King commenced a very rapid, and, indeed, reckless descent into the quarry.

He reached the little plateau in the space of a few minutes.

He paid not the slightest attention to Godfrey Royston, who lay groaning on the ground at some little distance.

Going direct to the edge of the precipice, he looked down.

His blood ran cold, and his brain grew giddy when he saw what a frightful depth it was.

He could see nothing of young Minton.

He raised his voice, however, and called to him.

Then waited for a response.

He fancied a faint groan smote upon his ear.

This was enough.

He begun without delay to look about him for some means of accomplishing a descent to the lowest depths of the quarry.

[CLAUDE DUVAL WITNESSES THE ESCAPE OF THE MURDERER FROM THE ROADSIDE INN.]

He soon discovered a continuation of the winding path, by means of which he had reached the plateau, and he at once set about making an effort to descend by it.

It was a difficult and dangerous enterprise, and more than once he had a narrow escape from falling into the abyss.

But he heeded not his perils.

If it was possible, he would rescue young Minton from his dangerous situation, or, at any rate, he would ascertain the extent of his injuries.

He feared the worst, however; for, even if he had escaped altogether the bullet from Godfrey Royston's pistol, the fall down such a fearful place would be enough to kill him.

"That dejection was but a foreboding of his approaching death, poor fellow," said Tom King as he leaped from a ledge of rock into the lowest part of the quarry.

The body of the unfortunate young Minton was now plainly enough visible.

He lay in a huddled-up mass at the foot of the precipice.

As he approached him, however, Tom felt certain he saw him move, and then he heard him groan feebly.

This was sufficient to cause him to increase his exertions, and he hurried to the spot where the sufferer lay as quickly as the uneven character of the ground would permit.

And now Tom noticed, for the first time, that in all the hollow places at the bottom of the quarry a great quantity of vegetable and other debris had collected, forming a comparatively soft place.

If young Minton had been fortunate enough to fall into one of these hollows there would be some chance of his having escaped severe injuries by his fall.

Upon reaching him he found that such was the case.

At the base of the precipice a larger than usual quantity of debris had collectd.

It was formed of myriads of leaves which had fallen down from the shrubs above, and also of the half-decayed branches of trees.

"Speak—speak," cried Tom King, as he placed young Minton in a more comfortable position. "Speak, if you can, and tell me whether you are much hurt."

The young man groaned, and Tom King took this as a sign that he was conscious, and that he understood what was said to him.

Young Minton, however, was in a very desperate state.

He did not appear to have broken any of his limbs by the fall, but from his breast the blood was flowing in a crimson tide.

Tom bent down over him.

The glassy eyes of the sufferer were fixed upon him, and his lips moved.

But Tom could not catch the sound.

He listened again, and then young Minton, making a greater effort, feebly gasped—

"Water—water!"

"All right; you shall have it," said Tom King, and he rose to his feet as he spoke, but he had not the remotest idea where water was to be found.

He looked about him, however, and at some considerable distance perceived a pool of water.

He hastened towards it at full speed.

Upon reaching its edge he found it was merely a hollow in the rock, apparently filled with rain-water.

Taking off his hat, he filled it with the limpid fluid, and hastened back to his wounded friend.

He found him insensible.

By sprinkling a few drops of water upon his countenance, however, he restored him to consciousness.

He then allowed some more of the water to trickle down his throat, and with the remainder washed away the blood which had congealed round the orifice of the wound.

Upon examination, he found that the bullet had entered the right breast.

Having bathed it well, Tom took off his neckcloth, and having soaked his handkerchief in the water, folded it up and placed it in a lump over the wound, and secured it in its place by means of the neckcloth.

During this operation young Minton fainted again, but the cold water again revived him.

Tom next placed him in a reclining position against the perpendicular wall of the precipice, making him as comfortable as possible.

Young Minton expressed his thanks by a sad, wan smile.

His face was as white as ashes, and he gasped painfully for breath, and, as he gazed upon him, Tom King feared that his trouble would be productive of no beneficial result.

CHAPTER CCCCLXXIII.

TOM KING FINDS HIMSELF THREATENED WITH MUCH DANGER AT MINTON HALL.

THE shadow of death seemed already to have fallen upon Roderick Minton.

The whole appearance of his countenance had changed.

No traces of dejection were visible, but his features were overspread with that unnatural serenity which so frequently is the precursor of death.

Tom King's heart ached when he looked upon him.

By degrees, however, those spasmodic gaspings for breath, to which we have adverted, became less frequent, and he breathed more easily.

Perceiving this, Tom knelt down beside him and addressed him.

"Are you much hurt?" he asked.

Young Minton shook his head.

But whether he meant that he was not much hurt, or whether he did not comprehend the extent of his injuries, the highwayman could not tell.

Tom King spoke again

"Tell me, my friend, what I can do for you. I reproach myself for having made the suggestion I did. Had I not done so, this would not have happened."

Roderick made an impatient gesture.

"I anticipated evil," continued Tom; "but nothing so bad as cold-blooded, treacherous murder. But these regrets now are perfectly useless, and cannot do the least good. Tell me what I can do to alleviate your sufferings."

"Water!" said Roderick, again.

More water was given to him, and then Tom renewed his question.

The wounded man raised his eyes and looked up at the edge of the quarry high above their heads.

"The ascent is ragged and precipitous," said Tom King, in reply to his glance. "It was with difficulty that I made my way down. I cannot carry you up, for, as you are wounded, you will require to be moved with the greatest care."

Young Minton nodded.

"What, then, can I do? I do not like to leave you here."

There was a short pause, and then Roderick, who was evidently recovering from his frightful fall, spoke in a whispering tone of voice.

"I know you cannot carry me up the sides of the quarry. You will find great difficulty and danger in ascending yourself."

"But I will go—only I do not like to leave you here. Do you think you would hurt if I was to make my way up above, mount my horse, and ride off for assistance?"

"You forget."

"Forget what?"

"You are a highwayman."

"True."

"It is now broad daylight, and it will be perilous in the extreme for you to think of carrying out your kind intention."

"Never mind the peril. I will do it if you think you will be safe remaining here."

"A thousand thanks. But Godfrey Royston? The villain fired at me when I was off my guard. Where is he?"

"I do not think you need fear anything from him."

"Why not?"

"Because I was so exasperated at his treachery that I fired at him from above."

"And you hit him?"

"Yes, I brought him down just at the moment when he was felicitating himself upon the achievance of his triumph."

"The villain was justly punished. Have you killed him?"

"No, I think not; but he is, certainly, very badly wounded. You see, therefore, that you have nothing to fear from him. And now, if you like, I will go."

"How can I thank you for this?"

"Nay, it is merely an atonement. Where shall I go to for assistance? Doubtless you know the locality well. Where is the nearest place that I can obtain assistance?"

"Minton Hall."

"I know it well, and will hasten there at once."

"A thousand—thousand thanks."

"Hush—hush! I am not worthy to receive them. But when I reach the Hall, shall I not be looked upon with suspicion?"

"It may be so."

"Do you think you could write?"

"I will try."

"Have you writing materials about you?"

"Yes; in this breast-pocket you will find a memorandum-book and a lead-pencil. Take them out, and give them to me."

Tom obeyed, and, having taken out the book, opened it where there was a blank leaf.

Roderick Minton took the pencil, though he could scarcely close his fingers round it.

Tom King held the pocket-book as firmly as he could in a convenient position, and young Minton traced some irregular words upon it.

They were great, sprawling letters, and the few lines he wrote completely covered the page.

When he had done, he signed his name, and then said—

"Read it aloud to me."

Tom King complied, and read as follows:—

"DEAR FATHER,—I am badly hurt, and lie in the depths of the old quarry. The bearer of this has succoured me at the peril of his life, and has promised to convey this scrawl to you. Send speedy assistance, or I shall die.—RODERICK MINTON."

"That will do," he said.

"I will deliver the letter with all speed," said Tom King, placing the book in his pocket. "Is there anything more I can do to render you comfortable while I am absent?"

"No—no. I feel easier now. Be speedy."

"I am gone," said Tom King. "Farewell for a short time only. Ere long you will see me return with ample assistance."

With these words, Tom hastened to leave the quarry.

But he found the task of ascending by the narrow, winding path much more difficult and toilsome than he had anticipated.

At length, however, the little plateau was gained.

Here Tom paused to gather breath and strength for accomplishing the remainder of the ascent.

He glanced around him in search of Godfrey Royston, but he had disappeared.

Tom did not waste time by stopping to look for him, but climbed up the remainder of the distance.

Upon gaining the summit, the whole scene around was as tranquil as when he left it.

The two horses remained tethered to the tree, and were busily engaged in cropping the sweet herbage which grew about its root.

To hasten to his own steed, unfasten the reins, mount, and gallop away, took Tom King but a moment.

Away he flew over the fields at a speed that was absolutely alarming, but he felt that he was bound upon an errand of life and death.

No thought of his own deadly peril in galloping in broad daylight across the open country entered the highwayman's mind.

His thoughts were intent upon but one object, that was, reaching Minton Hall in the shortest possible space of time.

Soon, then, appeared before him the gabled roofs of the picturesque old mansion.

Boldly enough Tom King made his way towards it, not checking his horse's pace in the least degree.

At length he pulled up suddenly before the iron entrance gates, at which he had parted with Miss Minton not many hours before.

The gates were closed, but espying a massive bell handle, he pulled it vigorously.

A clanging peal was the result, and a man immediately appeared, with a key to open the gate.

"Quick—quick!" cried Tom King, as soon as he saw him. "Let me in, I must see Mr. Minton immediately upon a matter of life and death."

The gates were accordingly opened with unusual alacrity, and Tom King, passing through them, galloped up the broad avenue leading to the hall.

Upon reaching the front door he pulled up and sprang himself off his panting steed.

"Mr. Minton," he cried to the domestics who made their appearance. "Take me to him at once. My business is most urgent."

"This way, sir; this way. Follow me. Mr. Minton is in the oak parlour.

Tom King followed the speaker across the hall, where he paused at a partially-closed door.

The murmur of voices fell upon the highwayman's ear.

The servant knocked, but his summons was disregarded.

"And so you see," Tom heard a voice say, "you were deceived—deceived as completely as anyone ever could be. Ha! ha! We shall always have the laugh of you after this. Ha! ha!"

"Ha! ha!" laughed another voice.

When the sounds of merriment had subsided somewhat, the servant tapped again.

This time, he was bidden to enter.

Tom King, however, plucked him back just as he was about to do so, and entered himself, closing the door carefully behind him.

The scene which he beheld was rather a curious one.

Seated at the fireside, in a luxurious easy-chair, was an elderly gentleman, whom Tom King immediately recognised as Mr. Minton, from the strong resemblance he bore to Roderick.

Two other persons occupied the apartment,

One was Miss Minton.

The other was Lieutenant Grenne of the dragoons.

Having closed the door, Tom stood with his back against it.

A scream came from the lips of Miss Minton, and a rattling oath from those of Lieutenant Grenne, who immediately laid his hand upon his sword.

Mr. Minton sat still, staring in the utmost astonishment, for, of course, the intrusion was unexpected by him.

Before anyone could speak or move further, Tom King raised his hand with such an impressive gesture that all became silent.

Then, in a loud voice, he said—

"Mr. Minton, I bring you tidings of the dangerous condition of your son, Roderick."

Miss Minton uttered another shriek, as she cried—

"Then the warning was not a false one, after all?"

"Here, my fine fellow," said Lieutenant Grenne, advancing a step, "be good enough to consider yourself my prisoner. If you resist, or attempt to escape, you are a dead man."

Tom looked at him calmly, as he replied—

"My errand concerns Mr. Minton. I tell him again, that his son, Roderick, is in peril of his life, and requires immediate assistance."

"You have robbed and half-murdered him, no doubt," interposed the lieutenant.

"No—no! I will not believe that," said Miss Minton.

"Take this pocket-book," said Tom King, handing it to her opened at the page upon which Roderick had written. "Read what it says there, and tell me what you intend to do."

"It is Roderick's hand," she cried.

Mr. Minton had by this time recovered himself sufficiently from the first shock of his surprise, and he looked at the pocket-book.

Miss Minton read the words aloud.

"Oh! heavens!" she cried. "What must be done?"

"Let assistance be sent at once," said Tom King. "If he is brought here carefully, I fancy that even now all may yet be well. If you wish it, although it is perilous to myself, I will lead you to the spot where he is to be found."

"Not so fast, my friend," said the lieutenant. "You are my prisoner, recollect."

"Don't be a fool."

"Sir!"

"I say, don't be a fool."

"I don't intend, Tom King, and that is why I arrest you now."

"Stand off, sir—stand off!" exclaimed the highwayman. "Mr. Minton, chance brought about a meeting between myself and your son, Roderick, and he entrusted me with that pocket-book. It is for you to look to it. He lies, bleeding, and nigh unto death, in the deepest depths of the old quarry."

"He shall be rescued at once. But you, sir—who and what are you?"

It was old Minton who spoke.

"I am Tom King, and a highwayman."

Old Minton was staggered when he heard this declaration.

"And as such," said Lieutenant Grenne, "I make you my prisoner. You shall suffer for last night yet."

"Bah! don't be a fool. Mr. Minton, shall I lead you to the quarry?"

"Yes—yes. My poor boy—my poor boy!"

"But I'm d—d if you lead the way anywhere except to Newgate, you villain," cried Lieutenant Grenne. "Move an inch at your peril!"

"Mr. Minton," said Tom King, "you have heard me declare myself; you have heard my motive for intruding upon you; after that you surely will not allow me to be made a prisoner beneath your roof?"

Old Minton was about to reply, but the lieutenant prevented him.

"If he or anyone else," he said, wrathfully, "attempts to obstruct me in the discharge of my duty, they will have to take the consequences."

"Very well," said Tom King. "That is enough."

Then, turning to Mr. Minton, he added—

"Sir, I have performed my mission; I have made you acquainted with the desperate condition of your son; I have brought his own writing to avouch it. The rest remains in your hands. The position of the old quarry must be well known to you, and you can find it easily enough. He is where I have described. Be speedy if you wish to find him alive."

"Lieutenant," said old Minton.

"Sir?" replied the officer.

"After hearing this, surely you will not carry into practice your threat of making this man a prisoner?"

"Shan't I, by ——? But you'll find I shall, sir," was the reply. "And now, Mr. Highwayman, let's have no more of your d—d nonsense. You are my prisoner. Hand me your weapons."

"Wouldn't you like it?" said Tom King. "Take that, and that, and catch me if you can!"

As he uttered these words, Tom sprang forward with great suddenness, and gave the lieutenant a couple of terrific blows with his clenched fists.

So powerfully, rapidly, and skilfully were the blows administered that the officer had no time to defend himself, and before he could tell what had happened, he measured his full length on the floor.

Having obtained this victory, Tom King sprang on to the low sill of the window, which opened like a folding door.

He turned the little button that secured it, and flung the window open.

For a moment he paused where he was to speak to the two Mintons.

"Farewell," he cried. "By the love you have for Roderick, send assistance to the old quarry. If you linger you will find him a corpse. Farewell."

As he spoke, Tom sprang off the window-sill on to the lawn.

At the same moment the lieutenant, who had recovered himself, fired a couple of pistols after the flying form of the highwayman, and then springing through the window himself commenced a vigorous pursuit.

Tom King, however, had no difficulty in reaching the front door where his horse was still standing.

He vaulted into the saddle in an instant, and set off at full speed down the avenue.

The lieutenant ran a few yards, and then he felt how ridiculous it was to follow a mounted man on foot.

He had no intention of given up the chase so easily, however, but ran to the stable and saddled his horse with his own hands, for the intelligence which Tom King had brought had filled the whole house with consternation.

He was not long in performing this service, but when he got outside of the lodge-gates and looked around him, he could see no signs whatever of the daring highwayman.

He feared that after all he had had his trouble for nothing, and that for the second time in less than twelve hours Tom King had got the better of him.

CHAPTER CCCCLXXIV.

CONTAINS THE SEQUEL TO THE STRANGE OCCURRENCES IN THE OLD QUARRY, AND RELATES HOW TOM KING HAD A STRUGGLE WITH LIEUTENANT GRENNE.

We fancy the reader will feel more interested in the fortunes of Tom King than in those of Lieutenant Grenne of the dragoons, and, therefore, we shall not hesitate to leave the latter in order to follow the former.

When Tom King, then, galloped off down the avenue, he reached without accident or interruption the large iron gates leading out into the high road.

They were closed, but the highwayman, glancing behind him, satisfied himself that he was not pursued, and so pulled up and waited calmly until the lodge-keeper should open the gates.

This was done without many moments' delay, and Tom, throwing the man a handful of silver, darted through them, and continued to gallop along the road at full speed.

Finding, however, that there were no signs of a pursuit, he abated his horse's pace, and then muttered—

"What had I better do now, I wonder? I should like to see young Minton fairly out of his present strait, and, if it was not for that confounded, officious lieutenant, I would do it. Let me think, now. What had I better do? I almost think the wisest course would be to make my way back by the most lonely and unfrequented routes I can find to the deserted mansion. I will do that, but at the same time I will contrive to pass the old quarry on my way. Yes, that shall be it."

Having come to this determination, Tom King took his course rapidly in a straight line to the place he had mentioned.

The distance was not great, and he soon arrived.

He reined in his steed near the brink, and took a long and careful look about him.

The ground around the old quarry was remarkably level and open, so that the highwayman could see for a considerable distance.

Nothing, however, met his view of a character to alarm him.

"The expedition has not started yet," he said. "Even now I shall be able to see all that goes on. I will try, though, for more reasons than one, to be an unperceived and unsuspected spectator."

He looked all around him in search of some hiding-place, not only for himself, but for his horse as well.

The level character of the ground around afforded not the slightest opportunity, and so he was driven to the quarry as his only resource.

There, and there alone, could he hope to find a place of concealment.

But it seemed impossible to lead his horse down such a precipitous place, and if he left his horse above while he descended and concealed himself, he would not only be deprived of the means of making a rapid escape, but the horse being seen would plainly indicate that he was somewhere close at hand.

The quarry, however, was of vast extent, and Tom was not without the hope that at some portion or other of its circumference he should be able to find a more easy path by which the descent could be made than any he had yet seen.

With this hope, he walked his horse along the brink of the abyss, looking narrowly below him as he did so for some indications of such a path as he wished to find.

After going rather a long distance, however, without being able to see anything of the kind, he suddenly came upon a rude kind of cart-road, which appeared to him to lead down to the lowest depths of the quarry.

This path was on the side opposite to that upon which the murder had been committed, and from its appearance the highwayman concluded that in former times it had been used for the purpose of conveying the masses of stone to the surface.

In this conjecture he was probably right.

At any rate, there was the road—rather rough and precipitous, it was true—but still it was perfectly possible to descend by it.

Without loss of time, Tom King, as soon as he perceived it, slipped off his horse, after having given one searching glance about him to ascertain whether any of his foes were upon his track.

But he could see nothing of them, though coming from the direction of Minton Hall he saw a throng of persons who, he rightly judged, had set out for the purpose of rescuing Roderick.

They were in the far distance, and Tom had no fear of being seen by them.

All seemed well; so, taking his horse by the bridle, he began to lead him down the dangerous road.

It was formed apparently of solid rock, but it had been overgrown with some kind of parasitic moss, which liquified when trodden upon, thus materially adding to the difficulty of the descent.

Tom's horse was sure-footed, and the sagacious animal seemed to understand what was required of it, and so trod with the utmost care and deliberation.

And so, by slow degrees, they descended lower and lower, until at length Tom found himself upon a flat, open space, which on three sides was bounded by a precipice, and on the fourth by the side of the quarry.

Here he paused.

It was no part of his intention to lead his horse down to the bottom of the quarry, if he could possibly avoid it, because of the great difficulty of getting him up again.

Nor was there now any need for such a thing, for on the kind of platform we have mentioned stood the ruins of a wooden shed, which many years ago might have served as a place in which the workmen could keep their tools.

Although the shed was in the last stage of dilapidation, Tom fancied it would serve well as a place of concealment for his horse, and he approached it at once.

With some trouble he led his steed over the threshold, but when once he stood beneath the ruined roof of the shed all was well.

As quickly as he could, Tom tied the reins to a projection in the woodwork.

Then, leaving his steed to his own devices, he made his way with as much speed as was consistent with safety to the spot where he had left young Minton, being almost fearful that those he had seen approaching would arrive before he had time to address him.

A tolerably easy winding path led from the plattorm to the depths of the quarry, and having reached here, Tom took his way over the rugged ground towards the opposite side.

As the quarry was small at the bottom in comparison with its dimensions at the top, it took him but a few minutes.

Upon arriving, he found young Minton just as he had left him.

He was propped up against the rock, and did not appear to have moved in the least.

He was not unconscious, for when Tom approached he looked up as though he heard the sound of his footsteps.

His face brightened with pleasure when he saw who it was.

Tom King knelt down beside him and took his hand.

It was cold and clammy.

"I have performed your mission," he said, in reply to the wounded man's inquiring glance. "All is well. Assistance will be here in a few moments."

Roderick thanked him with a smile.

He had no longer the power to speak.

He glanced in the direction of the little pool of water.

Tom comprehended that glance, and gave him more of the refreshing beverage.

An improvement was immediately visible.

"You have been in danger?" he said, inquiringly

"Do not exhaust yourself with talking," said King. "It is true I have been in danger from a lieutenant of dragoons, who seems to be quite at home at Minton Hall; in fact, the one I spoke to you about. Had I consulted my own safety merely, I should have placed as great a distance as possible between this spot and myself."

Young Minton endeavoured to interrupt him.

But Tom went on.

"I felt I could not rest," he said, "until I had seen you in safety, for I consider I am partly the cause of what has happened."

Young Minton made a dissenting gesture.

"When your friends come they will probably be accompanied by Lieutenant Grenne; it is therefore necessary that I should conceal myself. If he does not form one of the party I shall come forth and assist to carry you to the ground above. If he does, I shall, perforce, be compelled to remain hidden."

Young Minton nodded, and looked steadily across the quarry.

Tom followed his gaze, and then he saw that the expected aid was close at hand.

They were coming down the same path as he had himself descended by.

Probably it was known to them as being the easiest means by which the bottom of the quarry could be gained.

"I must hide now," said Tom King, "and if I find it safe to emerge I will do so. There is a projecting rock yonder, and if I get behind that there will be little fear of my being seen."

With these words, Tom darted towards the piece of projecting rock to which he had alluded, and crouched down behind it.

Provided that there was no suspicion of his being hidden somewhere in the vicinity, it would answer his purpose very well, although the hiding-place was of such an artificial character.

He was only just in time, for now, with loud shouts and cries, the party from the Hall dispersed themselves about in search for Roderick.

It was not long before they found him.

His father was loud in the expressions of his grief when he saw the state to which his only son had been reduced, and he uttered loud curses upon his murderer.

Miss Minton, too, was there, and she flung herself down on the rock near her brother.

He smiled faintly, and strove to take her hand in his.

"Home—home," he gasped; "home as quickly as may be."

At this moment, those persons who had formed part of the expedition, and who consisted of domestics from the Hall, cried out—

"Here comes Doctor Bache — here comes Doctor Bache!"

A young and pleasant-looking man now made his appearance upon the scene.

He was the nearest medical man, and he had been sent for with an urgent request to return with the messenger.

He did so.

All drew back now, in order to allow him an opportunity of examining the hurts of the wounded man.

By this time Tom King had ascertained that Lieutenant Grenne did not form one of the party, but he was so interested in what was going forward, that he forgot to disclose himself.

Doctor Bache looked grave when he rose up after having completed his examination, and he said—

"This is a dangerous case, and the greatest care will be required. Some of you must go and procure a litter, or something of the kind. Be as quick as you can, for we cannot remove him without."

Several of the domestics at once quitted the scene for that purpose.

Roderick Minton now signified his wish to speak, but the doctor would not permit it.

At this moment Tom King came from his place of concealment.

All looked surprised when he made his appearance.

Roderick Minton uttered a faint, but unmistakable cry of joy.

All observed it.

"I am here," said Tom King, "because I wish, in the presence of all here, to relate how and in what manner Roderick Minton received the injuries which I feared were fatal."

"But, my dear sir," said Doctor Bache, "why repeat them to us? A magistrate is the proper person to receive your depositions."

"I am aware of that. But, hear me out first, and I will give you my reasons afterwards. I charge you all to pay particular attention to what I say, so as to be able to recollect it at another time. Mr. Roderick Minton will witness whether I speak the truth, because, from time to time, I shall pause in my narrative, and then, if he nods his head, you will understand that I have spoken the truth."

This was assented to.

Then Tom King commenced a brief but full relation of all those circumstances with which the reader is already well acquainted.

It can be imagined with what mingled feelings his narrative was listened to; which, it is needless to say, young Minton confirmed every time he was appealed to.

Having finished, Tom said—

"And now, having performed my mission, and atoned for my share in what has happened, I will tell you who and what I am, and then you will say that I have adopted the only course that was open to me."

Just as Tom spoke, those who had been dispatched for the litter returned, and made their appearance upon the scene.

They were accompanied by someone who came for the first time to the old quarry.

It was Lieutenant Grenne.

He had tired his horse by an unsuccessful search after Tom King, and, happening to be near the quarry when the bearers of the litter arrived, he resolved to descend with them.

He caught sight of Tom immediately, and drawing a pistol, he cried—

"In the king's name I call upon all here present to seize upon that man. There are five hundred pounds reward offered for his apprehension, alive or dead. It is Tom King, the highwayman."

Doctor Bache and those who were unaware of Tom's identity looked as astonished as they might well do upon hearing such a revelation made.

"Stand where you are, sir," said Lieutenant Grenne, addressing Tom King, and pointing his pistol at him as he spoke. "You are my prisoner. If you attempt to move, I fire."

"Fire away, then," cried Tom King, defiantly. "I am no man's prisoner as yet. Farewell all."

As he spoke, Tom darted suddenly from the spot upon which he had been standing, and made his way towards the winding path by which he had descended to the quarry.

At that instant Lieutenant Grenne fired.

But the highwayman had been quick in his movements, and so escaped the shot.

The lieutenant uttered a scream of vexation.

Mr. Minton, Roderick's father, caught him by the arm.

"Surely, sir," he said, "after all that has occurred, surely you will let him go?"

"If I do, may I be d—d. Let go your hold, sir."

He wrenched his arm from Mr. Minton's detaining grasp as he spoke.

But this detention, trifling as it was, was of great service to Tom King.

It enabled him to get a wonderful start of his pursuer, for Lieutenant Grenne at once gave chase after breaking away from Mr. Minton.

Tom King dashed up the precipitous path in the manner a man would who knew he was flying for his life.

The lieutenant made good speed, too, but happening to miss his footing, he fell heavily to the ground.

All the other persons who had collected in the quarry, Roderick himself included, looked upon the chase with all-absorbing interest, and something like a cry of gratification came from the lips of all of them when they witnessed the discomfiture of the dragoon.

But in a marvellously short space of time the lieutenant was on his feet again.

Heedless altogether of the bruises and scratches he had received, he recommenced the pursuit with great vigour, determining not to be baulked in his object.

In the meantime, Tom King had gained the little shed in which he had left his horse, and had brought him forth.

A cheer from those in the depths below greeted him as he did so.

He raised his hat and bowed.

At this moment he saw how close behind him the lieutenant was, and he fancied that after all he should be obliged to have a tussle with him before he could get free.

CHAPTER CCCCLXXV.

FORTUNE FAVOURS TOM KING ON HIS RETURN TO THE DESERTED MANSION.

And so Tom King abandoned his intention of mounting his horse and turned round to face his adversary.

With a scream of anger, the lieutenant of dragoons rushed from the winding path on to the platform.

Tom King ran forward to meet him.

Lieutenant Grenne had not drawn his sword, and still held in his hand the pistol he had so ineffectually discharged.

Tom closed with him at once, not giving him the opportunity of providing himself with another weapon.

The lieutenant dropped the useless pistol, and grappled with Tom King.

A furious struggle then ensued.

Lieutenant Grenne was really a brave man, and he called for no assistance.

He sternly determined not to suffer another defeat, but to capture this highwayman single-handed.

With this intention he put forth his utmost strength and skill.

In height and weight he had greatly the advantage of Tom King, whose figure was inclined to slimness.

But Tom had skill and courage, while his muscles were as hard and as pliant as steel.

Between two such combatants as these the struggle was sure to be a severe one.

It was a dangerous place, too, for both of them, for the rocky platform was of very limited area indeed, and a fall over either one of its three precipice-bounded sides would result in the certain death of both.

When the lieutenant felt his opponent firmly in his grasp, he made sure of victory, forgetting at the moment that Tom King had far more incentive to struggle to the utmost than he had.

Round and round they went—now to one side, now to the other, mutually avoiding the edge of the precipices.

Lieutenant Grenne was not long in finding that he had no common enemy opposed to him, and his rage and vexation knew no bounds.

Tom made every effort, and it is not to be wondered at that he should do so, for, apart from all other considerations, he could not tell how soon some of the lieutenant's companions might peep down into the quarry and see what was taking place.

In the event of that, there would be all end to an escape.

The combatants had several times fallen to the ground, locked in each other's embrace, but they had rose both at once, neither appearing to have gained the advantage.

The bruises which they thus sustained made them still more furious.

And so the struggle went on.

In a short time, however, the dragoon felt that he was getting the worst of it, and he began to despair of achieving the victory about which he had felt so much confidence.

A feeling of utter and reckless desperation took possession of him when he made this discovery.

Feeling that he could not win, he made up his mind that his now more-than-ever-hated foe should not.

He should not, even if he had to perish with him.

Maddened by the conflict, and regardless of all personal consequences, the lieutenant endeavoured to drag Tom King towards one of the precipices.

When he had done so, he fully intended to fling him over, even if his own certain death was the immediate result.

But Tom was not long in penetrating this design, and he felt that the moment had arrived when the contest must be put an end to.

Gathering all his remaining strength and skill, Tom disengaged himself for a moment from the grasp of the dragoon.

Then clenching his fist he rushed at his opponent, and delivered a terrific blow just as he was coming with full force towards him.

The lieutenant staggered, but did not fall.

He was, however, effectually prevented from seizing his antagonist a second time.

But he came forward with that intention, and Tom received him with a second blow, which he closely followed up by a third.

Lieutenant Grenne then lay motionless and prostrate on the ground.

After having thus gained the victory, Tom wiped his dripping brow, and made another bow to those who were standing in the quarry, and whose interest was so strongly excited that they had not moved a limb.

A ringing cheer came from all of them, in which the wounded Roderick feebly joined.

This plainly enough evinced their partiality to our old friend, who, after bowing again, took his horse by the bridle and commenced leading him up the steep and rugged path.

To have attempted to ascend while mounted would have been perfect madness, for, owing to the slipperiness of the rock, the horse could with difficulty advance.

At length, however, the top was gained, and then Tom King sprang into the saddle.

Another cheer came from the depths of the quarry.

Tom waved his hat in reply, and at once galloped off, having the satisfaction about his heart that through him young Minton would be well attended to, while the guilty Godfrey Royston would not escape condign punishment.

Tom King once more turned his horse's head towards the deserted mansion, which he now resolved to gain without further loss of time.

He knew how great would be the anxiety of his comrades, and they would surmise the worst had happened when they found he did not return at the appointed hour.

The day was well advanced, and his journey could not fail to be attended with much danger.

But he put into execution every means he could think of in order to escape observation.

Very wisely, he made the resolution not to be tempted into stopping any other traveller, but to put up for the time being with his ill-luck, and wait until a better opportunity presented itself.

On his return, his mind was pretty fully occupied with thinking over the details of the adventure which had last befallen him.

The reader will admit that it was of a character to furnish ample food for reflection.

He was baffled and puzzled when he remembered some of the incidents, and he felt convinced that he had not learned all.

Probably, the confidence that had been so strangely placed in him was not complete.

He was much struck with the subtlety with which the murder of young Roderick Minton had been planned.

To have decoyed the youth to that lonely spot would have been difficult, if not impossible, without the adoption of some such scheme as a duel.

By causing the seconds not to keep their appointment, which could easily be done, he made sure of his victim, and but for the chance of Tom King's presence upon the scene he would have succeeded, and the body of the young man would never have been found in the lonesome depths of the quarry.

But with all his cleverness, Godfrey Royston was destined not to succeed in his nefarious schemes.

It was while he was engaged in these reflections that Tom King came in sight of the deserted mansion.

He looked cautiously around him to make sure that he was not observed, but all was still, not a human being was in sight.

Satisfied upon this point, he continued on his way with great confidence.

At every few yards he would look around him, but with the same favourable result.

Presently the mansion gates were reached.

His horse hastened through them and along the avenue with a feeling of pleasure, for the intelligent creature knew well enough that she would now be permitted to take a little rest.

Almost immediately after taking a turn in the avenue that concealed the lane, Tom was accosted by Claude Duval.

His delight when he found that his comrade had returned sound in wind and limb can be imagined.

Tom's first question was whether Sixteen-String Jack had returned, and he was, of course, replied to in the affirmative.

Dick Turpin, too, had not returned—for the reader must bear in mind that the incidents we are describing took place on the day that followed the night when Turpin set forth.

At the time Tom King arrived at the deserted mansion, the reader will remember that Turpin was sleeping soundly in one of the bedrooms at the "White Horse," while old Matthew was running some serious risks in disposing of the booty.

Tom led his horse to the stable, and, having attended to its wants, followed Claude Duval upstairs to the room where Maud was waiting for them.

As for Sixteen-String Jack, he was sleeping off his night's fatigue, but, upon hearing that Tom King had returned, immediately made his appearance.

He, too, was rejoiced at his return.

As Tom was thoroughly worn out by all that he had gone through, he hastened to throw himself down on one of the beds, after first partaking of some slight refreshment.

Sixteen-String Jack returned to finish his nap, and in this way the remainder of the day was spent.

Towards dusk they rose, and then they had to give an account of their adventures.

Tom could not help feeling a great deal of chagrin when he found how successful his comrade had been, for the valise taken from the post-chaise contained a very large sum in gold indeed.

"There is some satisfaction for me to-night, at all events," said Claude Duval, as he rubbed his hands briskly together.

"What is that?"

"Why, it will not depend upon the date on a guinea whether I go out on the road to-night. I am independent of that, and have made every preparation."

"Yes, that's true enough," said Tom King. "It rests between Sixteen-String Jack and myself to-night."

"I am sure to go, and I only hope fortune will favour me a little better than she has you, Tom."

"I hope so, too, with all my heart. If she does not, you will be badly off indeed."

"Nevertheless, you had some highly-entertaining adventures."

"I don't dispute that; but they did not help us at all in our design."

"Very true, and that is what we have got to do just at present."

"Of course it is."

"Well," said Claude, "in a little time I intend to be off."

"Good luck to you. Which road shall you take?"

"I have not decided."

"It will be best to make up our minds before starting."

"I quite agree with you. I think I shall try the Edgware-road."

"Good, but take care of the dragoons."

"Oh! let me alone for that; and now, as we have settled that point, suppose you draw lots with each other as to which is to go and which is to stay."

"Agreed," said Tom. "Now, Jack, get a couple of guineas of different dates.

This was done, and the lots drawn in the same manner as before.

Chance favoured Tom King at last.

The lot fell upon him, and Sixteen-String Jack had to keep watch and ward.

After all, this was no more and no less than it ought to be.

It would scarcely have been fair for Sixteen-String Jack to be successful two nights in succession.

By this time the darkness had considerably deepened, and Claude Duval and Tom King announced their intention of setting out without further delay, in order to take advantage of the best part of the evening.

Maud was very still and sad.

As the reader will have perceived, she took no part in the highwaymen's conversation.

She had seated herself near the fire, and, leaning her head upon her hand, gazed pensively at the glowing embers.

She was thinking about Turpin, and wondering where he was, and whether he was threatened with any serious danger.

A heavy foreboding of coming sorrow sat heavy at her heart and crushed her spirits.

She scarcely glanced upwards when Claude and Tom announced their intention of taking their departure.

Sixteen-String Jack persisted in accompanying them to the stables, though they wished him to stay and keep company with Maud, whose melancholy and dejection they could not fail to notice.

Still they judged it would be best to make no remark about it, and were silent accordingly.

Upon hearing Sixteen-String Jack express his wish to descend with them, she desired him to do so, stating that she should not be at all afraid to be left alone for a short time.

That Jack must have had some motive in so strongly urging his wish to accompany them his comrades were aware, and so as they were crossing the little bit of neglected garden that led to the stables, Tom King said—

"Now, Jack, what is it you wish to say to us? I can tell there is something by your manner."

"It is perhaps not very important, but still I felt desirous not to speak upon the subject in the presence of Maud."

"What subject?"

"Why, the mysterious sounds which we have all heard. What sort of night have you had."

"Ah! tell us, Claude," said Tom King. "I suppose my ill-luck puts me out, but I quite forgot to ask you anything about it."

"I did not mention it myself," said Claude Duval, "on account of Maud, and I am glad we have got the opportunity of saying a few words to each other alone."

"What has happened?"

"Come into the stable, and I will tell you there. We shall then be losing no time, for we shall be able to go on saddling our horses just the same."

This was at at once assented to and the three highwaymen entered the stable.

"Now," said Tom King, "begin, Claude, for I am burning with impatience to hear what you have got to say."

"It is nothing definite. About the usual time we were startled by a repetition of the same hideous sound which had previously alarmed us."

"Well—well. What then? Did you discover anything?"

"I will tell you. Upon hearing the cry, which seemed ten times louder and more horrible than before, Maud manifested so much terror that it was as much as I could do to calm her."

"And did you succeed?"

"Only partially. The poor girl was frightened to death, and I must confess that I myself fairly felt my flesh creep on my bones."

"What next?"

"I soothed Maud as much as I could, and endeavoured to lessen her agitation. Before I could succeed, however, the cry came again."

"Did you descend?"

"No. Maud was so petrified with fear that she could not move, and clung to me so tightly for protection that I felt I dare not leave her by herself.

"How long did the sounds continue?

"We heard it four times."

"And you did not descend?"

"No."

"Did you hear the clashing of steel?"

"No."

"Is that all?"

"Nearly. After Sixteen-String Jack returned, I descended to look for you, and took the opportunity of entering the old armoury."

"Yes—yes!"

"But I found all things precisely in the same state as they were when we saw them together."

CHAPTER CCCCLXXVI.

DESCRIBES HOW CLAUDE DUVAL SET A TRAP FOR THE TRAVELLERS ON THE DOVER ROAD.

A PAUSE ensued after Claude Duval had spoken these words.

His comrades looked in each others' countenances aghast.

"There is some deep mystery in all this," said Tom King, presently. "I will find it out, too. It must be found out. If things go on in this manner, we shall be driven mad."

"We cannot put up with it."

"Of course not. Jack, my friend, if you should happen to hear those sounds to-night—and doubtless you will—try your best to discover what it is that produces them. I could almost feel it in my heart to abandon my enterprise, and spend the night watching and waiting in the old armoury."

"No—no; that will never be worth while," said Sixteen-String Jack. "Go on, and good luck to you. I will find out all I can if I have the chance."

"Agreed, then. But you had better return to Maud. She will be terrified at being left alone so long."

"And you are just ready to start?"

"We are."

"Farewell, then. But, above all, try to return before dawn."

"We will."

"I mention it, because I expect Dick, and I should like you to all get back before he arrives."

"All right, Jack. Bear in mind what we have said."

"Oh! trust me for that."

"Once more, then, farewell."

With these words Tom King and Claude Duval set their horses in motion, and in a minute or two reached the gates we have so often had occasion to mention.

Here they paused for caution's sake, for it was important to learn whether anyone might chance to be in the lane.

But all was still; and, after listening a moment longer, the two highwaymen rode forth.

"And now, Tom," said Claude Duval, "what are your intentions?—which way do you intend to take?"

"The Windsor-road; that is, if you have not decided upon it."

"No," returned Claude. "I have been thinking matters over, and I have made up my mind to have an adventure of a very startling character indeed."

"Be careful."

"I have made every preparation, and arranged in my mind all that I intend to do."

"Which is the road?"

"The Dover-road."

"The Dover-road?"

"Yes. We have not shown ourselves in that quarter; and I think I shall be able to pick up a first-rate booty there, if I am not altogether out in my calculations."

"What are your calculations?"

"Well, never mind just at present. If I succeed, you will, on my return, hear all about it, but, until then, I have made up my mind to be silent."

"Very well, just as you like. I have not arranged any further than the particular road I am going to try."

"Very well, then. I hope, with all my heart, you won't be so unlucky as you were last night."

"No, confound it."

"We had better part here, I think, and each take our separate ways."

"Yes, we must part. Good night."

"Good night," was the reply.

The two highwaymen then trotted off in different directions, and were quickly out of sight of each other.

The night was young; indeed, to speak truth, it was as yet only evening; but Claud Duval set off at a sharp pace.

He had a long way to go, and, unless he made good speed, he would not be able to reach his destination until after the time he had arranged in his own mind.

As usual, Claude took the most unfrequented paths, in order not to meet with the dragoons; for, after what Tom King had said, the necessity of avoiding them was all the more apparent.

Without meeting with any accident, however, and without the occurrence of any incident deserving of being placed before the reader, Claude Duval cantered into the Dover-road.

Before the invention of railways, this was one of the busiest roads leading out of the metropolis, and, of course, a hundred and thirty years ago looked very different to what it is to-day.

Of all the roads he could think of, this one promised to be the most profitable, and an inspection of the map will show that Claude's expectations were well grounded.

He did not venture to emerge into the Dover-road, however, until he was some distance from London, for he calculated that the further into the country he got, the less fear there would be of his meeting with the dragoons.

Had anyone been near enough to observe him, it would have been seen that there was upon his countenance an expression of very great satisfaction, as though he was highly pleased at something or other.

"A little further on," he said, gleefully, "and then I will set my trap. If I do not catch something that will astonish them, it will be very odd to me."

From these words it will be seen that Claude had resolved upon some very peculiar plan of action indeed.

What it is, we need not pause to describe, because we shall have a good opportunity of observing all his actions.

On he went, allowing several persons to pass him without molestation.

At length he came to a small village, through which he trotted at full speed.

He soon left it behind him, and, after continuing his way for about five miles, all at once drew rein.

He was now in a lonely part of the Dover-road that lay between two insignificant villages.

They were nearly ten miles apart, and scarcely a house could be seen all along the road between them.

Claude calculated that where he had halted was, as nearly as possible, half-way between these two villages, and, therefore, he had little fear of interruption.

"Now to set the trap," he said; "and if it does not answer first-rate, I never made a greater mistake in all my life. It is a first-rate place to try it. There's no mistake about that. Woa! gently, now—gently, will you?"

These last words were addressed to his steed, which seemed rather inclined to be restive.

With great agility Claude then dismounted, and secured his steed to a convenient branch.

This done, his next proceeding was to lie down at full length in the middle of the high road, with his ear turned towards the ground.

He then listened intently.

[TOM KING COMPELS LORD STRACEY TO DISMOUNT AND SURRENDER HIS HORSE.]

By the adoption of this manœuvre he was able to tell whether anything was approaching.

Satisfied apparently with this, he sprang lightly and easily to his feet, saying, as he did so—

"Now for the trap!"

Turning up his long vest, he proceeded to uncoil something that was round his waist.

That something was rope.

It was fine, but very strong, and of considerable length.

He had concealed it about his person in the early part of the day when he first resolved upon the stratagem that he was now about to put into execution.

In less than a minute the whole of the rope was unwound.

Claude then took one end in his hand, and walked to the side of the road.

Here, and on the other side likewise, some tall trees were growing.

To the trunk of one of these, and as near the root as possible, he secured the rope, taking care that the knot he tied was a good one, and well able to bear a sudden strain.

He tested it several times as well as he could, and then, with a nod of satisfaction, he ran across to the opposite side of the highway.

The rope was plenty long enough for the purpose, and he passed the other end round the trunk of another tree, and secured it in the same careful manner as before.

When this was done, the rope was stretched tightly across the road at a distance of about six inches from the ground.

In the darkness it was quite invisible, so closely did the colour of the rope assimilate to the colour of the road itself.

When he had done this, Claude rubbed his hands briskly together, to show how well pleased he was with what he had done so far.

Going into the centre of the highway, he stooped down,

No. 100 will be Published next Thursday.

and, pressing on the rope with his hand, found that it yielded just about as much as he intended it should.

"I think it will do," he muttered. "And now to keep watch. I would lay any odds the trap answers."

With these words, Claude returned to the spot where he had left his horse, and sprang once more into the saddle.

Here he sat still enough, listening intently for any faint sound that might betoken the approach of a traveller.

He whiled away the time by looking to the priming of his pistols, for it was important that they should not fail him when the moment for action arrived.

He knew they were well loaded, so that the only thing he had cause to be solicitous about was the priming.

Suddenly, however, as he was thus engaged, there came upon his ears a sound which seemed at once to inspire him with new life.

The sound was the clear, ringing hoof-beat of a horse.

A single mounted traveller was approaching.

Claude backed his horse into the shadow of the hedge and remained there motionless.

Dimly beneath him, he could see the rope that was stretched across the roadway.

On—on, nearer and nearer came the horseman.

The iron shoes upon his horse's feet rang out sharp and clear upon the dry, hard road.

He was coming from the direction of the country, and therefore, as a matter of course, going towards London.

Impatiently Claude awaited his arrival.

The traveller came nearer, and as he did so changed the pace of his horse from a gallop to a trot.

In another moment the trap would be reached.

Little dreaming of their danger, on came both horse and rider.

Claude held his breath.

The rope was reached.

Down went the traveller's horse, as though struck with lightning, the moment his fore feet caught against the rope.

Flying over his head went the traveller, and then, after rolling over and over once or twice, both lay still.

"I knew the trap would answer," said Claude, as he slipped from his horse.

It would seem, though, that neither the traveller nor his steed were much hurt by their fall.

The latter, with a snort of alarm and pain, rose to his feet, and, riderless as he was, galloped off at full speed along the road towards London.

The traveller was only stunned for a moment, and he was rising when Claude reached him.

"Hold!" he cried. "Stir not a limb. If you disobey me, your life will pay the penalty!"

"Ten thousand curses!"

"Your money, sir! Quick! Hand it over to me! Do not delay, if you wish to escape with your life."

The tones of Claude's voice were threatening in the extreme.

"Let me get up," said the traveller, "and you shall have what you require."

"All right. Sit up, then," replied Claude. "But recollect that I hold a loaded pistol in my hand, and if I see the least signs of treachery, I will blow your brains out without mercy."

The traveller shook visibly, and removed his hand from the breast of his coat, where he had thrust it.

"Spare my life," he said, abjectly. "Spare my life."

"I will, but only on one condition, which is, that you hand over to me, without a moment's further delay, everything you have about you that may happen to be of the slightest value."

With a groan, the traveller produced a purse.

"More," cried Claude, as he pocketed it. "More, and be quick, or I may grow impatient, and if I do, it will be far from pleasant to yourself, I can assure you."

With several other groans the traveller placed in Claude's hands a number of other articles, nor would the highwayman express himself satisfied until he had taken everything.

"Now," he said, "rise to your feet."

The traveller obeyed.

"Where is my horse?"

"Gone on towards London. Make haste, and you will overtake him."

The traveller uttered an oath.

"I will count three," cried Claude; "and, when I have done so, I shall fire, so the best thing you can do is to run on as fast as possible, and then I shan't have such a good chance of hitting you. One!"

The traveller gnashed his teeth.

"Two!" cried Claude, as he brought his pistol to a level.

With a yell of fear, the traveller ran off down the road towards London, and, before Claude could say "three," he had disappeared in the darkness.

"So far, very good," said the highwayman, complacently. "There is nothing very valuable here, but still it shows the trap answers its purpose admirably. I will just see whether it is all right."

He went up to the rope as he spoke.

It was now rather slacker than before, but still it was none the worse for that; so very contentedly Claude remounted his steed, and waited to see who would next be unfortunate enough to come along the road.

Scarcely had he seated himself in the saddle, than he saw in the distance two small but flashing lights.

"The Dover coach!" he cried. "The Dover coach, as I am a living man! What shall I do now? I had not thought of this. How will the trap answer for this, I wonder? I think I had better untie the rope, and let it go by; it is rather too much for one to tackle. And yet, no. I never let anything pass me yet, and I won't. I will draw back a little, and see how the trap answers. If well, why, then, I shall know what to do."

Claude Duval arrived at his determination just in time, for the Dover coach came rolling along the road at full ten miles an hour, which, all things considered, was a very wonderful rate indeed.

The halo, which the bright lamps cast around them, was distinctly visible, as well as the horses, which were now reeking with steam.

Indeed, he could scarcely have had time to slacken the rope, even if he had been disposed to do so.

He moved a little from where he had been standing, and then, with a rumble like thunder, the mail coach arrived.

The two leading horses entangled their feet in the rope in a moment, and down they went, to the great consternation of the coachman, who was in the middle of a very interesting narrative, addressed to the gentleman who sat near him.

So suddenly did the two leading horses reach the ground, that the other pair, before they could stop themselves, fell over the same obstruction.

But the rope snapped now, unable to bear such sudden and violent shocks.

A tremendous uproar now ensued, every one wanting to know what was the matter.

The coachman, as the saying is, was completely taken aback.

To him the sudden fall of the horses seemed nothing less than magical.

Before anyone could recover from the first shock of alarm the loud report of a pistol was heard.

It was Claude Duval who had fired.

The trap had answered better than he could possibly have expected, and he fired the pistol for the purpose of creating an additional feeling of alarm in the breasts of the passengers.

He succeeded in his design, for everybody fell back, as though the bullet had found a home in their particular breast.

With two bounds Claude Duval reached the carriage.

"My errand is a peaceable one, ladies and gentleman," he said; "that is, if you will let me have my own way. For those who resist there will be nothing but death."

CHAPTER CCCCLXXVII.

CLAUDE DUVAL TAKES A GOOD BOOTY FROM THE DOVER COACH, AND ACHIEVES A SIGNAL VICTORY OVER THE DRAGOONS.

SUNDRY screams of alarm, evidently from female lips, came from the interior of the Dover coach after Claude concluded his highly pacific speech.

Taking no notice of these, the highwayman added—

"Quick!—quick! Hand over to me whatever articles of value you carry, and no further harm shall be done. If you do not yield quietly I shall summon my comrades to my assistance, and they will be by no means gentle, I can assure you."

"Oh! d—n you and your comrades as well," cried one of the inside passengers. "Do you think we are going to sit here quietly and be robbed on the king's highway?"

"Don't lose your temper," said Claude, calmly. "You can be robbed quietly or not, just as you please, but robbed you will be; there is no doubt whatever about that."

"Curses!"

"Curse away, sir, if it eases your mind at all. Don't mind me, I beg."

The other travellers could not forbear a smile at Claude's imperturbableness.

The traveller's ire increased.

"Has nobody got a pistol?" he cried. "If so, hand it to me, and I will show you all how it ought to be used. Has anybody got a pistol, I say?"

He glared fiercely around him as he spoke.

It would seem, however, that none of the passengers had firearms, for no movement was made.

Claude then saw that there was but one male passenger besides the one he had had the little altercation with.

This other was a very thin, light-haired, meek-looking young man, who did not appear to have courage or life enough in him to do battle with a fly.

The other four passengers were females.

Claude saw there was not much chance of securing a good booty, so he determined to bring the scene to an end.

Accordingly, when the irascible traveller demanded a pistol from one of his fellow-passengers, Claude projected the one he held in his hand into the interior of the carriage, saying as he did so—

"Look here, sir. You see I have a pistol. I don't want to use it if I can help it, but I shall not hesitate to do so if you trifle with me. My finger is on the trigger. Hand over your purse and watch, or I'll blow your brains out first, and take them from your dead body afterwards."

At this horrible menace, the ladies shrieked again.

The angry traveller turned just a shade paler, and then put his hand in his pocket and produced a purse.

Claude relieved him of it immediately.

"Now, sir, your watch."

With a groan, the watch was drawn forth.

A few more articles of no great value were also handed to Claude, who then turned his attention to the other traveller.

He was as white as a ghost, and had screwed himself up into the smallest possible compass in one corner of the coach.

"Now, sir," said Claude, "it's your turn. Make haste; I have no time to spare with you."

More dead than alive, the young man rapidly gave the highwayman all the articles he carried which were of the slightest possible value.

Claude then turned to the ladies.

He took off his hat, and made a profound bow.

"I am really very sorry, ladies," he said, "to have put you to so much terror and inconvenience. Had I known that the Dover coach contained so much youth and beauty, I should have allowed it to pass by unmolested."

"Then I'm d—d sorry you didn't know," grumbled the irascible traveller.

Claude continued, without noticing the interruption—

"What is done cannot be undone, but I regret what has occurred—deeply regret."

"Oh! d—n your regrets," interrupted the traveller again. "Why don't you ask the women for what they have got, and allow us to continue our journey in peace?"

"Ladies," said the highwayman, "I am Claude Duval, and I make it a rule never to take anything from the fair and lovely sex."

"Bah! bosh!" said the traveller.

At this moment Claude heard something going on at the top of the coach, and he withdrew from the window precipitately.

It was well that he did so.

If he had been a little slower in his movements, the consequences would have been fatal to him.

A terrific report, which seemed to annihilate the sense of hearing, followed a blinding flash of fire.

A perfect shower of bullets passed over the spot upon which Claude Duval had so lately stood.

It was the guard who had fired his blunderbuss.

He made sure of sweeping the highwayman from the face of the earth.

But Claude was unhurt.

It may seem strange that the guard did not fire his blunderbuss earlier.

But there was a reason for it.

He had had an encounter with highwaymen before, and had got decidedly the worst part in the affray, and so he resolved on this occasion not to get his body into trouble by interfering.

So he sat quite still, and it was not until he was urged and threatened by the passengers on the roof that he attempted to use his weapon.

Seeing, however, that he had a good chance of taking the highwayman at unawares, and, fearing the consequences of refusing compliance with the travellers' request, he had fired.

Some words uttered by one of the travellers on the roof warned Claude of his danger, and, as we have seen, he drew back just in time.

As for the coachman, the downfall of all four of his horses had been so sudden that he felt certain it was the work of enchantment.

He was some moments in recovering from the state of surprise into which he had been thrown.

When he did recover, his first act was to descend from his lofty seat, and set his horses on their legs again.

He was thus engaged when the guard fired.

Claude now felt that he had experienced all the resistance that would be offered him, and he proceeded to levy his exactions upon the outside passengers.

As for the guard, he shrank down into his seat, being only too anxious to escape observation.

With a very ill grace the outsiders surrendered their purses and watches.

But Claude would not permit one of them to escape.

When he had done he looked for the coachman.

He found him groping on the ground, trying to discover what had thrown the horses down.

Pointing a pistol at his head, Claude sternly commanded him to resume his seat and drive on to London.

The horses were all on their feet, trembling excessively.

The coachman mounted and took the reins in his hand.

He cracked his whip, and then the cumbersome conveyance was once more set in motion.

"Look out, coachy, another night," shouted Claude Duval, "and mind you don't try to drive your horses over a rope."

In a few minutes the Dover coach was far away on its road to London.

After its departure Claude sat quite still upon his horse in a reflective attitude.

"So far, very good," he muttered. "The trap has fully come up to my expectations—it has answered most admirably. Already I have a capital booty. Let me think, now. What had I better do? Shall I ride off at once, and be satisfied with my luck so far? Perhaps it would be the wisest plan. And yet I have been lucky twice, and why should I not be lucky a third time? I will try it. I will set the trap again. I fancy I am quite far enough in the country to have nothing to fear from the dragoons, who guard the roads around London only. Surely they will not come so far as this. At all risks, however, I will try."

From this it will be seen that Claude Duval had not got prudence enough to let well alone.

Instead of riding off with what he had obtained, he resolved to tempt fortune further.

The rope, as we have said, had been broken by the horses belonging to the stage coach, and so Claude slipped off his horse for the purpose of repairing it.

This he found was an easy enough matter.

He had but to unwind one end from the trunk of the tree round which it had been coiled, tie the rope in a secure knot in the middle, and make it fast to the tree again.

As he was stooping down for this purpose, however, there came upon his ear a sound which convinced him he had taken his trouble for nothing.

He rose to his feet and looked keenly along the road in the direction of London.

He could see nothing, but the sound he had heard grew plainer and plainer every moment.

It was the regular beat of horses' hoofs upon the hard road.

Claude could tell there were many of them.

They were the dragoons.

He had been in error when he thought they did not penetrate so far into the country.

On they came, and at a rapid speed, too, as though they had some other object in view than merely patrolling the road.

"They have met the coach," muttered Claude, "and of course have learnt all the particulars of my attack upon it. They may even have met the horseman. Never mind. I will be off. It was fortunate I heard them before they got any nearer."

He sprang into the saddle as he spoke, and as he did so a fresh thought entered his mind.

He chuckled loudly with pleasure.

"Bravo!" he cried. "Bravo! That is excellent. I did not think of that. But I can see plainly enough that, for the third time, the trap will be of service to me. I will let the dragoons come on, and then down they will go for certain."

Claude Duval rejoiced exceedingly in this prospective discomfiture of his enemies.

It would be a glorious thing, he thought, to send them all sprawling in the dust, and would be a revenge indeed.

Instead of galloping off and securing his own safety, as one would have thought he would have done, Claude walked his horse a few paces along the road towards Dover, and then bringing him to a halt, turned him round and paused in the middle of the road, with his face turned towards London.

The rope was about thirty paces before him.

In the meantime the dragoons had come very much nearer, and now Claude could perceive a dark mass approaching as well as hear the jingle of accoutrements.

He chuckled again when he saw how confidently they came on.

Their downfall would be sudden and certain.

And now the dragoons came within a few yards of the rope.

Claude could see them plainly, and he also found that they could see him, for they reined in their horses.

Still Claude maintained his position in the middle of the road, and never moved a muscle.

The dragoons had stopped just about as far on the other side of the rope as Claude, so that the trap was about half-way between them.

"Claude Duval!" cried one of the dragoons, in a loud and commanding voice, "surrender yourself! You are our prisoner! You cannot possibly escape! Surrender, or we fire!"

Claude took off his hat and made an ironical bow.

"You don't expect me to come to you, do you? I am not your prisoner yet. If you want me, you must come and fetch me."

Claude half turned his horse round as he spoke.

The officer of dragoons—for it was the officer who had spoken—fearing that the highwayman was about to gallop off, cried out—

"Forward—forward, my lads! We shall have him! A sharp touch will do it! Don't spare your horses! Forward, I say!"

Inspired by these orders, the dragoons struck their spurs deeply into their horses' flanks, and set forward at a good speed.

In a straggling body they neared the trap.

To encourage them to keep up their pace, Claude cantered a little way down the road, looking back all the time that he did so.

Then the foremost of the dragoons reached the rope.

Had they been that instant stricken down by lightning, they could not have fallen to the earth more suddenly than they did.

It was as though some potent magician had waved his wand.

Down they went with tremendous force.

As quick as the eye could wink, the road was completely blocked up by one inextricable mass of horses and men.

The rope was broken by the first almost who fell, but the others, who were close behind, and who saw what had occurred, had not time, nor, in many cases, presence of mind enough to rein in their horses.

The consequence was, they fell headlong over their prostrate companions.

Not one dragoon remained upon his horse.

All fell and rolled over and kicked each other with the greatest fury imaginable.

The horses snorted—the dragoons cursed and swore.

Their anger was a thing to be imagined, not described.

In spite of this accident, however, they did not lose sight of their original intention, and, therefore, in what may truly be termed an incredibly short space of time, they all scrambled to their feet.

But such a rueful-looking lot were surely never seen before.

There was not one who had escaped injury.

Many had been hurt by the horses' hoofs as the terrified creatures attempted to rise; others had been gored by the spurs on their comrades' heels, while all had been more or less bruised and scratched by their fall on the hard road.

But, when they looked about them, the highwayman, who they concluded was the author of this mischief, had disappeared.

Slowly and painfully, and muttering horrible curses all the while, the dragoons remounted their horses.

But there was nothing to show them which direction the highwayman had taken.

He was out of sight and out of hearing too.

Nevertheless, maddened by rage and pain, the officer commanded his men to set themselves in motion.

With a very bad grace the men obeyed.

They took their way along the road towards Dover.

They came at length to the small village we have before alluded to, and which was about five miles distant.

On their way they had not met a soul, nor had they seen the least signs of the highwayman.

Weary, dispirited, and in pain, they pulled up before the one solitary inn of which the village could boast.

It was open because the coaches stopped there.

Leaning against the horse-trough in front of the inn was a man, who came towards them when they stopped.

It was the ostler.

"How long have you been standing here, friend?" asked the officer.

"Maybe half-an-hour," was the reply. "I'se waitin' for the Lunnun coach. She's very late to-night."

"We are after Claude Duval," said the officer. "He is on the road somewhere, but we have lost sight of him. Have you seen a mounted man pass here?"

"No, that I ain't."

"Are you quite sure?"

"I'm certain."

"Then we're done!" said the officer. "There's no knowing where he is now: pursuit will be vain."

"You look knocked about a bit," said the ostler, as he surveyed the whole party with a critical eye.

"Yes," replied the officer, his face turning crimson with vexation; "we have met with an accident. It's no good pursuing our man now, so the best thing we can do is to stay here a little while and look to our own and our horses' hurts. Dismount!"

He was obeyed in a moment, and the horses were led to the stables at the back of the inn.

CHAPTER CCCCLXXVIII.

CLAUDE DUVAL IS A SPECTATOR OF SOME STRANGE SCENES AT THE ROADSIDE INN.

CLAUDE DUVAL only waited long enough to see that the downfall of his foes was complete.

He knew they were not the right kind of men to lie long on the ground after the occurrence of such a disaster, and so with a loud laugh of triumph and exultation, he settled himself firmly in the saddle, and quickened his horse's pace into a gallop.

But he did not long continue to make his way along the highroad.

After going some distance he paused, and turned down a narrow country lane which intersected the main road at right angles with it.

His intention now was to return to the deserted mansion.

The night was young, but he had a long journey before him.

The distance, in a straight line even, was great, but he would have to travel in a roundabout manner in order to avoid the troop of dragoons that were patrolling the roads.

It was, therefore, quite time for him to turn back.

He had no intention of seeking out another adventure, for he was well satisfied with the result of his night's work.

Still he would not allow any traveller to pass him by.

If he did not seek an adventure, that was no reason why he should avoid one if it came in his way.

For upwards of an hour, however, he travelled through narrow country lanes, and during that time he did not meet a soul, and scarcely passed a single habitation.

The road was rough and tiring to his horse, and, at the expiration of the time we have mentioned, Claude found that his steed manifested most unequivocal signs of exhaustion.

This was not to be wondered at, for the gallant creature had travelled many miles at a rapid rate, and with very little rest.

Besides this, the food upon which he had been fed while in the stable in the deserted mansion was of a very poor quality indeed, and not at all calculated to keep up his strength.

He now shook visibly, his exhaustion increased every moment, and Claude perceived with dismay that he would not be able to perform the remainder of the journey without both food and rest.

This was very awkward, for Claude Duval had little time to spare.

Still the wants of his steed were imperative, and demanded instant attention.

Where food and rest were to be obtained, however, Claude scarcely knew.

The gallant highwayman was not like an ordinary traveller, who could put up, without fear of the consequences, at the first inn he came to.

Yet he must halt somewhere, and the sooner he did so, the better it would be.

At a slower pace he continued on his way.

He made up his mind to halt at the first place he came to which offered him the least chance of safety.

As far as he could see, however, no trace of a house was visible.

Presently, however, while he was wondering where he should find a resting-place for his tired-out horse, a sudden turn in the road brought him in sight of a curious-looking, rambling roadside inn, such a one as would be vainly sought for now throughout the length and breadth of England.

It was situated low down in a hollow, and was almost hidden by the trees that grew on all sides of it.

The building itself was of no great height, which, independent of the lowness of its situation, would account for Claude not having seen it until he arrived in front of its very door.

Claude approached with caution, being anxious to learn what kind of place it was.

Looking in advance, the highwayman saw a small cluster of houses, which indicated that he was near some hamlet or village.

The roofs of the houses alone were visible, but Claude doubted not that at that late hour all the inmates were asleep.

Drawing still nearer to the inn, he perceived that the whole structure had a rustic air which was inexpressibly charming.

It was built entirely of wood, with the exception of the roof, which was covered with dull red tiles.

The casements were small and fitted with old-fashioned diamond-shaped panes.

Along the first floor there ran a rude kind of wooden balcony, which was supported by stout upright posts.

This was prettily overgrown by climbing parasitic plants, and presented a really lovely appearance.

In front of the door there was a quaint old porch, composed of woodwork, which had been twisted and carved into various ornamental shapes.

This, too, was prettily overgrown with long creeping plants, upon the cultivation of which much care was evidently bestowed.

Several paces from the porch was a tall post, which served to carry a signboard.

Adjoining this post was a long horse-trough, as was common in those days.

The signboard swung slowly and lazily to and fro.

What was upon it Claude could not see, for the night was dark and the letters half effaced by time.

Just below the signboard there was a small wisp of straw, secured by a piece of thin rope, which indicated that there was accommodation for both steed and rider.

The whole aspect of this place was so calm and so content, that Claude felt nothing but serene happiness could be abiding there.

He hesitated for a few moments, cast one glance around him, thought of the condition of his steed, and then resolved, at all hazards, to bait at this inn.

In so quiet and retired a spot he felt sure he should be safe.

He drew nearer.

The door of the inn was closed, but from one of the upper windows, that looked into the balcony, there came a dim and uncertain radiance.

It was as though some faint night light was burning in the chamber.

Claude reached the door.

His mind was made up, so, holding his riding-whip by the thong, he knocked loudly with the bone handle.

His horse seemed startled by the sudden sound, for he bounded from the door and reared.

The stock of Claude's riding-whip raised strange reverberations.

His steed was terrified, and, fatigued as he was, seemed inclined to start off at headlong speed.

With great difficulty Claude restrained and endeavoured to calm him.

It was while he was thus engaged that the highwayman was startled by a loud clashing sound.

It came from above, and, under the impulse of the moment, he looked up.

He saw in an instant what had caused the clashing sound.

The window through which the feeble gleam of light had shown had been opened suddenly and violently, and dashed back against the wall.

Then a shadowy form, the outlines of which were dim and indistinct, sprang out of the chamber on to the balcony.

Then the window was closed.

As this was done, Claude saw the shadowy figure more distinctly.

It was a man.

But what sort of man was more than he could see.

Motionless and surprised, Claude sat stone-still upon his horse, watching the occurrence of these strange events.

Having closed the window, the man hastened along the balcony towards one of the wooden supports which we have mentioned.

Seizing hold of it, he climbed over the rustic woodwork, and commenced a rapid descent to the ground.

This descent was accomplished easily enough.

There were numerous projections, which served admirably as resting-places both for his hands and feet.

So rapidly did all this take place, that before Claude could exactly understand what was going forward, the man had reached the ground, and bounded off into the darkness.

"What is the meaning of all this?" ejaculated Claude. "There is something very strange going on, that is certain. Good heavens! what is that?"

This ejaculation was caused by a loud growl, such as might come from the throat of some half-famished wolf.

The next moment a huge black dog of the Newfoundland species darted past Claude, and disappeared in the darkness as the man had done.

The highwayman looked about him with a puzzled and bewildered air.

Only just before he had been thinking what a quiet, peaceful spot that was, and even while the thoughts were passing through his mind its whole aspect changed.

It almost seemed as though the knocking upon the door had been a charm which set all these strange events in motion.

Not the least notice was taken of his summons for admission.

The man and the dog were both out of sight.

Involuntarily Claude raised his eyes to the window which had been opened.

The feeble light still glimmered through the tiny panes.

"I wonder what is in that room?" Claude muttered. "I will see. I fancy it will be almost as easy to climb up into that balcony as it was to descend from it. I will make the effort. It may be that I shall see something well worth the looking at."

While speaking these words, half-aloud and half to himself, Claude slipped off his horse, and secured the bridle to the upright post.

A vigorous spring enabled him to reach the lower part of the balcony with his hands.

His grasp was firm, and he drew himself up.

In less than a moment he stood upon the balcony.

At that very moment, a dismal, smothered groan smote upon his ears.

He started, and his heart failed him when he heard the sound.

It seemed to have the effect of turning his blood to ice.

It was only for a moment, however, that he succumbed to this sensation.

Two steps took him to the window.

He did not attempt to open it, but pressed his face against the panes, and peered into the room.

A rushlight was burning on a table, and by the aid of the illumination it afforded, the different objects in the room were revealed.

Claude had to strain his eyes, and shield them from the extraneous light with both his hands, before he could see distinctly into the chamber.

It was a bed-room, furnished in a rude and antique fashion.

Round the huge, four-post bedstead the dingy curtains were closely drawn, so that Claude could not see whether it was occupied or not.

There was no one in the room that he could see, and he was puzzled to know from whence the groan he had heard proceeded, without it came from some one lying in the bed.

All that we have described Claude saw at one glance, and in an infinitesimal portion of time.

Before he could make up his mind what he should do next, however, he perceived the door, which was opposite the window, slowly opened.

Claude gazed eagerly, and with re-awakened interest.

A strange kind of conviction came over him that he was destined to be the spectator of events more strange than he had yet beheld.

Slowly—slowly the door opened, and then, with a gliding, stealthy movement, a man crept into the chamber.

There was not light enough to enable Claude to observe him with any degree of distinctness.

Having crossed the threshold, the man paused and assumed a listening attitude.

Fearful of being seen, Claude crouched down on the balcony, so that his eyes were on a level with the window-sill.

And now the stealthy intruder, satisfied apparently by the deep silence that all was well, closed the door behind him.

Then a sudden gleam of light dispersed the darkness.

Claude knew well enough whence that beam proceeded.

The man carried a dark lantern, and had withdrawn the slide which prevented the light from passing through the powerful lens.

Just where that broad beam of light fell, everything was revealed with remarkable distinctness, but the man himself still remained almost invisible to an unsuspected watcher.

With a long, striding, noiseless step, the intruder made his way towards the bed.

His purpose was an evil one beyond all doubt, and Claude Duval held the window in such a manner that he could dash it open and spring into the room in a moment if circumstances should arise to make it necessary.

Upon reaching the bedside, the intruder paused again and listened.

He shifted the position of the lantern a little, and then some rays of light fell upon his face.

Murder was stamped upon it in legible characters.

After one glance at his countenance, Claude Duval had no sort of doubt as to what his intentions were.

The errand which had brought him to that chamber at that silent hour was one of blood.

But, had there been any doubts lingering in the highwayman's mind, they would have been dispelled by what he next saw.

In order to draw back the curtains which surrounded the bed, the man transferred something from his right hand to his left.

It was in his left hand that he held the lantern.

Claude saw what that something was.

It was a knife—a long-bladed, murderous-looking knife.

Claude rose to his feet, for the man's back was now turned towards him, and he prepared to spring into the room.

The man drew back the curtains.

He took the knife in his right hand again, and let a beam of light fall upon the bed.

At that instant, however, he started—staggered back—and then a yell, such as Claude had never heard before, came from his lips.

So ear-piercing was it, that Claude was riveted to the spot upon which he stood.

Almost immediately, however, the highwayman regained possession of his faculties.

Tearing open the window, he sprang into the room, and seized the intruder by the throat, and held him with a grasp of iron.

"Speak, villain!" he cried. "Speak! Tell me at once the meaning of all this!"

The man made no reply.

His countenance was distorted with extreme horror, and the muscles about his mouth twitched convulsively.

The dark lantern fell from his trembling grasp.

Claude was about to repeat his demand, when the murmur of voices and the trampling of footsteps struck upon his ear.

The inmates of the inn were alarmed, no doubt, and hastening to learn the cause of the disturbance.

Claude, then, changed his intention, and instead of addressing himself to the man, he called out for help at the top of his voice.

His cries were evidently heard, for the murmur of voices grew louder, and the trampling of footsteps nearer.

At length the door of the room was dashed open, and a tumultuous throng of half-dressed persons rushed in.

All at once wanted to know what was the matter.

Their astonishment may be conceived when they saw Claude Duval standing in the centre of the apartment, clutching the trembling wretch by the throat.

"Lights here! more lights!" cried someone.

The first uproar soon subsided, and then Claude Duval, turning towards them, said—

"Silence, silence all! I, and I alone, can give you a partial explanation of what has taken place."

"Who are you? Where have you come from? How did you get here? What is the matter?"

These, and a hundred other questions followed Claude's words.

In vain the highwayman held up his hand for silence.

Finding they could get no reply, the excited throng ceased their questions.

At this moment someone entered the apartment, carrying a tall wax candle in each hand.

The room and the inmates of it were then fully revealed.

It was a strange picture.

CHAPTER CCCCLXXIX.

CONTINUES TO RELATE THE EXTRAORDINARY INCIDENTS WHICH OCCURRED AT THE ROADSIDE INN.

"WHERE is the landlord?" said Claude Duval. "Let him come forward, and I will explain to him how and why I am here."

The throng divided, and disclosed a short, stout man, whose countenance was of a fiery rubicundity.

"I am the landlord," he said.

"Very good. Listen to what I have to say. First of all, however, let someone hold this man."

Two men at once sprang forward.

"Why," said the landlord, aghast, "that's the gentleman out of No. 2 bedroom."

"Never mind that. Keep him safe for a little while."

There was not much difficulty in doing this, for the prisoner made not the least attempt at resistance.

In a few words, Claude Duval then gave an account of what he had seen.

There is no need to repeat his words, because all that he said is already well known to the reader.

Once the throng would have sprung forward to the bed, but Claude waved them back, and entreated them to wait until he had finished his recital.

He was reluctantly and unwillingly obeyed.

As soon as ever he had done, he said to the landlord—

"Now go to the bed; draw back the curtains, and see what is there. I know not, but guess it must be some horrible sight from the yell which came from that man's lips."

No second bidding was needed.

The landlord and all those who had entered the room, comprising every person who happened to be in the inn at that moment, rushed to the bed.

The curtains were drawn back, and then ejaculations of extreme horror came from the lips of all.

They had been prepared for a sorry sight; but what they saw filled them with dread.

Lying on the bed, the clothes of which were in the utmost disorder, was the body of an aged man.

He was lying literally in a pool of blood.

He had been murdered—cruelly murdered.

His head was almost severed from his body, and his long white hair was dabbled in gore.

After one glance at this sickening spectacle all turned away appalled.

"I am innocent!" shrieked the prisoner, finding his voice for the first time. "I am innocent, I tell you! I—I did not do the deed! No, no! I am guiltless of it!"

"That will have to be seen," said the landlord. "Run somebody and fetch Doctor Barnard, and Garrat, the police-constable."

One of the domestics belonging to the inn hurried off to do the landlord's bidding.

"I fear the doctor will be of little service," said Claude Duval, turning to the bed. "Life must surely be quite extinct. But you forget there is some one else implicated in this affair. Pursue the man I told you I saw escape. Doubtless he is the real murderer."

"Did you not say a dog followed him?" asked the landlord.

"Yes, a large black Newfoundland dog," replied Claude. "Whose was it?"

"His!" said the landlord, pointing to the ghastly-looking object on the bed.

"Indeed! That is very strange. But who is this man?"

"I no more know, sir, than yourself," replied the landlord. "He arrived here last night, and asked for a bed. Of course, he was accommodated. He had luggage with him, and a small package, about which he was very particular.

"A small package!" cried Claude. "Where is it?"

"He brought it up to bed with him."

"What did the package contain?"

"I cannot tell you. Something very valuable, no doubt, or he would not have taken such care of it as he did."

"That is the key to the murder, then," said Claude. "Perhaps the old gentleman slept with the package under his pillow?"

"Very likely. See how the clothes are tossed about!"

"Do not let us stay here speculating," said Claude; "we ought to be acting. We can do no good by remaining. Let some follow me, and we will endeavour to capture the man I saw descend from the balcony. The dog will keep upon his track, no doubt. Come! This way: it is the nearest."

As he spoke, Claude Duval stepped through the window on to the balcony, and speedily descended.

He was followed by three gentlemen who appeared to be stopping at the inn.

Claude found his horse just where he had left him, and, untying the bridle, he sprang into the saddle.

Having seen in which direction the murderer had run, Claude naturally enough took the lead.

Ere they had gone many yards along the road, the distant baying of a dog came upon the ears of all.

"Forward!" cried Claude, as soon as he heard the sound. "Forward! The faithful animal is on the track of the murderer, and will enable us to hunt him down."

With these words, Claude pressed his horse into a gallop, forgetting that those on foot would be unable to keep pace with him.

When he discovered this, however, he did not slacken his pace, but kept on.

As for those on foot, they ran after Claude's horse at the top of their speed, and so were not very far in the rear.

The barking of the dog was incessant, and Claude found that he was rapidly approaching the spot from whence the sound came.

After going about half-a-mile further, he pulled up.

He called aloud to those who were following him, and desired them to quicken their steps.

Lying in the middle of the road was a mass of something which Claude easily made out to be a human form.

He alighted from his horse in order to look more closely.

It was as he had expected.

The large black dog had overtaken the murderer.

He had sprang upon him, and brought him to the earth.

When Claude looked, he was crouching down over the prostrate form.

The faithful but savage creature raised his head when Claude approached, and growled as though he had no intention of allowing his prey to be interfered with.

At this moment the three men on foot arrived, panting and breathless, on the scene.

Some dismal groans came from the murderer, and by the dim light Claude and the others saw that he had had a severe encounter with the dog.

His body was lacerated in a most fearful manner, and he was bleeding in at least a dozen places.

The dog, too, was bleeding.

The murderer had, in the struggle, stabbed the dog with the same knife that had drank the life-blood of his master.

The abject wretch begged to be released from the dog, but this appeared to be no easy matter.

It was while they were debating this that they first found the dog was wounded.

They discovered it in consequence of the noble creature falling on its side, and uttering low moans.

It was exhausted from the quantity of blood it had lost.

At length, gasping for breath, it rolled off the body of his foe.

Claude and the three others now endeavoured to raise the murderer to his feet.

But when he saw that they were about to touch him, he screamed aloud.

"Off! off!" he said. "Do not touch me! That dog has killed me! Let me lie where I am! If you move me, the agony will be more than I can bear! I am dying! dying!"

And, indeed, it seemed as though he was speaking no more than the truth.

Now that the dog had moved, the injuries he had sustained were more plainly visible.

They were of a dreadful character, and it did not seem possible that he could survive them.

If he did, he would only be able to crawl about, maimed and disfigured for ever.

"If you are dying," said Claude Duval, stooping over him, "relate how you have got into this trouble. I saw you escape from the inn, and hurry off. Confess! confess!"

"Confess what?" said the man, faintly.

"The crime of which you have been guilty. Make the only atonement you have left. Did you not murder the old man at the inn?"

The man trembled and shook, and then he gasped—

"I did it."

"For what reason? Speak, ere your voice fails you."

"I followed him to the inn," was the reply, given in a feeble, gasping voice. "He carried with him a package containing gold and jewels to a large amount."

"Go on."

"I determined to possess them, and so I tracked him to the inn, and found out the room he occupied. I entered it by the window, for to climb on to the balcony was easy. I had no thought of murder. I only wanted the packet."

"Where is it?"

"Let me go on. I knew he slept with it under his pillow. I tried to take it, and he awoke. Then I killed him in self-defence."

"And the packet?" said Claude.

"It is here, on the ground close by."

An immediate search was now made, and the packet was found lying by the roadside.

Claude took it up.

It was a box, or something that felt like one, but it was very light.

"This contains no gold," he muttered.

Then going to the dying wretch, he said—

"How did you know this packet contained gold and jewels?" he asked.

"I supposed so, because of the care with which it was guarded."

"Fool!" cried Claude; "you have lost your life for nothing. From the weight, I am sure this packet can contain nothing heavier than papers."

The murderer groaned, but whether from disappointment or pain they could not tell.

Claude turned away and looked to the dog.

But the noble creature had lost its life in avenging the death of its master.

The wound it had received was a severe one, and it had bled to death.

Claude turned to the three persons who had accompanied him, and, placing the packet in the hands of one of them, he said—

"Take this, and remain here. I will mount and gallop back to the inn for assistance. I shall be able to go much quicker than either of you. Keep guard over this man, and remember the confession he has made."

With these words, Claude mounted and returned to the inn.

Upon arriving, he made his way round to the back of the inn and placed his horse in the stable.

To give him a good feed of corn took him but a moment or two, and, having done this, he entered the inn.

He found it a scene of greater excitement now than it was when he had left it.

The reason was, the whole of the inhabitants of the little hamlet close by had been aroused, and they had all flocked to the inn.

With some difficulty, Claude elbowed his way through the throng.

The constable had arrived, and so had the doctor.

The latter was also a justice of the peace.

Claude at once acquainted them with the discovery of the murderer, and the confession he had made.

By the direction of the magistrate, the constable was at once despatched to the place described by Claude.

Never before had the old and peaceful inn been the scene of so much turmoil and ferment.

Claude sought out the landlord, and, not without some trouble, drew him away from the rest.

As the reader well knows, Claude had no intention of remaining until the whole of these mysterious occurrences were cleared up.

Such a proceeding, however much he might wish it, was too much fraught with danger to be entertained for a moment.

Before he went, therefore, he felt that he should like to hear as much as he could.

It was for this purpose that he took the landlord aside.

He inquired respecting the man who he had seen enter the chamber, but all the information the landlord could give him amounted to this:—

The murdered man had arrived and ordered a bed. Soon afterwards another stranger entered with the same demand. He was shown into bedroom No. 2. The household then retired to rest, and the landlord was ignorant of all that happened from then until the moment when the awful yell had aroused him and all the other persons in the inn.

The traveller who had hired bed-room No. 2 said nothing more than that he was innocent of the crime.

That he had intended to commit it, was evident enough to Claude, though he was puzzled by the complicated aspect of affairs.

He waited some time longer, but found he could learn nothing more, so, watching his opportunity, he slipped out unperceived, and made his way to the stables.

He found his horse much better for the brief rest and hasty meal he had had, so he led him out and quickly mounted.

The people at the inn were too busily occupied to notice him, and so he rode off unseen by anyone.

Claude's curiosity was much excited by this singular adventure, and though compelled to leave in the manner we have described, yet he determined not to let the matter drop.

Some other time he would make his way to the inn and hear the other particulars.

It was more satisfactory for him to come to this determination than to endeavour to account for all that had happened himself.

As may be expected, however, he had plenty of food for thought on his return journey.

Still, adhering to his original intention, he made his way by lonely and unfrequented routes to his destination.

He was so lucky as not to meet with a soul.

He allowed his horse to go at an easy pace, and so by the time he drew near to the deserted mansion, dawn was very close at hand.

As he drew nearer to this place of refuge he increased his caution.

It was in the highest degree important that he should not be seen anywhere in the vicinity, because of the danger of discovery.

But at that dark hour which precedes the dawn the road was completely deserted.

It may, perhaps, be as well to remind the reader that this was the morning when Dick Turpin was pursued and wounded by Mr. Wriggles and his officers.

Not many minutes before Claude Duval reached the top of the lane that led from the high road to the deserted mansion, Dick Turpin, in the strange semi-conscious state we have described, passed down it.

Upon reaching the top of the lane, however, and just when he was about to turn down it, Claude Duval heard a horse approaching at a rapid pace.

Nearer—nearer came the sounds, and he hesitated what to do.

The lane, he thought, led to no other place than the deserted mansion, and if so, he might keep down it with safety.

But then it might not be so.

The horseman who was approaching at so swift a pace might be one of his foes, and if so, the consequences of being seen would be disastrous to a degree.

These reflections enabled Claude to make up his mind how to act.

A large field was situated at one corner of the lane, and was defended by a high hedge.

Through a portion of this where there was a gap he forced his way, leading his horse after him.

Having done this, he hastened to the thickest and highest portion of the hedge.

It was quite tall enough to hide both him and his horse from anyone in the roadway, and so he stood still, with his hand on his steed's neck.

The horseman was now very close at hand indeed, and Claude had taken up his position only just in time.

CHAPTER CCCCLXXX.

TOM KING LOSES HIS HORSE, AND FINDS AN ADVENTURE ON THE WINDSOR ROAD.

AND now, in order to bring our narrative up to one point, the only thing that remains for us to do is to describe the incidents which befel Tom King upon this most eventful night.

It will be remembered, that just before parting with Claude Duval he announced his intention of seeking his adventures upon the Windsor road.

Whether on this evening Fortune favoured him any better than she did on the preceding one we shall very shortly see.

The watchfulness of the dragoons made it necessary for Tom King to make his way circuitously to his intended scene of action.

The night before had given him a pretty good idea of what sort of foes he had to contend with, and it would not be possible for him to be too cautious.

Before he set out he had made all his preparations, so that the only thing he had to do was to look out for an adventure.

[THE INANIMATE BODY OF DICK TURPIN IS CARRIED TO THE DESERTED MANSION BY TOM KING AND CLAUDE DUVAL.]

After about an hour's hard riding across a lovely piece of country, he emerged upon the Windsor-road.

At this time King George II. was residing at Windsor Castle, and, in consequence, there would sure to be people of rank and distinction perpetually going backwards and forwards.

Under these circumstances it was only natural that Tom King should expect to find better booty on this road than any other.

The only thing was, this road would be sure to be watched with greater closeness by the dragoons than any other.

But Tom was desperate.

He was exasperated by the ill-fortune he had met with the night before, and resolved to run a little extra risk in order to make up for the time he had lost.

Looking about him, he saw that the portion of the Windsor-road in which he found himself was admirably adapted for his purpose.

It was bordered on both sides by a park, the trees in which grew very closely together, and cast quite a deep shadow around.

Backing his horse under the outspreading branches until he was close to the palings, Tom sat still and waited.

He had satisfied himself that that would be a much better course of action than to ride on with the risk of meeting some of the dragoons.

The Windsor-road was made good use of; so, before Tom had taken up his position five minutes, the grating of wheels struck upon his attentive ears.

He roused himself at once, and gathered the reins tightly in his hand.

The vehicle—which by the sound it made the highwayman tell was a light one with four wheels—was coming at an extraordinary rapid pace from the direction of London.

PRICE ONE HALFPENNY.

As it came nearer, Tom could hear the hoof strokes of four horses.

They were coming at full gallop.

But, though he strained his eyes and looked up the road, he could see no indications of carriage lamps.

This struck him as being not a little singular.

To travel at such a tremendous speed along a dark road without lamps was dangerous in the extreme.

While he was making these reflections there came suddenly upon his ears a scream of so heart-rending a character that he felt appalled.

It was a female voice.

Tom knew that by the peculiar shrillness.

But from whence did it come?

He thought from the carriage, which in another second or two would pass him.

If he had hesitated whether he should stop the carriage, or not, that scream would have decided him.

We have seen, on more than one instance, that Tom King carried his devotion to the fair sex to an extreme limit.

Here, evidently, was a female in some peril, and he felt himself called upon, in spite of everything, to interfere between her and her foes.

Just then, like a huge dark shadow, the carriage rushed past.

It was nearer to him than he had imagined; nevertheless, with great promptitude, he stuck his spurs into his horse's flanks, and galloped off in pursuit.

"Halt—halt!" he cried. "Halt! I say. Halt! or I fire."

But no notice appeared to be taken of his words, except that the speed of the vehicle was accelerated, if that was possible.

Still Tom galloped on, determined to overtake it.

The carriage was only just before him, but, in spite of all his efforts, he found himself unable to decrease the distance which intervened between him and it.

Enraged at this, Tom rapidly raised his pistol and fired.

The shot was instantly replied to.

Tom saw the flash and heard the report, so that he knew he was unhurt.

He fancied his horse stumbled at the moment, but he was too much engrossed by the chase to pay any attention to it.

He still galloped on, goading his horse to the utmost.

It was but rarely that his command to stop was disobeyed, and in this instance he blamed himself for not having being quick enough at the first.

Tom raised another pistol and fired again.

No notice was taken, but the carriage suddenly turned down a lane that branched off at right angles from the main road.

There was something mysterious in all this, and Tom felt a greater desire to stop that carriage than he had ever done to do anything in his life.

But his efforts were quite vain.

The horses that drew the carriage were swifter than his own, and even as he found the distance much increase, his horse stumbled again, and almost threw him out of the saddle.

This was strange, but he spurred him again.

The gallant creature, however, trembled and shook, and advanced with difficulty.

He stumbled again, and then, with a loud snort of agony, fell heavily to the ground.

Tom slipped his feet out of the stirrups, and cleared himself just in time.

He now comprehended what had happened.

The first shot which had been fired had wounded his horse, but his mettle had kept him upon his legs until he dropped.

This was a serious accident, and Tom knew not how to repair it.

Kneeling down, he saw in an instant that his horse was in his last dying agonies, and that there was no hope of his ever being able to rise to his feet again.

The bullet had struck him full in the chest, and the blood had flowed from the wound in immense quantities.

It was wonderful to Tom how he had kept on his legs so long.

It was no good wasting time, however, by remaining there, and so, taking the pistols from the holsters, Tom hurried off, leaving the horse just where he had fallen.

He was more determined than ever to stop the carriage.

But, if he could not overtake it and bring it to a standstill while mounted, how was he to hope to do so on foot?

So excited was the highwayman, that he never once thought of this, but ran off down the lane in the direction the carriage had taken.

He ran with all his might for a few yards, and then he came to a sudden halt.

He had recovered the use of his senses, and not only that, his further progress was barred by some huge wooden gates, which looked as though they opened into some nobleman's domain.

Had the carriage passed through these gates?

Tom felt sure it must have done so, for there was no other route which could have been taken.

The lane was evidently nothing more than an approach to the large wooden gates before which the highwayman stood.

His chance of stopping the carriage now seemed further off than ever.

Doubtless it had by this time reached its destination.

What was to be done?

Clearly Tom's best and safest plan would be to give up the attempt at once, and endeavour to repair the loss of his steed in the best manner he was able.

But he did not like to confess himself defeated, and he resolved not to do so until he had made at least one more effort to achieve the victory.

Moreover, there was the mystery connected with the scream.

That must be elucidated; and, though probably there would be no profit attached to the adventure, yet he felt it was against his nature to leave a female in the hands of those who would use violence against her.

While these thoughts were passing through his mind, Tom King looked up at the gates as though he contemplated climbing them.

But one glance at their height and smoothness convinced him of the futility of making any such attempt.

He turned from the gates, and found they were flanked on each side by a wall of corresponding height, apparently presenting as insurmountable an obstacle as the gates themselves.

But, perceiving that some tall trees grew close to this wall, Tom hastened towards them.

One had wide-spreading branches, several of which stretched themselves over the wall.

Here, then, was a means of effecting an entrance.

The trunk of the tree was rough and rugged, and so Tom climbed it easily enough.

In a very short space of time he was among the branches.

Selecting the strongest, he crept cautiously along it until he grasped the coping of the wall with the ends of his fingers.

In another moment he was sitting astride the wall.

He looked around.

Beneath him there appeared to be some highly-cultivated grounds, very tastefully laid out in winding walks, and adorned with numerous statues and fountains.

Upon these Tom's eyes only rested for a moment.

They wandered off to a large, irregular pile of building, the outlines of which were only partially discernible.

It was clearly a mansion—one of those large, picturesque residences such as our fathers prided themselves upon building, and in which one might easily lose oneself.

All that Tom could make out distinctly were the stacks of twisted chimney-pots and the quaint, gabled roofs.

All the rest of the building was one indistinguishable mass of gloom.

From none of the windows came even the feeblest gleam of light.

All was as dark as though it had been uninhabited.

A silence, too, of a most profound character reigned around, and Tom began to wonder whether, after all, he had not been mistaken, for the place did not appear to have been visited for years.

But he soon satisfied himself that the carriage, about which he felt so much curiosity, had passed through those gates, and had probably driven up to the mansion, although now there were no traces of it whatever to be seen.

Tom determined to descend and explore further.

But now another difficulty presented itself.

The garden was a long way beneath him, and how was he to reach it?

Even if he hung down to the full length of his arms, and then dropped the remainder of the distance, he would have many feet to fall.

But this was the only means he had, and he resolved to risk what injuries he might receive by the fall.

He was inclined to do this because, upon looking down, he saw there was a garden bed just under his feet, and the soil of this would be soft for him to fall upon.

Without more ado he executed this intention.

He was bruised and shaken a little, but that was all, and he sprang nimbly to his feet.

But he sank down again immediately, and concealed himself as well as he was able behind a laurel bush.

He had been alarmed by the sound of footsteps, which were rapidly approaching.

Voices, too, came upon his ear, and, straining his eyes in the direction from which the sound came, he presently made out the forms of two men.

They were talking to each other, and, when they were a little nearer, Tom heard one of them say—

"I am almost certain I heard something, though what, I can't say. I hope it isn't that meddling fool who was kind enough to fire those shots after us."

"Yes, d—n him," replied the other man, in an angry voice. "He has broken the bone of my arm."

"But didn't you hear something?"

"I fancy I did; but it was only some insignificant sound, depend upon it. Come on. Never mind looking. It's no business of ours, you know; we have done our share of the business and got our money, and the only thing left for us to do is to take ourselves off."

"Very well. Of course, as you say, it is no business of ours, but I do hope that shot of mine settled him."

"So do I."

Tom heard no more.

The voices faded away in the distance, and became inaudible.

"I crouched down just in time, it seems," muttered Tom King, as he once more rose to his feet. "I am on the right track, that is certain. What I have just overheard is ample proof of that. Now then, to clear up this mysterious affair."

With these words, Tom King glided with rapid steps across the garden, keeping as much in the shadow of the shrubs as he could, until at length he paused on the boundary of the lawn in front of the house.

"Confound it!" he said, as a fresh thought occurred to him. "Those rascals, no doubt, were on their way to the gate, and, as they go up the lane, they cannot fail to see my horse lying there. I wish I had dragged him into the ditch. Never mind; it's too late to wish that now."

Tom turned his attention to the exterior of the mansion, which, now that he was so close to it, he could see with tolerable plainness.

It answered exactly to the idea he had formed of it.

But still all the windows in the front were plunged in darkness.

Tom determined to creep round the house, and ascertain whether this darkness prevailed on all sides of it.

Still skirting the extreme boundary of the lawn, he made his way round one of the wings.

There was darkness still.

He pushed onwards, however, but with the greatest possible amount of caution.

At length an abrupt turn in the building brought him in view of a window, which was lighted up, and yet not exactly that, for it was only a faint glimmer that shone through it.

This window appeared to be on the first floor of the house.

Somehow, the idea entered Tom's head, and would not be banished, that the room into which that window looked was occupied by the girl who had uttered the piercing scream.

Of course this was a mere fancy, and more likely to be wrong than right; but, nevertheless, Tom crept across a kitchen garden, and did not pause until he stood beneath the window.

He felt now that he would have given almost anything for the privilege of being able to take a peep into the room above him.

He glanced around to ascertain whether it was at all possible for him to do such a thing.

Equally to his surprise and joy, he found that a quantity of strong old ivy grew all over the back of the house.

By its aid he felt sure he should be able to climb up to the window, for its interlacing branches would afford many a foothold.

Without, then, a moment's hesitation he commenced the ascent, and in a few minutes his head was on a level with the window, through which he had so longed to peep.

CHAPTER CCCCLXXXI.

TOM KING SHOWS HIMSELF A TRUE FRIEND IN THE HOUR OF NEED.

If the truth must be told, Tom King was so absorbed in this adventure, that he forgot all about his original intention.

With straining eyes, then, he peered into the room.

It was a small, elegantly-furnished chamber.

On every side evidences of abundant wealth were visible.

There was not a single piece of furniture that was not of the richest and costliest character.

Paintings, representing a variety of subjects, and fitted in massive gold frames, almost concealed the walls.

Numberless little nick-nacks were scattered here and there, all trifling in themselves, and yet valuable.

Upon the floor a magnificent Turkey carpet was spread, while on the hearth a fire, composed of logs of scented wood, was burning brightly.

It was the ruddy light which came from this fire that shone upon the window-panes, and first directed Tom's attention to it.

As the blaze rose high up the chimney, everything was revealed with perfect distinctness.

But it was not upon the articles we have described—although he saw them all—that Tom King's gaze was riveted.

He had given one comprehensive glance around, and then his eyes had fixed themselves upon the form of a young girl, who was lying at full length, as though sleeping, upon a couch which had been drawn close up to the fire.

The lower end of this couch was in deep shadow.

But upon the upper part the light of the fire shone with full force, displaying to the utmost advantage the features of the fair sleeper.

Since his bitter disappointment, Tom King's heart had never been very susceptible to female beauty.

But now he was charmed.

Never had it been his lot to gaze upon anyone half so lovely.

It was a fair, girlish face, with small, regularly-formed features.

Her hair was a beautiful gold colour, and contrasted richly with the deep crimson covering of the couch.

Her countenance was very pale, however, and upon her cheeks could be perceived the traces of recent tears.

Her sleep was troubled and uneasy.

At times she would start and tremble violently, while her face would become clouded with sadness.

Then she would grow calm again.

It was evident that she had suffered much terror and anguish, and that she was sleeping the sleep of utter exhaustion.

Tom King jumped immediately to the conclusion that this young girl had been carried off against her will—that the shriek he heard came from her lips, in the hope that she would be able to obtain assistance, and that means had been taken to prevent her from repeating the cry of alarm.

Then she had been brought in the close carriage which he had vainly endeavoured to overtake, and that she had been deposited upon that couch in an utterly prostrated condition.

Whether Tom's supposition was correct or not, time alone will show.

How long he stood clinging to the ivy and gazing through the window upon the young girl's lovely face, he knew not.

He was startled by a sudden sound.

It was a sharp snap, as though a door had been unlocked.

Tom glanced in the direction from which the sound came.

The door was opened, and a man stepped into the room.

Tom could not see him very plainly at first, but, having closed the door carefully behind him, he crossed the apartment, going towards the couch.

Tom now saw him as plainly as ever he had seen anybody in his life.

He was of rank.

That was evident by his dress, for in those days the difference in degree was strongly marked by the apparel.

The intruder was dressed with great richness and taste.

Jewels sparkled on his fingers, on the hilt of his dress-sword, and on various parts of his person.

He might be considered young, for, judging by his appearance, he was not more than thirty—perhaps he looked older than he really was.

His face was handsome, and his form robust and manly, but all was spoiled by the unmistakable signs of debauchery and dissipation.

Upon the soft Turkey carpet his feet made not the slightest sound, and he paused only a few feet from the young girl's couch, without awaking her.

He gazed upon her for some moments.

Tom King could not see his face, and so he had no clue as to the nature of his thoughts.

At length, arousing himself from the contemplation of the beautiful girl, he stepped forward, as though he intended to awaken her.

But, if this was his intention, his purpose was abandoned as soon as it was formed.

He stopped, shook his head, moved his lips, as though he muttered something, and then retreated, locking the door carefully behind him.

The sharp click of the lock aroused the young girl, for she moved and half opened her eyes.

Then she closed them again, and for about a moment lay profoundly still.

Doubtless she was endeavouring to remember where she was, and what had happened to her.

Then she opened her eyes again, this time widely, and rose to a sitting posture.

Those eyes!—they were of the most beautiful blue that the fancy could picture.

With astonishment and dismay depicted upon her countenance she looked around her at the different objects by which she was surrounded.

She pressed her fair hands tightly upon her brow, as though by that means she could calm her whirling thoughts.

She remained thus for several minutes, Tom King all the while watching her with unabated interest, and oblivious of everything else, save that he was gazing upon her.

At length, with a sigh of despair, the young girl rose to her feet.

She seemed to have only in a partial degree overcome her recent prostration, for she steadied herself by clinging to the arm of the couch.

Once more her eyes travelled all round the apartment, until they rested upon the door, and then, with a faint cry of joy upon her lips, she sprang towards it.

She turned the handle, and then found the door was fast and immovable—that it was locked.

This discovery seemed to overpower her.

"Alas—alas!" she cried. "What can I do? What is to become of me? I am lost indeed."

She burst into a flood of tears as she spoke.

Tom was tempted to disclose himself at that moment, but he forebore to do so just at present.

The girl in despair turned again to the door, and shook it in its frame.

But it showed no signs of yielding, and her grief increased.

Tom could not remain a passive spectator.

He resolved to let her know that a friend was at hand—one who would not hesitate to protect her in the hour of need.

With this view, he tapped lightly with his finger-nails upon the window-panes.

The faint sound was unheard—at any rate, it was not heeded.

Tom tapped again, and this time with greater loudness.

The young girl started, and looked towards the window.

She seemed terrified in the extreme.

Her hand was pressed upon her heart, and her lips were half opened in fear.

Tom paused, and then knocked again.

Tremblingly the young girl approached the window.

"What—what was that?" she said.

"A friend," said Tom, in a low voice, for he was fearful of being overheard. "Do not be alarmed. I say again, I am your friend, although you know me not; but I will serve you as far as my power goes."

The tones in which Tom spoke were such as would convince anyone of his sincerity.

The young girl felt convinced that he was in earnest.

Tom continued—

"Make no sound. Be still for a moment, and I will enter, when I will explain to you how it is I am here."

The young girl stood quite still as she had been bidden.

The window was opened like folding-doors, and Tom discovered he was in a very awkward position to effect an entrance.

The girl saw this, and, approaching the window, unfastened it and flung one of the leaves open.

Tom was then able to make his way into the room.

He closed the window, and then he said, in a respectful voice—

"Lady, who you are, I know not; but I have reason to believe that you have been brought here against your will."

"I have—I have," was the reply. "Assist me to leave this place at once, and I will bless you. I have been torn from my parents and my home. They will be distracted when they discover my disappearance."

"Calm yourself, fair one," said Tom King. "Pray be calm. I have reason to believe this place is well guarded, and, therefore, it will be no easy task to escape. At any rate, it will be necessary to proceed with caution and deliberation. The least precipitation would ruin everything."

"You are right—you are right. I will be calm."

"Pray endeavour to be so. When I heard your scream, I tried my best to stop the carriage, but I could not, nor could I overtake it."

"Then you were fired at."

"I was; and that will show that your abductors will scruple at nothing. My horse was shot under me, but I escaped unhurt, and, after some trouble, tracked you here, for I felt sure you sorely needed assistance."

"Oh! thanks—thanks, sir; a thousand thanks. If I do not express my gratitude as I should do, it is not because I do not feel it, but because the occurrences of this night have completely overwhelmed me."

"Enough! enough! For what I have yet done, which is nothing, I deserve no thanks. I will, however, endeavour to deserve them."

"What do you advise? How shall I act?"

"We will leave this place at once, and I will try my best to effect your escape. You have one enemy, I feel sure of it—a powerful and dangerous one. He visited this chamber while you slept."

The pallid face of the young girl suddenly flushed crimson, and she said—

"Visited this chamber?"

"Yes. From my post outside the window I watched him enter. He gazed long upon you as you lay sleeping. Once he seemed about to wake you, but he changed his purpose, and then he left the room."

"Oh! sir," exclaimed the young girl, in great anguish, "you fill me with even more alarm than I have yet felt. Oh! let us leave this place at once. Let us"——

"Hush!" said Tom, in a whisper, suddenly interrupting her. "Someone comes. It is too late."

The young girl seemed about to faint when she heard these words, but Tom grasped her arm hastily, as he said—

"Be calm, be calm. You are in no danger. I will conceal myself behind this curtain, and if it is necessary I shall disclose myself."

Tom could say no more.

A key rattled in the lock, and he had just time to slip behind the ample curtains at the side of the window, when the door was opened.

The young girl sank down half-fainting on a chair.

Tom could not see who had entered.

He heard the door carefully locked, however, and then someone approached with a slow footstep.

Cautiously Tom moved the curtain a little, and then he was able to see what was going forward.

He had to use the utmost care, however, to avoid being seen.

As he had fully anticipated, the person who had just entered the chamber was the same nobleman who had before paid it a visit.

He walked straight up to the chair upon which the girl was sitting.

Upon reaching it he sank down on one knee before her, and took one of the young girl's hands in his.

She was conscious of what was going forward, but she was so overcome with terror that she could not move a limb.

The nobleman—for such by his dress he appeared to be—carried the hand he had seized to his lips, and covered it with kisses.

The young girl shuddered, but terror froze all her faculties, and she could not draw her hand away.

Apparently misunderstanding her passiveness, he said, in a low, deep voice—

"Fair lady, you see at your feet one who loves you more than words can express. That love, so boundless as it is, must be my excuse for the means I have taken to secure your company. Show me by some sign that you reciprocate my passion. Say that you will be mine! I am rich—I am one of the noblest of this proud land. It is in my power to obey your every wish. Speak, then. Tell me that you will be mine!"

But the young girl still sat there, like one deprived of life.

Her lips moved.

She tried to scream.

But no sound followed.

The nobleman then rose to his feet, leaned over her, passed his arm around her waist, and covered her face with kisses.

This act served to break the spell which terror had cast over her.

With a suddenness that surprised the nobleman, she sprang to her feet and broke from his embrace.

"Stand back, sir!" she cried. "Thank heaven, I recovered my consciousness in time to prevent you from offering me further insult. Fie upon you, sir! to take so mean and base an advantage of a helpless woman."

The nobleman shrank back several steps, after his victim had thus boldly and heroically spoken.

Recovering himself, however, almost immediately, he said—

"Come—come! let us have no more of this. I hate such stagey airs. Become yourself, and we shall not be long before we come to an understanding with each other."

"You mistake me, sir," said the young girl, with noble firmness, retreating as the libertine approached. "It is true that you have torn me from my home. So far you have succeeded in your nefarious scheme, but you shall carry your success no further. You have no longer any power over me."

"Ha! ha! No power? Why, silly fool, you are wholly in my power. But come, do not let us continue thus. I have power, but I have no wish to exercise it—that is, providing you give me no necessity for so doing."

"Stand back, sir! Approach me not. You have been mistaken in my character. I loathe you, feel more abhorrence for you than words could possibly express."

There could be no mistaking the tone of sincerity in which these words were spoken.

The nobleman's countenance flushed with rage.

"Do not tempt me too far," he cried, excitedly. "I tell you again, you are wholly in my power. I can do with you as I wish without fear of interference. This house is mine. It stands far away from every other human habitation. The only persons who are in it are wholly devoted to my interests. You cannot, therefore, escape. Yield, then, and make a virtue of necessity. You will find you will have no cause to repent doing so. If you refuse, the consequences be upon your own head."

"Then I do refuse," said the young girl; "most positively refuse. I"——

"Come, I am sick of this," interrupted the libertine. "I should have wished you to yield with a good grace, but since not"——

He sprang forward suddenly as he spoke.

But his intended victim nimbly eluded him.

Then, feeling that the scene had lasted quite long enough, Tom King glided quietly from his hiding-place behind the curtains and interposed himself between them.

CHAPTER CCCCLXXXII.

TOM KING'S ADVENTURE COMES TO A MELANCHOLY AND TRAGICAL TERMINATION.

Tom King held his drawn sword in his hand, and, turning its point towards the libertine's breast, he exclaimed—

"Forbear, sir! Forbear! You see you cannot have things quite so much your own way as you expected. Forbear, I say!"

The expression upon the nobleman's countenance when Tom thus addressed him was really a sight to see.

Rage, fear, astonishment, anger, by turns predominated. But anger had the ascendency.

Drawing his sword rapidly from its sheath, he, without saying a single word, precipitated himself upon the highwayman.

From his manner it was evident that he meant to make short work of him.

He commenced a most violent attack, but Tom King met him calmly, keeping quietly on his guard.

Finding this would not do, the nobleman changed his tactics, and fought more carefully.

Then Tom, perceiving an advantage, wounded him slightly in the arm.

This rendered him once more furious, and it required all Tom's skill and attention to parry the rapid thrusts that were made at him.

As for the young girl, she stood behind Tom King, with her hands clasped, and looking too terrified to move.

And now Tom's adversary began to find that, for once in his life, he had met with some one who was more than a match for him, and so he begun to retreat, though very slowly, towards the door.

Tom King had a sharp eye upon all his movements, and guessing that, in the event of defeat, the nobleman would call some one to his assistance, managed by a skilful manœuvre to change their positions.

Before his opponent was aware of it, Tom was standing with his back against the door.

Seeing this, he lowered his sword, and, almost bursting with anger, he cried—

"Who the devil are you, sir? What brings you here? Why do you interfere with me or my designs? I warn you to desist at your peril."

"Bah!" said Tom King, with a laugh. "Talk something like common sense. I am here to defend that helpless young girl from your infamous addresses, and I will do it, too."

"Take the consequences due to your folly then," said the nobleman, springing forward with great suddenness.

No doubt he thought to take Tom by surprise.

But, if he did, he was never more mistaken in his life.

Tom parried his thrust with ease, and, at the same time, inflicted a wound upon his breast which would have been a serious one had he not thrown himself back just in time.

Tom followed up his advantage, and the conflict grew more desperate than it had yet been.

But well skilled as this nobleman was in the art of fencing he was no match for Tom King.

Still it was some time before our friend saw a chance of putting an end to the conflict.

He tried a feint.

The nobleman was deceived.

Quick as thought Tom changed the direction of the point of his sword.

The nobleman was too late to parry it, and the keen weapon passed through his breast.

He dropped his sword, and fell to the floor with a loud groan.

The young girl screamed when she beheld this catastrophe.

"Quick! quick!" cried Tom King. "This is no place for us. We must fly, and that at once. If we linger we shall have no chance of escape."

Tom dragged the young girl to the window as he spoke.

Dashing open the casement, he showed her the means by which he had ascended.

"That is your only chance," he said. "Haste! haste! and you will yet be free. Take tight hold of the ivy with your hands, and lower yourself gradually to the ground."

Half-paralyzed with fear, the young girl obeyed.

Tom followed her with all speed, and assisted her as well as he was able.

The ivy was old, and had taken a firm grasp of the walls, and it bore their weight bravely.

In less than a minute they stood in the garden.

"Now," said Tom, impressively, "keep up your courage for a few moments, and all will be well—you will be free! We have but to cross the garden, surmount the wall, and gain the high road, and then you are safe."

"Thanks, thanks," replied his fair companion, placing her hands trustfully in his; "thanks, thanks. I will try to be brave. Oh! would that I could make you some return for the service you have performed. You have rescued me from that which is far worse than death!"

She shuddered as she uttered these last words.

"We will talk of that anon," replied Tom. "Are you strong enough now to take a run across the garden, think you?"

"Yes. Oh! yes."

"Come, then; we shall have to climb over a high wall, but that will not prove, I hope, an insurmountable obstacle."

"With you I could do anything," said the young girl, tenderly.

"Then haste—be quick!" said Tom. "It is impossible to say how soon a pursuit may be commenced after us, for your persecutor, though hurt, is not killed."

"I am ready."

Holding the young girl's hand in his left, and his drawn sword in his right hand, Tom ran across the garden in the direction of the wall. He soon reached it.

But the height was great, and he could see no means by which its summit could be gained.

In the hope of meeting with a tree, Tom ran quickly close under the wall.

Ere he had gone far loud cries from several voices, coming from the direction of the mansion, struck upon his ears.

The young girl trembled.

"Courage! courage!" said the highwayman. "We shall yet escape. Do not be frightened; all is well."

Glancing back, however, Tom could see the flashing of many lights about the garden, as though close search was being made for them.

Just at this moment, however, he perceived, not far in advance, a tree that grew close to the wall.

He hurried towards it.

The branches grew low down to the ground.

"I will ascend," said Tom King, addressing his companion; "and then I will assist you to follow me."

So saying, he grasped one of the lower branches, and at once drew himself up into the tree.

Then, getting as secure a position as possible, he held down his arms, and taking hold of the young girl by the hands, drew her up after him.

To ascend higher in the tree was comparatively an easy matter.

Then, having climbed high enough, Tom got upon the wall.

Bestriding it, and holding tight by his knees as he would have done if he had been riding, he held out his arms to his fair companion.

She gained the wall in safety, but how she could scarcely tell.

Under less exciting circumstances than the present, it is probable that she would never have been able to perform the feat.

Just, however, as Tom received her in his arms, and placed her on the wall, preparatory to making a descent on the other side, a loud report came upon his ears, and then he heard a voice say—

"I rather think I had him then."

The trampling of feet followed.

The young girl had uttered no sound, but now she suddenly lost her balance, and swayed over to one side.

Tom tried to save her, but the effort was a vain one.

She overbalanced him as well, and both fell heavily to the ground together.

Fortunately for them they fell on the outside of the garden.

The violence with which he reached the earth partially deprived Tom of his consciousness, but, recovering himself, he bent down over the young girl.

She was lying on the ground quite still.

Tom spoke to her, but she made no reply.

Then, and not till then, did the horrible thought enter his mind that the shot which had been fired had taken away her young and innocent life.

Involuntarily he groaned when this idea occurred to him with all the force of a conviction.

The interest he had felt in her was of no common character.

Eagerly, then, he stooped over her, in order to ascertain whether she had received any further injuries than those which had resulted from her fall.

He placed his hand upon her bosom.

He withdrew it instantly.

Her dress was soaked in blood.

His forboding, then, was realized.

With another groan, he bent still more closely over her.

"Speak—speak to me," he cried. "Give me some proof that you yet live."

He fancied her lips moved, but he heard no sound.

Then, with a palpable effort, the wounded girl raised her arm and placed it painfully around Tom's neck.

The highwayman felt a thrill shoot through every nerve in his body such as he had never before felt.

In his great anxiety he had bent down until his face nearly touched hers, and now she evidently tried to draw him still closer to her.

"They have killed me," she said, in a whisper, so faint that, although Tom's face almost touched her lips, it was only just audible. "They have killed me. I am sure they have killed me. Life is going fast. Fly—fly, my generous preserver, without you wish to share my fate. You cannot assist me. I am beyond all aid. It is a bitter thought, but I can feel that I have only a few minutes to live. Heaven bless you. Closer—closer. Kiss me."

The pressure of the arm about his neck increased, until Tom's lips touched those of the young girl who had met with such a cruel death.

She clung to him with one long kiss of fervent gratitude.

Then her head sunk back, a slight shudder overspread her whole body, and she was dead.

Still Tom clung frantically to her, and implored her to speak again.

Between those two who had met so strangely, and who were wholly unknown to each other, a sudden affection had arisen, though Tom was not aware of it until she died.

It was in vain he called upon her to answer—to speak to him once again.

She was dead.

He felt heartbroken—his throat swelled, and his eyes filled with tears.

He was aroused from his deep grief by the trampling of footsteps and the murmur of voices.

He looked up, and saw several men approaching him.

They were creatures in the pay of the nobleman, and had not made their appearance on the scene before because they believed that both fugitives were shot, and that their best plan was to go round and pass through the gates.

This they had done, and arrived upon the scene at the moment we have described.

Once more Tom bent over the now inanimate form.

Once more, and for the last time, he pressed his lips to those of the young girl, and then he started to his feet.

His foes were now close upon him.

Their number was so great as to make it impossible for him to achieve the victory.

But he determined to avenge the death of the beautiful girl, whose name he knew not, and yet who he loved with ardent devotion.

Rapidly drawing a couple of pistols from his belt, he fired them at the approaching throng, having done which he was compelled to seek his own safety in flight.

It grieved him to leave the young girl there, but he could not carry her with him, and to have remained by her side would only have been to court his own destruction.

The shots he had fired produced a momentary confusion among his enemies, and, taking advantage of this, Tom bounded off into the darkness.

As soon as his foes recovered themselves somewhat they fired several shots after his retreating figure, but Tom was already too far off for these to injure him.

With his heart swelling almost to bursting with grief, the highwayman plunged onwards, dashing through obstacles which at any other time would have made him pause.

Now he was quite reckless, nor did he regain possession of his usual calmness until he broke through a hedge and found himself in the high road.

He paused then and looked about him.

He felt giddy and sick.

He listened, but could hear nothing.

Doubtless he had completely distanced his pursuers.

With a groan, he sank down upon the bank upon which the hedge was planted and wiped the perspiration from his brow.

His heart beat with such frightful rapidity that he felt as though it must burst.

And all the time there was before his eyes the form of that beautiful girl, lying stark and dead, and dabbled in blood, beneath the wall surrounding the garden of the mansion.

We make no attempt to describe Tom's feelings, for we are conscious, before we make the attempt, that it would be a failure.

After the lapse of some time, however, he grew calmer, and looked about him.

"I must banish from my recollection all that has taken place to-night," he said. "I must never recur to it again. I must occupy my thoughts with some other subject."

This was, undoubtedly, a wise resolution for Tom King to come to.

The only thing was, it was a difficult one to put into practice: for, in spite of himself, his thoughts would recur to the unfortunate girl who had made so sudden and so deep an impression upon his heart.

And so, for some length of time, Tom sat upon the bank, making vain efforts to keep his resolution.

At length he was aroused by a sound which was of all others the best calculated to rouse him to action.

It was the approach of the dragoons.

Tom had heard them too often to make any mistake about the matter, and he wondered what he should do to escape them.

He thought once of breaking through the hedge again, but finally determined to lie down at full length in the dry ditch by the side of the road.

This he did, and was, of course, invisible.

Without the dragoons had positive information as to his whereabouts that moment, it was impossible that he should be discovered.

Still, his pulse throbbed when he heard them coming nearer.

They came from London way, and were going in the direction of Windsor.

In a few moments they trotted by Tom's hiding-place, little dreaming that one of the highwaymen, whose capture they had so anxiously sought to accomplish, was so close to them.

On they went, and Tom was, so far, out of danger.

He listened to their horses' hoof-beats for some moments, and then rose.

"I am in no humour for an adventure to-night," he said, as he looked about him. "After what has occurred, I feel that I should like nothing better than to return to the deserted mansion. But how am I to reach it on foot? Truly has this night been one of loss and ill-fortune. Hark! what is that? A traveller is approaching, and from Windsor, too. What shall I do? Stop him, or stand aside and let him pass?"

CHAPTER CCCCLXXXIII.

THE BODY OF DICK TURPIN IS DISCOVERED BY TOM KING AND CLAUDE DUVAL IN THE AVENUE LEADING TO THE DESERTED MANSION.

TOM KING made up his mind upon this point almost as soon as the question had passed his lips.

A single traveller, mounted on a good steed, was approaching.

The patrol had just passed by, and so there would be no fear of an interruption from them.

He needed a horse to take him back, and he carried weapons which he well knew how to make use of.

Therefore, drawing a pistol, the highwayman saw that it was in readiness for instant service, and took up his stand in the middle of the road.

The traveller came on at a canter.

When he was near enough, Tom spread out his arms suddenly before the horse.

The noble animal reared in affright.

To catch the bridle with his left hand took Tom King but a moment.

Then presenting the pistol to the astonished rider, he cried—

"Save your life by handing over to me your purse and watch. If you refuse, I shall fire."

"Let go my horse's head," said the traveller, mocking Tom's manner. "If you refuse, I shall fire."

And he lost not a moment in carrying his threat into execution, and Tom narrowly escaped having the bullet through his brain.

But the traveller fired too hastily for his aim to be accurate, and so our friend was unhurt.

"Come, sir," he said, "you have given me ample provocation to fire at you, but I will not do so if you surrender your purse quietly."

"Fellow," said the traveller, "do you know who I am? I am in the service of his Majesty. I am Lord Stracey!"

From the manner in which these words were pronounced, it was evident the traveller expected they would make some remarkable impression upon the highwayman.

But he was disappointed, for Tom said—

"I don't care a rush who and what you are. I can only tell you this, if you do not give me what I ask for in a peaceable manner, I shall proceed to extremities. Come, sir, don't be so foolish as to throw away your life for the sake of a paltry purse. Hand it over to me!"

Lord Stracey, as he had called himself, though we should doubt whether that was his title, appeared to see the force of Tom's reasoning, for he drew forth a purse and a watch, which articles he surrendered quietly.

Tom put them in his pocket.

"Now let me ride on."

"No," said the highwayman, "I have not done with you yet. The fact is, I have had the misfortune to have my horse shot under me to-night, and so I must trouble you to dismount and lend me yours."

"Dismount, and lend you mine?"

"Exactly so."

"I'll see you"——

"Now, don't—don't swear, my lord. What is a horse to you? Dismount. I will take the greatest care of him. He seems a fine fellow."

"D—n your impudence!"

"As you like, my lord. But your horse I must and will have. Dismount!"

Tom presented his pistol again, as he spoke.

Lord Stracey grasped the pistol he had discharged by the barrel, and aimed a desperate blow with it at his assailant.

By a nimble movement the highwayman escaped.

"I warn you," he cried. "If you do not dismount now I will fire, let the consequences be what they may!"

"I wish those dragoons were not so far off," muttered his lordship, glancing behind him.

Tom took advantage of this movement to put into execution a manœuvre which he thought would answer his purpose.

He had stopped quite long enough, and did not feel inclined to shed blood over the matter.

Therefore, when his lordship looked back, Tom suddenly took hold of his left foot, and exerted all his strength to hoist him out of the saddle.

So suddenly was this attack made, that his lordship lost his balance before he was aware of it, and after one vain and ludicrous effort to retain his seat in the saddle, he fell heavily on to the ground.

To spring on the horse took Tom but a second.

"Farewell, my lord," he cried, in an ironical voice; "take a good look at your horse, for I fancy you may never see him again!"

A howl, that would have done credit to a wild beast, issued from Lord Stracey's lips.

Tom touched his new-found horse with the spur, and darted off at a gallop.

Lord Stracey fired two shots in rapid succession, but neither of them injured the highwayman.

Tom was not many moments in making the discovery that the horse he had so strangely come into possession of was of excellent quality.

He moved his limbs with unusual freedom and vigour.

Tom was no loser by the exchange, for the steed which he now bestrode was immensely superior in every respect to the one he had left lying dead in the middle of the road.

In pursuance of his original determination, Tom made his way in almost a straight line across the country to his destination.

The occurrences of the evening made him feel disinclined to have another adventure.

He felt that many days would have to elapse before he should be able to banish from his mind the image of that young girl.

He could not have regretted her untimely end more deeply than if she had been his sister or his nearest relative.

It was a strange case of mutual love at first sight, and it ended as abruptly as it had commenced.

Pensively, then, Tom directed his course over fields and hedges, across lanes and winding streams, through copses and tangled brake, until at length he emerged into the Finchley-road, not far from the spot where the lane leading to the deserted mansion branched off from it.

He came on at a rapid pace, being anxious to reach the friendly shade which the unfrequented lane afforded him, for he fancied he had heard some one else besides himself upon the road.

But this might have been imagination merely, for he could hear nothing now.

At length the corner of the lane was reached, and he was just about to turn round when he was startled by hearing a voice say, with great abruptness, "Halt!"

The reader will remember that Claude Duval, hearing someone upon the road, had thought it prudent to conceal himself behind the hedge at the corner of the lane until the horseman had gone by.

This he did, and he found that, by looking through the leafless hedge, he commanded a full view of the road.

The moment the rider came in sight Claude recognised him as his old comrade, Tom King.

Fearful of the consequences that would be the result of any mistake, he waited until Tom was quite close, when it was impossible for him to have any doubts as to his identity.

Then he called out the word "halt!" in the manner we have stated, and immediately added—

"It is all right, Tom. It is I, Claude. Wait a moment, and I will be with you."

Tom King knew the accents of his friend's voice instantly, and he did not hesitate to obey his injunctions.

The next moment Claude made his appearance in the lane.

A mutual explanation then took place.

Both agreed as to how strange it was that they should have so met.

It was not long, however, before Claude Duval perceived that his old comrade was not in his usual frame of mind.

"How dejected you seem, Tom!" he said. "Has anything happened amiss? Have you had bad luck again?"

"Do not question me now, my friend," replied Tom King; "when I am calm, and more myself, I will give you as good an account of what has taken place to-night as I am able."

"Well—well. But you seem so terribly downcast."

"Well, Claude, to tell you the truth, I am. My mind is depressed by strange forbodings of coming evil. I feel a presentiment that something terrible has happened."

"Pho! pho! Tom. I am surprised that you should give way to such weakness. You have been upset by the occurrence of some unusual incident, that is all."

"Well, it may be so; but I cannot help feeling that something dreadful has or is about to happen."

"Well, then, let us make haste to the mansion, and satisfy ourselves that all our friends are safe and well."

"With all my heart."

The two highwaymen now accelerated the speed of their horses, and trotted swiftly down the lane, until at length they drew rein before the dilapidated gates.

At the end of the four hundred and fifty-ninth chapter, we related how Dick Turpin and Black Bess reached those same dilapidated gates.

The time was only a few minutes before the arrival of Claude and Tom King.

It will be remembered that Turpin became perfectly insensible, and slipped from the saddle on to the ground.

He fell too slowly and gently to hurt himself, and, when he had reached the ground, Black Bess had bent her head over him almost as a dog might do.

She had no voice, however, like a dog by which she could summon assistance to her master.

She was dumb.

Maud and Sixteen-string Jack were in the upper room in the deserted mansion, profoundly ignorant alike of the arrival of Dick Turpin as of his dangerous condition.

And then Black Bess raised her ears and listened.

She could hear the rapid approach of horses' footsteps.

The reader now does not require to be told who it was that had arrived thus opportunely.

It was Tom King and Claude Duval.

It was not until the two highwaymen had reined in their steeds and entered the avenue, that they perceived Black Bess.

They halted at once.

"Good heavens!" exclaimed Tom King, for he was the first to recover himself sufficiently to speak. "Here is Black Bess riderless. What can have happened?"

"It seems your forebodings were not so groundless as I thought them."

"Dismount—dismount. Look, here is Dick lying on the ground like a log of wood."

Tom hastily slipped from his horse as he spoke these words, and Claude as hastily followed his example.

They found the sad intelligence was unfortunately too true.

Stooping down, Tom tore open the breast of his captain's apparel, and placed his hand above his heart.

A slight degree of warmth was perceptible, but no pulsation.

Then his eyes rested upon the pallid face and the blood-soaked bandage which was bound round his head.

"Alas—alas! Claude," cried Tom King, in a voice of the utmost anguish. "And this is the end. The bravest, boldest, truest heart is still. The firmest, stanchest friend is no more. Little did I imagine that this would be the result of my foreboding feelings."

While Tom King was thus giving audible expression to his grief, Claude Duval also stooped down over the body of Dick Turpin.

He looked at his eyes, and saw with a painful feeling about his heart that they were fixed, wide open, and staring blindly.

They were covered, too, with that glassy film which always overspreads the eye after death.

He touched him on the cheek.

It was as cold as marble, and seemed only a degree less rigid.

Black Bess again bent her head down over the body of her beloved master, and a deep, moaning sound, that was awful to listen to, issued from her throat.

It seemed almost as though the gallant creature understood what had happened, and was mourning for his death in her own peculiar fashion.

Such, at any rate, was the idea which entered at the same moment the minds of Tom King and Claude Duval.

Tom King seemed stupified by this overwhelming and unexpected discovery.

"Little did I dream of this," he murmured; "little did I dream of this. I never imagined for a moment that this was to be the end of our long-enduring friendship! I have lost the best and truest friend I had on earth!"

"Come, Tom," said Claude Duval, gently; "do not give way to your grief thus. It is weak and unmanly. This is the moment for action. You cannot but know how dangerous it is for all of us to remain here so close to the lane."

"What matters it for danger now?" interrupted Tom, passionately. "I care for nothing now."

"Calm yourself, my friend—calm yourself. It may be, and I hope it will turn out so, that you are too hastily giving expression to your grief. Cheer up! Be a man! Assist me to carry him to the house. We may, perchance, find that life is not yet extinct."

It was some time before Tom could be brought to listen to this hope, and Claude could not help acknowledging to himself that it was a very faint one.

At length, however, Tom King grew calmer, and succeeded in overcoming the violence of his grief, which was as sincere as it was demonstrative.

Slowly and sadly he rose to his feet.

[SIXTEEN-STRING JACK HIDES FROM THE POLICE OFFICERS IN THE OLD CHURCH.]

"It is a frail and slender hope," he said, mournfully; "but I will cling to it. There will, at least, be some consolation in doing so."

"There will—there will!" returned Claude. "Do not let us mourn for him until we have ascertained, beyond all possibility of doubt, that he is no more."

"I will not. Even now I feel lighter-hearted than I did, which shows how firm a hold that slender hope has already taken upon my mind. I hope it will be verified, or otherwise I fear the disappointment will be more than I can bear."

"Enough of words. Come—come, be a man! Calm yourself. Do not burst forth into these sudden storms of excitement. Be calm, and then you may be of service to our captain, which, while you continue as you are, you cannot be."

Claude Duval had reason and common sense on his side, and Tom King could not avoid feeling it.

Subduing, then, the more audible expression of his grief, he turned his attention towards the carrying out of his comrade's instructions.

Clearly, the best and wisest course of action would be to carry Dick Turpin to the deserted mansion with all speed, and really ascertain whether life was or was not extinct.

Accordingly Claude said:

"Take hold of him carefully under the shoulders, Tom, and lift him up. I will take hold of his feet, and between us we shall be easily enough able to carry him."

Tom obeyed.

Stooping down with a groan, he moved Dick's head a little, and then took hold of him under the arms.

Claude raised his feet.

Slowly and mournfully then, they carried him towards the mansion.

Up the long, winding, dismal avenue of trees, with the faint light of early morning struggling over the landscape, they went.

Claude had taken the precaution, while Tom King was giving way so keenly to his anguish, to start all three of the horses up the avenue.

He knew well enough that their instinct would enable them to find the stable.

Never had that avenue of trees appeared of such a length as it did on this morning.

At last, however, the neglected, weed-grown lawn was reached.

Over this they passed without resting, and in another moment stood before the window through which they always gained admittance to the mansion.

Close to it Black Bess was standing.

The other horses had continued on their way across the garden and had entered the stable.

CHAPTER CCCCLXXXIV.

DICK TURPIN IS RESTORED TO LIFE BY THE EXERTIONS OF HIS COMRADES, AND SIXTEEN-STRING JACK SETS OUT UPON A HAZARDOUS BUT NECESSARY EXPEDITION.

But Black Bess—bonny Black Bess—with an affection and intelligence almost human, stood before the window.

A moaning cry came from her lips.

With that delicate perception which thorough-bred horses possess in such a high degree, she comprehended that something terrible had happened to her rider.

Tom King and Claude Duval were deeply touched by her manifest distress.

Though almost mute, yet how eloquent was it!

But they could not linger there.

Not without some difficulty, the inanimate body of Dick Turpin was lifted through the window.

When this was done, the shutter was closed, and the burden was carried into the great hall.

At the foot of the spacious staircase Claude Duval paused.

"Stop, Tom!" he said. "We have forgotten Maud. This dreadful intelligence must be broken to her gradually. If she receives it suddenly, the shock will be almost greater than she can bear."

"True—true!" replied Tom King. "But I was so wholly absorbed by my own grief for the unfortunate occurrence, that I altogether forgot others, and the effect it would produce upon them."

"Place Turpin here," said Claude. "You can remain with him, and I will go upstairs and break the dreadful news."

"Too late—too late!" said Tom.

Even as he spoke the hasty rush of footsteps on the stairs at once caused them to look up.

Maud was descending at a speed so rapid that she seemed to glide from stair to stair.

Sixteen-String Jack was following, and making every exertion to keep up with her, but in vain.

The rate of her descent was double his

Instinctively the poor girl seemed to know that something terrible had happened.

Her eyes were widely open, and her lips apart, and she gasped painfully for breath

Claude held up his hand.

"Hold!" he cried. "Descend more slowly, and prepare yourself for such a sight as makes me wish that I had died, rather than lived to witness it!"

Maud uttered a piercing shriek, but instead of obeying Claude's command, she increased her speed.

In an instant she reached the foot of the staircase.

One glance was sufficient to show her the motionless body of Dick Turpin lying at full length on the cold stones with which the hall was paved.

With another shriek she bounded forward, then cast herself down upon the body of her husband.

Her grief was heartrending to witness, and more than we can describe.

We shall not attempt it, further than she sobbed and cried most bitterly.

With a thousand frantic gestures, she endeavoured to extract some token of life from the inanimate form.

But she could not.

As well might she have appealed to the stones upon which he lay.

As for Sixteen-String Jack, he seemed stupefied.

It was some time before he could manage to speak at all.

Then, clutching Claude by the arm, he cried:

"Tell me—tell me at once what is the meaning of all this! Am I awake—or is it some horrible dream?"

"It is reality," said Claude Duval, and then, in a few words, he informed his comrade how and under what circumstances Dick Turpin had been found.

Jack listened in horror.

Claude then advanced, and, kneeling down, endeavoured to raise Maud, and impart some consolation to her.

"Rise—rise!" he said, tenderly. "The worst is over now. Let us carry him to the room above. You must remember that as yet we have made no examination of his hurts. It may even turn out—though I do not wish to raise your hopes too high—that he is not dead, but that he is only insensible from loss of blood."

Claude was not prepared for the avidity with which Maud seized upon the hope thus imparted.

As soon as ever she learned that there was just a probability that life was not extinct, she subdued her grief and rose to her feet.

She was not one of those poor, helpless creatures who in the hour of tribulation can do nothing but moan and wring their hands.

Believing he was dead, she had given way to her grief without restraint.

As soon as she learned that he might yet be alive, she rose to her feet, and at once assisted in rendering every possible service that she could think of and that lay in her power.

Knowing that water would be required, and the sooner it was at hand the better, she left the three highwaymen to carry the senseless body of their captain upstairs, while she went on a kind of exploring expedition in the lower regions of the house in search of water.

In an outhouse she found a broken stone jar, and in the garden was a well.

From this she obtained the water, and then hastened back.

By the time she returned she found that the three had achieved their task.

Dick Turpin was laid at full length upon one of the rude beds we have mentioned.

Experience had taught all three of the highwaymen a good knowledge of wounds, and so, with a speed and dexterity that did them infinite credit, they removed the bandage which Dick had managed to tie round his head.

It was soaked through and through with blood.

Then Maud was at hand with the water.

By the plentiful supply of this the wound was washed quite clean, and much of the ghastliness of its aspect was then removed.

With an amount of anxiety that can perhaps be guessed at, the wound was examined.

Maud watched them with breathless eagerness.

An ejaculation of satisfaction came from the lips of Tom King.

"My worst fears are over!" he said. "There is no fracture of the skull, nor has the bullet lodged anywhere."

"Then he may live?" said Maud, with earnest interrogation.

"He may if he has not gone too long without aid, but his body seems to be almost drained of blood!"

"But there is hope?"

"Oh, decidedly there is hope."

Maud sank down and burst into tears

But they were tears that did her good to shed.

They relieved her o'erfraught heart.

With even more anxiousness than before, the wound was re-examined.

But that examination only served to show that the bullet had struck alarmingly close to the temple, and that it had in some way glanced off, inflicting a long gash, extending to the back of the head, which left the bone of the skull completely bare.

It was an awkward, ugly-looking wound to say the least of it; but after the apprehensions our friends had suffered that their much-loved captain was no more, it sank into comparative insignificance.

With great care and skill, the wound was bound up with the best bandages they could manufacture.

These bandages were all well soaked in clean water before they were put on, for that was the only thing in the shape of healing ointment that they happened to possess.

Water was kept at hand, too, in order that the bandages might be wetted from time to time, and by adopting this expedient they hoped to be able to avoid inflammation.

Every means they could think of was tried to restore Dick to consciousness, but in vain.

Some pungent essence was required, and this, as a matter of course, they did not possess.

Still it was imperative that Turpin should be roused from the kind of trance into which they felt persuaded he had fallen.

Unless something was done, that trance would certainly end in death, for it was too much to expect Nature to recover him from it.

But their efforts all failed, and they began again to dread the worst, and to think that they had been buoying themselves up with false hopes.

Dick presented every appearance of death.

Maud did not weep now.

Her tears were dried, and her cheeks wore a hectic flush, while her eyes glittered with unnatural and painful brightness.

Nothing that they could do would restore vitality.

A little brandy or some other ardent spirit would doubtless have been of good service; but they had none.

At last, with desperate hope, Maud suggested they should search in Turpin's pockets.

All wondered that they had not thought of this before, and it was done at once.

A moment's search discovered a small bottle.

The cork was drawn, and the odour at once proclaimed that it contained brandy.

This was a joyful discovery.

Turpin had slipped it into his pocket while at the White Horse, little thinking at the time of the value it would be to him.

Cautiously, Tom King poured a small quantity of brandy into Dick's mouth.

He had to force his teeth apart to administer it, and he watched the result with great anxiousness.

No effort to swallow was made, but suddenly they perceived Turpin was turning black in the face.

Alarmed at this symptom, they hastily rolled him over, in order that the brandy might be ejected.

A gurgling noise followed, and then he seemed to choke.

Still more alarmed, they struck him some desperate blows on the back, just in between his shoulders.

This was rather violent usage, but it produced beneficial results.

Giving a gasping sort of sigh, Turpin swallowed the brandy, and opened his eyes.

With an hysterical cry of joy, Maud flung herself beside him.

Turpin smiled feebly.

He evidently recognised her, as well as his three comrades, who were all so anxiously bending over him.

But the extent of Dick's power and strength was comprised in that one feeble smile.

He could do no more.

It was a great consolation to all of them, however, to see him awake with the full and proper use of his faculties.

Tom King held up his hand, and strictly enjoined Dick to be silent, and not to make the least effort to speak, as the consequence of so doing might be serious.

A movement of the eyes was the only reply Turpin could make.

There was no fear that he would speak—that was quite beyond his power.

He closed his eyes, and appeared to sleep.

The three highwaymen withdrew, leaving Maud alone with Turpin.

Upon gaining the adjoining chamber, Sixteen-String Jack said:

"The next thing that must be done will be to procure some light, nourishing, and strengthening food. Without it, we cannot hope to secure the captain's recovery."

"Very good!" said Tom King; "but the difficulty is to get what we require."

"I know that; but we must have it, let the difficulty be as great as it may. I propose to take that task, or duty, upon myself."

"Nay, I——" interrupted Claude.

"Listen to me! You have both just returned from an excursion. Your horses are exhausted—mine has rested all night. Say no more, then—I am resolved to go."

"Where?"

"That I cannot say, at present. I shall go to the likeliest place I can think of."

"It will be frightfully perilous by daylight!"

"But do not the circumstances justify an extra risk?"

"Most certainly!"

"Then we will debate the matter no longer. I will go!"

"At once?"

"Yes—immediately! I shall make what hasty changes in my appearance I am able to do, and trust to good luck to befriend me."

"But, stay!" said Tom King—"you have not told me whether anything happened to you during the past night?"

"Never mind that now!" said Jack; "at another opportunity I will tell you all—I cannot stay now!"

"Well, well, you shall do so! You will not be long gone?"

"Not if I can help it! You may depend I shall return as soon as ever I am able to obtain those articles of which Dick stands in so much need!"

"Good luck to you, then, Jack!"

"Farewell!"

With this word on his lips, Sixteen-String Jack descended the stairs hastily.

Upon pushing open the shutter before the window, he was startled to see Black Bess standing there, with her neck outstretched and her ears projected forward.

The gallant creature had remained there ever since her master was carried through the window.

She had followed him as far as she had been able.

Jack spoke a few words of encouragement to her as he stepped out into the garden.

Black Bess suffered him to take hold of her bridle, and to pat her upon her neck.

Then he attempted to lead her towards the stable.

But she refused to move, and it was only after coaxing her for several minutes that he induced her to comply with his wishes.

All the horses required attention; and, judging that his comrades would be too busily engaged with Dick Turpin to think about them, Jack paused to collect as much grass as he could.

This done, he saddled his own steed, and, after taking unusual pains to reconnoitre, sallied forth.

The enterprise upon which he was bound involved a more than ordinary amount of risk and danger, and therefore Jack felt that he could not be too careful.

There was another point to be considered, which was the best place at which to obtain the articles he required.

London naturally suggested itself; but, after a brief consideration, Jack determined to obtain his supplies somewhere else.

The nearer he got to London, the greater would be his danger.

The closer he got to the metropolis, the more vigilant was the watch kept up by the dragoons, and the greater, too, were their numbers.

But, in going to some country place, more notice would be taken of him; but he fancied this was the less danger of the two.

This was the course, then, that he decided upon and proceeded to carry out.

"I wonder which will be the best place for my purpose! Let me think! There's Hatfield. That's only ten or eleven miles from here, and at least twenty from London. Surely, the dragoons do not reach so far as that! It is a good market-town, and my coming will not be noticed so much as in a village. Yes—I will try Hatfield!"

We need scarcely inform the reader that Sixteen-String Jack took his way across the open country, making his horse leap over all obstacles that presented themselves.

At the present day, it would be an easy enough matter to gallop for miles over an agricultural district without meeting with a soul; and at the time of which we are writing, when the population of the kingdom was nothing like so great, it was an easier matter still.

We have mentioned this, lest the reader should think it strange that Jack should reach his journey's end without meeting with any interruption.

But he did so.

The only persons he had caught sight of were at work in the fields, and he avoided approaching them at all closely.

There were, however, very few of these, for it was the wrong season of the year for any farming operations to be carried on.

It was not until he was quite close to the little market-town that he met people.

Believing that the dragoons did not extend their lines so far, and that he had little to fear, if he only put on a bold front.

Accordingly, when within a short distance of the town, he leaped over a hedge into a lane, and continuing along this, at length emerged into the high-road.

At an easy trot he directed his horse's steps towards the town as any other passenger might have done.

Curious glances were, from time to time, cast upon him, but none ventured to interfere, and he continued on his way without molestation.

It happened to be market day, and the streets were thronged with people and vehicles.

This was at once a safety and a danger.

A safety, because amongst so many his presence was not so likely to attract notice and remark.

A danger, because some of these people, coming, doubtless, from different parts of the kingdom, might recognise him.

CHAPTER CCCCLXXXV.

SIXTEEN-STRING JACK FINDS THE OSTLER AT THE "TIGER'S HEAD," AT HATFIELD, A FRIEND IN NEED.

SIXTEEN-STRING JACK pulled his hat as low down over his brows as he could, in order to conceal his countenance.

Wisely, he determined to stop at the first quiet inn he came to.

There his horse could obtain a feed of corn, of which he knew he was badly in need, and at the same time he could take steps to execute his mission.

Fortunately for Jack, it was growing dusk, though the afternoon was yet young.

But the day had been dark and gloomy, and night was setting in at an unusually early hour.

This was a state of things, however, that the highwayman was by no means disposed to quarrel with, inasmuch as it suited him admirably.

Turning down a narrow street on his right hand, Tom trotted on until he paused before an old-fashioned public-house, which was furnished with a huge swinging sign, on which was painted a rather terrific tiger's head.

Perceiving a gateway, Jack trotted down it without hesitation.

The sharp sound of his horse's feet upon the rough stones with which the gateway was paved served as a summons to the ostler, for that individual at once made his appearance, and running up to the horse, held the bridle for Jack to dismount.

The highwayman slipped from the saddle immediately.

"I can have a private room here, I suppose?" he said.

"Oh yes, sir!"

"Very good! Here's half-a-crown for you. Lead my horse to the stable, and let me see how well you can groom him down and how good a feed you can give him."

The ostler touched the tattered peak of his cap, and said, "Yes, sir," to every word.

The present of the half-crown made a wonderful difference to him, and he thought Jack a lord, at least, for though persons who halted there generally gave him something, yet that something, for the most part, consisted of a few coppers, given just when they were about to ride off, and when he had been holding their horses for ten minutes or a quarter of an hour.

But never had it come within his experience for anyone to give so large an amount as half-a-crown, and certainly never a penny, beforehand.

From the moment, then, that the half-crown found a resting-place in his pocket, he became wholly and solely devoted to Jack, and was prepared to render him any service.

The highwayman looked carefully all around him, and yet without appearing to do so.

He knew full well the importance of making himself familiar with any strange place at which he might stop.

He observed, too, with particular care, the situation of the stables, the fastenings upon the door, the stall in which his horse was placed, and also the exact spot where the saddle and bridle were deposited.

When his horse had been well groomed, and furnished with a liberal quantity of provender, Jack bade the ostler lead him to the inn.

Upon entering, he asked the landlord for a private room.

The mere demand produced a profusion of low bows from the landlord, for the inn in general had but little trade.

Jack was shown into a comfortable room on the ground floor, and the landlord stood near the door, bowing, and waiting for orders.

"I want some dinner," said Jack, as he threw himself carelessly into a chair. "What is there that you can get ready in the smallest possible space of time?"

"What would you like, sir?"

"Anything that can be had quickly. I have no mind to wait. What have you in the house that you can cook?"

"Some fine home-cured hams."

"Good—the very thing! Put down a couple of slices and some new-laid eggs."

"It shall be done, sir."

The landlord bowed and left the room, while Jack leaned back in his chair, contemplating with satisfaction the prospect of partaking of a civilised meal.

As he sat waiting, Jack began to consider more carefully in what manner he should carry out his mission.

Being on horseback, it would look very singular to see him loaded with provisions.

The difficulty of obtaining what he wanted did not appear to be so very great—the thing was to transport it to the deserted mansion.

This was a knotty point, and when the landlord presently entered with the meal he had ordered, he seemed to be as far off its solution as ever.

Sixteen-String Jack was frightfully hungry, and when the tempting meal was placed upon the table, he forgot all about his difficulties.

A stone jug of foaming home-brewed ale was placed upon the table by the landlord, and then Jack said:

"Have you any good wine in the house?"

"Port, sir?"

"Yes."

"I have a few bottles in the cellar, the quality of which, I make bold to say, is first-rate."

"I am glad to hear it. When I ring the bell, you will please to bring up a couple of bottles."

"A couple of bottles? Oh yes, sir! When you ring the bell? All right, sir!"

With another profusion of bows, the landlord withdrew.

Two bottles of wine at one time was an overpowering order.

Jack devoured his meal with great avidity.

There was no light in the room save that which came from the fire, and this was quite sufficient to serve his purpose, for the dusky twilight which had settled over the town did not seem much deeper than it was an hour ago, though by this time the sun had set.

By the firelight, then, in the really comfortable room in the old-fashioned inn, Sixteen-String Jack despatched his dinner.

Once, however, as he was raising the jug of ale to his lips he happened to turn his eyes in the direction of the window.

He could not avoid starting and spilling some of the ale upon the table-cloth, so surprised was he at what he saw.

A man was standing outside, with his face pressed close against the window-pane.

He was shielding his eyes from the extraneous light with both his hands, and evidently trying to make out all that there was in the chamber.

Sixteen-String Jack pushed his chair back from the table.

The spy outside must either have seen or heard him, for he disappeared instantly.

This circumstance troubled Jack greatly.

Despite the peril of such a proceeding, he hastened to the window and looked out.

The houses on the opposite side of the way looked rather dim and indistinct, but still the outlines of all objects were tolerably well defined.

Not a single human being was in sight.

The man, whoever he was, had made a precipitate retreat.

How long he might have been standing there peering through the window was more than Jack could tell, for it was by the merest accident in the world that Jack raised his eyes and saw him.

What could be his purpose in watching him?

Had he been recognised or suspected?

Such a thing was very probable.

With these thoughts passing through his mind, Jack still stood at the window.

Nothing passed by, however, but the small carts which were transporting various commodities from the market.

Suddenly, on the other side, he perceived three dusky figures, and he strained his eyes to the utmost to make them out.

But, except that they were men, he could see nothing, for the gloom was increasing rapidly each moment.

He saw these three dusky figures gesticulating, as though some conversation of a very animating character was going on between them.

They pointed several times to the inn, and, as Jack thought, to the very window at which he was standing.

This might or might not have been his fancy.

Then the three dusky figures disappeared, and he saw them no more.

"That looks remarkably as though mischief was brewing," said Jack, at length; "and it may be that I am frightening myself about nothing. I will not be scared by a shadow. I would give much to allow my horse a little more rest. Nevertheless, I will take what precautions I can, so that, should danger arrive, I shall not be altogether unprepared for it."

This was a very prudent resolution indeed to make, and Jack rang the bell.

Then, sitting down to the table, he resumed his interrupted meal.

Some few moments elapsed before the landlord appeared in answer to the bell, but when he did come, he brought with him the two bottles of wine that had been ordered.

The gloomy duskiness with which the room was filled prevented the highwayman from accurately noting the expression of the landlord's countenance.

"Put the bottles down on the table," said Jack, "I shall not open them just yet. Oblige me by telling the ostler to come here, I want to give him some instructions about my horse."

"Very good, sir. Do you want him to come now?"

"Yes, certainly."

"All right, sir. I will go and fetch him."

"Do so; I want to speak to him at once about my horse's stifle-joint."

"All right, sir. Would you like some candles, sir?"

"Not just at present, thank you. It will do after I have spoken to the ostler."

The landlord said no more, but bowed and withdrew.

As the door closed after him, Jack muttered:

"I don't like your ways, Mr. Landlord, and it strikes me very forcibly that I have got into a hornet's nest. I must be careful. The ostler, however, will, I think, stand my friend. I have no other chance, and if he fails me, my position will be desperate indeed."

Just as Jack had got so far in his ruminations, there came a faint tapping at the door.

"Come in," he cried.

The door was opened, and the ostler entered.

That is to say, he thrust his head into the room, and touching his forehead with his finger, said:

"Want to speak to me, sir?"

"Yes; come in and shut the door."

The ostler obeyed, and shut the door with great speed.

Then, before Jack could utter a word, he (the ostler) ran up to him and said, in an emphatic whisper:

"Mum! mind your eye! Guv'nor's outside!"

"But——"

"Hush—he's listening! Can't stop—suspicious—you're in danger! I've got the saddle on!"

"Hush!" said Jack: "speak more plainly—I don't understand you."

"Oh lor! Well, I must not stay a moment else the guv'nor'll know summat's up."

"What do you mean by danger?"

"Officers."

"You know me, then?"

"Yes, I heard them talking about you."

"Who?"

"Guv'nor and officers."

"You will be my friend?"

"Rather!"

"You will find it will answer your purpose. Here, take these."

Jack pressed a handful of guineas into the ostler's palm.

"Oh my!" he said.

"Put them in your pocket."

"Many thanks. You is an out-an'-outer, and no mistake!"

"But what do you propose to do?"

"Help you to get off."

"How?"

"I'll have your horse ready in a moment. Watch your opportunity to slip out, and off you can go."

"All right. You shall be well rewarded for this."

"Have you drunk any of that wine?"

"No. Why?"

"Don't."

"Why not?"

"Don't, I say. Mustn't stop, or guv'nor will be suspicious."

With these words the ostler hurried out of the room.

Jack sat down, and, clasping his hands over his head, strove to think.

"What does all this mean?" he murmured. "Is this ostler in earnest, or is he luring me to my destruction? I must think—I must think!"

After a few moments spent in reflection, Jack raised his head.

"I will trust him!" he said. "I would sooner do that than doubt. Yes, I will trust him, and if he attempts to deceive me, let him beware—that's all!"

He sprang to his feet.

His eyes fell upon the two bottles of wine on the table.

"I wonder what the ostler meant?" he continued. "Never mind—I will take them in my pocket for Dick, though I will try to learn something about them, for all that."

With these words, Jack put the bottles of wine in the skirt pockets of his coat, and then saw that his pistols were ready for immediate service.

By this time he doubted not the ostler had got the horse in readiness—that was, supposing he had not played him false.

Jack went to the window and looked out, or rather endeavoured to do so, for the street was now profoundly dark.

All seemed quiet, too, and so he turned away and went towards the door.

He approached it on tiptoe, then paused to listen.

But here also all was still.

He placed his right hand upon the stock of one of his pistols, which was cocked, and ready for instant use.

He placed his left on the handle of the door, and opened it quickly.

The passage was beyond, but he could see no one in it.

Emboldened by this, he stepped forward, his intention being to make for the back door as quickly as possible.

Scarcely, however, had he taken half a dozen steps in this direction than a man sprang forward and attempted to seize him by the throat.

At the same time this man set up a cry, which had the effect of calling his companions to his assistance.

With a sudden exertion of strength, Jack shook off the grasp of this man.

There was no time for flight, so he placed his back against the wall of the passage, and drew both his pistols.

His determined attitude caused the men to pause, and they stood before and around him in a throng.

One glance showed Sixteen-String Jack that they were police officers.

The landlord was in the background.

"Sixteen-String Jack!" cried one of the police officers, "you are our prisoner! Surrender yourself quietly. It is in vain to make the least resistance. Our instructions are to take you alive or dead!"

The officer who spoke these words advanced a step.

"Hold!" cried Sixteen-String Jack, in a voice that made the officer start. "If you decrease the distance there is between us by half an inch only, I shall fire, and at such a short distance as this I cannot fail to blow your brains out!"

The officer did not like the tone of Jack's voice; but nevertheless, putting on a bold front, he said:

"Come, come, my lads! Forward! It will be a sharp tussle for a moment, and then all will be at an end! You know your duty! Forward, and the reward is yours!"

But the men held back.

They did not like the look of the pistols which Jack held so threateningly towards them.

Nor did their leader, albeit he spoke so boldly, set them the example of rushing forward to secure the capture.

But it was not likely that this state of things would continue long.

Observing the effect he had made, Sixteen-String Jack slowly began to retreat, still keeping his back to the wall.

With one accord, they made a rush forward.

Jack fired one of his pistols over their heads, and rushed to the door.

The report produced a momentary check, and he took advantage of the opportunity to fling open the door that led out into the yard.

But before he could cross the threshold, the officers were upon him.

"Seize him! seize him!" cried the one in command. "You know your orders are to take him, dead or alive! Forward!—there's not many of us to divide the reward amongst!"

The officers seemed determined to carry their point, for they attacked Jack with great resolution, and the one in command discharged a pistol the moment he had done speaking.

CHAPTER CCCCLXXXVI.

SIXTEEN-STRING JACK SUCCEEDS IN OBTAINING A PARTIAL VICTORY OVER HIS ENEMIES.

FORTUNATELY, Sixteen-String Jack moved suddenly at the moment, and so escaped the bullet that was levelled at him.

Directly afterwards, he returned the shot, this time aiming at the throng, and not above it.

One officer fell writhing to the ground, and those near him seemed scarcely to know whether they were hit or not.

Their hesitation lasted but for an infinitesimal portion of a second, yet it enabled Jack to make a bold and rapid rush towards the stables.

Looking before him, he saw the ostler, with a grin on his face, holding his horse by the bridle.

Could he but reach him and mount, then he felt all would be well.

But the officers had recovered themselves, and, with cries of rage, pursued him.

Another shot was fired, but the aim was too hastily taken for the bullet to be effective.

Sixteen-String Jack was then about half-way across the yard, so he stopped suddenly, and turned round.

This was a course of action for which the officers were totally unprepared, and they, too, came to a halt.

Jack's intention may be guessed.

It was to strike them, if possible, with another panic, and, while they were under the influence of it, to run the remainder of the distance across the inn yard, and mount his horse.

But he recollected he had no more loaded pistols about him.

The other brace that he carried were in the holsters of the saddle.

Simultaneously with making this reflection, he recollected that he had in his pockets the two bottles of wine which the landlord had brought him, and which the ostler had cautioned him not to drink.

Quick as thought, then—for there was no time for deliberation—Jack pulled these bottles from his pockets and flung them at his foes.

His aim was accurate.

Crash went the bottles as they came in contact with the officers' heads.

The hardness of officers' heads has passed into a proverb, and they were certainly harder than the bottles.

In a moment, two of their number reeled and fell.

Jack hardly waited to see whether his aim had been true, but turned round and ran towards his horse as soon as the last missile had left his hand.

This attack, however, did not prove so effectual as the last, for, with redoubled anger, those officers who were unhurt continued the pursuit.

Jack heard them coming, but still he ran, for he was close to his horse.

He succeeded in taking hold of a lock of his mane, and getting one foot in the stirrup.

Another second and he would have been fairly mounted; but just as he was about to spring, an officer grasped him from behind.

At the moment of succeeding, Jack had to give up.

He turned round like lightning, and snatched a pistol from the holster.

He found himself confronted by two officers, who saw with dismay that the pistol was a double-barrelled one.

"Fall back," cried Jack, "or I fire!"

"Come, come," said one of the officers, prudently getting behind his comrade, "this sort of thing will do you no good, Jack—not a bit! You had better give in without further fuss. You can't escape!"

"Cripple his horse!" said a voice at this moment. "Cripple his horse with something, and then you have him secure!"

With flashing eyes, Sixteen-String Jack turned his head towards the direction from which these sounds came.

He saw one of the officers, who had received the blow with the bottle of wine, slowly rising to his feet, and wiping the blood from his face.

It was this man who had uttered the words we have recorded.

If anything was calculated to enrage Jack, that was; and under the impulse of ungovernable passion he brought his pistol rapidly to a level, and took deliberate aim.

The report followed instantly, and with a shriek the brutal officer fell writhing and bleeding to the ground.

Jack looked about him again, and saw that another officer was endeavouring to act upon the hint which had been given him.

Some gardening tools were placed near the stable door, and seizing a spade, this officer raised it in the air, and with it would doubtless have inflicted some severe injury upon the horse had not Jack rushed forward just in time to prevent him from carrying his diabolical design into execution.

With a strength which passion alone could have lent him, Jack seized the spade and wrenched it from the officer's hand.

The next instant it descended with a sickening crash upon his head, and he rolled over and over as though suffering more than mortal agony.

But reinforcements were now hastening across the yard from the direction of the back door of the inn, and Jack saw that, although he had been successful so far, there was yet much to be done.

Hurriedly firing his remaining pistol, he sprang into the saddle.

This time he was not prevented.

Thrusting his hand into his pocket, he drew forth a purse, which he threw to the ostler, at the same time advising that individual to make himself scarce.

One touch with his spur, and his gallant steed dashed through a gate which opened into a lane at the back of the inn.

Just as he did so, two more shots were fired, but, happily for him, without producing any hurtful effect.

The highwayman's horse was invigorated by the hearty and substantial meal which the ostler had given it, and dashed forward at a pace which threatened to set pursuit at defiance.

But the officers had taken much better measures for securing him than he at all anticipated, and in order to explain how it was that the officers had not at the first attacked him in a more systematic manner, it will be necessary to go back for a moment.

It so happened, then, that on the day Jack entered Hatfield, a large party of mounted officers from Bow Street arrived there, in consequence of some information they had received respecting a gang of coiners who had taken up their quarters in that town.

The officers arrived by twos and threes, so as not to create too much attention, for they wished to take the numerous gang as much by surprise as they possibly could.

One of the officers, then, saw Jack in the High Street as soon as he arrived, and fancied he recognised him, but was not certain.

Under these circumstances, being alone, he kept his eye upon Jack, and tracked him to the Tiger's Head.

Having done this, he sought out his superior, and gave him the information.

This matter was deemed so important that he forthwith put their original purpose on one side, and determined to proceed without delay to the inn that had been mentioned.

If the information should turn out to be correct, and he should be able to capture this daring highwayman after the many failures the dragoons had made, he felt it would be quite a feather in his cap.

It should be mentioned that this chief police officer was well acquainted with Sixteen-String Jack's appearance, and expressed his conviction that he should be able to recognise him at the first glance, so that the matter would speedily be put at rest.

This officer then walked to the Tiger's Head, and commenced spying about in the hope of picking up some information.

Being in front of the inn, and being, too, a dusky night, nothing was more natural than that he should peep through the windows and see by whom the different rooms were occupied.

The first window he came to belonged to the private apartment which Sixteen-String Jack had engaged.

He found our friend very comfortably and quietly enjoying the tempting meal which was before him; but, owing to the gloom with which the room was filled, he could not distinctly make out Jack's features.

Suddenly, however, a brighter flash than usual came from the fire.

This, falling upon Jack's face, revealed its outline fully.

The officer recognised him.

He was sure he made no mistake.

It was just at this moment that Jack, happening to turn his eyes towards the window, saw a man's face pressed close against it.

The sudden movement Jack made let the officer know he had been perceived, and he darted off instantly, so that by the time Jack reached the window the officer had got a considerable distance down the street.

Then crossing over on the opposite side, he walked towards the inn again

He was then joined by two of his men, and these were the three figures which Jack had indistinctly seen.

These two men the chief officer sent off with instructions to bring the main body down to the inn with the least possible delay, but still not in such a manner as should be the means of giving an immediate alarm.

The chief himself then entered the inn, and drew the landlord on one side.

It did not take him long to convince the latter who he was, nor was he much longer in inducing the landlord to assist him in his attempt to capture the highwayman.

This was all satisfactory enough, and now nothing more could be done until the officers arrived.

The landlord, in obedience to Jack's orders, went down into the cellar to fetch the two bottles of wine, at the same time apprising the officer of what he was about to do.

This gave the latter quite a fresh thought, so he said:

"Go and fetch the wine, but don't take them into the room to him till I return. I shall not be a moment, and most likely shall be back as soon as you have got the bottles ready."

With these words the officer put on his hat and rushed down the street to a druggist's shop, which he noticed only a few doors off.

Here he revealed himself, and by this means obtained a drug which would render anyone who partook of it helplessly insensible.

This was the very thing the officer wanted, so he hastened back with it.

His purpose can easily be guessed.

He was induced to adopt this means of capturing the redoubtable highwayman, because all the attempts to apprehend him by open violence had signally failed.

If he could, however, secure his taking a small quantity of the wine with the drug dissolved in it, all would be easy enough.

He entered the bar just as the landlord came up out of the cellar.

Between them they carefully drew the corks, dropped a small portion of the powder in each bottle, and then replaced the corks again.

But while they were thus pleasantly engaged, they had an unsuspected watcher.

That was the ostler, who had managed to overhear some of the former conversation between the officer and his master, which, joined to his own suspicions, made him aware of Jack's identity.

He saw he was in great danger, and resolved to warn him of it.

He was deliberating upon the means when he was summoned to Jack's room.

With what passed the reader is already in possession of.

When Jack issued, then, the preparations which the chief officer had made were not complete.

Still, several of his men had arrived, and with these, rather than lose the chance of effecting the capture altogether, he resolved to make an attack with what force he then had, and trust to the speedy arrival of reinforcements.

The results of that we have just described, but it unluckily happened for Jack that a large party of mounted police officers were then in sight of the inn.

The moon was up and shining brightly.

They saw Jack dart out of the inn yard and gallop off at such a rapid pace, and, guessing what had occurred, they, without waiting for any instructions, clapped spurs to their horses' flanks and galloped off in pursuit.

The clattering sound which their horses' hoofs produced soon made Jack aware that he was pursued, and he urged his horse to make still greater exertions.

But the officers were capitally mounted, and filled with the hope of being able to run him down.

Jack took his course over the open country, going in a direction at right angles to the deserted mansion.

It would never have done to have led his foes towards that place of refuge, more especially while Dick Turpin was in such a helpless condition.

Away, then, he went, with three important things to do

These were—to escape from his pursuers, to avoid those dragoons who might be patrolling the roads, and to lead his enemies away from the deserted mansion.

But Jack's blood was fully up, and he was ripe and ready for any adventure, no matter how desperate

His steed, too, seemed full of life and vigour.

He had but to give him the rein freely, and away he flew like the wind, leaping clear over obstructions that made Jack hold his breath when he saw how swiftly he was approaching them.

But, with extraordinary pertinacity, the officers kept upon his track, for they hoped, even if they did not succeed in overtaking him, that he would, ere long, be intercepted by some of the troops of dragoons.

And this latter was what Jack feared most; but so far, by keeping steadily over the open country, he had escaped them.

The moon, which seemed to shine with ever-increasing brightness, rose rapidly in the sky, shedding a flood of silvery lustre over the whole of the extensive landscape, and rendering objects at a great distance distinctly visible.

Thus it happened that the officers were able to keep the flying highwayman steadily in view, and this encouraged them to make still greater efforts to capture him.

From time to time Jack looked behind him, but whenever he did so he still perceived the throng of officers coming on at unabated speed.

This was a state of things that would never do, but the question was, how could he make an alteration?

"Confound them!" he muttered. "If I keep on at this rate I shall not be able to get back to the deserted mansion by daybreak. What shall I do? I must double upon them somehow or other—that is my only chance, and to do that I must get out of sight."

This was easier said than done, but upon looking back once more Jack fancied that the distance between him and the officers was materially increased.

Upon this he goaded his willing horse with the spur.

With a snort of pain the gallant creature bounded forward with a speed which made his former rate of travelling seem tedious and slow.

Jack looked back again.

He had gained wonderfully upon his foes, for it seemed to him that their horses were greatly exhausted by their long gallop.

Nevertheless, although there seemed a probability of outstripping them altogether if he kept on, yet Jack felt that his best course would be to hide somewhere, and then allow his enemies to pass him.

CHAPTER CCCCLXXXVII.

SIXTEEN-STRING JACK SEEKS REFUGE FROM HIS PURSUERS IN THE OLD CHURCH.

But this was in truth a very difficult matter, and one that would have to be carried out with a great amount of caution.

Without delay, however, he looked before him in search of some place which would serve to conceal him.

But he could see nothing save a large, old, square-towered church in the distance, upon the grey walls of which the moonbeams shone with a very pretty effect.

Jack pushed onward with unabated speed and without changing his direction, which would take him straight to the old church we have mentioned.

Looking back again, he saw that the police officers were further off than ever.

Jack had travelled many miles in a very short time, and his horse showed signs of flagging every now and then.

A sharp push, however, and then all would be over, and he would be able to allow him a rest.

From the distance which now intervened between the officers and himself, Jack felt sure that it was almost impossible for them to be able to distinguish his form.

He had, then, all the better chance of hiding himself.

But where?

The only place that seemed to afford the least facility for such a thing was the old church.

But the idea of taking refuge in a sacred edifice scarcely even entered the highwayman's mind.

As he came nearer, however, and saw how lonely the church was, the thought struck him that that would be the best possible hiding-place he could find, as the officers would scarcely think of looking for him there.

Upon reaching the church, Jack pulled up his panting steed and looked behind him.

His keen eye enabled him to discern a small black mass in motion in the far distance.

One thing, however, pressed itself upon his attention, and that was, that if he passed behind this church he would certainly be out of sight of his foes.

He did so, and then he saw the door was before him.

Whatever hesitation or doubt he might have had up to the present moment vanished now.

He determined to hide in the church, and surely the officers would never think of looking for him there.

A few paces onward he saw the gate that opened into the churchyard, but it was of such a character that he could not lead his horse through it.

Some palings only a few feet in height surrounded it, and over these his horse leaped with the greatest ease.

A narrow gravelled path led from the churchyard gate to the porch before the church itself; and having dismounted, he led his horse along it.

The moonbeams shone upon the strange scene, and tinted with a magic though spectral beauty the silent graveyard, with its moss-grown tomb-stones, and the square, ivy-covered tower of the church.

Sixteen-String Jack gave but one brief glance around—not at the beauty of the scene, though it was striking enough, but rather in order to ascertain whether his pursuers were in sight.

All was well, for the church was between him and them.

It took the highwayman a few moments only to reach the door leading into the church.

It was old and massive, like the rest of the building, and was reached by some steps ascending from the grave-yard.

Sixteen-String Jack left his horse, and ran up these steps to the door.

He tried it, and, as he expected, found it fast.

It was a large, heavy, iron-studded door, and seemed strong enough to be a barrier to a besieging army; but Jack did not despair of opening it.

He knew the only fastening it could have would be the lock, and to pick that was the easiest thing imaginable, for a glance showed him that the keyhole was large enough for him to put three fingers in.

In the good old times a lock was not thought a strong, secure one without it was of enormous size, and furnished with a key weighing half a dozen pounds, at least.

Such being the case, a large nail, bent at one end, or any similar implement, would undo the lock quite as quickly as the proper key.

Jack knew all this, and hastily searched in his pockets for a little tool that he always carried with him.

It was a picklock.

Armed with this instrument, he attacked the lock.

A few skilful movements enabled him to take hold of the bolt of the lock.

A sharp snap—almost as loud as the report of a pistol—followed.

A slight push sent the huge door slowly creaking open upon its hinges.

This was enough.

Turning back to his horse, Jack took hold of him by the bridle, and gently coaxed him to ascend the steps.

The gallant creature was greatly exhausted by the exertions he had made; so he obeyed Jack's wishes much more willingly than he otherwise would have done.

But when he stood fairly within the sacred edifice he seemed startled, and Jack had much ado to calm him.

The next thing necessary was to close the door, in order that there should be nothing to lead his pursuers to suppose he had sought shelter.

There was no time to lose, for he had already been several minutes in effecting his entrance.

He closed the door then, and locked it too, for by a skilful use of the picklock he was able to accomplish this feat, and having done this, the highwayman felt tolerably secure.

He now turned round and looked about him.

He found he was standing in a kind of lobby.

Some folding-doors were before him, and upon applying pressure to them they yielded.

He led his horse through, and then stood fairly in the church.

Jack looked round him with curiosity, mingled with awe and pleasure.

A repose and silence such as is to be found nowhere on earth save in a church by night filled the air around him.

So intense was the silence that he could hear the beating of his own heart and the panting of his horse with painful plainness.

Through the tall, narrow windows in the sides of the church, and through the richly-stained window over the communion-table, came the silvery lustre.

In large patches of light and shade fell the pale moonbeams, lighting up with extreme beauty the quaint old monuments which were placed around.

Involuntarily, Jack held his breath as he gazed around him, and strange feelings took possession of his heart—feelings which he had never before experienced.

A kind of spell seemed to fall upon him as he continued to gaze upon the solemn scene, and he almost wished that he had not chosen such a hiding-place.

[DICK TURPIN MAKES AN IMPORTANT PROPOSITION TO HIS THREE COMRADES.]

It was only natural that such feelings as these should take possession of the highwayman.

He would be something more or less than a man who could contemplate such a scene without emotion.

It was only for a few moments that Sixteen-String Jack continued as it were spellbound.

It required a strong effort to shake off the nameless influence which oppressed him, but he did so.

"I will move about," he muttered, "and then I shall not feel as I do now."

Accordingly he commenced to walk his horse up and down the aisles, but his iron hoofs raised such loud and endless reverberations throughout the building that he felt that silence was preferable.

The horse, too, seemed alarmed by the unwonted clamour which his footsteps raised.

It happened by chance that Jack paused opposite to a door not far from the one through which he had entered.

He tried to open this door, for he was curious to see what was beyond, but it was fast.

The services of the picklock were again called into requisition, and another snap told that it had been used successfully.

Tom pushed opened the door and led his horse into a square chamber, which at a glance he recognised as the vestry.

There he resolved to remain, for if the officers suspected he was in the church they would hardly think of looking in the vestry for him.

He closed this door and locked it.

The stillness in the vestry did not seem half so depressing as in the church itself, and Jack looked about him and felt much more at his ease.

"I wonder where the officers are?" he said. "I should think they must have passed by this time. I should like to know whether they have or not."

There was a window in the vestry, but it was very high up in the wall.

In the gloom he did not at first notice that there was a table close under this window.

But no sooner did he perceive it than he sprang on to it.

He was now high enough up to look through the window.

He did so with great curiosity and interest, for he fancied he could faintly distinguish sounds which indicated his enemies' approach.

Before him lay the beautiful moonlit landscape, but he could see nothing in motion upon it.

The sounds which had first caught his ear, however, increased in loudness, and he no longer had any doubt about what caused them.

Suddenly, round an angle of the church, the police officers appeared in sight.

There were several of them, and they all, as well as their horses, looked dreadfully fatigued.

To the surprise of Jack, they slackened speed as they approached the vestry window, past which they would go if they continued in the same direction as they were then taking.

They were evidently reining-in their horses, and Jack shrank back from the window, fearful that he had been or would be seen.

In another moment the police officers came to a dead stop, and then the one in command of the rest swore in the most fearful manner for about five minutes.

In this delectable occupation he was ably seconded by his companions.

Of course it is no part of our plan to lay before our readers this very pretty harangue, though Jack could not help hearing and being edified by it.

The officers commenced by cursing themselves, cursing their horses, cursing the highwaymen—against whom the most fearful anathemas were uttered—until at last, when quite exhausted, they wound up by cursing all the world at large, and all that was contained in it. This was so comprehensive that they found it impossible to go any further.

Accordingly, the "torrent and whirlwind" of their passion subsided. Some one has compared rage to high-pressure steam in a boiler, and swearing to an escape valve, alleging that as the valve relieves the boiler of the strain which the superfluous steam puts upon it, so in the same manner is the pressure of ungovernable passion relieved by swearing.

Certain is it that the officers grew calm after a few minutes' indulgence in this pretty pastime, and then in quite a rational tone of voice one of them said:

"I suppose we may as well give up at once. Our horses are completely done over, and from where we stand we can see three miles at least, and he is nowhere in sight!"

"That's true enough," said another, "his horse was so much better than any of ours! The way he gained upon us towards the last was wonderful. We were fools to follow so far as this!"

"That may be," said another, "but, for one, I don't like the idea of slinking back like a lot of dogs with burnt tails."

"But what else are we to do?"

"That's the knotty point!"

"Of course it is! Either he has galloped off out of sight or else——"

"Or else what?"

"Or else he is hiding somewhere!"

"Yes, it is either one or the other, but I should feel more inclined to think the former than the latter, for with such a start as he had got he would never think of hiding himself."

"Well, perhaps not; and, if he has hidden himself, you may depend it is in some safe place or other, and then we have not the slightest clue to his whereabouts."

"True—true! There is no help for it. We must turn back and confess we have failed; that is the only thing we can do."

This was assented to with a little cursing, which we omit.

"Come on, will you!" said the commanding officer, in a tone of voice which showed very plainly what sort of a temper he was in. "What's the good of stopping here? Come along, will you!"

The officer turned his horse's head round, and left his men to follow his example. This they were nothing loath to do, but rode off after him at once.

Sixteen-String Jack heard plainly all that passed between the officers, though he took care not to be seen.

He was rejoiced to see them depart; and, after listening to their footsteps for a moment or two, jumped down off the table.

By this time he had had enough of the church, and thought he could not do better than be off.

But, upon second thoughts, he resolved to wait a little, for he could not be too cautious.

The officers might have had some suspicions, and perhaps would not go far away, but pounce upon him at an unexpected moment.

Decidedly it would be best to wait, although he was to the last degree impatient to execute his mission and rejoin his comrades, for the reader must not forget that Jack had not obtained anything for Dick, although he had been out so long, and there now seemed to be even less chance than ever of his being able to effect his purpose. But Jack would not despair, although the prospect of success was so slight.

He jumped on the table and listened for some sounds that would show that his foes were retreating, but all was still.

He opened the window and listened again.

He was rewarded for his trouble by hearing the dull sound of their horses' hoofs.

The officers were, then, riding away, and he had nothing to do but emerge quietly, and take his way in a direction diverging from theirs.

This he resolved to do without delay, for, though the night was young, yet he could not tell how much trouble he might have in obtaining the articles he required, nor how long it would be before he could return to the deserted mansion.

Unlocking the door of the vestry again, he led his horse out into the church.

Jack was getting used to his quarters, and he was by no means so much affected now as he was before.

But his horse was restive, and it was with difficulty that he induced him to approach the folding doors.

At last he succeeded, and just as he did so, Jack fancied he could hear approaching footsteps.

He patted his horse on the neck, and used every means he could think of to keep him still.

Now that the echo of his own footsteps no longer frightened him, he stood still again.

It may be imagined with what intentness Jack listened. Footsteps were most certainly approaching.

They paused before the door.

A whispering ensued, and then a key or some similiar instrument was cautiously introduced into the lock.

CHAPTER CCCCLXXXVIII.

IN WHICH SIXTEEN-STRING JACK HAS AN UNPARALLELED ADVENTURE.

Sixteen-String Jack held his breath.

Here was a terrible dilemma!

He did not dare to move, and he suffered an agony of apprehension lest his horse should do so.

If the least sound reached the ears of those outside—and these he concluded at once must be his enemies—he would be discovered.

And if he remained where he was, and suffered the door to be opened, his discovery would ensue just the same.

What could he do?

There was no time to decide upon any course of action. He was fairly bewildered by this unexpected occurrence.

He patted and stroked his horse to keep him still.

He did not dare speak to him caressingly.

He could tell by the animal's manner that the slight noise outside was alarming him—the strange place in which he stood, and the occurrences which had recently taken place, having apparently had the effect of working him up to a pitch of nervous excitement,

Then the lock snapped.

The sharp sound, coming upon his ears so suddenly as it did, and in the silence of the church sounding very loud, put the finishing touch to his terror.

Uttering a loud snort of fright, he gave a sudden plunge, which snatched the rein from Jack's hand, and then galloped up the aisle.

The uproar was terrific, but the highwayman was little prepared for the results it would effect.

A deep groan and a yell came from without; then there was a scuffling sound, followed by rapid footsteps.

Jack pulled the door open, and caught sight of a couple of men climbing over the palings which skirted the graveyard.

No doubt the sounds they had heard seemed most unearthly and hideous, and, under the influence of the terror they felt, they had taken to flight.

An anxious question now occurred to Jack.

Who were these men, and what was their errand to the church at that hour of the night?

Were they the police?—were they in search of him?

Jack thought not.

There were only two of them, and they looked very unlike police officers.

At this moment, Jack perceived, lying down at the foot of the steps, a bundle of something.

Taking this up, he found it was a bag containing a a sack and a number of rather clumsily-made housebreaking implements.

Looking to the door, the highwayman then saw that a picklock, similar to the one he had himself made use of, was sticking in the lock, thus proving, beyond all doubt, that these two men were gaining admittance to the church in a surreptitious manner.

If they were burglars, and their intention had been to carry off the communion-plate, they must have been terribly alarmed by the din created by Jack's horse's hoofs upon the paving of the church.

Our friend came to this conclusion, and with a laugh, turned to look after his steed.

He could hear nothing of him, so he had evidently stopped in his mad gallop.

Advancing cautiously up the middle aisle, he saw him standing within the railings that separated the chancel from the communion.

He had leaped over these, and then, finding he could go no further, stood still, trembling violently in every limb.

Jack opened the gates in the railing, and took firm hold of the reins.

Then, quickly springing into the saddle, he touched his horse lightly with the spurs.

The bound forward that he gave was something marvellous, and the force with which he descended must have broken some of the paving-stones.

Away he went at full speed.

The doors were open, and the way was clear before him.

Like an arrow, he darted through the doorway, then cleared the steps at a bound, and leaped over the palings.

Jack looked around him; but all was still.

The men whose burglarious designs he had so strangely interfered with were nowhere to be seen.

Feeling that he had lingered long enough, and his horse being fully upon his mettle, he considered he could not do better than gallop off, and let him have the rein freely, until he slacked speed of his own accord.

Away, then, over the level face of the country they flew, more like some phantom horse and rider than aught else; and in a few minutes afterwards, when Sixteen-String Jack looked back, he could only just distinguish the old square-towered church in the far distance.

It was soon after this that his horse's intense excitement wore off, and he proceeded at a more moderate pace.

A glance up to the stars sufficed to show Jack which way he was going, and he looked about him cautiously on every side, in order that he might not pass by any opportunity of obtaining the articles he required.

Presently, however, he drew rein, and came to a standstill.

Before him was a tall hedge, and on the other side of this was the high-road.

It was this which had induced him to halt, for it would have been dangerous to a degree had he attempted to cross it without reconnoitring.

It was well that he was thus prudent, for the grinding of wheels upon the road was the first sound that struck upon his ears.

He could see through the hedge plainly enough, and he at once endeavoured to ascertain what kind of vehicle was approaching.

Before it came in sight, his practised ear told him that it was a light spring cart, drawn by one horse, and was coming along at a very rapid rate indeed.

It was very close at hand, and in less than a moment came in sight.

He looked at it curiously enough, and then, somewhat to his surprise, saw it was one of those light carts which he had noticed passing by while looking through the window of the public-house at Hatfield.

It was, indeed nothing more nor less than a light covered cart, filled with articles of every possible description, which had been purchased at the market.

At the time of which we write, things were ordered very differently to what they are now.

A hundred years ago it was quite a common thing for people living in remote and inaccessible districts to drive to the nearest market-town, and purchase a sufficient quantity of provisions and other articles to last them until the next market-day.

It was by this means only that village shopkeepers obtained the goods which they sold.

Of course all this was well known to Jack, and he recognised the character of the conveyance immediately, and no sooner did he do so than he muttered:

"The very thing! How ever was it that I never thought of that before? This cart contains, beyond question, an abundance of every article I require! Hurrah! I can see my way out of my difficulty! I shall obtain what I want, and return to the deserted mansion before dawn, after all!"

This was by no means so certain as Jack's speech made it out to be.

In the first place, even while muttering his thoughts aloud, the market-cart had passed him, and was a long way off down the road.

That, however, gave the highwayman very little concern, for he fully believed that he was still far enough away from London to have no fear of interruption from the dragoons.

Turning his horse's head in the direction which the cart had taken, Jack galloped over the fields, keeping close under the hedge.

Coming at length to a kind of gap, he made his steed face it, and leaped into the road.

The grinding of the cart wheels still reached his ears, and he galloped onward.

Each moment the sound became more and more distinct, until he presently perceived the cart on the road before him.

In another moment he was alongside.

So far as he could tell by the hasty glance which he alone had an opportunity of giving, this cart was occupied by one man, and he was holding the reins.

In a loud and peremptory tone of voice Jack called upon him to pull up, on pain of receiving a shot if he refused.

To his surprise, however, no notice was taken of his words, the man continuing to drive on just as though nothing had been said to him.

Jack repeated his demand in a louder voice, and with increased fierceness of tone.

The result was the same.

This was what he had anticipated.

It was the easiest matter in the world for him to keep abreast of the man in the cart, and he made his demands while retaining this position.

The moon was shining with greater brilliancy than before, but, nevertheless, Jack could not see the man's face distinctly, because it was shaded by the canvas covering of the cart.

Still, he fancied there was something peculiar about him, for he swayed his head backwards and forwards in a manner very curious to behold.

For the third time, Jack commanded the man to pull up his horse, but he met with no more attention than before.

Sixteen-String Jack could not help thinking that there was something very singular in all this.

Never before had any traveller treated him with so much stolid indifference—for the man who drove the market-cart neither answered him nor made any sign.

This was a state of things which Jack resolved to put a stop to, and that in a very short space of time, for it would never do for him to be galloping along by the side of the cart as he then was.

Quickening his pace a little, therefore, he was soon on a level with the horse's head.

Then, reaching out his hand, Jack took hold of the rein himself, and compelled the horse to come to a standstill.

He stopped very suddenly, for Jack had given the rein a sharp snatch, being, as he was, just a little put out by the small attention which had been paid to him.

But the highwayman little expected what would be the result of stopping the vehicle so suddenly.

The strange man who was driving was seated in a precarious manner on the top of some goods.

Turning round, Jack saw him swaying from side to side, and then he gave a sudden lurch to one side.

Before Jack could save him or even properly comprehend what was taking place, he fell heavily into the roadway, and lay quite still where he had fallen, without evincing the least signs of life.

The affair grew more and more extraordinary.

Sixteen-String Jack passed his hand over his eyes, in the manner of one who is not quite sure whether the events occurring before him are real or unreal.

But there could be no possible doubt about it.

There was the horse and cart, and there lay the man in the road as some log of wood might have done.

Jack was bewildered.

But he did not lose all presence of mind.

His first care was to look to the horse in the cart.

He saw the poor creature was reeking with sweat, and trembling as though under the influence of some great terror.

Jack dismounted, and tied his horse to a tree by the roadside, and which happened to be almost within reach of his hand.

This done, he approached the terrified horse in the cart, and soothed its agitation as well as he could.

Believing that it would not start off of its own accord, Jack next turned his attention to the man, over whom he felt sure there hung some air of mystery.

Jack stooped down.

The man lay with his face to the ground.

He was tall and bulky, and dressed in rustic attire.

Seizing hold of one arm, Jack, at a second effort, turned him over on to his back, so that his face was fully revealed to the moonbeams.

Some indistinctly-muttered words came from the man's lips, but the highwayman strove in vain to catch their import.

One glance at the man's face, however, served to make all clear, and to remove all mystery.

The man was in a state of hopeless intoxication.

This accounted for everything.

The horrible odour of stale fermented liquors with which his breath was tainted, would alone have sufficed to prove the fact; but the sleepy-looking eyes, the rubicund, bloated countenance, and the indistinct utterance, were so many additional testimonies.

Jack comprehended how it was that no notice had been taken of his command to stop.

The man could not hear him—or, if he could hear, could not understand—or, if he understood, had not the power to draw the rein.

How he preserved his seat was something astonishing.

The sudden cessation of motion, however, was enough to throw him off his balance, and down he fell.

Jack had often heard of people driving home from market in a state of utter intoxication, and here was a case in point.

This man was wholly under the dominion of drink, yet he was holding the reins, and doubtless would have reached his home unhurt, from the fact of his horse having sufficient intelligence to find its way back to its own stable.

All these thoughts passed very quickly through Jack's mind, and now he wondered what he should do under this singular conjunction of events.

There lay the man, about as helpless as any man could be, and there stood the cart containing those articles he was so anxious to obtain.

The question was, how should he act in order to turn things most to his advantage?

Sixteen-String Jack was not long in deciding upon a plan of action, and he was induced to be as quick as he could in coming to his conclusions, because he could not tell how soon some one might make their appearance on the road.

In the first place, then, he stooped down, and taking hold of the drunken man just under the arms, dragged him to the side of the road, where he would be out of danger from any vehicle that might pass by.

He was a great weight, and Jack found it quite a task.

Eventually, however, he succeeded in dragging him into the dry ditch, and placing him in a half-sitting position, with his back resting against the sloping bank upon the top of which the hedge was planted.

Some hours would evidently have to elapse before this man recovered his senses or recollection, for he made no opposition to what Jack did, though now and then he would seem to be half conscious that something unusual was going forward.

Even when he did awake to a full and proper use of his faculties, he would be rather puzzled to remember what had occurred.

Sixteen-String Jack was disgusted with the man's beast-like condition.

"That's a disagreeable job!" he said, as he straightened himself after placing the man in the position we have described. "I have done him a great service, and I ought to have something for my trouble!"

CHAPTER CCCCLXXXIX.

SIXTEEN-STRING JACK BECOMES THE DRIVER OF THE MARKET-CART.

As he spoke these words, Sixteen-String Jack stooped down again, and made a rapid examination of the man's pockets.

The result of his search was that he found a number of articles of no value, which he tossed aside, and a leather bag tied up with string, which he placed in his own pocket.

We have said that Jack had decided upon what he should do next, and so he had.

Going to his own horse, he untied him from the tree and fastened him to the tail-board of the cart.

Then, jumping up into the cart himself, he took the seat which the driver had occupied, seized the whip and reins, and set the horse in motion.

The creature had by this time recovered from its fright, and a sharp application of the whip caused him to set forward at a rapid rate, for really it was a capital hack, and worthy of something better than to run in the shafts of a market-cart.

Away went Jack, then, rolling along in quite a new character, and feeling rather surprised himself at the strange events which had just taken place.

It was a change of circumstances as strange as it was unexpected.

The highwayman's heart, however, was now light enough.

He had succeeded in his design.

Beyond all doubt, he had in that cart everything that Dick Turpin could require, and provender enough to last the whole of them for some time to come.

The prospect before him looked bright enough—much brighter than it had for a very long time; but such is generally the case when some sudden reverse is about to take place.

It did not form any part of Jack's plan to continue his course along the high-road.

At the very first lane he came to, which promised to lead him in the direction of the deserted mansion, he turned down it, though the horse was very unwilling to make any change, and Jack had to enforce obedience to his wishes with the whip.

The animal doubtless knew it was not going towards home, and a great change in its rate of speed took place.

Jack very soon made the horse aware that he was master, and, having established this position, away he went at the same rattling speed as before.

It was not very long, however, before Sixteen-String Jack became aware that all things were not so straightforward and simple as he thought they were.

It is true, he had got all he had required; but how were the goods to be transported to the deserted mansion?

It would be running a great amount of risk were he to attempt to drive boldly down the lane and through the ruined gates.

It was very certain that the horse and cart would be missed, and equally certain that very close search would be made after them.

The highwayman was well aware that such bulky articles as a horse and cart are not easily hidden, and it would be a thousand pities to peril the discovery of his comrades' present hiding-place by any such injudicious proceeding.

But what else was to be done?—that was the question.

Jack put on his considering-cap.

He had plenty of time for consideration, for he would have to drive many miles before he came anywhere in the neighbourhood of the deserted mansion.

Clearly, then, he could not occupy his thoughts better than in deciding upon what should be done.

From time to time he looked up to the stars above and calculated his position, for the piece of country in which he found himself was almost unknown to him.

From one winding lane he went on to another, probably going many miles further than it would have been by the main road; but, then, he was safe, for since he had begun to drive he had not been passed by a single person.

He was exceedingly anxious that he should not be seen by anyone, lest the appearance of the cart should be noticed and remembered when inquiry was made.

At length, the different objects in the landscape became familiar to him, and then he knew he was at no great distance from his destination.

He had racked his brain for some plan better than the one that had first presented itself to him; but he had been unable to do so, and, in the end, agreed to adopt it.

What that plan was, we need not tell the reader.

It will be sufficient to describe Jack's proceedings.

Not very far from the deserted mansion—that is, not far in a straight line across the country—was a wood of rather considerable extent.

Towards this wood Sixteen-String Jack made his way, and finally arrived under the shadow of the trees.

It so happened that he was able to penetrate some distance into the wood by pursuing several open glades.

At length, however, he came to a standstill, but not until he was, as he fancied, in the centre of the wood.

He now got down out of the cart, and going to the back, untied his own horse and let down the tail-board.

Taking up the first package he came to—which was a box containing eggs—he carried it right into the wood, and concealed it under the brake and gorse-bushes.

This done, he returned to the cart, whence he took a flitch of bacon, which he hid in the same manner, and at a little distance.

Thus he proceeded until the cart was empty, for all the things it contained were of an eatable or drinkable description.

Although all hidden in one place—namely, the middle of the wood—yet the different articles were distributed over a large space of ground, and each lot far enough away from the other to escape being found should one lot happen to be accidentally discovered.

The goods had evidently been bought to supply a provision shop, such as are to be found in small country towns and villages at the present day.

Sixteen-String Jack took care to retain and conceal about his person as many of those articles which Dick would require as he could, and then he prepared for return.

On the succeeding night he hoped, by the aid of his three companions, to be able to convey the whole to the deserted mansion.

This proceeding had of necessity occupied a long time, and now Jack prepared to return with all possible speed.

Both horses had plentifully regaled themselves upon the short sweet grass in the wood while he had been thus actively employed, and were now in good condition for the road again.

Jack took up his former position.

That is to say, he tied his horse at the back, and drove the now empty cart in the same way as he had before.

A very short space of time indeed now sufficed to take him clear of the wood, and he drove straight on towards the Finchley road.

As before, he took his way along the narrow country lanes.

In about half an hour the highway was reached.

Jack pulled up, and having listened carefully, descended, taking the long cart whip with him.

He passed the reins over a hook at the side of the cart, doubtless placed there for such a purpose.

He next untied his own horse and mounted him.

Then riding up to the cart, he struck the horse a couple of severe blows with the whip.

Away he flew at a prodigious rate, and with as much vigour as if he had not trotted a mile.

He took the road towards London, simply because his head happened to be turned in that direction.

Jack watched the cart until it disappeared from sight.

Then, dropping the whip, he set off towards the deserted mansion.

On the whole, he considered he had arranged things very cleverly indeed.

He had been absent a long time, and had run a great deal of danger, it is true; but he had not only succeeded in his original design, but had hidden, close at hand, provisions enough to last a month or more, and he had hidden them, too, where, owing to the precautions he had taken, there would be little likelihood of their being found.

As for the cart, he believed he had effectually destroyed all clue with respect to it.

The drunken man would recover his senses—would find he had been robbed, and that his horse and cart were gone.

The latter would be found, in all probability, somewhere on the high-road between Finchley and London; but Jack did not believe there was anything to connect him with the transaction.

In addition to this, the goods were concealed where they could be recovered with very little risk and trouble.

As Jack drew nearer and nearer to his destination, and recollected what a very many hours he had been absent, his breast began to be filled with feelings of the liveliest alarm for the safety of his captain.

He could not help thinking that Dick Turpin's condition was desperate indeed.

The wound in the head was a very ugly one, and, placed as he was beyond the aid of proper medical attendance, the chances were rather against than for his ultimate recovery.

This subject was such a painful and uncomfortable one that Jack tried his best to dismiss it from his mind, and felt heartily glad when at last he saw before him the dilapidated gates.

He was terribly fatigued, and so was his horse.

Before he had got half-way up the avenue, a figure glided out from the shadow of the trees.

A ray of moonlight fell upon it, and then Jack knew who it was.

It was Claude Duval.

He hastened to his old comrade's side.

"Well, Jack," he said, "what luck?"

"I have succeeded beyond my utmost anticipations!"

I am glad of that; but, as you may easily think, your prolonged absence made us dread that you had fallen into the power of our foes."

"I have had some narrow escapes, I can assure you, but you shall know all at the first opportunity I have of relating my adventures to you. First of all, tell me about Dick."

"I cannot tell you much, except that he seems very bad indeed; but you must see him. I fancy it is food he wants as much anything."

"He shall soon have that, then, and of the most nourishing character."

"That is good news again! I feel very uneasy about him myself."

"And I too—and I too!"

While this little conversation was in progress, Sixteen-String Jack and Claude Duval had made their way along the avenue and across the lawn and garden to the stable.

Here the horse was placed, and his wants having been hurriedly attended to, the two friends ascended together to the upper portion of the house.

They were met on the stairs by Tom King, who fully shared Claude Duval's anxieties, and equally rejoiced at Sixteen-String Jack's safe return.

The latter hastily deposited upon the table the various articles he had brought with him, and then, in company with his two comrades, entered the adjoining chamber, in which Dick Turpin lay.

They found him awake and sensible.

An unmistakable smile of pleasure came over his face when he saw that Sixteen-String Jack had come back.

"I am better," he said, in a faint whisper—"I am sure I am much better. I should feel almost well were it not for the low, faint feeling which at times comes over me, and that, I am persuaded, arises as much from want of food as anything, for I have lost an immense quantity of blood, and many hours have elapsed since a morsel of any kind has passed my lips.

"Then if that is all you require, captain," said Sixteen-String Jack, in a cheerful tone of voice, "you will soon be all right, for I have brought just what you require; and, better still, I have secreted close at hand a sufficient quantity of provisions to last us all for a month at least."

Dick smiled again, in token of satisfaction.

The effort it required to speak was too much for his weak state.

In the meantime, Maud, who had slipped out of the chamber at the moment the three friends entered it, now returned, bringing with her a portion of the provisions Jack had brought.

Turpin made a slight meal—they feared to let him take too much—and then he immediately fell asleep.

Sixteen-String Jack was only too glad to retire and do the same.

Towards evening they all assembled again.

Turpin was improving in a manner that was really wonderful to witness, and there was no doubt that by receiving plenty of proper food and rest he would soon be all right again.

Sixteen-String Jack then related at length the strange adventures which had befallen him since his departure, Dick Turpin listening to the whole with the greatest attention.

When, however, he described the different articles he had hidden, the joy of all was unbounded.

It seemed pretty clear that they would have to keep close for a time, until Turpin was better, and therefore Jack's intelligence was all the more welcome.

For fear what he had hidden should be discovered, it was agreed upon that they would fetch some of the things that very night.

Sixteen-String Jack would have to go, because he alone would know where to look for the various articles; and it was agreed that Claude Duval should accompany him, while Tom King remained on guard.

As soon, then, as the hour was sufficiently late, the two highwaymen set off on foot for the little wood.

They agreed to go on foot because the distance in a straight line was not great, and because they were less likely to attract attention than if they were on horseback.

It would be easy to take as much as they could carry, and conceal it at the mansion.

This was what they did.

Of course, they were careful to avoid being seen by anyone, and succeeded, for they were far away from any high-road, and the only lane was the one from which the dilapidated gates opened.

The task was a tiring one and many journeys had to be made.

Long before the faintest streak of dawn in the eastern horizon betokened the approach of the new day our friends had succeeded in performing their duty.

Sixteen-String Jack found everything undisturbed, just where he had left them, though they might not have continued so.

At last, as we have said, every article was carried away, including several that were scarcely worth the trouble of transit, but they removed them in order that they should not afford a clue to the whole transaction.

Thoroughly wearied out, they flung themselves down to rest, in order to be prepared for any emergency that might arise.

CHAPTER CCCCXC.

DICK TURPIN PROPOSES THAT HIS THREE COMRADES SHALL SET OFF FOR THE NEW FOREST IN SEARCH OF THE MISER'S BURIED CHEST OF GOLD.

SEVERAL days passed by without the occurrence of any particular incident, save that Dick Turpin rapidly progressed towards his recovery.

The utmost attention was paid to his hurts, and this, combined with his perfect rest, wrought the most salutary effects.

Every morning exhibited an improvement in his appearance.

As for his three comrades, they were so anxious not to do anything that might lead to their discovery while he was in such a precarious state, that they kept close in the mansion, and never once showed themselves abroad.

It was about a week from that morning when Dick Turpin was discovered lying close to the gates, that he was so far recovered as to be able to sit up in the old-fashioned chair and join in conversation.

The wound itself was nearly well, and what he most suffered from was a state of utter weakness, but this slowly improved from day to day.

There was no doubt time was the only thing required to set all right.

It was, then, one evening, a week after his accident, that those five persons in whom the reader feels so deeply interested were grouped around the fire in that chamber in the deserted mansion which from the first had been their head-quarters.

Dick Turpin, with his head bandaged up, was sitting in the antique chair, which had been drawn close up to the blazing fire, for, though spring was approaching, the weather was chilly.

Behind the chair, with one arm resting on the back of it, was Maud.

She was looking eagerly into Dick's face, and listening with the utmost attention to what he was saying, for Dick was addressing his comrades in animated tones.

Tom King, Claude Duval, and Sixteen-String Jack were near the fire, and also listening to their captain.

"There is really no time to lose," Turpin was saying. "It was a most unfortunate thing that I should have been wounded just when I was."

"But it might have been worse," said Maud, gently. "Be thankful that your wound has not proved fatal."

"True—true! I ought to be so, and yet I cannot help feeling some degree of vexation at being laid by just at the time when all things were progressing favourably."

"It is no use to regret that."

"No, Tom, my friend, it is not; and I want you, as I said a little while ago, to talk over some plans for the future."

"You have some plan of action to propose, of course?"

"A thought has certainly occurred to me, but whether it is carried out depends entirely upon yourselves."

"Let us hear what it is, captain."

"In good time. In the first place, then, I think I may say that our original plan is still to be adhered to?"

"Most certainly—a better could not possibly be found."

"So I think; and it is with regard to that I wish to speak."

"We are all attention."

"Well, then, you have already collected a tolerable amount towards the sum that will be required?"

"Yes, pretty well, considering the little time we have had."

"But yet not sufficient for our purpose?"

"Oh, nothing like enough!"

"I thought not."

"But what is it that you have to propose?"

"Why, something that I wonder has not occurred to you before, and how it is that I never have thought of it until to-day I cannot make out. I never knew anything so slip out of my memory."

"What—what?"

"Why, I happened to recollect where probably thrice the amount we want is lying, and to be had for the trouble of fetching away."

"I know what you mean, Dick," interrupted Tom King. "I had thought of it before, if you hadn't. It won't do."

"Why not?"

"It won't."

"But that is not enough reason."

"Stop—stop!" said Claude and Jack, both speaking together. "You must recollect that we don't at all understand what you are talking about."

"Let me explain," said Turpin.

"Pray do so at once."

"I think you have heard me relate the adventure before, so that probably the only thing necessary will be to remind you of it."

"Well, what was the adventure?"

"An incident that befel Tom King and myself some time before our meeting with you—before, indeed, those occurrences connected with Durley Chine, with which you are well acquainted."

"Yes—yes!"

"It was, then, one night when we entered the New Forest, and there saw a miser digging for a chest of money which he had buried."

"Oh yes, we recollect now! You and Tom found the chest of treasure which had been stolen from the miser, and buried it somewhere in the wood yourselves?"

"Just so—that is precisely it. Friend Tom here did not care much about it, and had the matter been left to him he would not have disturbed the treasure at all."

"Why not?"

"He would have it that some kind of ill luck would always attach itself to it."

"Ha, ha!"

"You laugh! I could not help doing so myself. And now let me make a long story short. I have said quite enough to enable you to guess my intentions."

"Oh yes! You think it would be worth while to dig up the miser's chest?" said Claude Duval.

"Certainly; and in that, rely upon it, there is three times as much wealth as we require."

"I have thought of it," said Tom King.

"And you think it won't do, of course?"

"Yes, I do, and I have the best of all reasons for thinking so. If I had not, I should have mentioned the matter before."

"And why won't it do?"

"The treasure is no longer there."

"No longer there! How do you know that? What do you mean? Explain yourself!"

"I can do so easily. Have you forgotten my first imprisonment in Newgate, when I was tried and condemned to death?"

"Oh yes! But why call up such disagreeable past events?"

"Simply because it is necessary to do so. In order that I might have no chance of making my escape, two men, named Biggs and Wilson, were placed in the cell along with me. I had resolved to escape, and conceived that I might be able to win these two men over to my interests by the offer of a large sum of money. I tried the experiment, and related to them at length the full particulars of our adventure in the New Forest, at the same time telling them that we had buried the chest not far from the dingle. I agreed that they should accompany me to the place, when, in return for my freedom, I would show them where the chest of treasure was hidden, and surrender the whole of it to them."

"But what of that? You did not escape."

"I know that. It seems Mr. Tapner, who was at that time Governor of Newgate, had been listening at the door to all that was said, and just when I had won the turnkeys over, he abruptly entered, gave them both in custody, and put two fresh men in the cell."

"How aggravating!"

"Very so!—was it not?"

"But what has this to do with the treasure not being where you buried it? You did not show them where it was?"

"I certainly did not, but I told them pretty well! You may depend upon it that when these two men were released, as they would be, they would hasten off to the New Forest, and, guided by the information they possessed, would make the closest search for the buried treasure."

"And do you think they would succeed?"

"I consider it very likely, having such a good clue as I gave them, and they wouldn't be very sparing with their trouble, depend upon it."

"Still," said Turpin, "I don't think they would find it."

"But," urged Tom King, "there is something further to be considered. Mr. Tapner, the Governor, who was dismissed in disgrace, also heard the particulars of that interesting adventure. Now, when he found himself deprived of his office, he would be inclined to try any desperate sort of speculation, and so off to the New Forest he would go, nor would he rest until he had found the treasure."

"There is just a chance," said Dick Turpin, after a pause, "that the box has been unburied by some one, but I think that it is far more likely that it lies where we left it undisturbed. What do you think, Claude?"

"I think as you do, for it is not very easy for anyone to hit upon a particular spot of earth in such a place as the New Forest."

"So do I, and therefore what I propose is that as the environs of London are so well watched by the police that it is only with very great danger that we can obtain a booty, and I think it very desirable that we should go further afield. In the meantime, the alarm in and about the metropolis would subside. As for myself, I shall have to keep quiet for some time longer in order properly to regain my strength."

"You will indeed. Do not venture out too soon."

"I shall not, depend upon it. And now to come directly to the proposition I wished to make to you. Because I cannot stir out is no reason why you should be imprisoned. Now, if you will leave me here with Maud I shall do very well; and if you will all three set off to the New Forest you will be advancing our scheme very much. For instance, if you fail to find the treasure—I am not much afraid, but still, supposing you do fail, you will have a much better chance of obtaining a good booty down in that district than you would about London, and the danger would not be half so great."

"I see what you mean, Dick," said Tom King, "and now you put it in that light I think it is the best thing we can do."

"So do I," returned Sixteen-String Jack, "because, as you have such a good stock of provisions, you will have no occasion to leave the place, and while you keep snugly hidden, I think you have little to fear on the score of being found out by our foes."

"The length of time we have remained here undiscovered," replied Turpin, "says a good deal in favour of the excellence of our hiding-place. I begin to think we shall not be suspected."

"I don't think you will," said Claude Duval. "That is, if you are only properly cautious."

"Of course," returned Turpin. "And then, with respect to your journey, you will be able to set out together, and so will be a mutual defence. If you find the miser's treasure, why, so much the better; if not, you will have the chance of doing a good stroke of business, and by the time you come back, I hope I shall be recovered, and that you will be in a position to enable us to put our scheme into execution."

"And so do we all, I fancy."

"Is it agreed upon, then? First, that you leave me here with Maud to attend upon me; second, that you all three join company to the New Forest in search of the buried treasure; and third, that, whether you find it or not, you will make as good a booty as opportunity will admit?"

"And when we return——" said Tom King.

"You will come here," said Turpin; "when, I hope, you will find me more like myself than I am now."

In this manner, then, the expedition to the New Forest was agreed upon.

Little did they think, when planning the future, what strange and unlooked-for events would take place, which would have the effect of deranging all their schemes.

But we ought not to anticipate.

It will be sufficient for us to recount what befel the three highwaymen upon their excursion, and also what happened to Dick Turpin and Maud during their lonely sojourn in the deserted mansion.

By the time their future proceedings were agreed upon, the night was very far advanced, and so, very wisely, they all retired to rest, for it was necessary that they should be in possession of their full bodily energies, in order to be able to contend with the numberless difficulties which would be sure to assail them.

It was late the next day when they all assembled; and having partaken of a hearty meal together, they set about making their preparations, for the three highwaymen had resolved to set out upon their journey that very night.

These preparations lasted them till nightfall, by which time they had everything properly arranged.

The horses had been attended to, and got into as good order as possible, though they were not in such condition for the road as could have been wished, in consequence of the poor quality of the food they had eaten.

This, probably, they would be able to remedy.

At last the hour for parting came.

Under any circumstances it is hard to separate from friends, and the highwaymen felt it particularly so.

Cut off as they were from all intercourse with mankind, it is only natural that the attachment they had formed for each other should be of a deep and more lasting character than of those persons who have all the world before them to choose acquaintances from.

Added to this, there was the doubt whether they should ever see each other again.

To one or more of them that might prove to be a last parting.

Their situation was extremely perilous and critical, and they could not tell how soon a catastrophe might occur.

All these gloomy thoughts filled the minds of our friends when the moment came for them to bid adieu to their captain, and they were more than half inclined to abandon their enterprise, and remain along with their captain until he was strong and well enough to defend himself.

Well would it have been for all of them had they allowed themselves to be more influenced by their forebodings than they did.

Things were doomed to take a different course, however. The forebodings respecting this parting were shared in by all, and yet neither expressed them.

All were glad when the farewell words were spoken.

Turpin was not well enough to descend into the garden, but he placed himself at that top window which overlooked such a large portion of the grounds, and watched them take their departure.

When the three highwaymen mounted, the night had just begun, and the bright and nearly full moon was only a few degrees above the horizon.

On leaving the deserted habitation which had furnished them for so long with a safe shelter, they felt as though they were bidding adieu to home—and, indeed, it was a home to them.

Upon reaching the lawn, they paused and looked back.

At the top of the window we have mentioned, they could see—though indistinctly—the faces of Maud and Dick Turpin.

They waved their hands in token of farewell.

The three highwaymen returned the salutation, and, then, setting their horses in motion, were the next moment lost among the trees which fringed the avenue.

CHAPTER CCCCXCI.

THE THREE HIGHWAYMEN ARE AFFORDED THE OPPORTUNITY OF REDRESSING AN INFAMOUS WRONG.

Passing through the gates, the three highwaymen struck straight across the country, apparently in a direction quite opposite to that which they ought to take.

But they had carefully considered which would be their best route, and galloped over the fields because they had found there was so much less danger of being intercepted by their foes.

When they got a certain distance from London, they imagined they would have things very much their own way.

To be sure, they would not have anything to fear from their worst foes, the dragoons, for it was only those roads immediately surrounding London that were regularly patrolled.

But the highwaymen were not aware how industriously handbills and placards, describing them with great accuracy, had been distributed all over the kingdom, and the very large reward which was offered for their apprehension had the effect of putting everybody on the alert.

In every direction people were on the look-out for them, and Sixteen-String Jack's encounter with the officers at the Tiger's Head at Hatfield had created quite a ferment.

It had the effect of stirring up all the police in every county town for miles.

In perfect ignorance of all this, our friends took their way over the meadows.

Although they appeared to go in a straight line, yet in reality they bent slowly round to the left, which was the direction in which they wished to go.

The high-roads leading out of London had to be crossed several times, and once or twice they had a narrow escape of coming into collision with the dragoons.

Fortunately, however, they avoided this.

When they found themselves once fairly in full gallop across the country, they forgot, to a great extent, their foreboding feelings, for the rapid motion of their steeds had a remarkably invigorating effect.

At length, after two hours' hard riding, the highwaymen deemed themselves sufficiently distant from London to emerge into the high-road.

At any rate, they did so, and continued to take their way along its level surface at a gentle trot, for their horses were exhausted, not only from the miles they had travelled and their rapid speed, but chiefly in consequence of the uneven character of the road over which they had to go.

As far as ever they could see, not a single habitation was in sight.

On all sides of them were meadows and green trees, and all those objects which go to make up a purely rural landscape

Here, then, were the highwaymen, quite out of the reach of their enemies, and they had but one wish, which was, that their captain formed one of the party.

The hour was very late—almost too late for them to hope to meet with any passengers. For this, however, they cared little; their object was to get as far away from London as possible.

With light and careless conversation the highwaymen whiled away the time, and to have heard or seen them as they rode along the moonlit highway, no one would have believed that they were in danger of their lives.

But so it was.

In a short time they were compelled to allow their horses to reduce their speed to a walk, for the poor creatures were utterly exhausted.

"The fact is," said Claude Duval, "we shall have to put up at the first public-house we come to where accommodation for our cattle can be found. The rank green stuff which they have lately been eating has weakened them terribly."

"There is no doubt of that," said Tom King. "Good sound corn is what they want. The other stuff they ate gave them no support."

"I feel rather doubtful about putting up at public-houses, after my last adventure."

"And well you may do. But what else can we do?"

"Nay, that I know not."

"There is nothing else. Our horses must be fed, and we must be extra vigilant to guard against the risk."

"That is it," said Tom King; "and you must recollect that we are a long distance from London now, and consequently the chances of our being recognised are much diminished."

"Very true. Then, may we consider it as settled that we are to stop at the next inn we come to?"

"I suppose so."

"It will soon be morning now, and you know that in the country most inns are open before sunrise. It appears to me that we shall have some distance to go, for as far as I can see there is no sign of human life."

"We will push on gently. Doubtless, by the time the sun rises we shall approach some village."

It was very tiresome, however, to journey along at such a pace, but there was no help for it, though they did not resign themselves without grumbling.

In order to rest their horses still more, and for the sake of the change, they dismounted, and led their steeds by the bridle. It was a strange mode of proceeding, but still it was not altogether an unpleasant one.

They were now able to talk even more at their ease.

Ere long, the night slowly glided along, and morning came. The light was faint at first, but soon it increased in power.

[THE LITTLE GIRL MAKES AN APPEAL TO THE THREE HIGHWAYMEN.

Just as the ruddy tint in the east gave token that the sun was about to rise, our friends remounted their horses and continued on their way at a slightly quickened pace.

In a little while they caught sight of the roofs and chimneys of a house.

They jumped in a moment to the conclusion that it was an inn.

But before they could make any remark about it, Tom King suddenly exclaimed:

"Look—look, my friends! What is that yonder? Look—oh, look!

Claude Duval and Sixteen-String Jack at once looked in the direction in which Tom King pointed.

There was a curve in the road, about a hundred yards before them, and it was round this curve that the building was situated which they had taken for an inn.

The chimney-pots and roof were, as we have said, visible above the tree-tops.

Round this curve in the road, then, there came at a rapid pace a young girl—a child, indeed, for her age could not have been more than thirteen.

She was evidently running at the top of her speed, and that speed was something marvellous, and could only have been attained under the pressure of some extraordinary circumstances.

It was the speed of the hunted fawn.

Upon her young and lovely countenance there was an unmistakable expression of extreme terror.

Her alarm, as could be seen at once, was excessive—her lips were apart, her cheeks flushed, and her eyes unnaturally dilated.

Such was the spectacle which had burst suddenly upon Tom King's vision, and had caused him to utter the exclamations we have set down.

So great was the little girl's agitation, that she did not see that our friends were on the road until she had come close to them.

Then she paused irresolutely for an instant.

During that brief space of time, she looked in rapid succession into each of their countenances.

It would seem that Tom King pleased her best, for, clasping her fairy-like hands together, she hastened forward as rapidly as before until she came up to him.

To Tom King's great surprise, no sooner had she done so than she seized his right hand with both her own.

The astonishment of our friends at this sudden meeting may be imagined, and they gazed upon the little girl with the greatest curiosity.

On her part, she looked up appealingly and imploringly into Tom's face.

Her large brilliant eyes became suffused with tears, and her lips parted as she strove painfully to speak.

But so great was her terror and excitement, that she could not utter a single syllable.

Tom King, perceiving this, endeavoured to soothe her agitation.

"Fear not, little one!" he said; "we will not harm you! What is it you want—You grasp my hand, and look imploringly at me, as though it was in my power to aid you in some way."

The little girl nodded her head while Tom spoke this last sentence, as though to imply that he was quite correct in his supposition.

Still she could not command her voice to address him, and the tears flowed faster than ever down her cheeks.

As some elder brother might have done, Tom King drew the little girl towards him.

She still retained the hold which she had taken of his one hand.

The other Tom placed on her head, as it rested against his breast.

"Now, little one," he said, in cheerful and kindly tones, "let me know what your request is, and rest assured it shall be granted. Tell me what I can do to serve you."

"Mamma!" said the little girl—"not me, but mamma! I want you to serve mamma!"

"Your mamma, little one?"

"Yes, my mamma! I want you to save her from Richard and from Mr. Tagg!"

The little girl broke out into sobs and tears again.

"We shall be as glad to serve your mamma as we should be to serve you, little one," said Tom King; "but you must tell us in what way we can be of service."

"Yes, yes! I will!"

"In the first place, you must tell me, who is Richard, and who is Mr. Tagg?"

"Oh yes! I had forgotten! I must tell you that?"

"Certainly you must."

The young girl dashed her tears aside.

"Now," said Tom King, "tell who is Richard."

"My brother."

"Your brother?"

"Yes; but not my real brother, you understand."

"Excuse me," said Tom King, "I don't quite understand. If Richard is not your real brother, how can he be your brother at all?"

"He is not my brother, though my papa—not my real papa, you know—would make me call Richard my brother. He beat me until I consented."

"Beat you?"

"Yes."

A cry of indignation from the lips of all three of the highwaymen followed this avowal.

To them it seemed the most horrible profanation to think that anyone should adopt such harsh measures to one so fragile and so beautiful.

Still, they were quite at a loss to understand what she meant about her real papa and her real brother.

Tom King stroked caressingly the fair, beautiful hair upon the child's head.

She grew calmer under the influence of their kindness.

"Now," said Tom King, "try if you can tell us quietly what you want us to do."

"I will try sir, I will indeed—but I have been so frightened!"

"You seem terrified, but if you do not explain matters to us we cannot possibly help your mamma in any way."

"I know that."

"I am glad you comprehend that: and now—are you calm?"

"Yes, yes—I am—I will be!"

"That will do; and now, first of all, tell us precisely who Richard is. You say he is your brother, but not your real brother?"

"Yes!"

"Well, I do not understand that. I want you to explain to me what you mean. If Richard is not your real brother, who is?"

"I have no real brother."

Tom stroked his chin.

The child was evidently quite as much at a loss to explain herself as he was to understand her.

He resolved to try another tack.

"Have you a papa?"

"No."

"No papa?"

"No; my real papa is dead, and so is my other papa. My other papa is Richard's papa, but Richard is not my real brother, I know, because mamma told me so."

Tom nodded his head.

This last sentence had made all clear, both to him and to his comrades.

The little girl before them had been taught to call her mother's second husband papa, and Richard was only her half-brother.

Such a thing is common enough, but the little girl knew very well that, although she called them by the dear titles, they were not her real papa and brother.

CHAPTER CCCCXCII.

IN WHICH THE THREE HIGHWAYMEN LEARN SOME FURTHER PARTICULARS CONCERNING RICHARD NARES AND LAWYER TAGG.

The reader can scarcely conceive the interest which this simple incident had awakened in the breasts of the three highwaymen.

Had they been asked why they felt so much interest, they would have been at a loss for a reply.

Perhaps it was because the meeting had taken place so unexpectedly—perhaps because the incident differed so remarkably from any that had previously befallen them.

But the cause which produced their interest matters little.

All three, however, seemed to feel that what had just taken place was but the prelude to some events of a still more interesting character.

Some tale of wrong and suffering seemed already to be shadowed forth by the few words which the child had uttered, and the circumstances under which they had met seemed to heighten the idea.

There was much to learn, however, and time would probably be an object of importance, while it would still be of importance that they should receive full and accurate information.

Tom therefore resolved to question the little girl still further.

"Then you have had two papas?" he said.

"Yes, but only one real papa! He died a long while ago, when I was such a little one! I so loved my real papa, and he loved me too!"

"No doubt—no doubt! Who could help loving you? But you have not had two mammas?"

"Oh no, no!"

"And it is your real mamma who is, as I take it, in some sort of danger from your half-brother Richard and some one else named Tagg?"

"Yes, a lawyer!"

"Oh indeed! The interest increases! Now there is a lawyer, there will certainly be some villany in the matter! After your papa died, your mamma married again?"

"Yes, that was to my other papa!"

"Exactly; and when your mamma married him he had a son named Richard, and you were told to call him your brother?"

The little girl clapped her hands.

"Yes, yes!" she cried, in joyous tones, "that is it! That is quite right; but I would not call him brother Richard till my new papa beat me and made me do so!"

"And did your mamma let him beat you?"

"She couldn't help it, for he used to beat her as well!"

"The infamous wretch!"

"He is dead!" said the little girl gently.

If anything had been wanting to complete the charm which the highwaymen fancied hung over the little girl, those words would have sufficed.

The death of the man who had treated her and her mother so shamefully had robbed her of the resentment which it was only natural she should feel.

Tom was so delighted that he stooped down and kissed her gently on the forehead.

"Bless you!" he said, "you are truly as good as you are beautiful."

A pause ensued after these words were spoken.

Tom King broke the silence.

"We understand better now!" he said. "You can recollect when your mamma married your new papa?"

"Oh yes! I am thirteen now, and she married him when I had just turned ten!"

"Then it is about three years ago. And how long is it since your new papa died?"

"Two days."

"Only two days?"

"That is all."

"How did he die?"

"We don't know, but he used to drink a great deal of wine, and come staggering home when he could hardly walk! One night mamma sat up for him, but he never came home, and the next morning we found him in the fishpond on the lawn!"

And you suppose he fell in while staggering home in the way you mentioned?"

"Yes."

"And he is not buried yet?"

"No."

"And Mr. Tagg?"

"He is a lawyer, a friend of Richard's."

"That is your new papa's son?"

"Yes."

"His only son?"

"Yes."

"Then your mamma had a daughter when she married your new papa, and he had a son?"

"Yes, that is quite right."

"And there are no more children?"

"None."

"And now about this Mr. Tagg?"

"Richard brought him."

"When?"

"The same morning that my new papa was found in the fishpond."

"Well?"

"The lawyer by Richard's directions took possession of everything."

"And what did your mamma say to that?"

"She was in a very delicate state of health, and very frightened of Richard, so she went up into her own room, and took me with her."

"Well, what next?"

"I persuaded mamma to let me go and see what Richard and Mr. Tagg were about so I went downstairs and watched them."

"And what did you see?"

"Richard and the lawyer looked over all my new papa's papers, and ransacked every drawer and box, but they seemed disappointed, and I heard Mr. Tagg say:

"'You have been a bit too fast, Richard! Take my word for it, there is no such paper in existence, so you have had all your trouble for nothing, and not only that, you have destroyed all chance for the future!'"

"And what did Richard say to that?"

"He said some very wicked words, and said he would succeed in spite of everything."

"What paper did he mean?"

"I don't know!"

"Had you ever heard anything about a paper before?"

"Oh yes, and so had poor mamma! My new papa used to come with a paper that he wanted her to sign, and he used to threaten dreadful things and to beat her too, but mamma would never sign it!"

"Oh indeed! That throws considerable light upon the whole affair!"

Claude Duval and Sixteen-String Jack nodded, for they thought so too.

The interest they had felt in the little girl increased, and now that she had grown calmer they were delighted to hear what clear and ready replies she was able to give to all Tom's questions.

"And did your mother ever tell you what that paper was about?"

"Not exactly!"

"Do you know what being rich is, little one?"

"Oh, yes!" replied the girl, looking up in wonder at the question.

"Well, was your real papa rich when he died?"

"Oh, very!"

"How do you know?"

"He often told me so."

"And when he died, do you know what became of his money?"

"Yes, he left it to mamma—absolutely!"

The little girl added this last word after a pause.

"Absolutely, little one! Where did you hear that word?"

"I heard the lawyer tell mamma that papa—my real papa, you know—had left her all his money and property absolutely, so that she could do just what she liked with it!"

"Just so! You have a good memory!"

"I recollect that quite well!"

"And this paper that your father wanted your mamma to sign! Have you any idea what it was about?"

"Yes; mamma cried one day, and said that my new papa wanted her to sign a deed that would leave the property to him."

"And she refused, you say?"

"Oh yes!"

"Was your new papa rich?"

"Oh no!—he had no money except what he made mamma give him."

"And now he is dead, you say?"

"Yes."

"Did Richard know that his father wanted your mamma to sign the paper?"

"Quite well. Richard used to demand money from his father, and they often used to quarrel together about it, until at last Richard was turned out of the house, and told never to come into it again."

"Who turned Richard out?"

"His father."

"And when was that?"

"About a week ago."

"And did Richard keep away?"

"Yes."

"And did not come back until the morning when his father was found dead in the fishpond?"

"No—not till then."

"One more question. Did you ever see Mr. Tagg until he came with Richard?"

"Yes, once."

"When was that?"

"He came to see my new papa."

"Was that before your mamma was asked to sign the deed?"

"Yes, just before."

Tom King and his companions exchanged glances.

They understood by that that Mr. Tagg had drawn up the deed.

"And this was the paper they were looking for?"

"I expect so. But they could not find it. I ought to tell you that mamma had been so tortured, that the day before papa was found drowned she made a sort of half promise to sign the deed."

"That is very important; and now, to bring this long examination to a close, what did Richard and Mr. Tagg do?"

"They came to mamma and asked her for the paper. She told them that she had it not, and that she had never signed it."

"What did Richard and Mr. Tagg say to that?"

"Richard said nothing, but Mr. Tagg said she would have to sign it."

"What did your mamma say?"

"She cried very much, and told them how cruel it was of them to serve her so, but declared that she would not sign the deed and disinherit her child to benefit Richard Nares."

"Is that his name?"

"Yes."

"What next?"

"Mr. Tagg said he should take means to make her sign the deed. I was standing near the bed, so he caught hold of me, and said he would lock me up in a room at the top of the house, and I should stay there either until I was starved to death, or until my mamma chose to sign the deed."

"The monster! Go on, pray!"

"Mamma screamed, but she was too weak to defend me. I screamed and nearly fainted when I felt that dreadful lawyer touch me; but I was no match for such strength as he had. My mother refused to sign, and Mr. Tagg carried me shrieking and screaming up to the top of the house, and shut me into a large attic that was never used. He locked the door, and then nailed it up, and went downstairs again, but not until he shouted through the keyhole, 'You shall stay there and starve to death! You shall have nothing to eat and nothing to drink until your mother has signed the deed!'"

CHAPTER CCCCXCIII.

IN WHICH THE LITTLE GIRL PROVES HERSELF TO BE A REAL LITTLE HEROINE.

Tom King had perhaps taken the longest means to obtain the particulars of the little girl's story, but if the longest, it was the best.

By asking such questions as suggested themselves to his mind, he obtained a more complete account than the child could possibly have given without some such assistance.

As it was, Tom believed he had drawn out every important fact.

He believed that he understood the whole story, from first to last.

The only thing he had yet to learn was the means by which she had escaped from her prison.

Upon this point he naturally felt curious, for the little girl did not look like one who would attempt to carry out any desperate plan of action.

As to the service she wanted them to render her mother, that was clear enough.

It was to free her from the infamous persecutions of Richard Nares and Lawyer Tagg.

Although our friends had particular business of their own on hand, and no spare time to devote to the concerns of other people, yet they never hesitated a second about what they should do in the present instance.

First of all, however, Tom said

"My dear little girl, you have told us your story very well, and I think we comprehend all the important particulars connected with it. There is only one point upon which we feel anxious and curious."

"And what is that, sir?" asked the little girl, simply.

"Why, if you were locked up in the room in the way you describe, how comes it that you are here on the high-road at sunrise this morning? and where were you running to so fast when I first caught sight of you?"

A flush of colour came to the child's face when Tom thus spoke.

"I made up my mind," she said, "that I would not be the means of causing mamma to make away with her property; so, after Lawyer Tagg had nailed up the door, and spoken to me through the keyhole, I looked about for some means of making my escape."

"What a brave girl! Go on—what did you do?"

"I knew there was no chance of getting out by the door, so I went to the window."

"When were you locked in?"

"Last night."

"You did not remain a prisoner long, then?"

"No. I went to the window and looked out. The window was very high, and looked on to some sloping tiles."

"Could you open the window?"

"Yes, but the roof was so slippery and steep that I was afraid to venture upon it, for if my foot had slipped there was nothing to save me from falling to the ground."

"What did you do then?"

"When I saw how little hope there was that I should be able to make my escape, I sat down and cried; but after awhile I grew calmer, and when I thought of my poor mamma I felt quite strong."

The highwaymen looked with admiration at this lovely child, who possessed the qualities of a true heroine.

Never before, they thought, had they beheld anything so beautiful.

Her courageousness and fortitude were just calculated to please them.

"Bravo, my dear!" said Tom King, quite enthusiastically. "Do go on; we are full of impatience to hear the rest."

The little girl seemed somewhat confused by this last speech, but, encouraged by Tom King's looks, she continued her artless but interesting story.

"I got up after that. I had been crying a long time, for I found it had got quite dark when I tried to look about me. The attic was quite empty, and so I could look for no help from that quarter, and turned to the window again."

"And did you hear nothing of Richard and Mr. Tagg?"

"No. When I was locked up, I suppose they thought I was safe. But I looked out of the window, and though the tiles were so slippery, and the danger of a fall so great, I resolved to risk my life rather than lose my liberty."

"You are a little heroine!"

The young girl went on without heeding the interruption.

"I crept out of the window on to the roof. Perhaps it was as well that I waited until night before I made my desperate venture, because I could not see so much of my danger. I slipped once or twice, and felt giddy and sick, but I recovered myself, and crept along until I came to a place where I should have to descend several feet to get upon a lower portion of the roof. Fortunately the place below me was flat, and covered with lead. I lowered myself by my hands, and then let go."

"You did not hurt yourself?"

"Only a very little. I crept along again, and then came to the tanks. I dropped down upon these in a similar manner, and this time without any injury. From the tanks I got on to some outhouses, and from the outhouses to the ground."

"You are really the bravest little girl that ever I met with! And were you long in making your escape?"

"I can hardly tell, but I was either very long or else it was very late before I made the attempt. At last, however, I reached the ground, and then I resolved to run on along the high-road until I saw some one coming, and if I liked their looks, to tell them my story and ask them to help me."

"And you saw ?"

"Yes."

"And as you have told us your story, I suppose you liked our looks?"

"Yes; I felt that I could trust you fully, and so I told you all from first to last."

"You have, and in a manner that does you infinite credit."

"And will you help me;—will you save my poor mamma from Richard and Lawyer Tagg?"

"You may depend we shall! It will give us the greatest pleasure to defeat the two rascals whose villany probably is of deeper dye than you can possibly imagine!"

"What do you mean?"

"Never mind just at present. We will wait and see whether our suspicions are well or ill founded."

"Come, then; follow me, and I will take you to my mamma. You will save her, will you not?"

"Oh yes! Rely upon it, we will soon rid the house of Richard and his friend the lawyer!"

"Come, then, sir! Oh, do come at once, and bring these other two gentlemen along with you; there has been quite time enough lost already!"

"There has, but still I do not think your mamma is in any immediate danger, so do not alarm yourself on that account. They will not proceed to harsh measures, take my word for it; and they will not be long able to keep from her the knowledge of your escape."

"I am glad of that, for I could see mamma tremble when the lawyer announced his purpose."

"If anything would induce her to sign the deed, their power over you would have that effect. All will be well, however. You and your mamma will be freed from these villains for ever, and then you will both be happy."

"Oh, thanks, sir—thanks! A thousand thanks for your kindness towards us!"

And the child kissed Tom's hand eagerly.

"Lead the way!" he said, in a voice that was husky with emotion, for the behaviour and appearance of this gentle and beautiful being had made a deep impression upon him "Lead the way, and we will follow! Your troubles will soon be over now!"

With willing gladness the little girl advanced along the road in the direction from which she had so recently come.

The three highwaymen dismounted again to follow her, and took this opportunity to converse together upon the mode of proceeding which they should adopt in order to carry out their plans.

What was agreed upon, we need not trouble the reader with.

Let it suffice for us to continue to describe their proceedings.

It was a fortunate chance which threw the little girl in the way of our three friends.

The reader of these chronicles is well aware that nothing was so pleasing to them as to be able to interpose their powerful presence between the oppressor and his victim.

It was ever their plan to place themselves upon the weaker side, and defend the helpless to the utmost.

There was something in the whole of this adventure which pleased them exceedingly.

The little girl, who, though so delicate, had yet proved herself so true a heroine, won their utmost admiration.

They felt that they would gladly do anything to render her a service, or run any amount of risk in her behalf.

Then their acute perceptions enabled them to see more deeply into the whole of this transaction than the little girl herself could.

Should their suspicions be confirmed, they felt they had such a power over Richard Nares and his rascally accomplice as would compel them to quit the house.

All this will be seen, however, as we proceed.

The little girl went on before with a rapid step.

She was anxious that her mother should be released from her persecution as speedily as possible.

Our friends were not less desirous of making haste, not only because they had no time to spare themselves, but because they feared if they lingered they would reach the house too late.

The fears of Mrs. Nares might be so worked upon that at the last moment she might be weak enough to sign the document.

It was very necessary to prevent this, though they had a scheme in readiness that would even clear them of this difficulty.

At last the curve in the road of which we have already spoken was reached.

It was a long, sweeping curve, and it took them some time to get round it.

The house, the top of which they had been able to see over the trees, was much more distant than they had at first imagined.

The clearness and brilliancy of the morning air had deceived them.

The sun was now fairly above the horizon.

The god of day shed his warm yellow beams upon the different objects which composed the charming landscape, and brought everything to life.

At length the building which they had so long seen came in sight as they passed round the corner of the road.

The reader will recollect that they had at first taken it for an inn, but now they found they had been mistaken upon this point.

It was a substantially-built red-brick residence, standing in its own grounds.

It was clearly a private dwelling, and not an inn.

"This is it!" said the little girl as they paused before it. "Look—there is the house, and there is the fishpond on the lawn!"

"Walk on!" said Tom King. "We won't stay here where we may be seen. Keep on, and now, my dear, point out to me, if you can, the window of the room in which you last saw your mother."

"I cannot do that from here."

"Why?"

"Because the window is not in the front of the house, but the back."

"Can you take us to the back of the house?"

"Oh yes, quite easily."

"Then do so at once. Are there any servants?"

"No."

"How is that?"

"The lawyer sent them all off."

"A strange proceeding!"

"Very, but he did. I fancy it was because they all loved mamma and me better than they loved Richard."

"Quite natural, and perhaps they did not want any witnesses to their nefarious proceedings."

The little girl led the three highwaymen down a narrow lane that seemed to run past one side of the house.

CHAPTER CCCCXCIV.

TOM KING AND CLAUDE DUVAL OVERHEAR AN INTERESTING CONVERSATION.

THIS lane did indeed run past the side of the house.

In fact, it was neither more nor less than a ready means of access to the back premises, which were very extensive, considering the size and style of the house itself.

In a few minutes they came to a wall, and here the three highwaymen paused.

"The gate is a little further on," said the child.

"Never mind that, my dear," replied Tom King; "we will just have a look over this wall before we go any further."

While standing on the ground, this could not be done; but by seating himself in the saddle, he could with ease.

His two comrades followed his example, for they, too, were curious to know what there was on the other side of the wall.

There was a very pretty and well-cultivated garden, though here and there some traces of neglect could be seen, the result of only a day or two's inattention.

They commanded a full view of the house, with all its outbuildings, and these were of such a character that they understood at a glance how it was the little girl had succeeded in performing the perilous feat of making a descent from the roof.

Not a trace of a human being could be seen at any of the windows.

Tom looked about him for some time in perfect silence.

Then, stooping down, he lifted up the little girl, and seated her on the saddle before him.

"Now, my dear," he said, "please to point out to me the window of your mother's room."

"It is on the first floor," she said.

"There are six windows there," said Tom. "Now, which one is it?"

"The fourth—counting from where we are."

"That will do. I understand now, perfectly. And that door, of course, leads into the house?"

Tom pointed to one which was furnished with a very pretty rustic porch.

"Yes; that is the back door."

Tom glanced at the building, and endeavoured to form some idea of its interior arrangements.

He was apparently quite satisfied, so he carefully placed the little girl on her feet again.

"We have got very important information now," he said, as he and his two comrades dismounted. "We shall be able to carry out our intention of entering the house surreptitiously."

"I am glad of that," said Claude Duval, "for you may depend we should fail entirely without we took them by surprise."

"I quite agree with you, and I believe that it can be done with much more ease than we had dared to calculate upon."

"Fraud and cunning must be fought with their own weapons."

"True. And now to carry out our arrangements. You, Jack, will remain here, and take charge of the horses and the little girl."

"All right!"

"And we will enter; and when you see the two rascals emerge, you can enter without fear."

"I understand."

The little girl crept up to Tom King, and took hold of his hand with both her own.

"You will not leave me?" she said.

"Only for a few minutes."

"Oh, do not leave me at all—pray do not! Take me along with you! Do not leave me here!"

"I think it will be much better to do so, little one."

"Why?"

"It is just possible that we may have to be rough with Richard and Lawyer Tagg, and you might be injured, you know."

"Never mind that; take me with you!"

"Nay; it will be best for you to remain here."

After this, the little girl urged her point no further, but shrank back with tears in her eyes.

Sixteen-String Jack spoke kindly to her, and Claude and Tom prepared to make an entrance.

Tom had resisted the child's entreaty to accompany them, because he feared, from what he already knew of the characters of Richard and Lawyer Tagg, that, in their rage at being detected, they might do her some serious and perhaps fatal injury.

He fancied they were just the men who would be likely to vent their rage in such a manner.

Had it not been for this, they would gladly have taken the little girl into the house along with them, because then they would have had the benefit of a guide, whereas now they would have to rely upon their own sagacity.

But as the window of the room had been pointed out to them, they would have a tolerable clue as to the direction they ought to take.

Carefully reconnoitring the grounds and the house, our friends scaled the wall, and in less than a moment were standing in the back garden.

They made direct for the porch before the back door, because they knew well enough that when they stood here they would be quite out of sight of everyone.

The back door was closed, and they at first feared fastened too.

Upon trial, however, they found that it was only secured by a latch, and when that was raised, it yielded to their hands.

The silence of the grave appeared to reign about the spot, and it seemed as though the house, and all around it, was utterly deserted.

In contrast to the open air, the passage into which the door opened looked dark and gloomy.

The two highwaymen stepped into the passage in a moment, and closed the door behind them.

Their eyes soon became accustomed to the gloom, but they did not venture to move until they had.

They looked keenly about them, and by degrees one thing after another came into view.

Before them they could see the staircase, and towards this they hastened.

They had already satisfied themselves that their weapons were in good order and ready for immediate service.

The stairs were covered with a thick carpet, which enabled them to ascend without making a sound.

Gaining the first floor, they saw they stood in a winding corridor, which branched off in three directions.

From this corridor many doors opened.

It now became necessary for them to consider which was the way they ought to take.

While debating this point, they fancied the murmur of voices came upon their ears—faintly, it is true, but still the sound did come.

Tom King made a rapid sign to Claude that he intended to proceed in the direction from which the voices came.

Duval assented, and the two highwaymen stole on tip-toe along the corridor.

At each step they took, the sound of voices grew louder and louder, thus convincing them that they were beyond doubt upon the right track.

At length they paused before a door which was closed but not latched.

It was from the other side of this door that the voices came.

They stood upon the mat and listened with the utmost intentness.

Some one was speaking.

A man evidently, for the tones were too harsh and gruff for a woman's voice.

"Why stain your soul with murder?" said this voice, in grating accents. "Do you value the remnant of your fortune more than you do the life of your own child?"

"Fiend, have mercy."

"Have mercy yourself! You are the cause of all this! I am willing to settle an annuity upon you and your daughter, but you must sign this paper!"

"Never!"

"Your obstinacy is ridiculous! You promised my father that you would sign it!"

"Ah, Richard!" said the female voice which had spoken in reply, and now letting the listeners know that the speaker with the harsh voice was no other than Richard Nares—"little did I think I should live to repent and regret my union with your unprincipled father so bitterly as I do!"

"Bah!—stuff! Be silent!"

"I will not—I will not! With fair and specious words he won what little love still smouldered in my heart. I married him, and from that moment did my persecution commence. What I have suffered——"

"Peace, I say—peace! Be silent, or you may live to regret a refusal!"

"I have spoken! He has tried hard to beggar my child—to deprive her of the fortune which is lawfully her own; and now you have taken his place. But as he failed, so will you!"

"Failed, say you? Ha, ha! It strikes me, if the old gent had only lived a little longer he would have succeeded. All would have been settled then, and I should have been spared all this confounded trouble!"

"Richard Nares, your father I loved once, but you never! I blame myself for my momentary irresolution. He took advantage of me in a moment of weakness. Thank heaven, that is over! I am firm now!"

"Will you listen to me?" said Richard, and his quivering voice showed the intensity of his passion—"will you listen to me? I have listened long and patiently enough to your mad rant! It is now my turn to speak!"

"Say on—say on! I will listen, but do not think that you will succeed in moving my resolution! I am firm, and your arguments will be of no avail!"

"We will see! Once more, will you listen?"

"You may as well spare yourself the trouble of speaking!"

"I do not choose to do so! I would advise you to pay attention to my words! Did you not notice that my friend the lawyer left the room a little while ago?"

"I shudder when I hear his name!"

"Bah! Did you notice his departure?"

"I did, and felt grateful that my eyes no longer beheld his hateful form!"

"Ha, ha! Perhaps you listened after he went out! Ha, ha! I know you did! You heard him go upstairs?"

"Monster!"

"Just as you please, but that does not alter the fact in the least! Upstairs he went! Can you guess for what purpose?"

A pause followed this question.

It was asked in a manner that was absolutely devilish.

"You know your daughter was locked up in the attic! There she is now! Do you know that? I said she should stay there until she starved to death, without you chose to release her by simply signing your name to a slip of parchment. But that process proved too slow. You calculated that she could bear the pangs of hunger for some time—that she would not be starved to death in a day. You hoped that help would come. Well, I confess that scheme has, through your obduracy, been a failure. But we have devised other means—and means, too, which are far more effectual."

"My child—my child!" moaned the poor woman.

"Yes, that is it! I ask you now, did you not hear my friend the lawyer go upstairs? He did go up! His destination was the attic in which your daughter is confined!"

CHAPTER CCCCXC.

LAWYER TAGG MEETS WITH THE DEATH WHICH HIS CRIMES SO JUSTLY MERITED.

A WILD shriek came from the mother's lips when these last words were spoken by Richard Nares.

The tones of his voice were so exultant, so diabolical, that the mother's heart became at once alarmed.

She felt that some danger of a more than usual description menaced her child.

But what did Richard mean by asking her so often and in such a peculiar way whether she had heard Lawyer Tagg ascend the stairs?

That was a question which she could not so easi answer.

Her heart made her dread [illegible]

She resolved to maintain her firmness to the last, however, and not give way to any pressure.

Richard Nares perceived that he had gained an advantage, though a slight one, and, like a skilful general, he hastened to improve upon it.

"Do you see that clock?" he said. "Look at it! Dash the tears from your eyes, and rivet your gaze upon the dial-plate! Do you see the hour? It is half-past eight, exactly. Watch the motion of the large hand! The clock face is large, and you can perceive the almost imperceptible movement. Look—look!"

These mysteriously-uttered words seemed to produce an effect upon the person to whom they were addressed, for the highwaymen could hear a sudden movement.

"In thirty minutes," continued Richard Nares in the same strange voice, "that hand will reach the figure twelve—it will then be eight o'clock. Watch those minutes as they glide away one by one, and tell yourself, as you see the slender finger advance from one point to another, that your daughter has just one minute less to live! Look—the finger has already advanced two points! In twenty-eight minutes she will be no more!"

"No—No! Have mercy! You cannot mean that! My child—my child!"

"Be still, madam! Attempt to move at your peril! Look, another minute has gone! She has twenty-seven minutes only to live, unless you choose to relent."

"Villain—monster!"

"There are but six-and-twenty minutes now! See how time flies when you are importantly engaged! Lawyer Tagg is in the attic. He is holding his watch in one hand, and a loaded pistol in the other! Ha!—look! his watch, like that clock, shows that your daughter has but twenty-four minutes to live, unless I give the signal that you have consented and signed the deed!"

The unhappy mother did not speak, but she moaned in a manner that was terrible to witness.

"You will repent your obstinacy," said Richard Nares. "Tagg will be as good as his word, depend upon it! His orders from me were to go upstairs, and wait till eight o'clock; then, if I did not give the signal that you had consented, he was to place the loaded pistol to your daughter's ear and fire!"

"Help—help!" shrieked the poor woman, in frenzied accents. "Mercy—mercy! You could not do such a deed!"

"There are only twenty minutes left now; and bear in mind it is not I or Lawyer Tagg that will commit the deed and be guilty of it, but you—you, and you alone!"

Richard paused again.

Then he resumed:

"Eighteen minutes more, and then all will be over, unless you think proper to sign this paper. Understand, if you refuse, you are wholly in my power. I have dismissed the servants—not one remains. This house stands in a lonely, unfrequented spot, and it is not likely that strangers would be attracted to it. It contains only four living persons—myself, you, my friend the lawyer, and your daughter. Dismiss from your mind all hope of obtaining aid. You are wholly in my power, and only fifteen minutes remain. A quarter of an hour more, and so surely as I now speak, your daughter will be no more!"

There was again a silence.

No doubt the mother was trying to derive hope from some source or other.

It must have been a vain task.

"Let me repeat my proposition," said Richard; "I shall have just time to do so. There is no need to read the paper to you again, for you are already acquainted with its contents. You shall have an annuity, and so shall your daughter. If not, she dies in ten minutes from this time!"

"Heaven help me!" said the poor woman. "What am I to do? Let second marriages ever be accursed. My misfortunes have taken their rise from that source alone."

"If you are going to preach a sermon," said Richard, "you had best be brief. It wants something less than seven minutes to the hour, and Tagg will be punctual to the moment. Sign, then, before it is too late!—sign, lest you should at last repent that you have doomed your child to a dreadful death!"

"Richard Nares, you must be a fiend, and not a man; and I—Heaven help me!—I——"

"No snivelling!" cried Richard. "Here is the paper spread out before you—here is the pen I have already dipped in the ink. Take it and write your name; there is just time for you to do so. If you hesitate your daughter will perish! I tell you, Tagg will be punctual to the second."

There was a silence for a moment, and then Richard said:

"There, I will hold your hand and steady it. That is better. Quietly. Now then, one more touch, and——"

At this moment there was the loud report of a pistol.

The sound clearly came from somewhere above.

A piercing shriek escaped the mother's lips.

"Duped!" she cried—"duped! I have beggared myself, and my daughter is murdered!"

"No!" said a voice, in loud and thrilling tones—"your daughter is saved! Richard Nares, if you move a step you are a dead man!"

It was Tom King who spoke these words as he dashed into the room, to the utter consternation of Richard Nares.

First, however, we must describe the proceedings of the two highwaymen and the cause of the pistol-shot, for, as the reader must be well aware, Richard was only using an empty threat about the little girl.

The fact was, he had discovered the alarming fact that she had made her escape, and a consultation at once took place upon the subject between himself and his co-partner in iniquity.

They both agreed that it would be unwise in the extreme to make the least alarm, and that the best thing they could do would be to adopt some scheme that would bring events to a crisis.

They had then hit upon the delectable scheme, the full details of which had been revealed to the highwaymen while they stood listening at the door.

The means were well chosen, as was proved by the fact of the scheme having succeeded.

At the last moment, and under the influence of such terrific pressure, the half-distracted mother had affixed her name to the all-important document.

When our friends found that the lawyer himself was not in the room, Tom drew Claude aside, and said, in a faint whisper:

"In order to give the scheme an air of reality, the lawyer has doubtless gone up into the attic. Slip off and see—I will remain here and look after Richard—and if the lawyer is in the attic make him your prisoner."

This task was quite congenial to Claude, so he set off with the greatest imaginable readiness.

He proceeded with caution.

The stairs were before him, and, of course, he made his way up to the attic without difficulty.

The stairs creaked a little under his tread, but still he thought the sound was not sufficient to alarm anyone.

Ascending the topmost flight, Claude found they terminated before one door.

This led into the attic, which was of such dimensions that it extended over the whole top of the house.

Claude paused before the door and listened.

He could hear some one pacing up and down the room.

Convinced that he was on the right track, he felt cautiously for the latch, with which the door was doubtless secured.

Slowly and gradually Claude raised it, and opened the door silently to the extent of about half an inch.

Through this crevice, narrow as it was, he could see into the attic.

He caught sight of the individual he had heard pacing up and down the room.

He was a sleek, sanctimonious-looking man, and far more like a parson than a lawyer.

By his looks no one would have taken him to be the infernal rascal he was.

Claude could see by the movement of his lips that he was muttering something to himself, and so he strained his hearing to the utmost in the endeavour to catch what he said:

"I will do it!" he said, in rather a louder tone of voice, and still pacing restlessly up and down the room. "I will do it, Richard Nares, the term of your life is short! You are taking a great deal of pains to enrich me! I will take care that you do not share the plunder!"

Claude could scarcely refrain from chuckling aloud.

"If these rascals were left alone," he said, mentally, "they would doubtless do society a great service by ridding one another of their lives!"

Claude had been told, however, to make the lawyer prisoner if he possibly could, and so he resolved to seize the present opportunity.

Accordingly, he dashed the door open, and entered the room.

The lawyer was, however, more upon his guard than Claude had believed him to be.

Turning round with great suddenness, he fired the pistol point blank at Claude, and then rushed to the window.

Claude knew not for a second whether he was hit or not.

This was the report which had reached the ears of those below.

It is said that a guilty conscience needs no accuser, and the lawyer exhibited a remarkable proof of the truth of the proverb.

He jumped immediately to the conclusion that all was discovered.

Under this impression he felt there was only one thing left for him to do, and that was to escape as quickly as possible.

He made, then, one wild dash to the window.

Forgetting in his excitement the danger of such a proceeding, the lawyer scrambled through the window with the speed of madness.

He was out on the tiles before Claude Duval had recovered himself sufficiently to look about him.

But with one bound he reached the window.

A glance showed him the lawyer slipping down the tiles at a furious speed.

He had lost his footing, but he was not yet quite sensible of his danger.

The lawyer was only conscious that he was making a rapid escape from his foes.

But when he tried to stop himself—and it was not until he was close to the edge of the roof that he made the attempt—he found he had not the power.

Then a terrific shriek pealed from his lips.

A full consciousness of his dreadful situation burst upon him.

He could not save himself.

No one could save him.

In another second he would be precipitated over the vss.

Claude Duval watched him like one spellbound.

He could not move a limb.

CHAPTER CCCCXCVI.

RICHARD NARES IS DEFEATED IN HIS INTENTION OF ESCAPE BY SIXTEEN-STRING JACK.

FRANTICALLY—most frantically did the lawyer grasp at the roof and strive to clasp the smooth and even tiles.

He broke his nails and tore the flesh from his fingers in the effort.

Indeed he did partially succeed in checking the rapidity of his descent—at all events his speed was not increased.

But the slight projections formed by the tiles lapping one over the other were not enough for him to grasp and sustain his weight by.

Down he went, slowly but surely down, in spite of all his efforts.

Screams of intense horror came continually from his lips as he fought and floundered about.

But at last the edge of the roof was reached.

In another second he was over.

But he did not fall.

That powerful instinct which causes everyone to cling with the utmost tenacity to life came more strongly over the lawyer at this moment, and the efforts he had previously made sank into insignificance when compared with those he now put for h.

As in many old-fashion d houses, the gutters to ca y off the rain-water were m de of stone.

This slight stone coping the lawyer managed to seize at the moment when he w as percipitated over the abyss.

He clung to it with a tenacity indescribable.

It was the tenacity of a death-grasp.

The lawyer felt that that was all that preserved him from death.

But his strength was already exhausted.

His bruised and broken fingers could not retain the grasp they had taken.

With a sickly sensation about his heart, the lawyer felt that his fingers were slipping from the smooth coping-stone.

Desperate indeed were the exertions he made to obtain a firmer hold, but in vain.

His fingers slipped more and more.

He felt that he was going.

A mist of blood came before his eyes, and he shrieked like one in the midst of some death-agony.

One hand failed him entirely.

It might be that he hung for about a second suspended by the other one.

Then that failed him too.

With another of those awful shrieks which had thrilled so repeatedly from his lips, he fell.

There was a horrible rushing sound, followed quickly by a dull, heavy, sickening crash.

The lawyer had reached the earth.

He fell upon the flight of broad stone steps which led up from the lawn to the front door of the house.

Down these he rebounded, until at last he lay motionless and lifeless upon the smooth green turf.

This Claude Duval did not see as he stood at the window; but he saw it afterwards.

The whole of the events that we have just described, occurred with a rapidity truly marvellous.

Claude Duval was one who quickly recovered himself from any sudden surprise; but when the lawyer had fairly disappeared from view, and the dull crash which told that he had reached the ground struck upon his ear, he passed his hand repeatedly over his eyes, for he was in doubt whether the whole was not a fevered dream.

He saw, however, that the attic was full of pale blue smoke, which curled around in fantastic wreaths.

The pistol, too, which the lawyer had discharged, and which in his alarm he had dropped, lay upon the floor at Claude's feet, and from its muzzle and lock the blue vapour still arose.

This was proof sufficient of the reality of the events which had taken place.

"What a horrible affair!" Claude muttered. "Never mind! From what I have heard, the rascal richly deserved such a fate, or even a worse one! However, I must not linger here; my presence probably will be required downstairs."

With these words, Claude crossed the attic.

Upon reaching the door, the sounds of some kind of contention came to his ears, and he rushed down the stairs with the utmost percipitation.

It is now necessary that we should return to Tom King.

From what we have just related, it will be seen that he alone overheard the latter portion of the conversation between the infamous Richard Nares and his poor victim.

It is very certain that Tom would not have allowed the feelings of the mother to be tried to such a painful extent had Claude been with him.

Every moment, however, he expected to see his comrade make his appearance, and Tom determined, as soon as he rejoined him, to rush into the room and make Richard a prisoner.

Tom did not wish to act alone in this matter, for fear Richard should either do some mischief or escape.

Both of these he wished to prevent.

Events at last came to such a crisis that he could no longer stand by without interfering.

Accordingly, he rushed in in the manner we have described.

In his hand Tom King held a pistol.

He pointed it full at Richard Nares, and the manner in which the pistol was levelled, as well as the stern tone of voice, and the highwayman's determined manner, made the cowardly rascal feel that Tom would be as good as his word.

The miscreant's consternation at Tom King's sudden entrance at the moment when he believed that there was no one at hand to interfere with his nefarious plans, is something which we cannot describe, but which, nevertheless, was well worth the witnessing.

[THE POLICE-SPY IN THE GARDENS OF THE DESERTED MANSION.]

He staggered back several paces.

But, great as his surprise undoubtedly was, yet he did not altogether lose his presence of mind.

For instance, Mrs. Nares had signed her name to the document.

She had just finished making the last stroke when the pistol was fired.

She had sunk back in a kind of swoon.

But Richard had seized the paper with avidity, and held it tightly.

Ere we go further we feel it necessary to describe the position of the different actors in this strange scene.

Mrs. Nares lay upon a large, old-fashioned bed—one was not undressed, but simply lay on the outside of the clothes.

The room was spacious, and antiquely furnished, and opposite the door was a large window.

It was a casement window—one half opening like a door—and was fitted with tiny diamond-shaped panes.

Close to this window stood Richard Nares, with the paper clutched tightly in his left hand.

He had sprung from the bedside to the spot upon which he stood at one bound, so surprised was he by the sudden entrance of Tom King.

But when our old friend had uttered that threatening speech, Richard stood as still as though he had been carved out of stone.

His eyes were wide open, and he glared fearfully at Tom.

Mrs. Nares was no longer conscious of what was taking place.

"Villain!" cried Tom,—"double-dyed villain! The hour of retribution has arrived! I am acquainted with all your manifold villanies! You thought you had triumphed, but you are defeated!"

Richard Nares was a coward at heart, but he had a spurious kind of courage, which came over him whenever he was forced at bay.

On the present occasion it exhibited itself.

The paper which he had sinned so deeply to obtain was in his hands.

He held in his possession all that he had toiled for so long, and could he but succeed in getting clear away, all would be well.

Having lived in that house from infancy, he was of course, perfectly familiar with every trick and turn in it.

His back was turned to the window, but he knew well enough that it was just behind him.

He knew as well, that he could dash open the casement with one touch.

To be sure, the distance to the ground was something over ten feet, but then just underneath the window was a garden-bed composed of particularly soft mould.

All this flashed in an instant through the mind of Richard Nares, and with great suddenness he made up his mind to leap through the window, and risk whatever injuries he might receive from his fall, believing that by adopting this course he should stand a so much better chance of making his escape with the paper.

Accordingly, just as Tom had ceased to speak, he, in spite of the warning he had received not to stir, turned suddenly round and dashed open the window.

But he was foiled in his intention to leap out.

Sixteen-String Jack and the little girl, it will be recollected, had been left in the lane with strict orders to remain there.

At first they were well enough disposed to obey these injunctions, but as the time passed on without any sign being made, the impatience of both increased until it became absolutely unbearable.

The half-hour which elapsed seemed to them like a whole day—it always seems so to those who are watching and waiting.

Then there came suddenly upon their ears the loud report of a pistol.

They could tell that the sound came from the house, but as they were at the back, they saw nothing of the scene on the roof when Lawyer Tagg met his righteous doom.

This put the finishing stroke to their impatience.

They felt that they could endure it no longer.

"Good heavens!" exclaimed Jack, in an agitated voice, "what ever can be the meaning of that shot?"

"Perhaps your friends are in danger, sir," said the little girl, trembling violently. "Richard and the lawyer are both very violent men!"

"I can easily believe that. I can stay here no longer. Tell me how I can gain admission to the grounds, and lead the horses in as well?"

"Oh, yes! Follow me, and I will take you to a door in the wall a little lower down—through that you can enter easily."

"Do so, my dear, for I am full of alarm!"

The little girl was quite as anxious as Jack, and she ran down the lane at a speed that Jack could only just keep pace with.

Pausing presently, she opened a little door in the wall, which led into the garden.

Through this Jack passed, the horses following him docilely enough.

The gate was then immediately closed, and, leaving the horses to take care of themselves, Jack ran after the little girl, who made direct for the house.

"Stop—stop!" he cried. "This will answer our purpose best! Do not go into the house! Look here!"

Sixteen-String Jack had espied a ladder leaning against the wall, and, taking this on his shoulder, he ran with it towards the building.

"Now, my dear," he cried, "tell me which is your mother's window?"

"This is it—this is it."

"All right!"

In another moment Sixteen-String Jack had raised the ladder against the window.

He ran up it with an agility that was really remarkable.

He reached the top at a critical moment.

The one half of the window was dashed violently open, but before Richard Nares could spring out, Jack struck him a blow which hurled him back with tremendous violence into the room.

CHAPTER CCCCXCVII

RICHARD NARES IS TAKEN PRISONER, AND MAKES A FRANTIC ATTEMPT TO TRAMPLE THE LIFE OUT OF THE WOUNDED BODY OF LAWYER TAGG.

It was a thousand wonders, and a thousand mercies, too, that Tom King did not execute his threat of firing if Richard Nares moved an inch from where he stood.

Had he fired, it is more than probable that he would have seriously injured his old comrade Sixteen-String Jack.

One of the reasons why Tom did not fire the instant he perceived a movement upon Richard's part, was because he was startled at the same time by hearing a noise behind him, and quickly and instinctively he turned round to see by whom or by what it was caused, for of course he did not know but what it might be some ally of his adversary's.

One glance, however, showed him that this apprehension was unfounded.

It was Claude Duval who had entered.

As may be supposed, he was not a little surprised at the scene which he saw before him.

Richard's sudden leap towards the window—his encounter with Sixteen-String Jack—and Claude's entrance—all happened so quickly, that it seemed the simultaneous occurrence of so many different events.

And they were almost simultaneous.

The blow which Sixteen-String Jack had delivered with the full force of his right arm was a severe one, and Richard lay upon the floor apparently half stunned.

Directly afterwards, Jack leaped into the chamber, where he had the satisfaction of instantly perceiving that his two comrades were safe and unhurt.

The little girl felt too much anxiety about the safety of her mother and that of her new friends, to scruple about climbing up the ladder.

Indeed, she was at the top almost as soon as Jack was, and she sprang with the lightness and airiness of a fairy into the room.

She looked all around her, and then, with a cry of pain flung herself upon her mother's bed.

Mrs. Nares was just recovering her senses.

At first, she could not believe that it was indeed her much-loved daughter who was beside her, so firmly had the idea taken hold of her that she had been murdered.

But when she found she was there, without even a scratch or bruise, her joy was so great that she could neither speak nor move.

Passionately, she wound her arms about her, and strained her to her bosom.

The little girl wept plentifully now; but the tears which flowed from her eyes had the effect of relieving her overcharged heart.

She was the first, however, to recover herself, and, in a few words, strove to make her mamma understand what had taken place since they had last seen each other.

In the meantime, the three friends pounced upon Richard Nares, and, despite his desperate and almost superhuman struggles, succeeded in binding him hand and foot.

The precious paper which he had gone through so much to obtain was forced from his grasp.

Oh, how he gnashed and ground his teeth with rage!

The highwaymen glanced over the paper, and found that it appeared to be what it doubtless was, namely, a legal transfer of Mrs. Nares's property to her step-son Richard.

Lawyer Tagg had no doubt had the framing of the instrument and he would take care that there was no technical flaw in it.

Now, however, he was past reaping any benefit from his villany.

By this time, Mrs. Nares somewhat recovered herself.

The joy which she felt had gone a long way towards curing her indisposition.

"Do not attempt to thank us for what we have done," said Tom King. "Believe me—and I speak not only for myself but my two friends also—all has been done freely and willingly, and simply because we always defend the helpless and innocent from the strong and guilty whenever the opportunity is afforded us of doing so!"

"But I must thank you, gentlemen! You can have no idea what persecutions I had had to put up with from that young man, who unfortunately happens to be my stepson."

"It is much to be regretted that he stands in such a degree of relationship to you. As to your persecutions, we have by one means and another become fully acquainted with them."

Mrs. Nares burst into tears.

"Be of good heart," said Tom King, soothingly; "you have nothing to fear now."

It was some time before Mrs. Nares could speak, but presently, she said, in a broken and tremulous voice:

"Alas! gentlemen—you know not the extent of my misfortunes. In a moment of weakness, I signed a paper which will make me and my child beggars for henceforth."

"Do not let that trouble you."

"I cannot help it."

"Nay—nay! You don't understand me! Look, here is the paper!"

Mrs. Nares looked at it through her tears.

"Do not let that circumstance trouble you. For see, this is the way I shall serve it!"

Tom King tore the paper into minute fragments as he spoke.

"There!" he added,—"you are all right so far as that is concerned; there is no proof that such a document was ever in existence, much less that it was signed."

"Oh, sir, I can see that you are determined to place me under a still greater obligation to you."

"Do not look at what we have done in that light, I beg."

Richard Nares had by this time abated the violence of his rage.

He lay in a strange, huddled-up position on the floor, with a look of sullen, angry viciousness upon his face.

He scowled fearfully when he saw the deed destroyed, though, of course, that event was no more than he expected.

In a low tone of voice Claude Duval spoke to his friends, and made them acquainted with the particulars of the fate of which Lawyer Tagg had been overtaken.

"I cannot help thinking," he added, "that he is yet alive, and if we make haste we may hear some important information, for when he finds he is in danger he will probably make a full confession."

"We will go to him at once."

"Let all go!" said Claude.

"What, Richard?"

"Yes, and Mrs. Nares and her daughter too. It is only by confronting the actors in these singular events with one another, that we can hope to learn all."

"Claude is right!"

"He is. Let it be done!"

This point settled, the three highwaymen turned towards the other occupants of the apartment.

The little girl who had so often proved her intelligence, now gave additional proof of it, for while our friends were conversing together she tried her best to console and calm her mother, and succeeded in a very considerable degree.

When the highwaymen turned round they were able to talk reasonably with her.

Without telling them their motive, Tom requested Mrs. Nares and her daughter to follow them downstairs.

They consented in an instant.

The highwaymen then turned to Richard, who seemed at first as though he intended to resist their commands.

But finding he was so helpless, and seeing how outnumbered he was, he agreed for once to surrender at discretion.

Sullenly and scowlingly he rose to his feet, and accompanied our friends downstairs.

It took them but a short time to reach the entrance-hall of the house.

Tom King advanced to the door and opened it.

The moment he did so a dismal groan struck upon his ears, which showed at once the correctness of Claude's supposition.

The lawyer was not dead.

The sight of his bruised and mangled body lying upon the smooth green lawn was a great shock to three persons, though it of course affected them in different ways.

Those three persons, the reader will scarcely require to be told, were, Mrs. Nares and her daughter, and her stepson Richard.

As for the latter, he seemed totally overcome by this sudden discovery of his guilty partner's fate.

He trembled and turned very pale.

Lawyer Tagg was evidently conscious that some one was approaching him, for in a faint, moaning tone of voice, he said:

"Help, help!—oh, help me! Do not leave me to die like this. Mercy—have mercy upon me! I cannot die yet! Help, help!"

"Wretched man!" said Tom King, in a solemn voice, "you are past all human help."

Lawyer Tagg looked up and saw that he was surrounded by a singular group.

First there were the three highwaymen.

Then there was Mrs. Nares and her lovely little daughter, whose mysterious escape had been so great a trouble to him.

Then, last of all, there was Richard Nares, with an expression upon his face which befitted a demon, and not a human being

The lawyer saw, too, that Richard's face was bruised and bleeding, and that he was a prisoner.

One brief yet comprehensive glance showed all this to the lawyer, who with a groan torn from him by the exquisite agony he was suffering, let fall his head upon the ground again.

Tom King bent over him.

"It is in vain you call upon us for help, you are past all human aid. It is impossible that you can survive the injuries you have received. How it is that you have lived so long is to me a mystery!"

A groan was the sole reply.

"I cannot do otherwise than think you were preserved from instant death for some wise purpose. You also must feel the same conviction. Atone, then, while it is in your power, for the mischief and evil you have wrought. There is but one way that you can do this."

"How?" asked the wounded wretch, in a hollow and almost inaudible murmur.

"By making a full confession to us of all your own and your companion's villainies."

"Why should I do that?"

"Because then, if I mistake not, you will place Richard wholly in the power of Mrs. Nares, and so preserve her from any future persecutions. Come, speak!"

At this instant, Richard Nares, by a sudden effort of strength, broke from the hold which Claude had upon him, and, springing forward, would have trampled upon the lawyer's wounded body had not Tom King seized him in the nick of time.

CHAPTER CCCCXCVIII.

LAWYER TAGG MAKES A FULL CONFESSION OF HIS OWN CRIMES, AND THOSE OF RICHARD NARES AS WELL.

A most ferocious expression distorted the sinister countenance of Richard Nares when he was thus foiled in his horrible intent.

Claude Duval and Sixteen-String Jack both sprang forward with great quickness, and the miscreant was totally overpowered.

His intention was palpable enough, and so was the motive which prompted him to the deed.

Lawyer Tagg evidently had something disagreeable to disclose, which would have the effect mentioned by Tom King, and Richard Nares had thought, by a little promptitude, to put it out of the lawyer's power to injure him.

How nearly he succeeded has been seen.

He was well enough aware by the appearance which his accomplice presented that the least thing would extinguish the spark of life which still clung to the mangled carcass.

Could he have stamped upon the lawyer, the injuries he would thus have inflicted, would doubtless have caused instantaneous death.

But it had been fated otherwise.

Richard's intention was not only palpable to all the spectators of this singular scene, but to the wounded man also.

His eyes gleamed with unnatural lustre, and his teeth were tightly clenched together.

He knew what Richard had meant to do.

Passion lent him strength which, under other circumstances, he would not have possessed.

He raised himself a little on one arm.

Perceiving this, and judging that he wanted to sit up, Tom King moved, and, going behind him, propped him up.

Tagg glared savagely at Richard.

"Unnatural monster!" he shrieked, in tones that were horrible in the extreme to listen to. "Unnatural monster! but for this last act of yours, I would have died with my tongue tied, but now I will speak! Richard Nares, beware!"

Tagg gasped painfully for breath, as though utterly exhausted.

Richard's face turned perfectly livid, and he trembled as though suffering from an ague.

But when he saw how exhausted the lawyer was he looked on with eagerness.

In his baleful-looking eyes was plainly enough expressed the hope that death would supervene before the promised revelations could be made.

But in this hope he was defeated.

The lawyer recovered himself wonderfully.

"I must be calm," he said—"very—very calm, and then I shall be able to tell all. Who is there that can write?"

"I can!" said Tom King.

"Be quick, then!" returned the lawyer. "In my coat-pocket you will find a pocket-book containing several blank leaves. Find it, I say!"

"It is here!" said Tom, as he placed his hand in Tagg's pocket and drew out the article he had mentioned.

"You will find a pencil inside. Now, be quick and write down my confession."

"I am ready!" said Tom, as he placed the open pocket-book upon his knee and held himself in readiness to write down the first words that fell from the lawyer's lips.

"Begin thus," said Tagg.

And amid an intense silence, which was broken only by the rapid passage of the lead pencil over the paper, the lawyer spoke as follows.

His words were listened to with an eager interest, which the reader may perhaps be able to conceive:

"I, Stephen Tagg, of Thavies Inn, London, attorney-at-law, believing myself to be within a short time of my decease, do hereby make oath and testify—

"That on the night of Monday last past, Mr. Richard Nares, senior, while upon his way to his own home, was suddenly and violently set upon by his son Richard Nares and thrown into the fishpond on the lawn—in consequence whereof the said Richard Nares, senior, being as he was at the time somewhat under the influence of wine, was drowned and did die—the object of Richard Nares, junior, being to obtain possession of Mrs. Nares's property and money, and also to have his revenge upon his father, with whom for some time lately he had not been on friendly terms. I will also confess I did aid and abet the said Richard Nares, junior, but now do most heartily repent of having done so. To the truth of all the above I most solemnly swear!"

The lawyer ceased.

"Is that all?" said Tom.

"Yes. Is it not enough?"

"Ample."

"Good. Raise me up a little and give me the pocket-book and pencil, I have but little strength left, but what I do possess shall be employed in placing my signature to this document."

Richard Nares fairly howled with rage, but he struggled in vain to release himself.

Tom King raised Lawyer Tagg to a convenient position, and anxiously watched his movements.

It seemed as though, after all, the lawyer would die without accomplishing his purpose.

He made several ineffectual efforts to grasp the pencil firmly.

At last he succeeded in closing his fingers round it, and then slowly and painfully, letter by letter, he signed his name at the foot of the confession.

His hand faltered when he made the final g, and he made an attempt to affix the date.

This was a failure.

His muscles relaxed, and the pencil fell from his strengthless fingers.

Then a horrible sound began to make itself audible in his throat.

It was a sound which is always instinctively recognised.

It was the death-rattle.

Painfully he struggled.

He slipped from Tom's grasp, and writhed upon the ground.

Then there was one sharp contraction of the muscles and all was over.

The lawyer was dead.

For a moment or two after the decease of this bad man, a profound silence was observed by all present.

The general horror of the scene had been too much for Mrs. Nares and her daughter.

Their eyes were averted from the dreadful spectacle.

Now that the confession was signed, all that hardihood which Richard Nares had formerly exhibited disappeared

He seemed quite crushed and overcome.

Tom King was the first to break the silence.

He picked up the pocket-book and then rose to his feet.

"This is the bad end of a bad man!" he said, "but we must do him the justice to recollect that he made the only reparation that lay in his power."

Mrs. Nares turned round when these words were spoken.

"Can it be possible that what the lawyer has confessed to is the truth? Surely, Richard cannot have added parricide to the long list of his crimes!"

"No, no!" said Richard, eagerly catching as it seemed at the doubt thus expressed—"no, no! It is false—false, every word of it! I did no such deed! It was done out of revenge! There is not the slightest foundation for such a charge. I tell you I am innocent!"

"Richard Nares," said Tom King, "it has been my conviction from the very first that you were guilty of the murder of your father. I suspected you, and what this lawyer has just written confirms me in my suspicions. You are guilty—guilty of the unnatural crime of parricide The shifting colour on your cheek proclaims your guilt!"

"It is false!" cried Richard, hoarsely.

But this time his voice was not so confident in its tone.

"You are guilty!" said Tom, again.

"And if I am, what is that to you?" said Richard, suddenly, and with all the fierce courage of desperation. "Who are you? What business is it of yours? By what right do you hold me prisoner thus?"

"The best right of all!" said Tom. "It is our object always, whenever we are afforded the opportunity, to step in and aid and succour the oppressed. We have done so on the present occasion, and have also been so fortunate as to do not only that, but to confound and punish the guilty!"

Richard was silent.

Tom then turned to Mrs. Nares.

"My dear madam," he said, "I am glad, as I before told you, that we have been chosen the instruments to relieve you from your persecutions. You will say, however, that after we have gone your position will be no better than it was before—that Richard will renew his persecutions."

"I hope not."

"So do I. From the relationship in which he stands to you, I feel sure that, so far from placing the officers of justice on his track, you would assist him to fly."

"I would indeed!"

"I knew it; and now I will tell you what I will do. Here is the lawyer's confession. Take it, and guard it more preciously than your life! While you have that, Richard is powerless to do you harm."

Mrs. Nares took the paper, but it was with manifest unwillingness.

"Remember," said Tom, "that it is not only for your own sake that you ought to arm yourself with this paper, but for your child's. You must keep it. Should he renew his persecutions, or attempt in any way to injure you, place that paper in the hands of a magistrate, who will know what to do with it."

"But——"

"Nay, I can guess your objections: You will say that he will persecute you until you give up the paper to him, or else he will take it from you by force. I will tell you what you must do to guard against that; and, for your dear daughter's sake, I trust you will listen to my words."

"I will, sir, and act upon them."

"I am glad to hear you say as much. Go, then, to your best friend. Choose the person upon whom you can rely, confide to him the full particulars of all that has taken place, and give him the confession to place it somewhere in safety. Then, in the event of any mischief befalling either you or your daughter, he will forward it to a magistrate."

"But——"

"Pardon me, if I anticipate what you are about to say—you will find that I have provided against every contingency. The day has only just begun. Start, then, without a moment's delay, and lose no time in getting to the residence of your friend. How long will this take you?"

"About two hours."

"I will give you three, and then you will be safe from all danger. For three hours, we will remain here and keep guard over Richard Nares. You will have nothing to fear from him. Do you understand me?"

"Perfectly."

"At the expiration of three hours we shall release Richard Nares from our custody. If he is wise, he will quit this part of the kingdom for ever, and seek some better life. Now depart. Let me see you begin your journey."

The little girl warmly seconded Tom King's proposal; and, after making a few preparations, the pair set out.

Not, however, until they had warmly and individually thanked our three friends for the inestimable service they had rendered.

And not until, with many tears, they had entreated Richard to flee the country, lest it should be discovered that his father died by foul means, and the crime be brought home to him.

But Richard only looked upon them with an evil scowl.

Tom King accompanied both down to the gate, and bade mother and daughter a last respectful farewell.

CHAPTER CCCCXCIX.

RICHARD NARES RECOGNISES THE THREE HIGHWAYMEN, AND SWEARS TO HAVE REVENGE.

We think, and our readers will think with us, that the present position of the three friends is almost as peculiar as any in which they have ever been placed.

There they were, left in quiet possession of a well-furnished mansion.

Left there by the owners, and under such strange circumstances.

They were to keep Richard Nares a prisoner for three hours, and at the expiration of that time they were to set him at liberty.

Then the house contained no servants—all the domestics had been sent away.

On the green lawn, like a foul emirch upon some delicate fabric, lay the crushed and mangled remains of a human form.

Inside the house, in one of the upper rooms, the windows of which were darkened, was another horrible sight.

That was the body of Mr. Nares, the owner and occupier of the mansion, who had been taken out of the fishpond on his own lawn.

Truly were the circumstances unparalleled.

Richard Nares appeared to have given up all ideas of resistance, but the highwaymen were not to be deceived into feeling a false security.

They mistrusted his quiescence.

Tom hastened to rejoin his comrades.

Addressing Sixteen-String Jack, he said:

"Where are the horses?"

"I brought them into the garden with me."

"Well, it seems there are some stables in the rear. Doubtless you will be able to find some provender in the lofts overhead. I will take your place here, and do you look to the horses, for as we are to stay here for three hours we may as well make ourselves as comfortable as we can."

"Decidedly so!"

Sixteen-String Jack rose as he spoke, and went towards the back garden where he had left the horses.

Tom took his place.

Richard Nares could not help seeing that his captors were determined to allow him no chance of making his escape.

Sixteen-String Jack found the horses readily enough, and, having secured them, led them into the stables.

Here he made them more comfortable than they had been for a very long time past.

There was plenty of food of all kinds ready to his hand, and he gave the animals a regular feast, for he could not tell how long a time might have to elapse before they again had an opportunity of getting any corn.

He rubbed them down and thoroughly attended to them.

When he had finished, he found a considerable portion of the allotted time of three hours had expired.

He found his two comrades still occupying the same positions as when he had left them.

Our readers may perchance be able to realise the amount of satisfaction the highwaymen felt at the adventure which had recently so wholly engrossed their attention.

It was a source of the greatest delight to them to think that chance had thrown them in the way of the little girl, whose actual name they knew not; but who, in an incredibly short space of time, had taught them to love her with a rare affection.

They felt perfectly rejoiced when they reflected how completely they had freed Mrs Nares and her daughter from the infamous persecutions of Richard.

Both were now safe from him, though it was solely owing to the interposition of our friends that they were so.

The three hours which had been fixed upon very quickly expired.

It was about one o'clock in the day, when Sixteen-String Jack repaired to the stables and saddled the horses ready for the road.

In so lovely a part of the country, and so far away from London, too, as it was, the highwaymen believed that they would be able to take their way along the high-road by broad daylight with almost absolute safety.

Accordingly, they resolved not to linger any longer at that house; though they might, had they so chosen, have remained there until nightfall.

But they judged it to be best and most prudent to depart at once.

From the time Tom King had taken his seat beside him, Richard Nares had not spoken a word, and had scarcely made a movement.

He sat there dogged and sullen; and the highwaymen, of course, made no attempt to lead him into conversation.

Shortly after one o'clock, then, the horses were brought round all ready for our friends to mount.

By this time Mrs. Nares and her daughter were surely in a place of safety.

As a very necessary precaution, they searched Richard's pockets, and removed all weapons, so as to make it impossible for him to do them an injury.

Then they loosened the bonds, by which his arms were confined in such a manner that in the course of a few minutes at most, he could free himself by his own unaided exertions.

Having done this, they mounted and rode slowly away, looking back from time to time to catch a last glimpse of the building in which such strange events had taken place.

Upon reaching the top of the lane, the three friends followed their original direction, resuming their interrupted journey.

If they had done nothing else, they had obtained a rest and a meal for their horses, which were now in excellent condition for the road, and equal to almost any amount of exertion.

While speaking of what had happened—for the reader will remember that this was the first opportunity they had had for conferring freely together—Claude said:

"It may be all very well, but I, for one, can't help thinking that that confounded rascal Richard got off a great deal more easily than he ought to have done! He deserved a worse fate than the lawyer, in my opinion!"

"But don't you see how disagreeable such a thing would be for Mrs. Nares?" said Tom King. "Rely upon it, the best thing to be done was to give her the lawyer's confession, and give Richard the opportunity of leaving the country with all expedition."

"I don't think things could have been managed much better," said Sixteen-String Jack.

"Nor I," said Claude Duval, "except that I can't help feeling that he got off a great deal too lightly."

"Indeed!" said a sneering voice, so close to them that all three started.

They had proceeded but a short distance.

The voice caused them all to turn their eyes in one direction, and that was towards the hedge, on the right-hand side of the road.

There in a gap in the hedge stood Richard Nares.

How he had contrived to release himself and get there in so short a space of time seemed really marvellous.

He could not have done it had he been less intimate with the grounds than he was.

His face was convulsed with passion, and he looked with the utmost malignity upon our friends.

"I have got off lightly, have I?" he said. "Ha, ha! But my time will come for triumph! I know you, my fine sprites! I know you all three! Ha, ha!"

So astonished were the three highwaymen by his sudden appearance, and the strange words he uttered, that they impulsively reined in their steeds, and gazed at him aghast.

He looked more like a madman than aught else.

"Ha, ha!" he chuckled again. "I know you, and, what is more, I will be even with you! I am one of those who never forget or forgive an injury, be it ever so slight a one. While you—you have put yourselves out of the way to thwart me, when you had not the slightest excuse for so doing. But I will have revenge, and full and deadly revenge! You have ruined the one grand scheme of my life—ruined it utterly—ruined it, too, when success had crowned my long and toilsome efforts! I held a fortune in my grasp, and it was wrested from me by you!"

As he proceeded, his excitement grew greater and greater, until now he foamed at the mouth like some infuriated animal.

He continued with impetuosity:

"You have done all this, but you will suffer for it! My plans are all defeated! Never mind! Henceforth I will live, and with but one object only! That shall be to hunt you to the death! I tell you that I know you—you, Tom King; you, Claude Duval; and you, Sixteen-String Jack! You see, I know you all three. The reward offered for your apprehension is great! I will have a share of it! From this moment I will know no peace till I have had you hunted down! Let it be a satisfaction for you to remember that there is now upon your track—watching your every movement, dogging your every step—one who will have the thoughts of past injuries and future vengeance to urge him on! Ha, ha! We shall see—we shall see!"

Tom King tried to make himself heard, but his voice was drowned by the villain's shrieking tones.

"I tell you you have now a mortal foe—such a one as you have never had before, or your career would long ago have been cut short! I tell you to beware! The hour will come when I shall triumph—then I shall shriek aloud, so that the tones may penetrate the inmost chambers of your brain, 'Remember Richard Nares—remember Richard Nares! He swore to have his revenge, and he has had it!' Ha, ha! those will be my words. You may fly—you may smile at my words—but your speed will not outstrip the speed of fate. I tell you I will have my revenge—revenge! Farewell! Remember I am on your track, and that now the sole object of my life is to compass your destruction!"

Ending his singular, maniacal speech with these words, Richard Nares suddenly disappeared behind the hedge, and the next minute could be seen flying over the meadow.

"Confound the villain's impudence!" said Claude Duval, and as he spoke he drew a pistol and fired it after the retreating form.

But Richard Nares had already gone too far for the shot to be effectual.

Evidently, however, the report reached his ears, for he stopped suddenly in his headlong course, faced about, made a contemptuous gesture, and hurried on again.

Claude looked half inclined to pursue him.

"Never mind him," said Tom King. "Come on. Put up your pistol and take no more notice of him. Come on."

"All right; but did you ever hear the like? But I told you he was let off a good deal too lightly, and this proves it."

"He seemed like one mad!" said Sixteen-String Jack.

"I believe he was mad," said Tom King. "It is quite certain he had entirely set his heart upon this little pet scheme of villany, and to find himself defeated at the moment of success has turned his brain. He is mad, depend upon it! No one but a madman would have spoken like that."

"He may be mad," said Claude; "but, if he is, all I can say is, there is a very great deal of method in his madness; and it is a sort of madness I don't at all care about. It strikes me he was uncommonly in earnest. I wish I had been a little quicker with my pistol, and then we should have had no further trouble with him. As it is, I can't help thinking he will be as good as his word."

"Bah!" said Tom King. "Think no more about him! Push on—we shall soon be out of his reach. I don't fear him, and I should feel rather glad, than otherwise, that he was looking after us, instead of persecuting poor Mrs. Nares and her daughter."

"Perhaps so," said Claude Duval; "but you can take my word for it we have made an enemy, and one, too, who has all the will, even if he has not the power, to do us serious mischief!"

"Let him do his worst!" said Tom—"I can only feel despision for such a miscreant!"

CHAPTER D.

THE THREE HIGHWAYMEN FIND THEMSELVES UPON THE THRESHOLD OF ANOTHER MYSTERIOUS AND TERRIBLE ADVENTURE.

After Tom King thus spoke, the highwaymen relapsed into silence.

Their horses' heads were turned towards their destination, and the animals were fresh.

A loosening of the rein was all that was required to set them in rapid motion, and they flew along the high-road at a speed that soon took them away from the scene of their recent exploits.

In the excitement of the gallop, the threats to which Richard Nares had given utterance became less and less impressive, until at last Claude Duval could smile when he remembered them.

Many miles were passed over before they slackened speed in the least, and then it was only out of consideration for their steeds.

It would have been unsafe in the extreme to have exhausted them entirely.

At any moment, a pursuit might be commenced after them; in the event of which, they would have to trust to the superior fleetness of their steeds for escape from their persevering foes.

They exchanged, then, their gallop for a trot; and, while going at this rate, it was the easiest matter in the world to converse with one another.

"Now, Tom," said Sixteen-String Jack, "we look upon you as our guide—I am quite ignorant of this part of the country."

"And I happen to be very familiar with it," replied Tom King; "so you can trust yourself to my guidance with perfect safety."

"Have we far to go?"

"Yes—many miles yet. If we push on, however, I hope we shall be near the outskirts of the forest by nightfall."

"Good! I am glad to hear it, for I feel a very great degree of curiosity to know how this adventure will end."

"And I, too!" said Claude.

Tom King laughed as he replied:

"Don't fill yourselves up with the notion that we shall find the miser's chest of gold, because I feel a firm conviction that we are a day after the fair!"

"It may be so; but the New Forest is a very large place, and, without more definite information than you save given, I don't see how the buried chest is in danger of discovery."

"You have no idea now much the hope of obtaining a large sum of gold will sharpen a man's perceptions? It is really wonderful! And the three men I have spoken of would not rest until they had succeeded."

"Well, well! It may be that they are still prosecuting their search."

"It may be so!" said Sixteen-String Jack. "We can not tell until we go there; and I am sure the chance is well worth the trouble!"

"It is—it is!"

"By to-morrow," said Tom, "we shall be fairly within the deepest recesses of the old forest. When once we are there, we shall be perfectly free from danger; therefore I propose that we take the opportunity of giving our horses a rest, and obtaining a few hours' sleep ourselves."

"With all my heart!" said Jack and Claude.

"That is decided upon, then; and now for another point: I told you I knew this country well."

"Yes—yes, Tom!"

"Some distance further on we shall come to a cross-road. It is lonely and unfrequented—at least, it used to be; but, if we take it, we shall save at least a dozen miles."

"Will it be that much further if we continue along the highway?"

"Yes, quite!"

"Then let us take the cross-road, by all means!"

"I thought you would say that! Of course we shall save the distance I mention, but then there will be little likelihood of meeting with any travellers."

"That is a drawback."

"To some extent it is, but I have been thinking lately that perhaps it will be best for us to get to the New Forest as quietly as we possibly can. We had better not have a hue-and-cry about our ears if we can possibly avoid it."

"I quite agree with you, Tom, though until you spoke I had not taken that into consideration," said Claude Duval. "If we find the gold, we shall have no occasion to trouble the travellers."

"And if we fail," said Sixteen-String Jack, "we shall have a capital opportunity of making up for lost time on our way back again."

"Of course we shall, and, one way or the other, I have made up my mind to have a good booty."

"Bravo!"

"Well, then," said Tom King, as he pointed to a finger-post, the four arms of which were just visible over the hedge-rows, "there is the cross-road I spoke of, and if we continue to pursue that we shall in due time arrive at that portion of the forest in which the chest was buried."

"Are you sure you should know the spot again?"

"Oh yes! we took care to bury the chest at the foot of a tree of such a peculiar kind, that I could recognise it from a million."

"That is also satisfactory, and the more I think of it the surer do I feel that we cannot do better than let all travellers pass us by without molestation."

"If we do so there will not be a suspicion of our presence in this part of the country, for you know we have not been tracked at all."

"No, we have not, it is true," said Claude Duval, "but you must not forget Richard Nares."

"Bah!"

"You should never despise an enemy; rely upon it, he will be as bad as his word."

Tom King laughed.

Just at this moment they reached the cross-road, and turned down it.

"I told you it was very lonely," said Tom, as they trotted along it, "and it does not appear to have changed its character in the least. Look at the ruts—and see, the road is almost overgrown with grass."

"It is certain a long while has elapsed since any vehicle passed down this road," said Claude.

This was apparent enough, for the ruts were covered with a kind of moss, which must have been there some time.

The road was very rough, and bad for travelling, but there was no need for them to make great speed, so, after all, it did not matter.

There was little fear that they would be seen by anyone, and this suited them exactly now that they had agreed upon making a change in their plan of proceeding.

Engaged in conversation, the journey was pleasant enough, and the time passed away quickly.

At length the sun hid himself behind the clouds that were piled up in the western sky, a cool breath fanned their cheeks, and twilight crept over the face of nature.

Claude Duval and Sixteen-String Jack looked keenly in advance, but could see nothing of the forest.

"We shall reach the outskirts by nightfall, nevertheless," said Tom, "but you must understand that all round the New Forest, surrounding it like a belt, is a strip of waste land upon which no trees grow, but only such rank vegetation as you would find upon a heath or common."

"I know!"

"This belt of waste land is many miles in width in some places, in others only one or two. It is on the edge of this strip that I hope to arrive by nightfall."

"And how far is it to the actual forest?"

"To the tree?"

"Yes."

"Seven miles at least."

"Whew! Then, when we reach the end of this road we shall have seven miles to go over a heath?"

"Just so."

"Look there!" said Sixteen-String Jack. "It seems the road is not wholly untravelled. There's some one, evidently!"

It was as Jack had said.

A long way off, down the lonely road, and only just visible in the dusk of evening, was a man.

He was mounted upon a horse of perfect symmetry and rather unusual size.

This rider, whoever he was, remained motionless.

His steed was planted nearly in the centre of the road, and was as motionless as his rider.

The latter was looking up the road in the direction our friends were coming from.

In his left hand he held the reins, while with his right he shaded from his eyes the extraneous rays of light which have a tendency to obscure the vision when one is looking at distant objects.

He was evidently gazing intently at our friends.

There was something very peculiar in his manner.

The three highwaymen rather slackened their speed.

They looked towards the stranger with great attention.

"Whatever can be the meaning of this?" said Tom to his comrades.

His tone of voice showed how puzzled and bewildered he was.

"I know no more than you do," replied Claude. "It is very strange."

"If I told you what I thought about it," added Jack, "I think you would laugh at me."

"No, no! What is it?"

"Why, he looks to me as much like a highwayman as ever I saw anybody in my life!"

"Ha, ha!"

"I knew you would laugh at me."

"That is too droll," said Tom.

"And yet," said Claude, "how still he is, and how he gazes upon us! I wonder whether he will try to stop us?"

"He would be a bold highwayman," said Tom King, "who would wait in the road like that, single-handed, for the approach of three well-mounted, well-armed travellers!"

"He would, and yet why on earth should he pause in the road like this? Did you see him take up his position there?"

"No."

"Nor I."

"Nor I. When I first caught sight of him he was sitting there, just as he does now."

The singular appearance of this horseman did indeed form ample matter for speculation for our friends.

They could not understand why anyone should behave in so eccentric a manner.

Gradually the highwaymen reduced the speed of their horses until it became a walk.

Still the stranger never stirred, though, as they drew closer and closer, it became more evident that he was waiting for them.

But what on earth could be his motive for doing so?

That, at present, was an unsolvable mystery.

Having exhausted all their speculations, the highwaymen became silent.

They each occupied themselves in noticing what they saw, and drawing their own inferences from it.

A closer approach showed them that the mysterious stranger was dressed with great elegance and richness, though his garb seemed to be of foreign manufacture.

His horse was black, with a sleek, velvety coat.

The saddle did not seem an English one, but it was furnished with holsters, from which the brass-bound butts of some horse-pistols peeped forth ostentatiously.

A long black cloak was clasped round his neck, and hung in massive, though graceful folds over his person, and partly over the crupper of his steed.

On his head he wore a black hat of peculiar fashion, in which was one solitary feather, which stood up as rigidly as though it had been some steel ornament upon a helmet.

The stranger's complexion was very swarthy, and his countenance was almost entirely covered with black hair, which had been allowed to grow freely and luxuriantly.

In the times of which we write this was a very remarkable feature, for then it was the prevailing fashion to shave the face clean, though some military individuals at times cultivated a fine moustache, but even this was an innovation.

When, therefore, the highwaymen saw that the stranger's face was buried in hair, the interest they had previously felt was doubled.

It now became rather a nice question whether the stranger would accost them when they passed.

This was a point that would be quickly set at rest, for another moment or so and they would reach the spot upon which he stood.

When they came nearer, the stranger removed his hand from his face, and let it fall listlessly by his side.

He gazed attentively into the countenance of each of our friends in succession, then, raising his hand to his hat, he saluted them with deep and respectful politeness.

Yet there was a certain amount of constraint and hauteur in his manner.

Our three friends promptly returned the salute, and would have continued on their way, but the stranger, in whom they felt already most deeply interested, spoke.

His voice had a strong foreign accent, and he spoke with difficulty, like one who is but indifferently acquainted with the language, or as though he had to translate his thoughts from his own tongue before he gave them utterance. The hesitation thus produced came upon the ear with a peculiar but not unpleasant effect.

It is not our intention to trouble the reader with the difficulties of his speech.

He spoke as follows :

"Good gentlemen—good evening! I would speak with you. Have you a long journey taken ?"

Then, perceiving the surprise with which our friends regarded him, he added, in some confusion :-

"Pardon me, gentlemen, but it is with difficulty that I speak the English tongue. But be patient, and oblige me by listening."

The three highwaymen bowed, and Tom took upon himself to reply for his comrades.

"We shall listen with pleasure to what you have to say to us, sir."

"Thanks—it much pleases me to meet with a kind response. I will not detain you long, if you will only have patience to listen."

They bowed again.

"I ought to ask you, first, whether you far make your journey in thie direction? If you do not, then there is no need for further speech. If you do, I would earnestly beseech your attention to my words."

The three friends exchanged glances with each other, as much as to say, "Events are growing still more complicated—what can he mean ?"

This took but a moment ; then Tom replied :

"We intend to travel to the extremity of this road."

"You have already reached it, gentlemen, or nearly so. I mean, shall you cross the large open space between the end of this road and the forest ?"

The highwaymen exchanged glances again, for they could not imagine to what point these questions would tend.

Nevertheless, the stranger's manner, although so mysterious, was at the same time so earnest and impressive that Tom felt constrained to answer him candidly and truthfully.

"We are going to cross the open space you speak of," he said.

A strange expression came over the stranger's face.

"I thought so," he replied ; "and I am much obliged to you for listening to me with so much attention. Hitherto, when I have addressed anyone, I have met with nothing but rebuffs. I trust, however, you will hear me to the end."

"We will do so willingly."

"Well, then, I want you to allow me to accompany you in your journey across this place. I would willingly be an escort to every traveller across the dreary waste —until——"

The stranger sighed deeply.

This request our friends thought was a strange one, but they resolved to accede to it.

They felt that if the stranger contemplated treachery they should be more than a match for him, without, indeed, he lured them into some ambuscade.

But though he was a foreigner, yet he did not look like one who would be guilty of a base action.

He seemed sad and mournful, and the corners of his mouth were depressed, as though a long time had elapsed since he smiled

But Tom King, although he had made up his mind to consent, nevertheless remarked :

"Your request, sir, is, to say the least of it, a strange one. People are naturally suspicious of travellers they may encounter on the road. We shall therefore feel more at ease if you will give us some reason——"

"I will do so willingly, if you will only have patience to listen."

"We will listen with pleasure."

"Well, then, gentlemen, my presence must seem very strange, and I hasten to give you a faithful account of it. As you have guessed, perhaps, I am a foreigner."

The highwaymen bowed.

"I have not long been in England," he said, "and the circumstances which have brought me here are singular. They are painful, too ; but you shall know them, and then you will no longer have room to doubt my good faith."

The stranger paused, as though to control some powerful emotion.

"By birth and education," he said, "I am a German. Until about two months ago, I never quitted my native country—probably should never have done so except under the circumstances which have brought me here. In my own land, I am entitled to the rank of Count—the Count von Schoenen."

The highwaymen bowed when they received this intimation of the stranger's rank, and grew more deeply interested than before.

"I have, or had, a twin brother," continued the Count von Schoenen. "Although the difference in our age is insignificant, yet I was the first born. That did not matter, however. We were made the joint inheritors of my father's property and wealth. About six months ago, this younger brother of mine had occasion to visit England. He came over here alone. At first we heard regularly from him, and then all correspondence ceased."

The Count paused again, and cleared his voice.

"I loved my brother as few persons love their brothers, and when I ceased to hear from him I was anxious and terrified. At last I felt certain some evil had overtaken him, and I resolved to set out in search of him. I came over to England. I made my way at once to the place from which he had dated his last letter to me. This was an inn. Here I learned that he had put up for one night. I made my inquiries carefully, and found that he had travelled in this direction. I traced him to the spot upon which I now stand. But here all trace ends. I can learn nothing further. I have no clue to his disappearance. I have made many inquiries, but all have been fruitless. I am convinced that there is some mystery in that heath beyond. That is where he disappeared, but I can find nothing strange upon this heath. I have resolved, however, to accompany all travellers who cross it, in the hope that by so doing I shall be able to solve the mystery of my brother's disappearance."

[DICK TURPIN AND MAUD ARE ATTACKED BY THE POLICE OFFICERS.]

CHAPTER DI.

THE THREE HIGHWAYMEN SET OUT TO CROSS THE HEATH IN COMPANY WITH THE COUNT VON SCHOENEN.

THE COUNT VON SCHOENEN appeared to be deeply affected by this story of his brother's loss, and he paused once more, for his voice was very husky.

The reader will scarcely require to be told how deeply interested the highwaymen were in the narrative which they heard so unexpectedly.

That the count was sincere and what he professed to be they did not doubt for an instant.

Every word he spoke and every tone of his voice proclaimed that his narrative was true. They forebore to interrupt him by asking any questions.

They saw that he was deeply moved, and therefore would not be guilty of the rudeness of intruding upon him, but waited patiently until he should have sufficiently recovered himself to resume his story.

In another moment the count raised his head.

"You must pardon me for this display of weakness," he said, "but I cannot help it. As I have told you, I loved my brother. But I will continue, for I do not wish to detain you any longer than I can help, for it is unreasonable to suppose that you, being strangers, could feel as I do the keenness of this domestic affliction."

"Indeed, sir," said Tom King, with the utmost respect, "you are in error in supposing that we do not feel interested. We are most deeply interested, and hope that, if you have no objection, you will make us acquainted with all the particulars of this extraordinary affair. We shall not be wearied if you are ever so minute."

A pleasant smile came over the count's features as Tom King thus spoke.

"Thank you, gentlemen," he said—"many thanks! I have spoken to many travellers, but never to any who have treated me with so much consideration."

"The reason is," said Tom, "that the roads in England are very unsafe, and English people are naturally cautious, so they look with great suspicion on every stranger they may meet with on the road."

"I see—I see! But we have nothing to fear from each other?"

"Nothing at all," said Tom—"we are three gentlemen travelling for pleasure."

This avowal seemed to set the count quite at his ease.

"I have very little more to tell you with respect to myself and my lost brother. As I said a little while ago, the last place from which he wrote a letter was an inn. Of course, when I began to make my inquiries, I went straight there, and managed to trace him to this spot, where he was last seen. But I have no further clue."

"Have you any evidence that he crossed the heath beyond?" asked Tom King.

"No direct evidence, but only the inference that he would do so, since this road leads nowhere else, but debouches upon the heath."

"Then we may take it for granted that he crossed it?"

"I think we may safely do so," said the count.

"But did you not say that you had crossed this heath?"

"Once, and once only."

"Were you alone?"

"Yes."

"And when was it?"

"This morning."

"Then you have not long been here?"

"No. I stopped last night at the inn I spoke of, and which is some distance from here. I learned there all the intelligence I could respecting my brother, and arrived here just before noon."

"What did you do?"

"I waited a little while, and then crossed the heath, but I could see nothing peculiar or suspicious, and I returned here to this spot."

"And have you remained here ever since?"

"Yes. Some other travellers have passed, but they all avoided me, and shrunk back whenever I attempted to address them."

"Yes, yes—people would be sure to do so. They would fancy you had some sinister designs upon them."

"I suppose that was it. At any rate, I have remained here ever since, and you are the only persons who have manifested any interest in my brother's fate, or rather, who have even listened to a word I have to say."

"It seems to me," said Tom King, after a pause, "that you have some suspicions that your brother disappeared upon the heath."

"I have. In fact, I am driven to think so. Here no harm could have befallen him, but the heath beyond is a very lonesome-looking place. I fear that he has fallen into the hands of robbers and murderers."

"That is far from unlikely."

"I feel almost sure of it, and I thought the best way in which I could ascertain would be to make some travellers acquainted with my purpose, and ask them to allow me to accompany them across the heath."

"You think that, by so doing, you would discover whether there really were any robbers on the heath who made a practice of waylaying and murdering such travellers as cross it?"

"Just so."

"Well, sir, I think your plan a very good one, and one likely to succeed. As for myself and companions, we shall be only too glad of your company, and shall rejoice if we are so fortunate as to be able to render you important assistance in this matter."

"Thanks, sirs—many thanks!"

"Evening is fast closing in," said Tom King, "and therefore the time is well chosen, for it is at night, and at night only, that we are to look for assassins."

"You are right."

"Let us, then, at once commence our journey. We will all keep together, and maintain a vigilant look-out."

This was assented to.

The Count von Schoenen was very much pleased with the way in which our friends had treated him, and he would insist upon shaking hands with them all three. When this little ceremony was gone through they were on the best possible terms with each other.

At a very gentle trot they passed down the lane, and emerged upon the piece of waste land of which Tom King had spoken as surrounding the forest like a belt.

It was, in truth, as the Count von Schoenen had described it—a most lonely and desolate-looking place, and in the dim evening twilight looked more sombre than it would have done at any other time.

The ground was very rugged, and there scarcely appeared to be a beaten track across the vast expanse.

Bushes and dwarfish shrubs grew all around, and sometimes a tall tree would be seen standing solitary and desolate in the plain like some sentinel on the outposts of an army.

These solitary trees, with their huge, leafless branches, added greatly to the desolation of the scene.

But they were very few and far between. In places there would be a kind of hollow or excavation, and these were invariably overgrown with prickly plants.

The three highwaymen looked about them with feelings of great interest and curiosity.

As may easily be imagined, our friends were much excited by the strange story that had been related to them by the Count von Schoenen.

They could not help admitting that this place seemed, of all others, just suited for the commission of the most atrocious crimes. On their way they chatted pleasantly enough, and Tom King said:

"If you will believe us, sir, it will give us the utmost gratification if we are successful in solving the mystery of your brother's disappearance. Take my word for it, we shall not think anything of either time, trouble, or danger."

It was a lucky chance for me that I fell in with you, gentlemen!" replied the count. "From the knowledge you probably have concerning the place, you will doubtless be able to render me more assistance than anyone else possibly could do."

"We are not very familiar with this heath, sir," said Tom King. "Indeed, I am the only one who has previously crossed it."

"And did you see anything peculiar?"

"Nothing. I was not molested in any way, nor did I see anything to arouse my suspicions."

"But how long is this ago?"

"Oh! it is some time back."

"Then you are almost strangers?"

"We ought almost to be considered such, but do not think that will make any difference. We will not give up until we have entirely cleared up the mystery."

"I am much indebted to you, and yet——"

"Pray speak without reserve."

"I was going to say, then, that I cannot think why you should take so deep an interest in my brother's loss as you evidently do."

"It is chiefly because it has come to our knowledge that in various parts of this country there are places which can be called by no other name than murder dens!"

"I feared as much."

"We have proof of it, as one of my comrades narrowly escaped the dagger of an assassin in one of them. We saw those villains safe in the hands of the officers of justice, as they deserved to be."

"And you think——"

"It appears to me almost certain that your brother's disappearance is to be attributed to this cause; and this alone would be sufficient to account for our interest, because we have a personal feeling against such miscreants. In addition, however, to all this, we hold the crime of assassination in such abhorrence, that we would gladly go to any length to punish it."

The count's face assumed an appearance of greater melancholy.

"I am afraid," he said, "that my brother is no more! I have endeavoured to call up hope in my breast, but I was wrong to raise such expectations. He has perished—perished beyond all doubt!"

"Nay, I would not make too sure of that," said Tom King, when he saw how full of grief the count was; "don't cast away hope, it may be he has escaped their murderous clutches."

The count shook his head.

"I am afraid not. If he had I should have heard from him before this."

Tom was silent, for he felt the truth of this remark.

"Let us hope for the best," said Claude Duval. "After all it may turn out that we are altogether wrong in our suppositions. At any rate, it would be best to retain hope as long as possible."

"Decidedly!" said Sixteen-String Jack. "It may turn out his disappearance may be otherwise accounted for."

Our friends' convictions were in direct opposition to their words.

The count seemed to understand that what they said was uttered only with the intention of consoling him.

He took their efforts in good part.

The darkness had by this time greatly deepened.

Objects which were more than a few yards distant could be with difficulty distinguished from the gloom in which they were enveloped, and the uneven, broken character of the ground demanded the whole of their attention, lest their horses should meet with some serious injury.

Up to the present moment, however, they had not seen anything of a suspicious or extraordinary nature.

But the wildest and most desolate portion of the heath was yet before them.

By slow degrees they all relapsed into perfect silence.

Each one was busy with his own thoughts, or looking keenly about him, in order that nothing should escape his observation.

There was a kind of pathway across the heath, but there was scarcely anything to distinguish it from the ground adjacent to it.

There was no fence or even low mound of earth, as there sometimes is along the sides of such roads, and it was overgrown with rank weeds and prickly bushes. So little was the road travelled that their growth was hardly checked.

To have deviated from such a path in the darkness would have been the easiest thing imaginable.

Indeed, the difficulty would have been to keep upon it.

The highwaymen, however, were very familiar with night travelling, and they saw things that would have escaped any less vigilant observation than they bestowed.

Suddenly, however, Tom King uttered a faint ejaculation.

"Hark!" he said, in a whisper—"hark! all of you, and listen attentively!"

He was obeyed in an instant.

But all was still.

Not a sound could be heard, save the faint moaning of the wind as it careered wildly over the vast expanse.

For at least two minutes the whole party remained immovable, during which period of time they listened with an intentness which cannot be described.

But they heard nothing.

Tom King was the first to move.

His companions addressed him eagerly.

But they spoke in the faintest possible whisper.

"What was it, Tom?—what did you hear, or fancy you heard? Speak!—tell us at once, all seems still!"

CHAPTER DII.

IN WHICH TOM KING BECOMES ACQUAINTED WITH SOME OF THE MYSTERIES OF THE HEATH.

"It is quite possible," replied Tom King, "that I was misled by my fancy; and, as all is so still, I am inclined to think I must have been."

"But your ears are quick. What was it you thought you heard?"

"The sound of voices. They seemed at a great distance, and I only caught one ejaculation."

"You may be right; and if so, depend upon it some one is lurking near."

"That we must find out."

"But how?"

"You must leave that to me."

"How?"

"Wait a moment. It will be necessary for us to proceed in this matter with the greatest possible amount of caution."

"That is quite certain."

"And we must not allow anything, no matter how trivial, to escape our observation."

"Right again."

"Well, then, it appears to me that it would be a very easy matter to discover whether my ears deceived me or not."

"How shall you find out, then?"

"Why, I shall ask you to remain here, just where you now stand, and to take care of my horse."

"And you?"

"I will slip off in the darkness, making no more noise than I can possibly help, and reconnoitre the ground all round about us!"

"Nay—nay!" said the count. "I cannot consent to allow you to run all this risk on my account."

"There is very little risk for anyone to do what I propose."

"Let me go, then," said the count.

"Nay! I think I can give you a reason which will convince you at once that I am the best person for this service, and that I shall run much less risk than anyone else."

"How is that?"

"Simply because I am tolerably familiar with my whereabouts, while you, and my comrades also, are perfect strangers."

"There is something in that."

"There is everything. And now, do not detain me any longer. I know the direction from which the sound appeared to come, and I shall proceed there straight. I shall then very quickly know whether or not I was mistaken. Do not hesitate, because if I linger the chance will be lost."

No one made any reply to this last speech of Tom King's, so he slipped off his horse as soon as the last words were fairly out of his mouth.

"Do not move from this spot," he added; "I will rejoin you in a few moments at the outside."

So saying, Tom crept rapidly away, and his form was quickly lost to his companions in the darkness which overspread the heath.

Tom King bent his steps in a direction nearly at right angles to the footpath.

With all that stealthiness of movement for which the Indians are celebrated, he crept over the rugged ground, crouching down every now and then behind some friendly bush, listening for some repetition of the sound which had first attracted his attention.

No such sound, however, came upon his ear, but he was so certain that he had not been deceived by his fancy, that he kept on again without hesitation, and without in the least degree relaxing the caution with which he had made all his former movements.

The gloom and darkness were, however, terribly perplexing to him, but in spite of all obstacles his progress was almost noiseless.

He was deeply interested in this adventure, and he determined to prosecute it to the utmost.

He fancied that he should not go far without making some discovery.

Onward and onward he crept until now he was a long way from his friends.

All at once he stopped.

Again there came upon his ears a faint sound, but this time it was not of voices.

It seemed rather that a door had been closed with some degree of violence.

Almost immediately afterwards, he distinguished in the distance a faint twinkling light—so faint that it afforded good proof of the keenness of his vision, or else he would never have seen it.

Tom King riveted his eyes upon this twinkling light.

In a little while he satisfied himself that the light, faint as it was, was a stationary one.

It looked like a star, but he knew it could not be that.

This light was not in the direction in which he had been going, but rather to the right of it.

He hesitated, therefore, for a little while whether he should keep straight on, or whether he should bend out of his course and endeavour to ascertain what the light was, and whence it proceeded.

He listened.

Still all was silent, and this made him determine to bend his course towards the light.

This was easy enough.

Fixing his eyes upon it, he crept stealthily but swiftly onwards.

Every now and then he paused to listen; but had he been in a desert the silence could not have been more profound than it was.

As he drew nearer, the faint light much increased in brilliancy

He perceived, too, that it had a ruddy tinge; and he was also convinced that it came from somewhere on the heath.

But so great was the darkness, that he could make out nothing else that was in advance of him.

The faintness of the light was evidently caused by the distance he was off when he first caught sight of it.

Upon a closer approach, he found it grow brighter and brighter.

"That must come from the window of some cottage," he said; "and yet what cottage can it be? I did not know there was a building of any kind within miles of this place. It must be a cottage!"

As he came closer, he was the more convinced that he was right in this supposition.

Ere long, he could distinguish the latticed casement through which the beam of light came.

This put the matter at rest.

Very faintly against the background of dark sky, Tom could distinguish the dim outlines of a small building, not many feet in height, but apparently extending over a large piece of ground.

As he was in such close proximity to this building, the utmost degree of caution became necessary in all his movements.

Not a sound indicated the presence of any human being.

He crept forward slowly and noiselessly.

He was crouched down on the ground, so that it would be a difficult matter for anyone to have distinguished him from a gorse-bush.

And now about twenty steps more brought him close to the hut, for such it was.

Having been so long in the dark, his vision had accommodated itself to the gloom, and he was now enabled to see that the hut was a building of the rudest possible kind.

It seemed to be composed of nothing more than thin wood plentifully plastered over with mud, in order to keep out the cold.

The roof presented exactly the same appearance.

There were other windows, but only one that was illuminated.

This window, like the rest, was composed of small diamond-shaped panes of glass.

The light appeared to come from a fire that was blazing on the hearth.

Tom had paused at a low fence with which the hut appeared to be surrounded.

The piece of land which it enclosed did not, however, present any marks of cultivation. It was to all appearances as rugged and barren as the heath itself.

Having listened, and found all perfectly still, Tom climbed over the wooden fence, and crouched down in the shadow which it cast.

But he had no occasion for alarm.

All was as still as before, and he could see no indications of the presence of anyone.

He now crept on tip-toe to the window.

He reached it in less than a moment, for he had only to cross the little piece of enclosed ground.

He stooped down until his head was just below the level of the window sill.

In this position he remained for a few seconds listening, before he ventured to peep into the interior.

At length he raised his head by slow degrees, and not an inch higher than was necessary.

It was only necessary for his eyes to be just above the level of the sill to enable him to see all over the interior of the cottage.

He was right in supposing that the light came from a fire.

On the hearth a pile of wood logs was blazing fiercely, and sending out a ruddy light, which was pleasant to look upon.

There was no other light than that which came from the fire, but this was amply sufficient to illuminate every nook and corner of the room into which Tom looked.

As he had expected from the appearance which the exterior of the hut presented, it was a very rude-looking place.

The walls were roughly plastered over with mud, and the floor appeared to be composed of nothing more than earth hammered hard and flat.

A few primitive-looking articles of furniture were placed here and there, but the room did not appear to be occupied by any living creature.

Tom looked all around, but could not see anyone, nor was there anything in the aspect of the scene before him to confirm the suspicions which had sprung up in his breast.

It was just as he was compelled, though rather unwillingly, to come to this conclusion that he saw a door, which he had previously noticed, slowly opened.

From its position, Tom fancied this door communicated with some other chamber in the hut.

His eyes happened to be turned in that direction when the door opened.

All his attention at once became fixed upon it.

The opening door disclosed the form of a very aged woman

She stepped at once into the light which streamed from the fireplace, and Tom was able to observe her distinctly.

How old she was would have puzzled anyone to say.

She looked more like the resuscitated mummy of some ancient Egyptian than aught else.

Her skin was dry and wrinkled, and the colour of musty old parchment.

As for flesh, she absolutely had none.

A more meagre figure could not possibly be seen.

Her sharp, angular bones were covered with nothing else but skin.

Her features were hideous in the extreme, and there was something about her whole appearance so terribly repulsive that Tom felt a shuddering, sickly sensation of loathing come over him.

Her hair, which was thin, was in the greatest disorder. Its colour was whitey-brown—a tint most probably acquired from dirt.

It was perhaps her unnatural leanness that made the woman appear much older than she really was.

Her step was firm and brisk as she closed the door and crossed the room towards a rude table which was drawn up before the fire.

But the closer view which he obtained increased Tom's disgust to such a degree that he was forced to turn his head away.

He felt, however, that it was most important he should keep an eye upon all her movements.

If ever anyone deserved the appellation of hag, most surely this old woman did.

Such horrible eyes she had.

They looked like those of some deadly serpent.

Her front teeth, too, had grown to an unnatural length, and hung down over her lower lip like two yellow, poisonous fangs.

But Tom King's attention was diverted from this contemplation of the hag's personal appearance by perceiving that she held something in her hand.

This something she had evidently brought in to the room with her; but as she had held her hand down by her side Tom had not noticed that she carried anything.

But upon reaching the table we have mentioned she seated herself upon a rickety three-legged stool, and flung the article she had held in her hand upon the table.

Tom King saw now what it was, and he peered through the window with redoubled eagerness.

CHAPTER DIII

MR. WRIGGLES OBTAINS A CLUE TO THE WHEREABOUTS OF DICK TURPIN.

THE tide of events has for a long time carried us away from the hero of our story—so long, indeed, that we feel ourselves constrained to return to him.

However much the reader may be interested in the fortunes of Tom King, Claude Duval, and Sixteen-String Jack, we feel convinced that a still greater degree of interest is felt in the adventures of Dick Turpin and his fair companion.

In order, then, that we may chronicle what happened to him and to her, we will leave his comrades and the Count von Schoenen on that desolate heath on the confines of the New Forest.

We break off the narrative at this point because so much has yet to be told respecting the hut and its inmates, and the fate of the lost brother of the Count von Schoenen.

We left Dick Turpin, then, in that deserted mansion near to Finchley, which, contrary to his anticipations, had for so long been a place of safe refuge for his companions and himself.

He stood at the window in that room on the topmost story in which they had principally taken up their quarters.

Maud was leaning upon his shoulder.

They were both looking down upon the neglected lawn across which the three highwaymen were making their way.

Here they stood and watched them until they faded from their sight.

Turning away, then, the window was closed, and they sat down together by the fire.

Dick placed his hand to his head once or twice with an uneasy movement.

The excitement of the scene which he had recently passed through was too much for his feeble strength, and he felt the effects of it already.

Maud, however, was at hand to attend to him.

She insisted that he should keep himself perfectly quiet.

He took her advice willingly enough, for he was utterly exhausted and overpowered.

Presently, however, when the night had far advanced, the profound silence which reigned in and about that deserted mansion was broken by that horrible and unearthly cry which had before so frequently assailed their ears.

So suddenly and unexpectedly did the cry come upon them that Dick Turpin started violently.

But Maud restrained him.

"Be still!" she said—"oh, be still! These sounds are horrible; but we must bear with them, and shut our ears against them as best we may."

"Nay—nay, Maud!" said Dick—"do not seek to detain me. This is past all endurance! I must and will discover what this means!"

"Not to-night—oh, not to-night! You are weak and ill, and such excitement will have the worst results. Be calm—oh, pray be calm! You can do nothing—discover nothing—you will only exhaust yourself!"

Dick had sprung up; but now he found how terribly weak and exhausted he was.

His brain throbbed most painfully.

He could not conceal from himself that Maud was right, and that any exertion would have the worst results; and, by a strong effort, he kept down the desire he felt to descend and explore every corner of the building.

But, as Maud urged, he might have all his labour for naught, and so he determined that, let what would ensue, he would remain where he was, and put off to another opportunity the task of making a thorough search through all the chambers of the whole mansion.

It was horrible, though, to remain there under such circumstances.

The mystery seemed to weigh most painfully upon him, but he contented himself with the thought that ere long he would discover it.

And so passed away the whole of that night.

At irregular intervals, the awful sound—which cannot be described because it cannot be likened to aught earthly—came upon their ears.

Sometimes it would sound as though it came from afar off, and sometimes as though it was just outside the chamber door.

Both were grateful when the morning came.

In this manner, and without the occurrence of any particular event, nearly a week passed.

During the whole of this time not a night passed without the awful sounds making themselves heard until daybreak.

Not without difficulty had Dick Turpin adhered to his resolution.

Each day, however, showed a marked improvement in his personal strength, and he was rapidly becoming more like he used to be.

Still he was weak, and it would have been injudicious to try his newly-found strength too soon; and so, night after night, he had listened to Maud's entreaties to put off for a little while longer his promised exploration of the building.

But at the end of the week he felt himself so far recovered that he announced his intention of finding out the cause of this hideous sound.

And so, just one week from the night when he had parted with his comrades, Dick made his preparations to set out upon his exploring expedition.

On that night, however, events were destined to occur that they little dreamed of.

Had either Turpin or Maud happened to be at one of the windows overlooking a certain portion of the garden they would have been filled with the greatest consternation and alarm.

The reader will quickly understand what they would have seen if they will turn their attention to the proceedings of an old and troublesome acquaintance.

We allude to Mr. Wriggles.

That irate police officer was, as we have before had occasion to remark, almost mad with the repeated defeats he had met with in his efforts to capture Dick Turpin and his comrades.

But all his manifold disappointments did not make him despair, or think of relinquishing the object upon which he had set his heart.

On the contrary, he seemed to grow more and more determined and pertinacious.

The capture of Dick Turpin became the one object of his life. It amounted to a perfect mania with him.

He thought of nothing else, and he looked upon everything with the same object constantly in view.

He was no longer a man striving to gain a large reward, though that had been his first inducement.

But he despised that now—thoroughly despised it.

He had a personal feeling in the matter—he looked upon the highwaymen, and Dick Turpin in particular, as enemies of his own.

It was not the reward he wanted, but the satisfaction of triumphing over him—of atoning by a capture for his many defeats; of obtaining his revenge—for, in plain language, he felt that he must be revenged upon him.

From what we have just said, the reader will immediately conclude that Mr. Wriggles was not at all likely to sit down quietly under his last defeat.

On the contrary, it seemed to urge him to still greater exertions, for he was very well aware that he had been almost successful.

After what had happened, Mr. Wriggles came to the conclusion that Dick would keep himself quiet for some time, and that in consequence he should have a great deal of trouble in discovering his whereabouts from the want of a clue.

He resolved to keep quiet himself, and, for a little while, take no active steps, in the hope that by so doing he should, to a great extent, throw the highwaymen off their guard, and induce them to quit their place of concealment sooner than they otherwise would.

Very soon after this he received the intelligence that Sixteen-String Jack had been seen at Hatfield, and had been pursued for many miles across the country, but had ultimately escaped.

This led Mr. Wriggles off on a wild-goose chase over the country, which resulted in a manner he little expected.

While stopping at an inn for refreshment, he heard a man recounting a wonderful story of how he had found some provisions scattered about in a wood, and imperfectly hidden under the bushes.

Mr. Wriggles became all attention in a moment.

He had heard of the robbery of the market-cart, for the man had been found on the roadside, and taken home, while the horse and cart were captured near Hampstead.

As the owner's name was painted on the cart, there was no trouble in taking it to him, and he then made a terrible outcry about the loss of his goods, and also of a bag containing a large sum of money.

Now Mr. Wriggles, as he sipped his glass, put all these parts together, and came to certain conclusions respecting them.

"I have it!" he said at last. "I can see it all now! I shall have them safe enough! They are hiding in some out-of-the-way place or other—nobody knows where—and they were obliged to get something to eat, and so they hit upon the nice little scheme of robbing the market-cart. I am sure I am right so far!"

In this the reader will no doubt agree.

Mr. Wriggles thought the matter over still further.

"I will go to that wood!" he said. "I will go there without delay! They are hiding somewhere about there! I will warrant to say they are not far off! They would hide the goods close at hand, in order to get at them all the more easily! I know what I will do! I will make a circle round that wood, and consider every place I come to; and then, rely upon it, I shall find them out!"

This seemed very likely.

Mr. Wriggles's plan was an ingenious one, and had every prospect of being successful.

No sooner had he resolved upon this course of action than he proceeded to carry it out.

He called his men about him, and, by the offer of a five-pound note, induced the man he had heard talking to guide them to the exact spot where he had found the provisions.

Away, then, they went.

Of course their destination was the little wood that was situated not far from the deserted mansion.

Upon reaching this place, Mr. Wriggles made a slight change in his plan of operations.

He called his men together.

"Just listen to me for a moment," he said, making a tremendous effort to keep perfectly calm and unexcited. "I will tell you then what you must do."

"I have a thought too, Mr. Wriggles," said one of the officers.

"Eh?"

"I say I have a thought."

"Then you'd better keep it!"

"But——"

"Now, what are you trying to say?"

"Don't you think, Mr. Wriggles, that the chaps we want might be in this very wood?"

"No; but you may depend they are not very far off!"

"I think very likely they are here!"

Mr. Wriggles paused reflectively.

"No!" he said, at length; "I am sure they are not! But we will soon find out where they are!"

"How — how?" asked the men, crowding forward eagerly, for Mr. Wriggles had previously told them that he should take no share of the reward himself, but should divide it among them equally.

"Why, these things being here—or rather having been here, which it's all the same to them, seeing that they know no better—why, if we wait patiently, we shall see them come to fetch some more, and then we can pop out at once, take them prisoners, or follow them stealthily and find out their hiding-place, according as circumstances may be!"

This was not a very lucid speech, but the men understood from it that they were to place themselves in hiding near the spot where the goods had been secreted, and wait for the highwaymen to make their appearance.

This was a very cunning scheme, and did Mr. Wriggles very great credit.

It would have succeeded but for one little circumstance.

The police officers did not happen to know that the goods which had been found were only such as our friends had made up their minds were not worth the trouble of carrying to the deserted mansion.

CHAPTER DIV.

MR. WRIGGLES IS MORTIFIED TO FIND THAT HIS VERY CUNNING SCHEME IS NOT PRODUCTIVE OF ANY BENEFICIAL RESULTS.

UNFORTUNATELY, so far as they themselves were concerned, the police officers did not know that the highwaymen had paid their last visit to the little wood about twelve hours before, when they had taken away with them everything they wanted.

So it happened, then, that Mr. Wriggles's cunning scheme, like many more which had been hatched in his expedient brain, came to nothing in the end.

Most patiently did he and his men lie down on the damp earth, with their forms concealed behind the bushes, or beneath the brake and other undergrowth.

They looked like an army of cats all waiting near a tempting bait for the appearance of four small mice.

But their patient watching was unrewarded.

Morning came, and found them all very uncomfortable both in body and mind.

Their limbs were stiff with the dews which had fallen upon them, for they were afraid to move, lest by so doing they should give the alarm to the highwaymen, and put them on their guard.

Little did clever Mr. Wriggles and his officers dream of the essential service they had rendered the highwaymen by lying there so snug, for while they were doing so, the three friends set out upon their expedition to the New Forest.

Had Mr. Wriggles been out upon the road he might possibly have encountered them.

But he could not be at two places at once.

All were cold and tired, and all were in a terrible bad temper—but that did not mend the matter in the least.

As soon as the first streak of dawn appeared in the sky, Mr. Wriggles knew that it would be in vain to wait any longer, so he savagely told his men to break up their watch and follow him.

He led the way to a public-house at no great distance, and here they rested and refreshed themselves.

It must not be thought for a moment, though, that Mr. Wriggles had in the least lost faith in his scheme.

Far from it.

He told his men that they were to think nothing of such a disappointment as that, and that they stood a much better chance of effecting their object that night than they did on the previous one.

Upon taking this view of the case, the officers felt a little more reconciled to their task of watching all night in the cold, and they accompanied their leader to the appointed spot with feelings of considerable confidence.

But, alas! that night wore away just in the same manner as the preceding one; and morning came, and found the officers more sullen and bad-tempered than before.

Back to the inn they marched, and the day was spent again in eating and sleeping.

But, as soon as ever night came, inexorable Wriggles—loth to abandon the scheme upon the projection of which he had so prided himself, and yet feeling a great amount of misgiving that things would not turn out in the manner he had hoped for and expected—called his men about him, and resumed his place in the wood once more.

The result was the same.

Not a soul came near to disturb them in their lonely watch.

The state of mind in which they had all been at dawn on the two preceding mornings was amiability in comparison with the present occasion.

Again came evening, and the men seemed inclined to rebel against any more of that sort of work; but Mr. Wriggles suggested something which reconciled them to the idea of trying their luck once more.

"Don't despair, my lads!" said Mr. Wriggles—"Rome wasn't built in a day, you know! Let us be patient! I know these chaps of old! They would just take as much as they wanted, and never think of coming for more until they had demolished all they had got! Take my advice—we will try one more night; and if we fail, why, I shall be heartily glad if you will all put your heads together, and try to suggest some other plan."

Once again, then, did the police officers take up their forlorn station.

It was, of course, to no manner of use whatever.

While they were thus engaged, Tom and Claude and Jack were rapidly nearing the New Forest.

As for Turpin, he was in the deserted mansion along with Maud, and never for a moment dreaming of moving out of it.

Morning came; but the officers were no better off, and certainly no nearer their object than before.

"We must give this up as no go!" said Mr. Wriggles, vainly endeavouring to suppress his passion. "Come back—come back! and when we meet this evening, let me see whether you can think of something else!"

Grumbling and swearing, the officers went back to the inn.

Night came again, and found the officers again assembled in one of the rooms of the inn

Mr. Wriggles was very savage that his scheme should have failed; but still he had the wisdom to try to think of something else.

"Well, my lads," he said, endeavouring to make himself as agreeable as he could, "have you been able to think of anything?"

There was a silence.

"Ah well!" continued the chief police officer, "it doesn't much matter, as it happens, for I have thought of something myself."

The men had faith in their leader, and anxiously asked what this new scheme was.

"I think, then," commenced Mr. Wriggles, assuming an oratorical air—"I think we may take it for granted that they are lurking somewhere not very far off from where we now are!"

"Hear, hear!"

"Well then, my lads, what I have to propose is very simple indeed; it is, in fact, what I first of all thought of, though the plan is somewhat modified and improved. It is that we all separate from each other, and go on an exploring expedition round the country. When we come to a place that we think likely to afford a chance of concealment, we must approach with caution, and spy all about. Then we will meet here at sunrise and report what we have done."

The plan, which was really a good one, was agreed upon without hesitation.

The men separated at once, and each set out upon an independent search over the country surrounding the little wood in which they had so vainly watched.

Mr. Wriggles formed one of their number.

Each officer set out with a determination to try his utmost to accomplish the purpose in view.

This was the right spirit to go to work with.

But there was one officer in particular who set out with this settled determination.

This man was named Lickfold, and Mr. Wriggles looked upon him as one of the most promising members of his troop.

Like the rest, this man Lickfold separated from his comrades, and set out on an independent journey of discovery.

But when he had got some distance from the inn, peering about him with great care and minuteness, he suddenly stopped short.

Then clenching his fist, he struck himself quite a violent blow on the side of the head.

"You're a d—d fool, Jim Lickfold—that's what you are!" he said. "A d—d fool, and an idiot as well! To think now that that should never have entered my thick head before! How ever came I to forget it? But it's just like me! I shall forget my own name some day! Now, let me see. What had I better do? I think the best thing will be to run back and tell Mr. Wriggles. No, that won't do either, for he set out like the rest of us, and no one knows where he is by this time. No; it's no good turning back to him. What had I better do?"

Jim Lickfold rubbed his head reflectively.

"That's it!" he said presently, and with rather odd abruptness—"that's it! I will go myself and look about, and make sure, and then, if things turn out as I think they will, why I shall get old Wriggles's good word for ever. Only to think, now, that I should have been bred and born in this part of the country, knowing every lane and tree for miles round, and then not to remember the old shut-up house that everybody says—or used to say—is haunted! D—n me! I feel sure that's it! It's just the place where they would go to, for they would care no more about ghosts and goblins than I should about——"

Jim Lickfold paused for a moment, being at a loss for a word that would form a good simile, and then he abruptly ejaculated:

"Spiders!"

"Yes," he continued, after a brief pause; "they would care no more about 'em than I should care about spiders, or any other insect! That's where they are! I know the old house well, and I'll be off there at once. And if they are there, I'll warrant I'll discover them! It's only a short run across the meadows."

With these words, the officer leaped over a low fence, and struck across some pasture ground.

It was quite certain he spoke the truth when he said he was familiar with that part of the country, for he took his course in a perfectly straight line for his destination.

That destination, the reader will scarcely require to be told, was the deserted mansion.

On his way the officer continued to reproach himself in no very gentle terms for his forgetfulness and stupidity.

"The more I think of it, the more sure I feel that I am right. I wonder, now, whether any of the others will think of it. They are sharp chaps, very, and it's such a likely place that they could not help thinking of it! Ah, well! I'll be there first, at any rate. They sha'n't rob me of my share of glory!"

So saying, Jim Lickfold quickened his pace, and he soon had the satisfaction of seeing the deserted mansion appear in sight.

"Ah, there it is!" he said, pausing for breath and reflection, "there it is, looking just the same as it did when I was a boy! I will lay my life they are there! But stop! Caution, Jim—caution! If you are too fast you will ruin all—that you will! Caution—caution! That's the word!"

In a very stealthy manner Mr. Lickfold approached the gates which we have lately so often had occasion to mention.

This was a peril that Turpin never dreamed of.

He relied fully that, having escaped discovery so long, he should continue to do so, provided he kept close, and did not show himself.

And no doubt he would have done so, but for the chance fact that one of the officers composing Mr. Wriggles's party happened to be intimate with the country, and having got a slight clue, would therefore be able to follow it up with certainty and success.

He was, as the reader knows very well, on the right track now, and the discovery of the wounded and almost defenceless Dick Turpin appears inevitable.

And it seems that discovery cannot fail to result in anything save his death or capture.

Mr. Lickfold satisfied himself that he had gained the gates unperceived.

Having done this, the remainder of his course was easy enough.

The trees which grew so plentifully and thickly along the avenue afforded him most excellent opportunities of concealing himself.

Indeed, it seemed next to impossible that he should be seen.

Stealthily and slowly did this police spy creep through the gardens of the deserted mansion.

His ears were strained to catch every sound, and his eyes roamed constantly in every direction.

But as yet he had seen nothing to speak of.

At length the spy reached the outskirts of the lawn.

He crouched down behind the elaborate stonework, and gazed attentively before him.

There stood the large old house, looking just as he had always seen it look.

To all appearances, it was as much deserted now as it had ever been.

When he saw how dark the house was, and how little it was changed in its appearance, the officer abated something in his confidence.

He began to have some doubts now about the matter, and a strange sensation of dread, which he vainly endeavoured to shake off, crept over him.

He was dreadfully oppressed by the sepulchral silence that prevailed about that spot, and more than once he felt inclined to take to his heels, and leave the exploration of that place to his companions.

But he banished his fears, and put on as valiant an exterior as he could.

Then, having once more looked cautiously around him, he crouched down, and crept noiselessly across the lawn.

CHAPTER IV.

JIM LICKFOLD, THE POLICE SPY, DISCOVERS DICK TURPIN'S RETREAT IN THE DESERTED MANSION.

Without disturbing anything but the birds and a few bats, Jim Lickfold reached the deserted mansion.

He felt all right when he was in the shadow of the building, and he drew himself up to his full height.

But he was forced to confess that he had not as yet seen anything to confirm the suspicion he had entertained.

That strange uneasy feeling, too, which had come over him—that feeling which would have come over him had he been alone in a funeral vault, at the hour of midnight, beneath some large cathedral—increased in its intensity.

Forgetful as he was, at the present moment there was not one wild legendary tale which in his boyhood he had heard related concerning the haunted mansion that did not then vividly come before his mind—as vividly as if he only just heard the tale told.

He shivered and his flesh crept upon his bones, while his blood seemed changed to ice, and forced a sluggish progress through his veins.

And strive as he would, the spy could not get the better of these uneasy sensations.

Indeed, he found that while he stood still they increased rather than otherwise.

By a sudden effort he moved, and continued his prowl round the building.

He found at last that when he fixed his mind upon the large reward which was to crown his exertions he was best able to cope with the disagreeable feelings we have mentioned.

It took a long time, but Jim Lickfold made a complete tour round the mansion.

He reached at last the spot from which he had started.

When he paused here, he was forced to admit that he had not been able to see anything that tended in any way to give colour to the suspicions he had entertained.

All was still.

His most vigilant gaze had not been able to detect any sign that the old mansion was inhabited.

But he was getting more used to his situation now, and the nervous dread of he knew not what to a very great extent subsided.

Jim Lickfold was not brave enough to try the fastenings of the doors and windows in order to ascertain whether any of them had been opened lately.

In the daylight he might not have shrunk so much from such a task, but at that dark and midnight hour he felt it to be out of the question.

He would not do it even if he could make sure of obtaining ten times the amount of the reward.

But he could watch and wait.

Crossing the lawn again, he seated himself upon some of the ornamental stonework.

The silence was, however, unbroken.

More than once he felt inclined to give up and search elsewhere, but somehow a voice seemed to whisper to him, "Those you seek are here."

At last the spy felt his position on the stonework an uncomfortable one.

He was tired, and he thought he should be able to watch and wait as well if he laid himself down upon the grass, because he could still command a view of all around him.

He yielded to the temptation.

At first his position was only a half-recumbent one, his body being supported by his right hand and arm, but presently this grew tiresome, and he lay down.

The result may be guessed.

He was off to sleep in an instant.

Worn out as he was by watching, he could not resist the silence and the darkness, both of which were so eminently provocative of slumber.

How long he lay asleep he knew not—indeed, he was unconscious that he was asleep at all, until presently he opened his eyes and found the sun was shining down with full force upon him.

He nearly started to his feet in his surprise, but he recovered his presence of mind almost instantly, and remained quite still.

He found that his body was pretty well concealed by the long grass.

"What had I better do now?" was the first thought that presented itself to him. "Jim Lickfold, this is just like you. Upon my word, you are not worth a d—n!"

It was an odd habit this police officer had of apostrophising himself as though he was addressing some other person.

"Shouldn't wonder now if the game isn't all up; and yet I don't know. Perhaps it has all happened for the best. Now it is daylight, I shall have a much better chance of looking about me, and I shall be able to say for certain whether the old place has been inhabited lately or not. I must be very careful in all my movements, though, for should they be here and I be seen, my life would not be worth a fig. I must be careful, but I will set this matter at rest, I am determined!"

With these words, Jim Lickfold rolled over, and then crawled along like a snake to the friendly shadow of some trees close by.

Under the shadow of these he felt sure he should be able to make his way round the mansion unseen by anyone.

He set forward.

For some time he saw nothing suspicious, although his eyes travelled scrutinisingly over the building from the ground to the roof.

Suddenly, however, he paused.

"Hallo!" he said—"what's that? D—n me if I don't think I have found it all out! Let me have a look at that shutter. It looks to me as though it had been forced open, and lately too!"

The spy had paused just opposite to the shutter of the window through which our friends were wont to make their way into the mansion.

The shutter was closed, and to a less penetrating gaze than that which the spy bent upon it, nothing of an unusual character would have been seen.

But he was on the look-out for certain signs, and he believed he could see some of those that he looked for.

But, ere he could proceed any further in his speculations and meditations, he was interrupted in a manner which to him was as unexpected as it was pleasant.

He saw the shutter upon which he had fixed his eyes slowly opened by some one within the mansion.

As he perceived the movement, he shrank back still further among the trees, although he was already out of sight.

The shutter was opened with great caution, but at length it was fairly pushed back.

Then a fair face became visible at the aperture.

Jim Lickfold gazed upon this seeming vision with wide-open mouth and eyes.

He was powerless to move.

It was Maud who at this early morning hour appeared at the window.

Little did she dream, poor girl, what eyes were fixed upon her.

She believed herself quite safe, and yet she listened intently.

But, as she could hear nothing, she concluded that all was well.

Jim Lickfold guessed in a moment who she was, but he wondered what on earth had brought her there.

To his intense surprise, then, Maud sprang lightly and easily through the window into the garden.

Her errand was one that she never missed.

It was to gather some of the long grass, which grew plentifully everywhere, and give it to Black Bess.

She chose always that early hour, because she believed that was when she was least likely to be seen.

And every morning up to the present she had performed this duty without any prying eye being fixed upon her.

Lightly and easily she tripped away, and became in a minute lost to the view of Jim Lickfold.

He did not dare move, however, in order to see where she had gone, lest she should discover him, and raise an alarm.

This would ruin all, so he had the good judgment to remain just where he was, for, as he rightly imagined, she would speedily return.

He was not disappointed.

Maud was absent only a few minutes, and having gathered plenty of grass, she returned to the house.

Again she looked about her and listened, but the silence gave no token of the presence of the hidden spy.

Alas! poor girl, she little dreamed that they were menaced by a danger of such a terrible description.

She thought all was well, and was therefore in that worst state of all—a state of false security.

With the same fairy-like agility which she had before displayed, Maud leaped through the window, and having done so, closed the shutter carefully, and was lost to sight.

[THE THREE HIGHWAYMEN BECOME ACQUAINTED WITH SOME OF THE SECRETS OF THE OLD HUT ON THE HEATH.]

For quite a moment Jim Lickfold neither moved nor spoke.

"Oh, lor!" he at last ejaculated. "Only think of that now!—only think of that! It's just as I thought, after all! Jim Lickfold, if you will only be careful, your fortune's made, and no mistake! Oh, lor! only think of that! I wonder what she wanted out of doors so early as this?"

It was in vain to speculate upon such a point as this, and the spy soon desisted from doing so, and tried to make up his mind as to what was the best thing he could do.

"Wriggles!—Wriggles! I'll be off and tell old Wriggles! That's what I'll do! Then we shall have them all as safe as nuts! Oh, what a find! I must be a d—d fool, or else I should have thought of this haunted house before, and so old Wriggles will say when I tell him about it, and yet—stop a bit, Jim—stop a bit! Why should I tell him all? I won't—no, that I won't! If I did, I should be a d—der fool than ever! I know now! I'll make it appear that I found it all out by my own cleverness! That's what I'll do. I may as well get all the credit I can!"

With these words the spy relapsed into silence.

But his thoughts were busy if his tongue was not, and he was trying to decide upon the next step he should take.

"We were all to meet at sunrise," he said, "but Jim Lickfold won't be able to keep that appointment. Nevertheless, I'll get back as soon as I can, but I must take care not to be seen. Then, when I get back, I shall be able to give old Wriggles some news that will rather astonish him, and what's more, please him too!"

So saying, the spy assumed his old crouching posture, and crept slowly away, keeping all the time in the shadow of the trees.

Maud was looking out of the window in the room in which she had already spent so many hours.

Her eyes were fixed upon the gardens and the scenery before her, but they were not keen enough to detect the skulking figure that glided from tree to tree.

Jim Lickfold was fully impressed with the importance of the discovery he had made, and the manner in which he crept through the garden was ample proof of it.

Indeed, he made use of twice as much caution as was really necessary; but he can scarcely be blamed for this, as it was a mistake on the right side.

At last he got fairly beyond the precincts of the buildings.

When he was quite sure he was out of the range of vision of any person who might be standing at one of the upper windows, a marked change took place in the manner of his progression.

He started off at a brisk trot, that got over the ground in capital style, and ere long he had the satisfaction of perceiving before him the inn in which he and his companions had temporarily taken up their quarters.

He entered the inn in quite a breathless condition.

"Where's Mr. Wriggles?" he asked the landlord, as soon as ever he was able to speak.

"In bed and asleep."

"Wake him, then!"

"I dare not!"

"Dare not? But I will!"

"Stop—stop!" said the landlord; "Mr. Wriggles came back in a terrible passion and went to his room, locked himself in, and swore he would send a couple of bullets through the door if anyone came to disturb him!"

CHAPTER LVI.

MR. WRIGGLES MAKES UP HIS MIND TO COMMENCE OPERATIONS AT THE DESERTED MANSION BY CAPTURING BLACK BESS.

JIM LICKFOLD was so impatient to make his chief, Mr. Wriggles, acquainted with the unexpected discovery he had made that he had already reached the door opening out of the bar on to the staircase.

But upon receipt of the intimation that he stood a good chance of receiving a couple of bullets for his pains, he stopped short, and took second thoughts upon the matter.

"If that's the case," he said, "I'll see him d—d before I wake him! But it will be a caution to him."

"How so?"

"Why, I have intelligence of the utmost importance to communicate, and when he knows it he will be ready to bite his head off!"

"Then you'd better wake him!"

"Not if I know it."

"But he's such a violent man, you know!"

"He is; and if he had not been quite so violent, he would have learned the news at once. As it is, I sha'n't stir a peg, but wait until he chooses to make his appearance!"

With this, Jim Lickfold sat himself down in the bar with a very dogged air, and called for something to drink.

After all, he thought it would not so much matter if they did wait until night.

Probably if Mr. Wriggles did know, he would not think of making his attack till after dark because then they would be able to approach the mansion unperceived.

Jim Lickfold sat in the bar weighing the matter over in his mind, and at times dropping off into a doze, until at last evening came.

One by one those who had been out upon the night excursion crept downstairs and seated themselves in the bar.

As a matter of course, they had been unsuccessful.

Jim Lickfold was questioned, but his comrades could get nothing out of him.

At last their leader made his appearance.

His countenance looked more purple and irascible than ever.

He glanced round him, and said:

"All here? Oh yes! Well Lickfold, where have you been? When did you come back?"

"About breakfast time. Couldn't get back any sooner!"

"What have you been doing ever since?"

"Sitting here."

"No luck, I s'pose?"

"Oh yes—lots!"

"What do you mean?"

"I've found them."

"F—f—found them?" said Mr. Wriggles, with a roar loud enough to lift the ceiling off.

"Yes."

"Found who?"

"Why, them you want, to be sure!"

Mr. Wriggles sank back into his chair.

But immediately afterwards his face became convulsed with passion.

Starting up, he seized Jim Lickfold by the throat with such violence that he very soon began to turn black in the face.

"What is it you say, villain?—what is it you say?" he shrieked. "You've found them, you say?"

Jim nodded his head desperately.

"You d—d fool!—and you've been sitting here ever since breakfast time!"

Jim nodded again, this time more desperately and spasmodically than before.

"Curse you! I've a good mind to do for you at once!" said Mr. Wriggles, absolutely foaming with rage. "Why couldn't you come and report to me—d—n you! why couldn't you come and report to me? Oh, ten thousand curses! Did ever any man have such natural-born idiots to deal with as I have! If you found them, they are gone by now—gone—gone! and I am done again!"

With these words, Mr. Wriggles let go his hold of Jim Lickfold, and sank back in his chair again, quite exhausted by the violence of his own passion.

Jim Lickfold, too, sank back, looking more dead than alive.

Mr. Wriggles was truly furious.

Jim recovered himself by degrees.

He glared at his superior as though he would like to shoot him, but he was too much knocked up to move.

He gasped painfully for breath.

Mr. Wriggles recovered from his passion, and then he felt that he had been just a little too hasty.

"Where are they, Jim?" he asked, in a mollified tone of voice—"where are they? We will try and find them yet. Where are they, Jim?"

But the appeal was a vain one.

Jim Lickfold felt he was an injured individual.

Instead, then, of making any reply, he pointed his left elbow at Mr. Wriggles, and patted it with his right hand in a defiant, triumphant manner.

What was precisely meant by this would perhaps be hard to say; but Mr. Wriggles looked upon it as a great insult, for his eyes sparkled, and he seemed more than half inclined to renew his attack.

But prudence for once had sufficient power over him to enable him to control his passion.

He recollected, too, that Jim Lickfold had a weak point.

That was an immoderate fondness for port wine and brandy mixed in equal proportions.

But this was too expensive a compound for the police officer to often indulge himself with it, and perhaps that made him like it all the more.

Mr. Wriggles was aware of this, and so he summoned the landlord.

"Bring half a pint of brandy and half a pint of port wine!"

This was done, and the two jugs were placed upon the table.

When Jim Lickfold saw this his face softened.

Mr. Wriggles poured the brandy into the port wine.

"There, Jim," he said, "try that. Forgive and forget, you know I am rather hasty, but we all have our failings."

Had the proffered beverage been anything but what it was, Jim would have refused.

As it was, the temptation was too great.

He took the jug and raised it to his lips.

He drank half of it off at a draught.

"Shake hands and be friends, Jim," said Mr. Wriggles. "I didn't mean no harm."

Jim Lickfold was appeased.

"I don't bear no malice," he said, as he grasped his superior's outstretched hand; "but don't you go for to try that on again!"

"All right. But why didn't you come and tell me at once? It was that which put me out."

"It was your fault," said Jim, in a grumbling tone. "I should have gone right upstairs and told you, but the landlord told me as how you had said you would send a couple of bullets through the door if anyone came near to disturb you."

"So I did, Jim. It's my fault, and I own it, and I can't do more than that, you know."

"Don't say another word, Mr. W.," said Jim, as he took another pull at the delicious beverage.

"Tell us all about it, then."

This Jim did.

We need not trouble the reader with his narrative in full, for events press heavily upon us for speedy recital.

It will be sufficient to say that the account he gave was a wonderful one, so far as his own cleverness and sagacity were concerned.

Mr. Wriggles heard him patiently to the end.

"Now, my lads," he said, "I will tell you what we will do. There are fifteen of us altogether, counting myself, and it will go very hard with us if we are not able to capture them all. You must make up your minds for a little sharp work. But what of it?—better that than have to divide the reward amongst so many."

This was a view of the case which was pleasing enough to the men, and they received the proposal with acclamation.

"We will take our measures carefully, and then we shall succeed. Shut up in this mansion, no doubt they think themselves perfectly secure, so that we shall be able to approach them closely, and then, one sharp tussle, and we shall have them."

'Hurrah!"

Mr. Wriggles ordered brandy-and-water all round.

The fiery beverage was quickly imbibed, and then they were ready to depart.

Jim Lickfold took upon himself to lead the way, and tho airs he assumed were important to a degree.

The distance was really not very great, and so they went on foot, because they would not be troubled with their horses, and because Jim Lickfold could take them by a near cut across some fields.

In a very little while they came in sight of the dilapidated gates.

Like a prudent and skilful general, Mr. Wriggles took a careful and cautious survey of the mansion and its surroundings.

Then he gave the order to advance.

Every precaution was taken that they could think of.

There was nothing either to see or hear that would indicate that the mansion was inhabited.

But on this very night, as we have before remarked, Dick Turpin fancied he was strong enough to set about his task of exploring the mansion, and arriving, if possible, at some solution of the awful sounds which night after night rung in their ears.

Without any incident occurring, Mr. Wriggles and his police officers crept up the avenue and reached the lawn.

No alarm had been given as yet.

"Stay where you are," he said, addressing his men, "and keep a sharp look-out for a few minutes."

Then, addressing himself to Jim Lickfold, he said:

"You, Jim, come with me!"

"All right, Mr. W.!"

"Be cautious! I want you to guide me round this place, and show me the window you spoke of!"

"All right, Mr. W.!" said Jim again.

The chief police officer and his subordinate glided off into the darkness, leaving the others close to the edge of the lawn to watch and wait for their return.

Without the least hesitation, Jim led Mr. Wriggles round to the mansion, and pointed out to him the window through which Maud had made her way.

They paused opposite to this.

"You say she jumped out of there?"

"Like a blessed ancient Roman!"

"Where did she go?"

"That's just what I should like to know. I was afraid to move."

"Well, that's the way in, at all events. Eh? Stop now, Jim, I've just thought of something!"

"Lor, Mr. W.!"

"I have. If these fellows are here——"

"Eh?"

"What do you mean by interrupting me in that manner?"

"You said 'if.'"

"I know I did."

"But there ain't no 'if' about it."

"Oh, d—n you, why don't you pay attention! I say if they are here their horses are here too."

"You're as good as a conjurer, Mr. W.!"

"We must get possession of the horses first, Jim—that will be a fine stroke of generalship!"

"Oh, will it!"

"Of course it will! Shan't we cut off the enemy's retreat?"

"We should."

"Then, first of all, Jim, we will find where the horses are. And, look here, Jim, I've something else to say——"

"What is it?"

"Why, if——"

"Go on."

"I hardly can, I'm so excited. But if Black Bess——"

"Black Bess?"

"Yes. If Black Bess should happen to be with the other horses, and it's more than likely——"

"Oh, yes!"

"Well, if she is, and we can only get hold of her, Jim!"

"What's to prevent us?"

"Nothing that I know of."

"Well, then?"

"If we can get hold of her, she will fetch almost her weight in gold—that she would. Her fellow has got to be foaled yet. I tell you, she will fetch her weight in gold. But we'll keep this little affair to ourselves, Jim—there's no need for the others to know anything about it."

CHAPTER DVII.

JIM LICKFOLD AND MR. WRIGGLES ENTER THE STABLE TO CAPTURE BLACK BESS.

Mr. Wriggles clutched Jim Lickfold convulsively by the arm as he spoke these words in a low whisper.

He was almost breathless with his eagerness; and, if the truth must be told, he felt more excitement about the prospective capture of Black Bess than he did about the capture of her rider.

"Mr. W.!" said Jim—"I'm with you, flesh and bones I'm with you! I always said I was a d—d fool, and now I feel it more so!"

"How, Jim—how?"

"That I did not think of that myself!"

"We can't think of everything, you know, Jim; but come, let us find out if we can where the horses are."

"In some of the outbuildings, you may depend!"

"Oh, no doubt of that! Where are they? You ought to know!"

"I do know!"

"Lead the way, then!"

"Don't be rash, Mr. W., don't be rash! There used to be some stables belonging to this here very place, and daresay they are here still!"

"Of course they are, and that is where we shall find the horses! Go on! Show me the way!"

"We must be cautious!"

"Oh, of course!"

Jim Lickfold crept along in the shadow of the trees for some distance.

Then he stopped, and said:

"There they are, Mr. W.—there they are!"

"Where—where?"

"That long range of building just before us."

"I see! Come on!"

"I will lead the way. We must be careful how we cross this piece of garden, or we may be seen!"

Mr. Wriggles had the good sense to resign the leadership on this occasion to his subordinate

Jim Lickfold took a circuitous route to the point he wished to reach; but, by doing so, he avoided crossing the open space.

Like two spectres, the two police officers glided up to the stable door.

Their hearts beat with anxious suspense.

The door was unfastened.

They opened it slowly.

The interior of the stable was very dark, and they could not so much as see their hands before their faces.

But that state of things was soon remedied.

Mr. Wriggles threw open his coat, and took from his belt a dark lantern, where it had hung suspended.

This was lighted, but the dark slide was over the glass.

He pushed this back, however, in a moment.

A broad stream of light at once dissipated the darkness in the stable.

He waved the light about.

There were the stalls, and a great many of them, too; but those near the door were unoccupied.

A slight movement at one end of the building, however, attracted the attention of the officers, and they turned their eyes in that direction.

But they could see nothing.

"Come on!" said Jim Lickfold, in a whisper—"they are long stables, and there seems to be something at the far end. Come on!"

Mr. Wriggles followed without hesitation.

"There she is!" he suddenly exclaimed—"there she is!"

"Hold your row, Mr. W.—you'll have somebody hear you!"

"But look!"

"I see her!"

It was so.

Mr. Wriggles had indeed caught sight of Dick Turpin's priceless mare, Black Bess.

She was holding her head over one of the divisions of the stalls.

She appeared to be regarding the intruders, for her eye seemed strangely expanded, while her ears were laid flat back upon her neck.

She had altogether a very vicious look.

But how could she defend herself? or, rather, how would she be able to know that those who were approaching were her master's deadly enemies?

How was Turpin to defend her?

How was he to know that his foes were about to seize his mare, and cut off, by so doing, all possibility of his making his escape?

Surely Mr. Wriggles could not do otherwise than succeed in this portion of his undertaking.

But he paused just where he was, and so did Jim Lickfold.

"She looks an uncommon vicious brute," said the latter—"that's what she does!"

"I don't like her looks at all!"

"Don't funk, Mr. W.—don't funk! You are not frightened of a horse, surely?"

"Oh no—no!"

"Come on, then, and we'll soon have her! But we goes halves in this little affair!"

"Certainly!"

"Very good, then! Here goes! You hold the light, and I'll soon have her out!"

"Be careful!"

"Don't mention it. I knows what horses is!"

With these words, Jim approached the stall in which Black Bess was standing.

Alas! When the gallant creature is in the hands of the police, what is to become of Dick Turpin?

Wounded, weak, and almost defenceless—with Maud to protect and shield from injury as well as himself, what can save him?

How can he avoid falling an easy prey into the hands of his insatiate foes?

How, even, is he to know, until too late, that any enemies are near—that he is in danger of having an attack made upon him?

Under no circumstances could his position be worse than it was.

We confess we tremble for his safety.

Cautiously, and yet quickly, Jim Lickfold approached the stall and glided up to the manger.

Mr. Wriggles followed, holding the light.

Jim put out his hand to seize Black Bess.

He did not doubt that he should succeed.

But whether it was that Black Bess had some instinctive dislike to being handled by strangers, or whether she was alarmed by this intrusion into the stable, or whether, indeed, she recognised those two men as enemies of her master, we really cannot tell; but let the cause be what it might, certain is it that she rewarded Mr. Lickfold with a sharp bite upon the arm for his attempt to grasp her mane.

He uttered an awful howl, which was alone enough to frighten any horse.

Black Bess gave a loud snort, and struck out wildly with her four legs all at once.

Then, turning round in the stall with great suddenness, to the further discomfiture of Jim Lickfold, she made a wild rush out of the stable.

Mr. Wriggles turned round and made an effort to escape.

But Black Bess was quicker then he was.

She struck him violently in the back with her fore feet.

Down he went, and the mare rushed after him.

In less than a second, Black Bess reached the stable door.

Then she gave one bound, and immediately disappeared in the darkness of the night.

The oaths and curses that came from the lips of the two discomfited police officers were really awful.

The bite which Jim Lickfold had received was a severe and painful one, and he had, moreover, received some very sharp kicks.

As for Mr. Wriggles, he felt bruised to death by the mare's iron-bound feet, and unable to move a limb.

After he and his companion had relieved themselves by swearing tremendously, he struggled to his feet.

Jim Lickfold scrambled up at the same moment.

They had quite exhausted themselves with swearing, and could not keep up that amusement any longer, so they spoke like rational beings.

"Oh, Mr. W.!" said Jim Lickfold, ruefully, "what shall I do! Oh, murder! That infernal brute has bitten a piece clean out of my arm!"

"Hold your row!" was the reply. "It was your own fault! Why didn't you catch hold of her?"

"Catch be d—d! She laid hold of me in a minute. Where is she?"

"Gone! She galloped over me, and nearly trampled me to death!"

"But she cannot have got right away?"

"I will lay you ten to one you don't so much as clap eyes on the varmint! She's gone—as good a two thousand pounds as ever was coined!"

Here followed a fresh volley of maledictions.

They went to the door of the stable.

But the darkness was most intense, and they could not so much as catch a glimpse of bonny Black Bess.

She had successfully resisted the attack which had been made upon her liberty, and was now far away in the grounds surrounding the mansion.

"Just as I told you," said Mr. Wriggles. "She's vanished—vanished, and left no trace behind!"

"Well, it's a bad job, and can't be helped. Just bind up my arm, will you? We must make the best of it, I suppose."

Wriggles swore.

"I wish you'd had this bite on the arm instead of me! It's all your own fault, for if you had not proposed it I should never have thought of capturing the beast!"

"Bind your arm up yourself, then, and be d—d to you!"

"Come—come, Mr. Wriggles! No offence—no offence, you know, but when you have a bad hurt it puts you out of temper! I don't mean anything."

Mr. Wriggles tied up Jim's arm, which was bleeding profusely, for Black Bess had stuck her teeth into it to some purpose.

"Come, come, Mr. W., don't be downhearted over losing a horse! The best part of the game remains yet! If we can only catch the highwaymen themselves we need not regret losing their horses!"

"I will try to-night," said Mr. Wriggles, with desperate resolution. "I have tried before, but all my previous efforts shall be as just nothing at all in comparison with what I shall do to-night."

"That's the way to go to work with! You keep in that mind, and we shall be bound to succeed! Come along! Lean upon me, and we will rejoin those we left waiting on the lawn. They will wonder what on earth has become of us."

"They will say we have lost a great deal of valuable time and done no good after all."

"Never mind! Don't be downhearted! I shouldn't care a d—n if it wasn't for my arm!"

"How did it happen?"

"Curse me if I can tell you! When she let me enter the stable and pass up to the manger so quietly, I fancied I should have no trouble at all, so I reached out my hand to take hold of her forelock, when all of a sudden she nipped hold of me, then she kicked out, and down I went, and that's all I know about it!"

"Hush—hush!"

"What is the matter?"

"Is not that the window you pointed out to me?"

"Yes, that is it."

"Then I think I cannot do better than keep an eye upon it."

"It might be as well."

"You go back to those on the lawn, and bring them all here as quietly as you can. In the meantime I will make up my mind how to act."

"All right!"

Grumbling and groaning, cursing and swearing, Jim Lickfold made his way back to those police officers who were left on the lawn.

They wondered, of course, what ever could have been the cause of his long absence, but Jim was not in the humour to gratify their curiosity, and remained silent.

In less than a moment they joined their leader.

"All right, boys! The time of action has come! Follow me quietly, and I will show you the way."

Mr. Wriggles glided across to the shutter.

His men followed like shadows.

A touch showed the police officers that the shutter was unfastened.

He opened it instantly.

There was no obstacle to his gaining admission.

It seemed rather strange for the police officers to be grouped round that window like so many burglars.

They were perfectly silent, and just as stealthy as any midnight robbers possibly could be.

But Mr. Wriggles wanted to gain admission without making the least sound that would give the alarm to those within.

The services of his lantern were again brought into requisition, and by the aid of its light he and his followers scrambled into the little chamber from which it opened.

CHAPTER DVIII.

MR. WRIGGLES AND HIS OFFICERS SUCCEED IN EFFECTING AN ENTRANCE INTO THE DESERTED MANSION.

"HUSH!" said Mr. Wriggles, in a faint whisper. "Are you all here?"

"Yes—yes."

"Close the shutters, then."

This was done.

"Now, my lads, be cautious! I want us to try if we cannot steal upon these fellows unawares! Come quietly,—we will creep on tip-toe until we come to the room in which they are, and then we will bounce in upon them!"

"Hurrah!"

"Hush—hush! Don't make a noise, or you will give the alarm!"

"All right!"

There was but one door leading out of the little chamber, and this they quickly opened under the commands of their superior.

The passage leading into the hall was beyond.

Along this they crept.

But before we follow them any further, we must return to Dick Turpin and Maud.

Is not their position of such a perilous nature as to demand our utmost and immediate attention?

Surely, yes, for by what means can they possibly hope to escape from their foes on this occasion?

We shall see to what extent Fortune favoured them.

It was, then, as we have already said, on this night that Dick set about exploring every nook and corner in the mansion.

Dick busied himself during the whole day in making his preparations.

He had four pistols and a slender stock of ammunition.

He loaded his weapons carefully, and he stowed the powder and ball about his person, so that he could readily reload his pistols, should a necessity arise for his doing so.

There was one small piece of candle, too, which he had carefully hoarded up, and which he hoped would be sufficient to enable him to make his researches.

He had made up his mind to wait until he heard the sound, and then immediately descend; but, strange to say, he waited till long past the usual hour without the cry making itself heard.

This was strange, but Dick resolved, nevertheless, not to forego his intention, but to carry it into effect.

Fain would he have persuaded Maud to remain in the chamber while he pursued his investigations alone, but she refused to listen for a moment to any such proposition.

"No!" she said. "Where you go I go!"

"But think, dearest; some horrible sight, too awful for you to look upon, may——"

"No matter! Let it be what it might, it could not be worse than remaining here without you!"

"Well, you have a bold heart, and so you shall accompany me. Perhaps it will be better that we should be together."

Dick Turpin afterwards had occasion to congratulate himself upon not leaving Maud in the upper room.

"We will start now," he said. "Perhaps before we have gone far we shall hear the sound again."

"I am ready."

"Come, then, and call up all your courage, for probably there are some strange discoveries awaiting us."

With these words, Dick passed Maud's arm beneath his own, and the pair crossed the room and emerged upon the landing.

Here, more from habit than aught else, they paused and listened.

But the silence of the very grave itself filled the deserted mansion.

They then commenced the descent of the stairs, nor did they pause until they reached the landing from which opened the ante-room leading to the old armoury.

Dick had said nothing about this being his destination, but from the manner in which he paused and handled his pistols, he evidently had intended it should be.

"Now, call all your fortitude to your aid," he said. "We know full well that there is one horrible sight to be seen in yonder room; but you have seen that once, and therefore it is shorn of half its horrors. I am convinced, however, that it is in this direction that we must look for the solution of all the horrible sounds we have heard."

Maud trembled.

"You are terrified already," Dick said. "Do you not think that it would be better to remain alone? Do not ask me to give up this enterprise, for I have set my heart upon it."

"I had no thoughts of making such a request," was the reply. "I shivered I know, but I fancy it was more from cold than aught else."

"Come, then. There is a draught here, I know. Let us enter the old armoury, and——Ha! What is that? Hush—hark!"

These last words were hurriedly spoken, and Dick sunk his voice to a whisper while he uttered them.

"I heard nothing!" said Maud.

"Hush—hush! Oh, hush!"

Dick Turpin assumed an attitude of intense listening, and bent over the balustrade.

Dreading she knew not what, Maud followed his example.

We have elsewhere stated that the staircase was so constructed that anyone looking over the balustrade could see down on to the floor of the hall beneath.

Dick looked down, but of course he could see nothing.

It was like looking down some well.

But though he could not see he listened.

All was still, however, and he raised his head.

"I must have been mistaken!" he said, anticipating Maud's anxious inquiry. "And yet——"

"Yet what?"

"I could almost stake my life I was not."

"What did you fancy you heard?"

"A faint sound as of footsteps, and a murmur as of voices in low but earnest conversation."

Maud's lips parted, and she with difficulty suppressed a cry of alarm.

"Hush!" said Dick.

But the caution was not needed.

"Oh!" she cried, "you terrify me."

"Nay, do not be too much alarmed."

"But whispering voices. Your foes——"

"Do not jump too hastily at conclusions, dear one. As we are well aware, this house is full of strange noises—we have ample evidence of that, and we ought not to allow even such sounds as I have just heard, or fancied I heard, to too much alarm us."

"But I am terrified!"

"Be calm—be calm—pray be calm! It may be—and indeed it is very likely—that what we heard was but the echo of our own voices!"

"And the footsteps?"

"No, it could not be that, for we were standing still at the time. Hush!—hark! There it is again!"

Both were now profoundly silent.

Again there came upon their ears the same whispering sound—for Dick's sense of hearing, which was wonderfully acute, had not deceived him.

Anxiously and eagerly they again bent over the balusters.

This time Dick Turpin took the precaution to conceal, as well as he could, the light which he carried.

He looked down.

But, as before, there was nothing to be seen.

The whispering sound of voices came, however, most unmistakably upon their ears.

They listened with suspended breath.

Dick felt the life-blood congeal about his heart as the supposition occurred to him that those persons who were evidently whispering below were his foes

That was, indeed, the most probable of all suppositions.

If so, what was he to do?

Still he was disinclined to think that they were officers.

Having kept indoors so close as he had, how could they possibly have discovered his retreat?

And if they were officers below, they must have done so; for were they not endeavouring to steal upon him unawares—had they not made a surreptitious entry?

Dick was fairly bewildered.

Had it not been for the strange sounds he had already heard, he would scarcely have hesitated a moment in saying that they were officers.

And now he was doubtful.

Perplexed and puzzled, he still looked over the balusters, straining his senses of vision and hearing to the utmost.

Suddenly, he caught sight of a faint ray of light.

Maud saw it as well as himself.

It was only for a moment that he saw it.

It disappeared instantly, and then all was as dark as before.

He drew back.

"I can stand this no longer!" he said—"I must and will know the meaning of all this! Remain here for a moment, dear one, and I will run down the stairs and find out what it is!"

Maud clung to him, but did not speak.

"Release me!" he said, again. "I will promise you not to run into any danger! I will creep downstairs silently, and, as soon as I find out whether officers are really below, I will come back again. There will be no danger!"

Maud let go.

"You are sure you will only descend low enough to find out what it is and then, when you have done this, you will return?"

"I promise."

"Go, then!"

Dick Turpin needed no second bidding.

He gave the little taper to Maud, and glided down the stairs like a spirit.

He was cautious to a degree.

But he did not pause until he reached the first landing.

The whispering sounds still came from below, but with so much additional loudness, that it was impossible to mistake their character.

Dick descended a step or two lower, until he could command a tolerable view of the whole of the entrance hall.

A faint light attracted his attention.

He soon was able to distinguish a mass of dark forms.

They were going from door to door.

Of course the reader will know from what has gone before that these were Mr. Wriggles and his officers.

After gaining the hall, as we have already described, they gave as good a look around them as the light of the lantern would allow them to take.

Then, going to the different doors, which opened out of the hall, they tried them all in succession, and found every one fast.

They were thus engaged when Turpin looked down upon them.

Still Dick felt so sure that the officers could not have penetrated the secret of his presence in the mansion that he was loth to think that the shadowy figures were those of his foes.

He was very little inclined to superstition, and yet he would more readily have believed that they were spectres than police.

Just as he made this reflection, however, the dark mass made a sudden movement.

Then he heard a voice, the accents of which were familiar, say, in a low tone:

"Come on, my lads! We must look a little further! They ain't anywhere upon the ground floor, I'll take my David! Be careful! We will go upstairs and try the doors above! We are sure to have them at last!"

It was Mr. Wriggles who spoke.

There was no mistaking the thick voice.

Dick had heard it too often to be mistaken now.

It came upon him like a revelation.

For a moment he seemed stunned.

How could his old pertinacious enemy have found him out?

That was a mystery to Dick.

But he was roused to his senses by the officers approaching the foot of the staircase.

Before he could move, however, and get away, a broad beam of light from the dark lantern was flashed up the staircase.

Dick was confident that most of the rays fell upon him.

He turned and fled.

A loud shout let him know that he had been seen.

"There he is!" roared Mr. Wriggles, for it was he who had directed the light of the lantern to the upper part of the staircase. "there he is! Quick, my lads—quick! Now we have him! At last we have him! I will wager my life that was Dick Turpin! After him—quickly, or he may escape! There is a thousand pounds to be earned by his apprehension alive or dead! Quicker—quicker, I say, or we shall be too late and he will escape! Quicker—quicker!"

CHAPTER DIX.

DICK TURPIN'S POSITION BECOMES MORE CRITICAL AND PERILOUS EVERY MOMENT.

UTTERING these whirling, incoherent words in a screaming voice and at the top of his lungs, under the belief that by so doing he was stimulating his men to make increased exertions, Mr. Wriggles, with the lantern in one hand and a loaded pistol in the other, bounded up the staircase at a speed which, considering the bulk of his body, was most miraculous.

His men followed him very closely.

There was no fear of their impeding each other's motions, for the staircase was quite spacious enough to allow double their number to ascend it.

But Mr. Wriggles found that his breath was not equal to shouting and running upstairs at the same time; and, as he was obliged to discontinue the one or the other, of course he dropped the former.

Maud echoed Mr. Wriggles's cries with a scream.

she was almost ready to faint with terror.

But in less than a moment Dick Turpin was by her side.

"Come!" he said, breathlessly—"quick—quick! as you value your life and mine!"

Maud wanted no urging.

"Where shall we go?" she asked. "How can we escape? Alas! there is no hope—you will be captured!"

"Peace—peace! This way, and then I will make up my mind what to do!"

As he spoke, he dragged Maud through the door of the ante-room.

The reader will remember that the lock had been blown off the door by a pistol.

Nevertheless, as soon as he had crossed the threshold, Dick Turpin closed the door.

He ran his hand along its edge, and near the top his fingers encountered a bolt.

To shoot it into the socket took him but a second.

Quick as thought, he stooped down and found another bolt near the bottom of the door.

This he also slipped into the socket.

He drew a breath of relief.

He had placed a barrier between himself and his foes.

It was a slight one, and would, no doubt, be easily demolished· but still it gave him time for a little reflection.

Maud clung to him, completely overcome by terror.

"What—oh! what shall we do?" she said. "Hark to the cries of that dreadful man! Listen to their footsteps! How fast they are coming up the stairs! In another moment, at the most, they will reach the door. Oh! what are we to do? How are we to escape?"

"That's what I was trying to think, only you confuse me just a little."

Maud understood this was a reproach, and became instantly silent.

Dick's thoughts were busy, and he looked about him anxiously.

He could not, however, see any outlet of escape.

He had had the start of his foes, and he had ascended the stairs more rapidly than they had been able to do, but by this time they were very close indeed to the door.

There was just a chance that they would pass it, in their haste, and continue their way upwards, in which event he would stand a chance of slipping down to the ground floor, where his means of escape could not help but be increased.

This hope, however, was such a faint one that he could not count upon it.

Still, he listened to the approach of his foes breathlessly.

All the while, his thoughts were active in the extreme.

Maud clung to his arm tightly; but she uttered no sound now.

She only gazed, as well as the feeble light of the candle would allow her, into the countenance of her husband, with her features rigid with alarm.

"Stop!" said the thick voice Dick knew so well—"stop—here they are, or I am mistaken!"

The police officers came to a halt on the landing just outside the door of the ante-room.

"Yes, this must be it! Down with the door—down with it!"

Dick waited to hear no more.

There was but one place into which he could retreat

That was the old armory.

He darted rapidly into it, dragging Maud with him.

The inner door was very much broken, but he placed it in its position as well as he could.

Some heavy blows were struck upon the door opening upon the landing, and then some words were uttered, but what they were Dick did not pause to listen.

Dick had gained the armory, but that, under the most sanguine view of things, could scarcely be called an advantage.

He had succeeded in getting away from his foes so far, it is true, but he had taken refuge in a place from which there was no mode of exit save the one at which the officers now stood.

He had taken refuge in a place which did not either possess any capabilities of defence.

He could not stand a siege there, because there was no barricade that he could place between himself and his enemies.

A succession of rapid, heavy blows were now dealt upon the door, which, if continued, must soon shatter it from its hinges.

Dick pressed his hand to his head.

Such a scene as the present was too much for his exhausted mental and bodily powers.

Where to turn—where to look for the least loop-hole of escape he knew not.

He seemed to have no other alternative than that of seeking refuge in the armory.

And yet, at the same time, he knew full well that he and his three comrades had made a close and searching examination of that very apartment, and had failed to discover any mode of egress from it.

Then they had plenty of time for the search and nothing to distract their attention.

Probability pointed very strongly to the conclusion that there must be some means of egress, but if it was so well concealed as to escape a search instituted under such circumstances, how could Dick hope that it would be revealed to him when his brain was in a whirl?

It was absurd to think of such a thing.

Bang, bang, bang!

Louder and louder—fiercer and fiercer came the blows upon the door.

"We have but one hope, Maud!" said Turpin—"only one frail chance of escape! Do you hear me, dear one?"

"Yes—yes! I hear you! What is it?" said Maud, faintly.

"Do you think you are calm enough to assist me?"

"Yes—yes! I am—I will be!"

"That is well. Now listen to me—to our only chance!"

"Oh, speak!"

"Take the candle, then! There, that will do! Now search about narrowly on every side for some mode of exit from this place. I believe a concealed exit exists! If you find it quickly, all will be well!"

"Yes—yes! And you?"

"Never mind me."

"Tell me what you will do?"

"I will keep them at bay for a few minutes! Fear not that I shall fail, or that I shall be in any danger! Do not throw away our only hope!"

"I will not!"

Maud spoke faintly but collectedly.

Dick did not have any misgivings on her account.

He rushed to the door of the armory.

His sole object now was to gain time.

He reached the ante-room only just in time.

Had he been a moment later the chance would have been lost.

The door was almost down.

"Hold!" he cried, in a tone of voice so loud that it rose clear and distinct above all other sounds. "Hold, I say!"

The blows ceased as if by enchantment.

There was for a moment the silence of the grave on the other side of that door.

Not a word was spoken—not a movement made.

At last Mr. Wriggles recovered himself sufficiently to say:

"Who is that?"

This was a needless question.

He knew full well who it was that spoke, for Turpin's voice once heard could ever after be recognised.

"I, Dick Turpin!" was the reply.

"Here he is, my lads!" said Mr. Wriggles, with a triumphant chuckle, addressing himself to his men. "I told you we should have him!"

"Who are you?" asked Dick. "What do you want?"

"Ha, ha! That's a good one!" said Jim Lickfold.

"Surrender—surrender, Dick—surrender!" shouted Mr. Wriggles. "I know that's what you've made up your mind to do, because you cannot hold out any longer! It's sensible of you, Dick! Give in handsomely, and spare us all further trouble, and you will have no cause to regret it!"

"Who are you?" bawled Dick again.

"Zounds! you know very well who we are!" roared Mr. Wriggles. "We are officers—his Majesty's officers o police! and we call upon you to surrender in the name of his Majesty the King!"

"And if I surrender, what then?"

"You cannot do better than to give in. Our strict orders are to take you dead or alive! Make a virtue of necessity, Dick, and surrender! You cannot escape. We have you safe!"

"Will you treat me well if I give in without any resistance?"

"Yes, yes—depend upon it we will! You will find it will answer your purpose to allow us to earn the reward as quietly as possible, but we are determined to have it one way or the other!"

"Well, you have taken me at unawares, Mr. Wriggles! I confess that."

"Ha, ha!"

"You have, in fact, run me up into a corner!

"Ha, ha, ha!" said Mr. Wriggles, more triumphantly still. "I knew I should have you sooner or later!"

"I am in this place, and can't get out, without you like to let me!"

"Good, good!"

"So, if I surrender, will you promise to use me well?"

"Yes—yes."

"That is, if I behave handsomely to you, you will behave handsomely to me?"

"Haven't I told you so?"

"You have."

"Then, what more do you want?"

This was an unanswerable question.

Dick was puzzled how to prolong the conversation further.

He looked back.

Maud had not discovered the secret exit yet.

He began to despair.

He feared, after all, that he should be captured.

Mr. Wriggles and his men, too, were exceedingly delighted to find, as they thought, that Dick Turpin was hesitating whether he should or should not give himself up to them.

To be sure, by one rush they could demolish the door and capture the highwaymen, but in the event of their succeeding, one or more of their number would be sure to receive some fatal injuries.

But if he gave himself up, there would be an end to all risk, and they would preserve their carcasses whole as well.

It was this which made them willing to parley, for had they not received from the highwayman himself the admission that he was driven up in a corner?

"Come, Dick," said Mr. Wriggles, after a very long pause, "let us know what you mean to do! Say the word one way or the other! It's no good dallying here!"

"But I feel it to be a serious matter."

"Oh, stuff!"

"I do, I assure you."

Just at this moment Maud came running from the armory.

Her step was light and rapid.

There was no need for her to speak

One glance into her countenance was sufficient to let Dick Turpin know that she had succeeded.

He turned in an instant to the door.

"Mr. Wriggles?" he said.

"Yes. Are you going to give in? Say so at once! I won't wait any longer!"

"Grant me one favour, Mr. Wriggles! It's a serious matter, you know! Just give me three minutes to make up my mind in—only three minutes, you know! It can't make any difference to you, because, at the end of the three minutes you will be just as well able to knock down the door, and will stand just as good a chance of capturing me as you do now!"

CHAPTER DX.

WRIGGLES AND HIS OFFICERS FOLLOW DICK TURPIN TO THE VAULTS.

Mr. Wriggles rather demurred to this demand.

But eventually the desire of capturing Dick Turpin without bloodshed, and without fear of personal consequences, induced him to say yes.

"Very well, then," said Dick; "at the end of that time I shall have fully considered my position, and I will tell you whether I will give in or whether I will fight it out to the last!"

Of course, Dick Turpin had no such intention.

The moment the last words had left his lips, he seized Maud by the arm, and hurried her to the far end of the armory.

"Have you found the secret door?"

"Yes—yes! Here it is!"

"Where?"

"In that corner!"

Maud pointed to an adjacent corner.

Here Dick saw a narrow door standing open.

He rushed towards it.

"Stay—stay!" cried Maud. "Be careful—oh, be careful, or you will fall! I had a narrow escape myself. That door opens upon a flight of steep stone steps, that seem to lead down into the bowels of the earth!"

The caution came only just in time.

Dick narrowly escaped a fall.

"Come—come!" he said; "we must make the best use we can of the three minutes' grace I have been lucky enough to obtain!"

"I am ready."

"Come, then, and I will close the door. How came you to discover it?"

"By chance, just as I was about to give up in despair."

"You must give me the particulars when there is an opportunity."

While speaking these words, Dick Turpin assisted Maud through the narrow secret door in one corner of the room; and as soon as she was by his side upon the steps he closed the door after him.

He pulled it to hastily, and in his anxiety to descend the steps did not notice that he had failed to fasten it securely.

The spring which held the door fast in its frame was rusty with long disuse.

In ignorance of this, Dick descended the steps.

They were spiral in shape and slippery with damp.

Fear lent speed to their feet, and they descended with wonderful rapidity.

A damp, earthy smell saluted their nostrils.

In a little while, Dick felt sure they had reached the level of the ground, but still the steps showed no signs of a termination.

Down they went, with even greater swiftness than before, until their brains grew dizzy.

Soon they were, as Dick felt firmly convinced, far below the level of the earth.

Where these steps could lead them, or for what purpose they had been constructed, he could not imagine.

Nor could he tell whether he had in any way improved his situation further than by getting a greater distance from his enemies.

For aught he knew, the steps might terminate in some vault.

He reached the termination somewhat abruptly.

They were brought up suddenly by a small, strong-looking door, which was placed right along the foot of the steps.

This door was set in a low stone arch.

Dick's heart almost ceased to beat when the thought occurred to him that he was trapped in a well, as it were, for he made sure the door was fast.

He had not really the heart to try whether it was or not.

But Maud, whose presence of mind had not deserted her, did so.

She turned a handle, and the door opened.

A charnel-house sort of smell came through it, but this they heeded not.

Dick was almost overcome by this sudden occurrence, so different as it was to what he had expected.

He stepped across the threshold instantly, and Maud as well.

They found themselves still on some steps, but they were only two or three in number.

They led down into a vault.

Dick saw this at a glance, and, having done so, turned round to the door.

A cry of joy escaped his lips as soon as he had closed it.

The fastenings were all on the side on which he stood.

With eager haste, he shot the massive bolts into their sockets.

[THE THREE HIGHWAYMEN MEET UNEXPECTEDLY WITH AN OLD ACQUAINTANCE.]

There was a thick bar and a chain, and these he also placed across the door, and when he had done so he felt that, taking all things into consideration, he was tolerably secure.

The only thing that remained was to find some outlet from the vaulted chamber or corridor in which he stood, though he could not help feeling very doubtful whether anything of the kind existed.

But as soon as he had secured the door, he hastened to Maud, and, placing his arm around her waist, he said:

"I think we may congratulate ourselves upon being fortunate so far, dearest. Cheer up! I begin to think that all will yet be well."

"Do you?"

"I do indeed! I look upon our position as being a doubly-safe one. That door would withstand a good attack. Look how strong it is, and then you must recollect that we have left no clue behind us as to the way we have come, and it is too much to suppose that those thick-headed police officers, who allowed me to get the better of them so easily, would find out the secret door, and——"

"Hush!" said Maud, her very lips turning white. "Hush! What is that? They have found the secret door! They are descending the steps! They come—they come!"

Thus were Dick's felicitations upon his escape interrupted.

He pressed his arm more firmly round Maud's waist, who leant against him half frightened to death, for she too had begun to think that all was well.

But there could be no doubt whatever about the nature of the sounds, and what produced them.

The police officers were tumultuously descending the steps.

Dick held his pistol negligently in his right hand.

He listened to the rapid approach of his foes with some anxiety depicted upon his countenance, though he had faith in the power of the door to resist any attack that might be made upon it.

His anxiety chiefly arose from the fact that he could feel that the end of his strength was reached.

He was but feeble at the best, and by no means equal to the exertion he had gone through, and now he felt a dreadful sensation of weakness seize upon him.

He strove to combat it as well as he could.

From the appearance of the vault, too, and the close, peculiar smell of the atmosphere within it, he began to fear that it was a vault and nothing more, and that there was no outlet from it.

If this should prove to be the case, his position was most desperate.

Even if the door withstood all the attacks that were made upon it, and proved impregnable, how then?

He would be as badly off as before.

The police officers could have no doubt about where he was, since the steps led to nowhere else save to the door of the vault.

They would have to surrender to their foes at the last, or else submit to the even worse alternative of remaining where they were, and perishing by a lingering death—starvation!

And so, in a dreadful state of weakness, with all these thoughts pressing at once upon his brain, Dick Turpin stood upon the stone steps just within the door of the vault, listening despairingly to the sounds which indicated the rapid approach of his foes.

One word now as to Mr. Wriggles.

When about two out of the three minutes had expired, the chief police officer felt some one touch him on the arm, and a voice say:

"Mr. W.—Mr. W.!"

"What is it, Lickfold?" he asked, as he turned round and saw who it was that had addressed him.

"You'll excuse me, Mr. Wriggles, I hope, but I feel——"

"Speak out."

"The conviction is stealing over me that this here blessed move about giving hisself up is a do—a swindle—a regular sell! He don't mean nothing of the sort!"

"I feel so, too!"

"Do you? Then depend upon it we are right!"

"I'll call him!"

"Do."

Mr. Wriggles did.

But no answer was returned, for just then Dick was rushing down the stone steps for his life.

"Didn't I say so, Mr. W.!" said Jim Lickfold. "We are done again! Done as brown as hammers! He's sold us! It's no go!"

"Down with the door!" yelled Wriggles, like a maniac.

"Down with it! Down——"

He suited the action to the word.

As he spoke, he gave a tremendous rush forward.

His men seconded him.

The crash with which they all came against the door was tremendous.

It was before almost trembling in its frame, and it was unable to withstand such a vigorous assault as that.

Down it went, and the officers too.

But with a celerity that was almost laughable, they one and all scrambled to their feet.

That must have been a wonderful lantern, for Mr. Wriggles still held it in his hand, and the light streamed forth through the lens as brightly as ever.

He waved it up and down.

Then uttering a loud cry, he sprang forward, calling out to his men to follow him.

In another instant they reached the armoury.

Mr. Wriggles waved the lantern again.

"Quick my lads, quick, quick! We shall have him now after all. This way, this way, I will——!"

Mr. Wriggles ceased abruptly.

In rushing along the armoury he came suddenly upon the two dead bodies which lay there in so singular a manner.

He stumbled, and such was his blind haste and confusion, that he could not recover himself, but went sprawling over the obstruction.

His men were too close behind to stop when they saw their leader fall, and the consequence was, they all fell headlong over him.

It was quite a minute before they could extricate themselves and get upon their feet again.

When the chief officer rose he was mad with rage, and with his drawn sword in his hand he rushed at his followers.

"Gently, gently, Mr. W.!" cried Jim Lickfold at the top of his voice. "Gently, gently! It was your fault! What did you fall over?"

These words changed the current of Mr. Wriggles's thoughts, and he began to search upon the floor, by the aid of his lantern.

He was not long in discovering the two bodies, or rather the remains of them, for they had almost crumbled away.

Still, the sight was so disgusting and horrible a one that they turned away loathingly after bestowing one hasty glance upon it.

"Come along, come along!" roared Wriggles, "Don't forget what you have to do! This way, I say!"

Rapidly, and yet skilfully, the chief police officer waved his lantern so that the bright beam of light rested for a second or so upon every object.

They were, however, unable to see any mode of exit from the armoury.

A more rigid examination, however, disclosed the secret door which Maud had been so fortunate as to discover.

It will be remembered that Dick had pulled this door after him, but in his haste did not notice that it did not properly fasten.

The spring was rusty, and the door remained slightly ajar.

While in this condition, the officers could hardly fail to notice it.

The shout of triumph to which they all gave utterance may perhaps be imagined.

Convinced that they were beyond doubt upon the right track, and that there was a strong probability of their being able after all to effect their purpose, the whole party rushed down the steps in a manner which showed that they were perfectly reckless of personal consequences.

In a few moments they stood before the door at the bottom of the staircase.

CHAPTER DXI.

TOM KING WATCHES THE TWO MURDERERS DISPOSE OF THE DEAD BODY.

It now becomes our duty to return to Tom King, whom we last left peering through the window of the hut on the confines of the New Forest.

He saw that the hag carried something in her hand, but what it was he could not tell until she threw it on the table.

He then perceived that it was a jacket such as would be worn by a naval officer.

There was nothing peculiar or singular in this, to all appearance, but Tom was convinced there was by the old woman's demeanour.

She glanced around her quickly and inquisitively, and then, satisfied apparently that all was well, she commenced a rapid examination of the pockets of the coat.

The first article she produced was a leather bag of tolerable size.

The hag's eyes gleamed with additional lustre as they fell upon this object, and a horrible chuckling laugh came from her lips.

She held the bag in her two hands caressingly for a moment, and then she untied the string by which it was secured.

From the appearance of it, Tom could tell that this bag contained money, and therefore he was in no way surprised when he saw the old woman hold it up and pour out a large number of guineas upon the table.

With trembling fingers she proceeded to count them, and place them one by one in little piles.

Tom watched her for some time, but the old woman still continued her occupation, and the probability was that she would do so for some time.

Accordingly, Tom King felt that it would be useless for him to remain there any longer, and he crept off round the cottage, in the hope of making some further discoveries.

He stopped himself suddenly, and crouched down upon the ground.

A door was opened, and it was a thousand wonders he was not discovered.

But he sank down just in time.

Through the doorway came the dusky figure of a man.

He paused a few paces from the threshold, and listened intently.

"All is silent enough to-night!" he said, in a harsh, grating voice.

He peered about him, and then went back to the doorway.

"Is all well?" said a suppressed voice from within.

"Yes, all's well!"

"Take hold, then!"

"Where's old Poll?"

"Never mind her!"

"She's counting the swag, I'd lay my life!"

"So would I—but take hold! Make haste! We must get back as soon as we can."

"Yes—yes, or else we shall miss some of the swag!"

"Shall I make her come with us?"

"No—no. She had better stop and mind the place."

"As you like. Have you got hold?"

"Yes. Are you ready?"

"Quite."

"Come on, then, and shut the door after you!"

Two men now emerged from the doorway, carrying between them some heavy object.

Tom King strained his eyes to the utmost in his anxiety not to lose sight of what was going on.

They were tolerably accustomed to the obscurity already, and he could see things which would have been invisible to persons coming out of the light.

The two men moved away rapidly.

The object they carried appeared to be enveloped in a sack.

Tom did not know how it was, but strangely enough the idea took possession of his mind and would not be removed that this object was nothing more nor less than a dead body.

There was nothing to lead him to this conclusion, and yet he was as sure he was right as he was of his existence at that moment.

It now became necessary that he should follow these men, and ascertain where they went and what they did.

To do this would require the exercise of no ordinary amount of caution, for the silence was profound, and the least noise came upon the ear with remarkable clearness.

The men, if their errand was what Tom believed it was, would be more than ordinarily careful, and the cracking of a twig would rouse their suspicions, and make them think that they were followed.

But Tom King believed that he was equal to the task which he had set himself.

No Indian could have crawled along the ground more stealthfully or quietly than he did.

His eyes he kept continually on the forms of the two men, and he managed to preserve just the same distance between them as there was at first.

In this manner he proceeded for a considerable distance across the heath.

The men were talking to each other, and a slight breeze carried the sound towards our friend, but he could not distinguish any of the words.

It was lucky the wind blew in the direction it did, because it would have the effect of carrying any slight sound which Tom might make away from, and not to, them.

At times it became difficult to keep the two men in sight, but Tom was careful.

The route which they took was a devious one, but Tom followed it faithfully, because he understood that by treading in their steps as closely as he could he should be able to keep upon level ground.

He found this to be the case because the men avoided every hollow—and there were many of them—which proved that they were familiar with the ground.

At last they came to a halt.

Tom approached as closely as he dared, and then remained perfectly still.

Although he tried his best, he could not make out what they were doing.

They were standing beneath the shadow cast by four tall trees, which stood like spectres on the plain.

They were doing something, but what was a mystery.

Tom tried to creep round in a circle, but while he was doing so he had the mortification of seeing the men returning towards the cottage

Now that they were no longer shrouded by the trees, Tom could see them plainly.

They were walking side by side, and not one before the other, as they had been.

They were talking in suppressed tones.

Tom remained motionless, and in a minute or so the two men were out of sight and hearing.

"They are off back to the hut, I'll be sworn!" muttered the highwayman, as he rose cautiously to his feet. "Well, I have no occasion to follow them. But what of the dead body? What have they done with it? I am quite sure now that it was a dead body, and nothing else! Their object, of course, was to dispose of it. But where have they put it so quickly? It is mysterious, but we must find it out!"

Tom stood still reflectively, and then he muttered, half aloud:

"It was under those four trees that they stood while they disposed of the body. What shall I do? Shall I try to penetrate the mystery at once? No! I have been absent from my comrades too long already. I will return to them with all speed. If I linger longer they will grow alarmed, and may probably set off in search of me. If they do that, we may wander over this heath for hours before we meet. I will go back to them, and tell them what I have seen. It will be time then to decide upon what shall be done."

Tom had to consider for some moments before he could make up his mind which direction he ought to take in order to reach the spot where he had left his two companions and the Count von Schoenen.

"That's the way!" he said at last, in confident tones, and having so spoken, he glided off rapidly into the darkness.

There did not now exist so much necessity for caution, and so he hastened on.

In a few moments he arrived at the spot where his friends were waiting.

Claude Duval heard some one approaching, and he cried:

"Who goes there?"

"It is I—Tom," was the reply.

The next moment he stood amongst them.

As may be supposed, he was questioned eagerly as to where he had been for such a long time, and what he had seen.

Tom peremptorily refused to answer any questions, and insisted on giving an account of all from first to last.

This was by far the best plan, and occupied much less time than any other method.

When he had finished, his companions were in possession of all the circumstances.

"Now!" he concluded, "I have a question to ask you. What is to be done?"

"It is as I feared," said the Count von Schoenen, in a tone of voice so sad that it made the highwaymen sad for sympathy. "My worst forebodings are realised! There is a murder-den upon this heath! By some means or other my brother has been decoyed into it, and has perished!"

"Do not arrive too hastily at that conclusion," said Tom King. "That there is a murder-den upon this heath I am pretty certain—indeed I have discovered it, but if there is it by no means follows that your brother should have perished there."

"I know and appreciate the motive which causes you to speak thus," replied the count, in the same sad voice. "I am much obliged to you."

"Do not, then, give way to despair until you are driven to do so! You cannot tell what may be the result of the researches we are about to make."

"I loved my brother!" said the count, with a more than brotherly affection "To the natural tie he added the dearer and more precious one of friendship!"

"Come—come!" said Tom King, "do not give way to grief! Let us discuss our next proceedings."

"I will—I will!"

"What say you, then, comrades? What shall we do first?"

"If you appeal to me," said Claude Duval, "I should say, lead us to the spot where you say they left the object which you declare to be a body."

"And so say I," said Sixteen-String Jack.

"That is precisely what I should have proposed myself," said Tom King.

Then, turning to the count, he said:

"Does the plan meet with your approbation?"

"Entirely."

"Come, then, at once—follow me! You had better dismount and lead your horses by the bridle, for the way is very rugged."

"It will be best."

Tom King's two comrades and the count rapidly alighted from their horses.

"We shall have the moon in a little while," said Claude, pointing to the eastern horizon. "We shall as soon as ever the moon rises above that bank of dark clouds."

"Forward, then! Let us gain the shadow of the trees before that takes place, for fear her beams should reveal our forms to some of the inmates of the cottage."

This was a wise speech, and all thought so, as was evidenced by the manner in which they hastened forward.

Tom King had paid particular attention to the bearings of different objects in the landscape, and so he was able to lead the way with great confidence and precision to the four trees of which he had spoken.

The distance was not great.

As soon as they had fairly arrived, and tethered their horses to a tree, the moon rose above the clouds, and shed a clear, silvery light upon the scene.

Brighter and brighter grew the light as the queen of night surmounted the vapours above the clouds, and, in a little while, every bush, and shrub, and tree, and indentation of the soil for a great distance could be seen.

It was as though a curtain of darkness had been slowly raised.

The air was unusually clear and pure, and the heavens—except round the horizon—were free from clouds, so that the moon shone with her full radiance, revealing the blades of grass and every stone upon the ground.

This was an aid towards making their researches upon which the highwaymen had not counted.

Their task was now very much easier.

"Now," said Tom, "here are the trees, and I will show you as nearly as I can the spot upon which the men stood. Had the moon been shining as it is now I should have been able to see all they did. Let me see! Yes—this must be about the spot! Here they stood, and in, as I may say, the twinkling of an eye, the body was disposed of!"

CHAPTER DXII.

SIXTEEN-STRING JACK HAS A NARROW ESCAPE FROM FALLING INTO THE "DEVIL'S MOUTH."

Upon hearing these words, Claude and Jack and the Count von Schoenen advanced to the spot upon which Tom King was standing.

"It was here, you say, the men stood?"

"As near as I can tell."

"Then let us set to work and make an examination. It is possible that we may find the body secreted among some of the bushes."

This was a very likely supposition indeed, and all drew their swords and thrust them into the bushes.

Suddenly, the Count von Schoenen uttered an exclamation.

At the same moment he stooped and picked some dark object off the ground.

The others pressed forward, eager to see what it was.

The count held it up in such a manner that the moon's rays fell full upon it.

They saw then that it was a cap.

It was trimmed with gold lace, and it was just such a cap as would be worn by some officer on board a man-of-war.

"Ha!" said Tom King, that looks like another link in the chain! It certainly confirms my suspicions! Do you remember I told you it was such a coat as would be worn by a naval officer that the old woman threw upon the table and took the gold from?"

"Yes—yes!"

"It was, then, a coat that would exactly correspond with that cap!"

"Let me look at it!" said Claude. "It may be that we may find some mark inside it that will point out the owner!"

The count surrendered the cap immediately.

"Why, it's wet!" ejaculated Claude, as soon as he touched it.

"Wet?"

"Yes, wet and sticky too!"

Claude held up his hand, and examined it by the aid of the bright light which the moon afforded.

His companions saw a change come rapidly over his face as he said in altered tones:

"It is blood!"

Upon hearing this announcement, the interest which from the first had been felt in this article was redoubled.

All pressed round to examine it.

Very soon they found that it was soaked inside with blood.

But they failed to perceive any mark which would serve as a clue to its identification.

"Your brother would not wear such a cap as this, I presume?" said Tom King, addressing the count.

"No—no!"

"I thought not!"

"That cap must belong to some other victim!"

Tom did not reply, but he felt that the count had spoken the truth.

"This is proof of the truth of your narrative!" said Claude.

"The best proof," returned Tom. "And now, count, point out to us, if you can, the exact spot where you found the cap, because that shows most unquestionably that we are on the right track."

The count moved a few steps towards the trees.

"It was here," he said.

Tom at once stooped down, and narrowly examined the grass.

"Here is blood!" he said, at length.

His companions looked at the place indicated, and saw on the ground a large spot of blood.

It had only recently fallen there, for its colour was bright scarlet, and it had not sunk into the soft turf.

"This will be a guide for us," said Tom. "Look about all of you for another spot!"

In obedience to this, all stooped down and commenced a search.

"Here's another," said Claude, almost immediately.

It was still nearer to the trees, and not far from where Tom had said he fancied the men stood.

Spots were now found with great rapidity.

They all led in one direction—namely, towards the trees.

Sixteen-String Jack was foremost, and a sharp cry escaped his lips, which caused the others to turn round.

The Count von Schoenen was nearest, and he grasped Jack tightly.

He was only just in time to save our friend from falling down into what looked almost like a pit.

Jack's foot had slipped, for he had approached the edge of the abyss in total ignorance of the peril of his position, and he would have inevitably lost his life but for the promptitude with which the count seized him.

Jack had fairly slipped over the verge, and the count's strength was insufficient to pull him up again.

But Claude Duval and Tom King quickly came to his assistance.

He trembled from head to foot.

He had given himself up for lost.

But he soon became conscious that he was saved, and recovered his composure.

"That was a narrow escape!" he said.

"Very narrow! How did it happen?"

"I can hardly tell you. I was standing there, and took a step forward, and found I had nothing to tread upon."

"It was a wonderful escape."

"Most wonderful! Had it not been for your presence of mind, sir," said Jack, addressing himself specially to the count, I should have been no more. My heartfelt thanks are your due."

"Do not mention it. I rejoice that I was able to save you."

"Let us examine this place," said Tom.

"Approach with care."

"Do not fear, we have had a caution."

"An awful one," said Jack; "I would choose any death rather than such a one as that."

With very great circumspection our friends approached the verge of the precipice.

They found it a most treacherous place.

Some peculiar-looking long grass grew all along the edge of the precipice, the length of which was seven or eight yards.

The grass would make one think that no such place as a deep abyss existed.

It was this fringe of long grass—if we may so designate it—which deceived Sixteen-String Jack.

By advancing their feet cautiously, our friends were able to approach the edge of the precipice as nearly as was prudent.

Standing there they looked about them.

They found the place to be in reality a fissure in the earth of the depth of which they could form no accurate idea, but something seemed to tell them that it was very great.

In shape it was irregular.

As we have already stated, its length was seven or eight yards.

The opposite side at the widest part, and that was the centre, was about four yards distant.

From this width it roughly tapered off both ways until the two sides united at a sharp angle.

This description may, perhaps, convey a general idea of the place.

The four trees grew along one side of the precipice, and at a very short distance from it.

Some moments elapsed before a word was spoken.

Tom King was the first to break the silence.

"All is clear now," he said, "quite clear."

"Yes," added Claude, "we need no longer feel puzzled to know how the two murderers disposed of the body of their victim. They must have cast it down there."

"Most certainly."

"And there I was very near going myself," said Sixteen-String Jack.

"How deep is it?" asked Claude.

"I will get a stone," said Jack, immediately searching for one

Tom King remained standing in a thoughtful attitude, apparently paying but little attention to what was going on.

Sixteen-String Jack had very little trouble in finding a stone.

He picked up a round pebble about the size of his own head, and the weight of which was considerable.

With this raised above his head, in both hands, he approached the brink of the precipice, and when sufficiently near he threw it in.

All stood perfectly still.

The stone rebounded with rapid strokes from side to side of the rocky chasm.

But the sound of the blows grew fainter and fainter, and at the same time more and more rapid.

Our friends listened with the utmost intentness for the sound which would indicate that the stone had reached the bottom.

But they listened in vain.

The sound of the rebounding gradually died away.

"This is strange!" said Jack, after a long pause.

"Very!" said the count.

"The depth must be immense," added Claude. "That stone would fall with inconceivable velocity, and for what a length of time we could hear it!"

"And then we did not hear it strike the bottom."

"No."

"How strange!"

"Strange indeed! Let us try another stone."

"Oh yes, by all means! See—yonder is a large piece of rock. By our united exertions we may roll it over. Come!"

"With all my heart!"

"Come, Tom!" they said.

Tom King roused himself from his abstraction.

"What do you want?"

"To help us roll this stone."

"It is no good!"

"What is no good?"

"You hope to hear it strike the bottom of that abyss?"

"Just so!"

"But you will not."

"How is that?"

"You will not, if what I have learnt is true."

"Explain yourself!"

"I will willingly, to the best of my ability."

All three prepared to listen intently.

"As I have already told you," continued Tom, "I am to a certain extent, familiar with this locality, but my familiarity does not extend to the knowing all places."

"Proceed!"

"What I have just seen—I mean that place yonder—calls to mind something which I once heard, a very long time ago, but which until the present moment had quite slipped off my memory."

"What reminded you of it?"

"The look of that place."

"I guessed as much. What were you told?"

"You shall know. It was not very far from here, at a small roadside public-house, that I heard some people talking together. One was the landlord—an old inhabitant of the locality, and he gave a description of a place which went by the very singular name of the Devil's Mouth."

"The Devil's Mouth?"

"Yes! You are surprised, doubtless, that any place should have so singular a name! I can assure you I was; but let me hasten to give you an account of what the landlord said.

"He told them, on the borders of the forest, and situated in the barren ground around it, was a fissure in the earth, the shape of which, however, bore a rude resemblance to a large mouth!"

As soon as Tom spoke these words, his three listeners approached the precipice.

They were then struck with the remarkable resemblance which it bore to a human mouth when about half open.

A very little imagination would make the likeness perfect.

All wondered that they had not noticed the shape before.

Now that it was mentioned, their fancy made them think it was even more like than it actually was.

"It was, I suppose," continued Tom King, "from the size of the place and its horrible appearance that it received the name of the Devil's Mouth."

"Most likely. The name to me seems a well-chosen one."

"And to me. This place quite corresponds with the description which the landlord gave of it. I have never seen it before, but its shape, its situation, and another circumstance which I will immediately communicate to you, made me think it was the Devil's Mouth."

CHAPTER DXIII.

TOM KING COMMUNICATES TO HIS COMRADES SOME PARTICULARS CONCERNING THE "DEVIL'S MOUTH."

THE last words which Tom King spoke at once made his listeners aware that something of still greater interest than what they had heard remained to be told, and they waited impatiently for him to speak.

He did not keep them long in suspense.

"The most singular thing that the landlord mentioned in connection with the Devil's Mouth was that though hundreds of attempts had been made to find the bottom of it, not one had succeeded!"

All three started.

"I was thinking of all this," continued Tom, "and trying to recall these forgotten particulars to my memory, when I saw you throw the stone. As I heard it rebound from side to side, and listened to its endless reverberations, I thought to myself, 'Now I shall know for certain whether this is the Devil's Mouth or not;' though, if the truth must be told, I had very little if any doubt.

"You know the result. You heard the stone fly from side to side, but you did not hear it strike near the bottom!"

"We did not!"

"Nor did I; and this told me I was right in my supposition, and confirmed what the landlord had said as well!"

"But this is very extraordinary!"

"I admit that, but it seems true!"

"It is!"

"But, my friends, can you think for a moment what facilities for concealing a dead body this awful place would present? Once cast into its depths, it would never be seen again!"

His hearers could not repress a shudder.

"I feel convinced this is it; but there would be no harm in trying the effect of that huge block of stone," said Tom.

"No harm at all," said Sixteen-String Jack. "I was about to propose the same thing myself, only you took the words out of my mouth."

"Let us bend our backs to the task."

Willingly enough all went towards the stone.

It was a huge fragment of rock, and must have weighed several hundredweight at least.

They could never hope to lift such a mass, but by their united exertions they might be successful in pushing it along.

At any rate, they resolved to make the attempt.

They put their shoulders to the block, and all pushed together.

It moved slowly.

Repeating their efforts, they at last, after an incredible amount of labour, succeeded in rolling it to the edge of the precipice.

"If anything will decide the question," said Tom King, "I should think this stone will!"

"Decidedly! If we cannot hear such a huge mass as this strike the bottom, I think we may safely conclude it is bottomless."

"Let us try."

One more push sent the stone over.

It balanced on the brink for a moment, and then it slipped down.

Our friends flung themselves down at full length upon the ground, and hung their heads over the precipice

The fragment of rock of course disappeared instantly.

But they could hear a strange hissing, rushing, singing noise caused by the rapid displacement of the air by the huge stone as it descended.

This sound, however, quickly grew fainter and fainter.

From some cause or other this huge stone did not bound from side to side as the smaller one did.

Perhaps it was in consequence of its weight and the tremendous swiftness with which it descended.

The noise which it made in falling through the air of course became very soon inaudible to our friends.

Nevertheless, with their heads over the abyss, they continued to listen.

All was silent as the very grave itself.

There was no sound of a stone striking upon the bottom, nor of the splash which its fall into the water would occasion.

They waited full five minutes before they would give up the hope of hearing the stone strike.

But, at the expiration of that time, Tom King set the example of rising to his feet.

The others quickly followed.

Somehow, Tom appeared to take the lead in the affair, and now they all remained silent, waiting for him to speak.

"You see, all is confirmed!" he said—"that mysterious chasm cannot be otherwise than fathomless! If it was, we should have heard that huge stone strike! This is the place the landlord described—there can be no doubt of that; this is the place into which the body of the young naval officer has been thrown—there can be no doubt about that, too!"

"And my brother!" said the Count von Schoenen, mournfully.

"No—no!" cried Tom King, quickly—"I did not say that—indeed I did not say that!"

"You did not say so, it is true!"

"Nor did I think so! We may have discovered a place upon this lonely heath into which travellers are decoyed and murdered—we may have seen the miscreants by whom such horrible murders were perpetrated—and, above all, we may have seen the place into which the dead bodies are flung; but it does not follow that your brother has been a victim!"

"No—no! Certainly not!" said Claude Duval and Sixteen-String Jack, who spoke thus against their convictions, but with the praiseworthy motive of sustaining the hopes of the count as much as they could.

"But the inference is very strong!" said the count, with a sad smile.

"Still, we have no proof!"

"Not yet!"

"No, not yet, and we may not have! However, that is the point which requires to be cleared up! My companions and myself have promised you our aid in your attempt to discover your lost brother! We will help you all we can!"

"Gentlemen," said the count, in a broken voice, "I shall never be able to repay you for this service!"

"No—no! Say no more about that! If we can serve you, and, at the same time, root out the nest of villains who appear to have taken up their quarters here, we shall be quite content!"

Claude and Jack warmly seconded what Tom said.

The count was deeply touched by their behaviour.

Tom spoke.

"Now that we have proceeded so far, and made these discoveries, the next thing necessary will be to decide upon our future proceedings. The one thing we have to determine is this: Is your brother's sudden and mysterious disappearance in any way connected with the discoveries we have made to-night?"

"Precisely!" said Claude and Jack.

"I fear so," said the count.

"But you require to be satisfied upon the point?"

"I do; and yet I fear to be, lest all hope should be for ever destroyed."

"But," said Tom King, gently, "look on the other and equally probable view of the case. Suppose we should find that your brother's disappearance is not in any way connected with these murderous transactions?"

"How can it be decided?"

"I cannot tell you straight off; but I have no doubt if we gave the subject our attention we should quickly think of something."

"You are right—quite right!" said the count. "You have to show me perpetually what I have to do for the best. What a fortunate chance it was for me that I met you!"

The highwaymen took no notice of the last speech of the Count von Schoenen.

It would have been very difficult for them to have made a reply to it.

A pause followed, and the silence soon became awkward for all parties.

Neither of the highwaymen liked to break it, and they felt greatly relieved when the count spoke.

"I am already greatly beholden to you," he said, "and you will greatly increase the amount of my obligation if you will only tell me of some means by which I can ascertain for certain whether my brother has met with his death at the hands of these wretches!"

"We will try our best," said Tom King. "It is a very difficult affair, as you must know full well, but it is a point which cannot be left. It must be cleared up."

"It must."

"We cannot, of course, go straight up to the cottage and simply put the question to them. Some other means than that must be thought of."

A silence followed these words, during which each one was busily occupied in devising some plan by which they could gain the information they so much needed.

But they were baffled.

"It appears to me," said the Count von Schoenen, "that there is one, and only one means by which I can learn my brother's fate."

"And what is that?"

"A simple enough plan."

"Let us hear it."

"Willingly, for I should be glad of your opinion as to its practicability. It is that I should go to the cottage as though an ordinary wayfarer. I might get up some plausible tale about being lost, and having wandered about for hours, and so on."

"But the danger?"

"It would not be great."

"I do not agree with you there."

"Why not?"

"I should be on my guard."

"But what precautions will avail against treachery? And then, what benefit would arise from this rash act? For so I cannot help considering it."

"I should be sure to learn something, and then, as for the danger, I do not think that much, because I have, and I hope rightly, counted upon your assistance."

"You may command us to the death."

"I believed so, and that is why I spoke as I did. Well, then, will you accompany me to the cottage? I can enter alone, and you can keep watch outside. You would then be at hand, and in readiness to render me assistance should I require it."

"Candidly speaking," replied Tom, "I cannot help thinking that the plan you have proposed is about the only one that could be adopted with any chance of success."

"Do you indeed think so?" interrupted the count.

"Yes, I do. But still there is great risk. You might purchase your information with your life, and that would be paying too dear a price for it."

"But I should be careful."

"So you might, and yet fail for all that. Now I have an amendment to propose if you will only listen to it."

"I listen with pleasure to all that you say."

"Well, then, it is this—that I should go to the cottage instead of yourself, and that you should keep watch outside instead of me."

"Never!"

"Never, do you say?"

"I do say never—never a thousand times!"

"But why?"

"I could never consent to such a thing! Why should you—a perfect stranger, run this risk, while I must surely be the proper person?"

"Nay, I can give you a good reason why I am a better person than yourself."

"I doubt it."

"I will tell you, then. I am used to such adventures as these, and I have been accustomed to deal with such characters as inhabit yonder cottage. I should—pardon my vanity—but I flatter myself that I should succeed where you would fail."

"I cannot think so, nor can I consent that you should run this risk. I will go."

"Nay, I will."

"You must give way to me in this."

"It will be best if I do not."

"I tell you I don't think so."

"Why?"

"I can furnish you with a good and sufficient reason. You knew nothing of my brother. You would pass over little things which I should notice, and which would prove, to some extent, that our worst fears are well founded. Can you deny the truth of what I have just said?"

"No. Though I pronounce the word reluctantly."

"I can tell you do. But you know nothing about my brother, except from the meagre account which I have given you of him, while I—I know him as well as I know myself, and the tiniest shred of clothing or the most insignificant trinket worn by him would be recognised by me the moment I cast my eyes upon it. This will, I hope, convince you that it will be best for me to carry out this plan."

CHAPTER DXIV.

THE COUNT VON SCHOENEN ENTERS THE MURDER-DEN ON THE HEATH, IN ORDER TO SET AT REST THE MYSTERY OF HIS BROTHER'S DISAPPEARANCE.

TOM KING did not urge his point any further, for he felt that it would not be well for him to dictate too much to the Count von Schoenen.

Nor could he help admitting to himself that it was far more reasonable for the count to go to the cottage than himself.

Claude and Jack were of the same opinion.

Yet, in spite of all, Tom was reluctant to give up the idea, for the adventure was one which he would have felt a great deal of pleasure in carrying out.

But it was not to be.

"You have convinced me," he said, with a smile, "but you may enter in perfect safety, for we will keep such a vigilant look-out that we shall be upon the rascals before they can harm you."

"That is, if they make the attempt."

"Which they are almost sure to do. Above all things, be on your guard yourself, and do not suffer yourself to be taken by surprise."

"I think you can trust me."

"We will do our best."

"I know you will."

"Come then, if we are to make this trial to-night—and I should not like to put it off."

"No, nor I."

"Then we must set to work at once, or else we shall have the night gone before we begin."

"We shall indeed, for it is already far advanced."

"Forward, then! Yonder is the cottage."

"That small, twinkling light?"

"Yes, that is the reflection of the fire shining through the window."

"Shall we mount?"

"No; I think we had better proceed on foot, leading our horses by the bridle."

This was the mode of progression that was decided and acted upon.

When within a hundred yards of the cottage, the little party paused.

Tom, Claude, and Jack tethered their horses to a tree.

"Now," said Tom, "I and my companions will creep forward and post ourselves outside the window through which the light is shining. When we have taken up this position you can advance—mounted, if you like—and request admission."

"Which will be given me!"

"Oh, no doubt! Enter boldly, and leave the rest to us. We will undertake to keep you safe—that is, if you are only moderately careful!"

"You need have no apprehension upon that point. But come; are you ready?"

"Quite."

"Forward, then."

As they had arranged, the three highwaymen crept stealthfully towards the cottage, taking a circuitous route to reach it.

At last they stood close to the window through which Tom had looked some time previously.

They believed they had not raised the least alarm.

The light which shone through the window was not so brilliant as it had been, for the fire had gone down.

The highwaymen crouched down and peeped through the window with the greatest curiosity and interest.

As for Tom, he was anxious to know what changes had taken place since he had his last peep, and his comrades were stimulated by the account which they had received.

Upon looking through, they saw the old woman Tom King had described.

She was crouching down by the fire.

Seated on a couple of stools were two men.

Doubtless these were the men Tom had seen carrying the dead body to the Devil's Mouth.

A sulky, evil look was on the old woman's face, and the two men were quarrelling with each other.

They were addressing some opprobrious epithets to the old woman, who put up with all with singular equanimity.

She neither moved nor spoke.

What the subject of dispute was, our friends could not make out, though Tom more than fancied it was caused by the purse of gold.

Doubtless they would have gained some further particulars, but just at this moment Count von Schoenen rode up to the door of the hut.

He approached at a walking pace, and the sound of his horse's hoofs quickly reached the ears of the inmates of the cottage.

No sooner did they catch the sound than their demeanour underwent a remarkable alteration.

Their squabble—whatever it might have been about—was set aside and forgotten.

They assumed listening attitudes and exchanged glances with each other.

Their lips moved, but our friends could not catch what they said.

The next moment a heavy, banging noise made itself heard.

It was the Count von Schoenen knocking at the door with the bone handle of his riding-whip.

The two men opened a narrow door, which appeared to lead into a kind of cupboard, and closing the door, were immediately hidden from view.

The old woman bolted this door on the outside, so that, to all appearance, the men were prisoners.

The sharp knocking continued, and the old hag having smoothed herself down a little, went to the door and opened it.

By slightly changing their position, the highwaymen were able to hear what was said.

"I am sorry to trouble you," said the Count von Schoenen, in his deep, rich voice, which seemed to borrow an additional charm from its strong foreign accent, "but I am a traveller, and have wandered out of my way. I have lost myself for some hours, and had almost given up the hope of finding a place of shelter for the night, when I caught sight of the light which streams from the window!"

"Ah, sir!" said the old woman, in a whistling voice, "this is a strange part! I don't often see travellers! I am a poor, lone woman, sir, that lives in this cottage all by herself! I don't have anyone come to visit me now, not hardly from one year's end to another!"

"Then you must be very lonely!"

"I am—I am!"

"But tell me—can you find me shelter for the night?"

"I am a poor, lone woman, sir, and there's not a house or a living creature besides ourselves within miles of this place!"

"Well, can you find me shelter?"

"Yes, sir, I will trust you! I don't think you are one that would harm a poor, lone woman!"

"I am not!"

"I will take you at your word, sir! You can enter! You are welcome to this poor place—very welcome! I wish it was better, for I don't think you are one that would harm a poor, lone woman!"

"Many thanks!" said the count. "I will avail myself of your hospitality. If your cottage be ever so poor, it is better than the open air."

"As you say, sir, it is better than the open air."

"And my horse," said the count—"what shall I do with him for the night?"

"Ah, sir, I can't tell you! I am a poor lone woman, and it isn't such as me as would have a stable."

"Then you cannot find my horse any accommodation?"

"No, sir, without it will do to let him stop in the garden all night."

"The garden?"

"Yes, but he can't injure it, sir. Nothing grows in it but grass, and the wall will keep him from straying away."

"Well, it seems, as I must put up with such accommodation as I can get, my horse must do the same. Ah well—he might fare worse! You shall be paid for your trouble, my good woman!"

"Oh, thank you, sir!"

The count dismounted from his horse, and having loosened the girths and removed the bit from his mouth, he left him to follow his own devices in the garden.

When he had done this he followed the old woman into the house, and the door was closed and locked.

Our friends could hear no more.

But they had listened to the foregoing conversation with mingled feelings.

As for Tom King, he felt divided between hatred for the old woman's treachery and admiration for her capital acting.

Tom King had seen much, and had met with many a strange adventure, gaining thereby a great deal of experience.

He was clever in judging of people, and finding out whether they were false or not.

But he could not help admitting that had he been travelling alone, and had lost his way, as the Count von Schoenen pretended to have done, he should have been completely deceived by the old woman.

She played her part excellently.

There was no violent desire exhibited to get the traveller beneath her roof; on the contrary, she had hesitated about receiving him.

Such behaviour was, above all others, calculated to throw anyone off their guard.

No doubt the old hag had had plenty of practice in her detestable part.

After the door closed upon the count, Tom King experienced a strange sensation, as though all was not about to go on as they had hoped for and arranged.

Dismissing his fears as well as he could, he and his comrades made their way close to the window, and looked with more eagerness than ever through the tiny panes.

The old hag, looking as amiable as she possibly could, ushered the count into the room, and requested him to seat himself at the table.

He complied, but when he sat down, he took care that his face should be turned towards the window on the outside of which his friends stood.

It now became impossible to overhear the conversation, which chafed the highwaymen a great deal.

They could see their lips moving, but could not tell a word that was said.

From the old woman's actions, however, it would appear that she had wanted the count to partake of some refreshment, and that he had consented to do so.

She laid the cloth over the little table, and laid upon it a rude and not very tempting repast.

She also produced a bottle, which apparently contained spirits.

Our friends had not thought to caution the count against partaking of anything in the shape of food or drink during his stay at the cottage.

Tom King now became excessively anxious to convey some warning to him.

But how?

That was a mystery.

He could not for the life of him think how he could put him on his guard, without at the same time attracting the attention of the old woman.

Tom's uneasiness increased to a perfect fever when he saw the count make every preparation for commencing his meal.

He wondered himself how he could be so thoughtless.

He waved his hand twice or thrice, as a signal to the count to desist; and each time that he did so he ran a great risk of being seen by the old woman.

On one occasion the count saw him and dropped his knife and fork.

The old woman appeared to ask what was the matter.

The count said something and smiled, and then went on with his meal as before.

But in a little while he ceased.

The old woman then poured some liquid out of the bottle into the glass, and pressed the count to partake of it.

The highwaymen watched his actions in the most dreadful state of suspense.

It was a great relief to them when they saw the count shake his head repeatedly, and say something with a smile.

The old woman seemed urgent, but the count was firm, though no one would have thought he suspected anything sinister.

The highwaymen watched the hag's countenance narrowly, and saw that it was clouded with annoyance, though she tried hard to suppress any exhibition of such a feeling.

The count took a large meerschaum pipe from his pocket, which he filled with tobacco, lighted, and smoked leisurely.

But while thus engaged, he continued to converse calmly with the old hag.

At length he rose, and the old woman produced a candle.

Our friends now understood the count was about to be shown to his bedroom.

They were confirmed in this idea by seeing the pair leave the apartment in which they had hitherto sat.

It now became of the most vital consequence that our friends should ascertain without delay which was the chamber into which the Count von Schoenen was about to be conducted.

[DICK TURPIN AND MAUD DISCOVER THE SKELETON IN THE VAULT.]

CHAPTER DXV.

THE COUNT VON SCHOENEN DISCOVERS TRACES OF HIS BROTHER IN THE MURDER DEN.

"Be quick—oh, be quick!" said Tom King, in a hurried whisper, to his three companions the moment the Count von Schoenen and the old woman had left the room. "This is a dangerous place, and we must not, if we can possibly avoid doing so, allow the count to be a moment out of our sight."

"True—true!"

"Follow me, then. We shall easily be able to ascertain into which chamber he has been led, because the candle carried by the old woman will shine through the window panes."

With these words our three friends glided round the garden—if it deserved the name—which surrounded the hut.

But when they had made a complete tour of it they had not seen the least sign of what they looked for

This was strange, and alarmed them greatly.

At Tom King's suggestion they separated from each other, and took up their positions in such a manner that between them they commanded the whole exterior of the hut.

Scarcely had this been done when Claude Duval gave utterance to a low chirping whistle, which was the signal agreed upon to be given by the one who first caught sight of the light.

The sound was so faint that it could not possibly have attracted the attention of anyone save those who were listening for it, and it could have been easily mistaken for the cry of some nocturnal forest bird.

Tom and Jack joined their comrade instantly.

Claude raised his arm and pointed to a window in the upper part of the hut, through the diamond-shaped panes of which there came a feeble light.

As they gazed upon it, it grew brighter, or seemed to do so—probably it was burning better in consequence of its having been set down somewhere.

That this light came from the room into which the Count von Schoenen had been shown there could be little or no doubt.

But a serious difficulty presented itself.

It was necessary that our friends should take up a position that would enable them not only to see into the room, but also to enable them to spring into it, should events arise that would make it necessary for them to do so.

But as they looked up they could see no means of attaining their object.

The hut was not lofty, it is true, but still the windows on the upper floor were much too high for our friends to stand on the ground and be able to peep through them.

How they were to do this seemed a mystery.

There was no friendly tree growing near, among the branches of which they could have ensconced themselves and watched what was going on within.

Nor was there indeed any object near which promised to assist them.

Anxious and distressed they sought all around them for something that would be of service.

They were much agitated as minute after minute slipped away without their having been successful.

All three were well aware that only a short time is required for the perpetration of a deed of blood, and while they were thus occupied in searching round the garden the count might be in imminent and deadly peril, and at the same time be relying upon them for the succour they had promised.

This was so very probable and reasonable that they felt more agitated than ever, and especially so when they could find nothing in the garden that would enable them to reach the window.

They were already beginning to give way to despair, when Sixteen-String Jack, while pursuing his researches, discovered a ladder.

With the greatest haste they raised this implement to the necessary position and placed it against the window.

In doing this they were excessively careful not to make the least noise.

To our friends a long period of time appeared to have elapsed, but that was fancy only, and the result of their extreme anxiety.

In reality a very short time had elapsed.

As soon as the ladder was placed against the window, Tom King hastened to ascend it.

Claude Duval followed, and Sixteen-String Jack remained for the present at the foot, partly because it was feared that the ladder would not be strong enough to sustain their combined weight, and partly in order that he should give them the alarm in case anything took place.

Having mounted the ladder, Tom King peeped cautiously through the window.

He saw that the count was the sole occupant of the chamber, and that with the candle in his hand he was making a rigid examination of every corner of it.

Perceiving this, Tom tapped lightly with his finger-nails upon the window-pane.

The count heard the sound, and probably guessed what it meant, for he rose immediately from the half-stooping posture he had assumed, and came towards the window.

Tom made a sign to him to open it.

The count nodded, but went first across the room to the door.

This he opened, and listened attentively.

Then closing it again, he succeeded in securing it by ingeniously placing the hilt of his sword on the floor, and lodging the point under the panel in such a manner that the door could not be opened very easily.

Then returning to the window, he placed his finger on his lips, and proceeded to open it.

Tom King was well enough pleased to see these signs of caution exhibited by the count.

It made him think him all the more competent for the adventure he had undertaken.

At first Tom was fearful, but now he was assured that he was quite equal to the task.

The count opened the window noiselessly.

"Hush—hush!" he said, in a faint whisper

"What is it?" asked Tom, in a voice as low as his own

"Have you discovered anything?"

"No—no!" returned the count, hurriedly; "but I am almost afraid to make the least noise, lest suspicion should be aroused. I have found one portion of what the old woman said to be false."

"What is that?"

"She told me that she was the sole occupant of the cottage; but after she went down, I crept on tiptoe to the stairs-head, and there heard the murmur of voices in conversation."

"Yes," replied Tom, "there are two men in the cottage besides herself. In my own mind, I have no doubt they are the same who carried the dead body and hurled it into the Devil's Mouth."

"I heard them whispering."

"They are no doubt in consultation."

"How have you managed to reach this window?"

"More by good fortune than anything else. We happened to find a ladder lying down in the garden."

"And you are standing upon it?"

"Yes, and one of my comrades. The other is at the foot on guard."

"I see; and if it is necessary you will spring in to my assistance?"

"I have been thinking about that, and I think I can propose something better."

"I am delighted to hear it!"

"If we remain here, I fancy we shall not be of so much service to you as we ought to be."

"How do you mean?"

"If any danger assails you, we ought to be able to rush promptly to your assistance. A minute's delay may cost you your life. Now, it will not be the easiest thing in the world to leap through the window——"

"I see—I see!"

"Therefore I think it will be better for us all three to enter and conceal ourselves in the chamber—we shall then be in a position to assist you instantly."

"It will be best. Come in, but quietly and quickly!"

Tom soon got over the sill into the room, and Claude followed his example.

In a whisper they told Jack to ascend, and in a moment afterwards the three highwaymen were standing with the Count von Schoenen in the bedroom of the hut.

The window was closed and then our friends glanced eagerly around them in search of some place of concealment.

But this promised to be no easy matter, for there did not appear to be any available hiding-place.

It was Tom King who said, after a short pause:

"When the candle is extinguished this chamber will be in utter darkness, and it will then be perfectly easy for us to conceal ourselves in any corner."

"So it will—so it will!"

"And then," continued Tom King, "you need not fear any interruption from the wretches below for some time to come!"

"Why not?"

"I know these gentry well; they will wait until they think you are asleep, and then, with noiseless steps, they will creep in upon you unawares and deprive you of your life, while you are utterly unconscious that it is in danger."

The count shuddered.

"Such," he said, "has no doubt been the fate of many a poor belated traveller who has sought shelter beneath this roof!"

"You may rest assured of it, but you shall not form another victim, and it will go hard with us if we do not destroy this nest of villains."

"I for one will try my best."

"I know you will. But first of all, to return to what I was about to say, you need fear no interruption just at present. We must be careful to speak no more than we are compelled, and to make as little noise as possible, for fear that we should be overheard by the old woman, for instance, who might crawl silently upstairs to listen and judge whether you were asleep or not."

"We have arranged everything, I fancy," said the count, "and therefore there ceases to be a necessity for further speech."

"You are right!"

"Let me, then, resume the search which your appearance at the window interrupted."

Not another word was said.

The three highwaymen seated themselves upon the side of the bed, and watched with anxious interest the movements of the Count von Schoenen.

Taking the candle again in his hand, he peered into every nook and corner, searching closely everywhere.

It would have been an awful shock to him to find in that room any article which he could recognise as having once belonged to his lost brother.

Such a discovery would point with terrible conclusiveness to the fact that he had perished by the foul hands of a midnight assassin.

The count wished most fervently that he might fail in finding anything, and yet he felt, at the same time, that if he did not, he should not feel satisfied.

The silence in the room was now most profound—even the breathing of the various occupants of it could be heard, and as it seemed, with a distinctness that was absolutely painful.

Suddenly the count started, and the candle trembled and almost fell from his grasp.

He had been stooping down, but now he rose with great quickness, and sank back upon a chair.

His face was of ashy paleness, and his eyes rolled wildly in their sockets—indeed, his appearance at this instant was the very personification of the extremest horror.

He trembled like an aspen leaf.

The moment our friends saw these signs, they understood that the count had found something belonging to his brother.

That he would make some such discovery the highwaymen fully expected, although they had been careful to conceal their convictions from the count as well as they were able.

They were not, therefore, exactly taken by surprise, but yet they were startled.

They were curious, too, to know what it was that the count had found, and whether the article, whatever it was, would furnish conclusive evidence of the fact that his brother had been in that chamber.

Still it was necessary that they should preserve their caution.

With that readiness of thought and promptitude of action for which he was remarkable, Tom King rose to his feet, while at the same time he made a hasty and imperative gesture to his comrades to remain seated.

They obeyed without hesitation.

CHAPTER DXVI.

THE TWO MEN STEAL INTO THE CHAMBER TO MURDER THE COUNT VON SCHOENEN, AND MEET WITH A SURPRISE.

On tiptoe, Tom King crept across the room to where the count was seated.

He took the candle from his trembling hand, and as he did so, he placed his lips close to the count's ear, and whispered:

"Speak—speak, I pray you! Tell me what has caused all this emotion. How is it that you are so greatly agitated?"

The count did not appear to hear what was said, and it was not until Tom repeated his words, that he looked up.

When he did look up, Tom King was startled at the change which had taken place in his countenance.

Already, the count looked years older, so great were the ravages wrought by his grief.

His lips quivered, and his dark, bright eyes, became filled with tears.

A sob, which sounded more like a stifled groan, came from his lips, and then he murmured:

"Alas—alas! My brother—my poor lost brother!"

"What of him?"

"My worst forebodings are realised! He has perished!"

"Speak more fully," said Tom King, "and endeavour to compose yourself! What proof have you of what you say!"

"Indubitable proof! Look there—there!"

The count pointed to a corner of the room as he spoke.

Tom King, although much excited, calmed himself as well as he could, and crept noiselessly across the room towards the corner to which the count pointed.

Stooping down, almost the first thing which met his eye was something small against the wainscot, that glittered brightly as it caught and reflected the rays of the candle.

Tom picked this up.

A glance showed him it was a jewel of some kind; but without pausing to examine it in any way, he rose to his feet again, and replaced himself by the side of the Count von Schoenen.

The count had covered his face with his hands, and had bowed his head down towards his knees.

Holding the little jewel between his finger and thumb, Tom King took hold of the count's arm, and strove to remove his hand from his face.

"Look!" he said. "Look—look! Is this what you mean?"

The count looked up, but the moment his eyes fell upon the jewel, he uttered a groan, and averted them.

"Once more," said Tom, "let me endeavour to persuade you to be calm. Time must be of importance, and let us economise it as much as possible. Tell me clearly what you mean? Do you identify this jewel as having belonged to your lost brother?"

"I do—I do!"

"Are you sure you recognise it?"

"Quite."

"But how? Is it possible that this stone is of such a peculiar kind and tint—or even the ornament itself of so unusual a kind that it could not have belonged to anyone else?"

"I do recognise it."

"But, pardon me, I cannot help fancying that you are allowing your feelings to lead you astray. This ornament may have been worn and dropped by some one else than your brother."

The count shook his head with the same mournful air.

"I am getting calmer now," he said—"I am fast becoming more like myself. I will tell you how it is I recognise that ornament. It is because the setting is of a peculiar character."

Tom glanced at the little sparkling gem in his hand, and saw that the count spoke the truth.

"And you are sure your brother had this jewel?"

"Oh yes! His dress was a peculiar one, and it was ornamented in various parts by those little pendant jewels. It was in consequence of his having worn this dress that the landlord of the inn at which he stayed remembered him. He had on this dress when he was last seen."

"Then that points to the fact that he has been here."

"It does, most certainly. It would be easy for him to leave such a trace behind him. The ornament may have become loose and fallen off, or it may have been torn off in his death-struggle with the miscreants who inhabit this hut."

"Hush—hush!"

"I had forgotten my caution. It was unwise to speak so loud. It is quite clear, my friend—for such I feel privileged to call you—that my brother has been here, and that circumstance, coupled with his disappearance, points inevitably to the conclusion that he—he has been murdered!"

Tom King was silent.

He, too, was of the same opinion, and he felt that it would be unwise to endeavour to raise false hopes in the breast of the count.

After awhile, however, he addressed the count in the same low whisper as before.

"What shall we do next?" he said.

"I leave the direction of affairs in your hands, my friends. I feel that I cannot do better. It is to you that I am indebted for all that I know—for the discovery of this hut, in fact, and of my brother's terrible fate! I feel now that the worst is over. The blow has been struck. It has been a severe one, but I am recovering from it. I shall be quite ready, however, to do as you wish."

Tom said no more, but returned to his companions.

Before he could speak to them, there came a faint sound from without.

A rapid sign was exchanged, and then Tom King extinguished the candle.

The room was now involved in total darkness, for the light which came through the window from the night sky was so trifling as not to amount to any illumination at all.

They listened, but the faint sound was not repeated.

After the expiration of about a minute, however, a creaking noise reached their ears, as though some one was ascending or descending the stairs in such a manner as to make as little noise as possible.

Gradually this died away, and our friends came to the conclusion that it was some one descending.

They were now more than ever convinced of the necessity of silence, and so they all sat still without exchanging a word.

The three highwaymen were on the bed; the Count von Schoenen was still seated on the chair on to which he had sunk upon making the appalling discovery that his brother had been an inmate of that room.

In this way perhaps an hour passed, and then the same creaking noise which they had before heard came upon their ears.

Our friends slipped silently off the bed and crouched down on one side of it, so that the bed was between them and the door, which would prevent anyone from seeing them on a first entrance.

The footsteps on the stairs came closer and closer.

The highwaymen almost held their breaths, although what was occurring was no more than they had expected.

At last the footsteps paused just outside the door, and the next instant they could hear plainly enough that some one was endeavouring to gain an entrance.

The count had removed his sword after our friends had entered, and as there were no fastenings of any description on the inside of the door there was nothing to oppose their entrance.

Claude Duval at this moment thought of something, and pressing his hands upon each of his comrade's shoulders in rapid succession, he got on to the bed, rolled over, and slipped down on the other side of it.

He was now within a yard of the door, and he placed himself with his back against the wall in such a way, that when the door was opened, he would be concealed by it.

In performing this feat, he had made scarcely any noise—certainly not enough to rouse in the faintest degree the suspicion of those without.

Like his two comrades, Claude Duval held his drawn sword in his hand, and having taken up his present position, he waited with more impatience than ever for what was going to happen next.

He was not left long in suspense.

The door was slowly opened.

Then some one said in a whisper, which was plainly audible to Claude, standing as he did so close to the speaker:

"I told you it was all right! Come on—he's asleep! We shall have no trouble this time, I tell you. Come on!"

"You go first!"

"All right!"

"Go on, then!"

The one who had first spoken entered the room.

At this moment a ray of light from the moon shone into the chamber, and feebly irradiated it.

The moon was fast sinking to the west, and it was only when she was in this position that her rays entered.

This light, feeble as it was, enabled Claude to perceive the dim shadowy figure of a man enter the room.

Then his companion followed, and as it seemed to Claude somewhat reluctantly.

He carried in his hand something shining.

At first Claude could not tell what this was, but almost immediately afterwards he found it to be a dark lantern.

The slide was drawn over the lens, and the glittering he had noticed proceeded from the light within shining through the crevices of the lantern.

The pair stole towards the bed, and from their manner it was evident that they had no doubt the traveller was reposing himself upon it.

As soon as the bedside was reached the second man removed the slide from the lens, and a brilliant beam of light fell upon the bed.

In an instant they saw it was untenanted, and an ejaculation of fear came from their lips.

The one with the lantern dropped his hand down to his side, so greatly was he terrified, and the simple action caused the ray of light to fall upon Tom King and Sixteen-String Jack, who were standing at their full height on the other side of the bed.

Upon catching sight of the two well-armed figures, a yell of fear burst simultaneously from the lips of the murderers, and they turned to fly.

But when they faced round, they saw that the door was closed, and that Claude Duval had placed his back against it.

He held his drawn sword in readiness, either to attack the two miscreants, or defend himself.

But murderers are always cowards.

These men would have shrunk from a hand-to-hand conflict with anyone—they were only capable of stealing into a room and murdering unsuspecting people while they slept.

With one accord, they made a rush towards the window, doubtless with the intention of leaping through it.

But in this direction they were confronted by the Count von Schoenen, whose face was at once pale and menacing as he stood there, resolved to have vengeance upon the murderers of his much-loved brother.

"Villains!" he cried, as he rushed forward impetuously to attack them—"villains, your career of guilt has reached a termination! Your guilt is discovered."

The two men appeared to be quite overpowered, and staggered back several paces without attempting to defend themselves from the furious onslaught which the Count von Schoenen made upon them.

But finding that all retreat was cut off, that all their iniquity was discovered, and that they stood not the least chance of making their escape, they became inspired with a fierce but spurious kind of courage.

It was the courage which some animals will offer when forced at bay.

The one who carried the lantern hurled it at the count.

It struck him with full force in the face, and for a moment staggered him.

But the three highwaymen hastened to attack the wretches, and so prevented them from following up the advantage which they had gained over the Count von Schoenen.

The moon had now declined so far towards the horizon as to pour the whole of her light into that chamber, so that our friends were able to see their antagonists with tolerable distinctness.

The one who had first entered the room carried in his hand an implement which attracted a great deal of the highwaymen's attention.

He used it as a weapon, and laid about him with it in good earnest, but fortunately our friends were able to ward off the blows that were aimed at them.

CHAPTER DXVII.

THE INHABITANTS OF THE HUT ARE OVERTAKEN BY A RETRIBUTION AS TERRIBLE AS IT WAS MERITED.

As Tom King and his companions made out what this weapon was, their blood congealed in their veins.

It was a poleaxe, such as is used to slaughter cattle, only it was made entirely of iron.

The handle was not above twelve inches in length, and the head was wrought on one side into a hatchet-like shape, while on the other it was elongated into a spike about four inches in length.

The use which was made with this weapon was obvious.

It was with this axe that the sleeping travellers were murdered.

The upper part was exquisitely balanced on the handle, and one blow would cause the sharp spike to pierce deeply into the brain.

Death would be instantaneous.

The Count von Schoenen looked upon this singular and awful weapon with a kind of fascination.

He was thinking of it as the instrument which had drank his brother's blood.

With this poleaxe, then, one of the miscreants attacked our friends, and defended himself.

The blow which the count had received from the lantern being flung with full force into his face was a severe one, and for a moment or so it half stunned him.

It was while he was recovering that his eye fell upon the iron poleaxe, which seemed to receive a larger quantity of rays from the moon than any other object.

But as he gazed, he reflected that not only did he see the implement before him with which his brother had been murdered, but his brother's murderers as well, and a kind of frenzy seemed to seize upon him.

Stooping down, he picked up his sword, which had fallen from his grasp, and then commenced such an attack upon the wretches as could not be withstood.

With one terrific slash with his sword he clove open the skull of the man who wielded the polcaxe.

The wretch sank to the earth gasping for life, and then, after one convulsive shudder, lay still in death.

His companion, who had carried the lantern, fought with a long, dagger-like knife, which, in the hands of one so desperate as himself, was truly a most formidable weapon at close quarters.

Tom King narrowly escaped a wound from it.

Nothing saved him except Sixteen-String Jack's sudden interposition.

Drawing a pistol, Jack fired, and Tom's adversary fell to the ground.

Both the murderers now lay weltering in their blood—one was quite dead, and the life was quickly ebbing from the veins of the other.

Victory had been gained, and our friends had met with no further injury than the count had received from the blow with the lantern in his face.

This was trifling.

Altogether, the encounter had occupied only a few moments.

Tom King stooped down to the man Sixteen-String Jack had shot, and said to him:

"Are you much hurt?"

A storm of imprecations was the reply.

The question, however, was almost a needless one.

The bullet had passed through his chest just above the heart, and a wound in that region is nearly always fatal.

Even as he cursed, his utterance became impeded, until at length a sudden rush of blood into his mouth compelled him to be silent.

"You are badly hurt!" said Tom. "For my own part, I believe you are hurt to the death! Before you expire, then, answer me one question!"

"What is it?" gasped the man, feebly.

The count guessed what was coming, and he bent forward with an anxious mournful look upon his face.

In all probability he was to hear his worst fears confirmed.

"It will do you no harm to answer the question," said Tom. "Will you tell me whether a traveller stayed here some days ago—a foreigner who wore a dress of singular manufacture trimmed with these jewels?"

Tom held up the one the count had found.

The man turned a shade paler, and he shook visibly as he replied:

"Ye—yes—a traveller did stay"

"And where is he?"

The man's eyes gleamed as he turned towards Sixteen-String Jack.

"Was he a friend of yours?" he asked.

Jack replied in the affirmative.

"Ha, ha!" he said. "I am glad he was a friend of yours—glad—glad—ha, ha!"

"Why?"

"Do you want to know where you can find him?"

"Yes—yes!"

"Listen, then, and I will tell you. Look, and you will find him in the Devil's Mouth!"

A groan from the count followed these words.

While speaking, the man had raised himself up on one arm, but it became evident that he had taxed his powers to the utmost, for there came another rush of blood, and he fell back a corpse.

For a moment there was silence, and then Tom King said:

"Come, comrades, let us quit this murderous place—I'm sick of it! The very air seems tainted with blood. Come, count, follow us—you can do no good by staying here! We have set at rest the mystery of your brother's fate. It is a sad conclusion to which we are obliged to come, though it is no more than I feared and expected from the first. He has perished, and his body has been thrown into that place, which, so far as we know, is unfathomable."

"I will follow you," said the count, "for I feel calmer now."

"The reason is you know the worst, and we have had a full vengeance upon your brother's murderers. Now let us quit this place."

"With all my heart!"

The friends made a movement towards the door.

But before they could reach it, it was dashed violently open, and the old woman rushed in.

She was the embodiment of frantic fury.

A wild shriek thrilled from her lips, and she threw herself upon the two dead bodies.

Rapidly she examined them, and then, finding they were dead, she screamed aloud.

"Both dead!—both my poor boys!—both my lambs! Dead!—dead! But I will have vengeance upon you all yet! Both murdered! I am their mother, I tell you—their poor mother! How you all came here, and how this has happened I know not—it seems to me like a dream! But they are dead!—dead!"

Tom King advanced with the intention of saying something to this old hag, but he was not allowed the opportunity to speak.

As soon as she saw him coming nearer, she sprang to her feet.

"Off!—off!" she shrieked. "Off, I say! Would you murder me as well as them? Off!—off! You would,—I can see it in your eyes! But you shall not! I will be free!"

With these words the hag rushed to the window, flung it open, and leaped out before our friends could recover from the astonishment into which her sudden entrance had thrown them.

But as soon as she disappeared, Tom said:

"Quick, we must follow her! No doubt we shall be able to gain some important information from her!"

"Yes—yes!"

"The ladder is outside—that will be the readiest way to descend."

In less than a moment all four were in the garden.

Before them, in the distance, her form well revealed by the moonbeams, was the old woman.

She was running at a speed which, for one of her years, was neither more nor less than wonderful.

All four commenced an immediate pursuit.

The old woman flew off across the heath, preserving a tolerably straight direction, and yet avoiding a descent into any of the hollows which abounded there.

At first they did not notice that she was running full in the direction of that strange fissure in the earth which went by the equally strange name of the Devil's Mouth.

This was not surprising, for of course they were not familiar with the route.

It was not until they saw the tall trees that Tom King recollected where he was.

They were already under their branches when he made this discovery.

He stopped instantly, and called out to his companions to do the same.

They were unable to stop all at once.

The old woman still continued on her frantic course, nor did she stop, but disappeared with the most awful suddenness.

She had jumped into the Devil's Mouth.

The Count von Schoenen and Claude Duval only checked themselves on the verge of the abyss.

Tom King and Sixteen-String Jack slowly approached.

But after the old woman had disappeared there was not a sound.

All turned round and gazed into each other's faces inquiringly. They could almost have believed that the occurrences of the past two hours were nothing but a delusion of their senses.

"This is strangest of all," said Tom King, at length. "Who would have supposed that she was bent upon the committal of such an act?"

"No one, I should think," said Claude.

"What could be her motive?" asked Jack.

"It seems plain enough to me," replied Tom King. "She would no doubt expect that we should follow her, and her intention was to cause us to fall into the abyss."

"But she has perished."

"Still she may not have intended to do so, but merely have lured us to her death, and there is no knowing she may even have contemplated casting away her own life, provided while so doing she could compass the destruction of all four of us."

"I fancy that is it," said Sixteen-String Jack, "for did you not see how eager the man I shot was to be revenged upon me? When he thought the count's brother was a friend of mine with what malicious pleasure he told me of the murder!"

"Yes—yes! I noticed it, and no doubt the same feeling was strong in the breast of the old woman."

"It has been a night of strange adventures," said the count, "but such a night as I hope never to pass again. I have gathered some satisfaction, but it is a melancholy one. I know my brother's fate."

"You do. It would, no doubt, be more in accordance with your feelings if you could obtain one glimpse of his remains, but they will never again see the light of day, so that thought must be banished."

"It must—it must! I ought not to forget, however, that this excursion has not been without beneficial results. We have destroyed a nest of villains. Henceforth this heath will cease to be a snare for the unwary traveller."

"It will, and it was in the hope that this desirable result might be brought about, that I and my comrades joined you."

"I owe you many thanks—indeed, I can never repay you for your trouble! I suppose, now that all is over, we must say farewell. For my own part I am sorry that we are about to part, but our ways lie in different directions. It is my duty to return to my native land, bearing with me the sorrowful tale of my brother's loss."

"We are sorry too, to part from you," said Tom King. "But, as you have just said, and truly, henceforth our ways lie in different directions."

All four now in silence and in sadness too, made their way towards the spot where the horses had been left.

Those belonging to the three highwaymen were found tethered to the tree as they had been left.

The one belonging to the Count von Schoenen was in the piece of enclosed land which surrounded the cottage, and he suffered himself to be captured without difficulty.

In a few minutes they were all mounted.

It then became necessary for them to part, for the highwaymen were anxious to resume their interrupted journey to the forest, for they had already lost more time than they could afford.

As for the count, he would make his way with what speed he could to the nearest port at which he could obtain a vessel bound for his native land, for after what had occurred he felt but little inclined to remain in England.

CHAPTER DXVIII.

TOM KING SEES A SINGULAR INDIVIDUAL WHILE KEEPING WATCH AND WARD IN THE FOREST.

THE acquaintance between the Count von Schoenen and the three highwaymen had been of short duration, but the circumstances were altogether so exceptional, that it seemed, now the moment for parting had arrived, that they were about to be sundered from an old and valued friend.

It must be remembered that the count had no idea of who our friends really were. Nothing had transpired which would tend to suggest even the suspicion that they were other than gentlemen travelling for their pleasure.

"I must say farewell to you," said the count, "though I would fain have had your company for some time longer yet! However, that cannot be, and it is idle of me to speak thus. We must part. Before we separate, however, it would give me much pleasure if you would allow me to present you with some token by which you can remember me and the strange adventures of this night!"

"We shall be glad to exchange such gifts."

"I, too, should like to receive something from each of you," said the count.

As he spoke, he took from his vest a magnificent gold watch of foreign manufacture.

It was large; but in those days the tiny baubles which are now the fashion were not thought of, and it was literally studded with precious stones.

Tom hesitated about receiving this gift, for, as he said, it was not in his power to offer anything of equal value in return.

But the count would not listen to any such demur, and insisted upon Tom receiving the watch.

He then drew from his finger a ring, in which was set the largest diamond our friends had ever seen.

This he forced Claude to accept.

He seemed puzzled to find something else, and, turning to Sixteen-String Jack, he said:

"Unfortunately, I do not possess anything else of equal value to the articles I have given to your companions. All I have, indeed, is this brace of pistols, and if you will accept them, I shall feel greatly pleased. They are of exquisite and rare workmanship. Their fellows do not exist. They were given to me by the maker of them. They are of great value, being heavily mounted and ornamented with gold. But their greatest value is this—they have never missed fire, and are so exquisitely made that you can aim at the smallest object and be certain of striking it. Take them. Believe me, I wish they were more valuable!"

Sixteen-String Jack was well enough pleased to receive these pistols—indeed, a more acceptable gift to him could not be found, and he thanked the count for them and expressed how pleased he was.

The highwaymen then contributed some article of their regard, having done which, they shook hands and parted.

The count and the highwaymen each took opposite directions, and in a short time were lost to each other's view, for the dawn was close at hand, and the moon had sunk below the horizon, so that although the new day was coming, the darkness was deeper, and the obscurity greater than it had been for several hours previous.

"There goes a brave, free-hearted, generous man!" said Tom King, as he rode off along with his companions. "I should have been glad could I have prolonged the acquaintanceship. I shall always look back upon this night with pleasure."

"And so shall I," replied Claude—"that is, as far as the count is himself concerned, for it has been a night of strange and terrible adventure. It is a night we shall not forget very easily."

"I shudder," said Sixteen-String Jack, "when I think what a narrow escape I had of falling down that frightful place."

"And well might you do so," said Tom King; "I wonder how many poor victims have been hurled into those unknown depths?"

"That we shall never know, because those who done were able to give such information ow past oing so."

Very true, but we will speculate upon this and the other circumstances when we have decided what we shall do."

It was Tom King who spoke.

"What do you propose?" asked his companions.

"Well, for my part, I am very much fatigued, but that is nothing to be wondered at, considering what I have gone through; and I have no doubt you feel much the same as I do."

"You are right!"

"Well, then, if you're agreeable, we will push on until we get fairly into the forest."

"And what then?"

"Why, we will seek out some leafy and sequestered nook, and obtain a few hours' rest. Our horses will be all right, for we will tether them at some spot where sweet grass grows plentifully."

"They will be glad of a rest, for we have travelled many miles."

"We have. Say, then, does this proposal meet with your approval?"

"Certainly."

This being assented to, the little party made their way towards the forest, which was at no great distance.

Ere they were fairly beneath the trees, however, day had fairly dawned, and that grey light which betokens the advent of the morning crept over the face of the landscape.

Tom King was tolerably well acquainted with the New Forest, and so he undertook the task of leading his companions.

He plunged at once into the darkest and deepest recesses, nor did he pause until he was at some distance from the point at which he had entered.

"Now," he said, at length, "we are a mile at least, from the borders of the forest, and we are far away from any human being or dwelling-place."

"Then I should think we are safe?"

"I think so."

"Will you pause here?"

"If you like the place."

"It will suit well."

As soon as these words were spoken, Tom King slipped off his steed, and his comrades instantly followed his example.

They tethered their horses to a tree in such a manner, and in such a place, that they could feed freely from the sweet pasture around.

"All that is necessary now to complete our comfort," said Tom King, "is a substantial meal and something good to drink. Sleep would be all the sweeter after that, but I suppose it is no good to think about it."

"Not a bit!"

"Then I will banish the thought."

"I don't think," said Claude Duval, "that we all ought to go to sleep at once. We may be in no danger, it is true; but, for all that, it would be more prudent for one to keep watch."

"Decidedly," said Tom King; "I was about to propose it. We can relieve one another every two hours."

"Good! But who is to take the first turn?"

"I will, if you like," said Tom.

"Let it be settled fairly," said Sixteen-String Jack. "Which is it, Tom—head or tail?"

He spun a coin in the air as he spoke, and caught it in his hand.

"Head!" said Tom.

"It's a tail. Try with Claude."

Tom did so, and eventually the lot fell upon himself.

His two comrades threw themselves down upon the grass beneath the shadow of a tree, and composed themselves to sleep.

It was not long before they were in a sound slumber, for both were worn out by the exertions they had undergone.

For awhile, Tom King paced up and down like a sentinel.

But he very soon grew tired of the exercise, and seated himself on the ground, with his back to a tree.

The position which he took up enabled him to command a view, not only of the horses, but of his comrades too.

He could not help envying them their calm repose.

The morning advanced with rapid strides.

Already over the trees in an easterly direction could be seen the early beams of the sun, which gilded with a rare beauty the massive foliage.

The deep silence which always prevails in the depths of a forest is provocative of reflection, and almost unconsciously Tom found himself thinking over the manifold occurrences of the past night.

He could scarcely fail to be interested in the Count von Schoenen, for that individual possessed many rare and touching traits of character.

"A strange discovery awaits some one!" he said. "In the course of time that lonely hut upon the heath will be visited, and then what will be thought of those two dead bodies on the floor?"

He had got so far in his reflections, when a rustling among the underwood attracted his attention.

Thinking that it might perhaps be some predatory animal, Tom drew a pistol from his belt, and held the weapon in readiness for instant service.

The rustling continued.

Tom fixed his eyes upon the spot from which the sound proceeded.

Something was forcing a way among the shrubs and brake which formed the undergrowth of the forest.

By this time it was so light that Tom could see with perfect distinctness all around him.

A slight movement among the bushes now attracted his attention, and the next moment a man, or rather something which seemed to wear a human shape, made his appearance in the glade.

Tom gazed earnestly upon him.

To use Shakspere's words, the figure before him was

"So wither'd and so wild in his attire that

It looked not like an inhabitant o' the earth,
And yet was on't."

Picture the figure of a man long past the prime of life, with his face and hands thickly barked with earth, and with a profusion of white matted hair, streaming in the wind and falling upon his shoulders.

He was thin even to emaciation.

His face and hands and bare chest seemed literally bloodless, and the skin to be a mere covering for integuments and bones.

His clothing had once been good, such as would be worn by one of the middle class who was pretty well to do, but now it was but the ruin of what it once had been.

His coat was literally torn to tatters, and so was the long-lapelled, embroidered waistcoat.

The trousers, too, were torn in many places, and the boots he wore could have been but a very ineffectual protection against either the roughness of the road or the inclemency of the weather, for they were full of holes, and appeared to be totally destitute of soles.

Not the least singular feature in the face of this strange creature were the eyes.

They were preternaturally large and staring, and gleamed with a wild lustre.

His head, too, seemed to have a tremulous paralytic motion.

Such then is as good a description as we can give of the singular being who came thus suddenly and strangely to Tom's view.

The old man caught sight of Tom and his companions instantly, and came to a sudden stop.

He looked at them for a moment with great intentness.

Then, uttering a wild, screeching laugh, and whirling his arms wildly, he spoke some incoherent words.

What they were, Tom could not make out.

While they were still coming from his lips, the old man suddenly turned round, and bounded off among the brushwood.

In a second he was lost to sight, and even the rustling of the branches which he disturbed in his progress ceased to be heard in a little while.

Tom King sat looking in the direction in which the old man had disappeared, while his brain was in a strange, dreamy state.

He passed his hand two or three times over his brow, reflectively.

"What does that mean?" he at length murmured. "I don't know how it is, but somehow that strange figure seems familiar to me; and yet—yet how can it be? for I have never seen him before—I am quite sure of that."

Tom was puzzled, nor could all his reflections help him out of this difficulty.

Something, either in the old man's voice, or in the expression of his countenance, or in his general personal appearance, seemed to remind him of some one he had once seen

But who?

That was a puzzler, and he racked his brain in vain to recollect.

His thoughts being thus busily occupied, however, had one good effect.

It prevented the time from hanging so heavily upon his hands, and he could scarcely believe himself when, upon consulting the watch which the count had given him, he found that the allotted space of two hours had expired.

He was glad to find, though, that the time had arrived for him to take some rest, for he was very tired.

CHAPTER DXIX.

THE HIGHWAYMEN ARE PUZZLED AND SURPRISED AT THE BEHAVIOUR OF THE OLD MAN.

ACCORDING to the arrangement which they had made, Tom King awoke Sixteen-String Jack, whose turn it now was to keep watch and ward for two hours.

He sprang up willingly, for he was much refreshed by the short nap he had taken.

Before he laid down upon the greensward, Tom communicated to his comrade the particulars of the strange meeting which had taken place.

Jack listened with great interest to what his comrade said, and promised to keep a sharp look-out.

"I scarcely think it," said Tom, as he laid himself down, "but it is just possible that his presence bodes no good to us! Our enemies are very artful, and we must keep constantly upon our guard!"

"We must; and yet, how can our foes suspect our presence in this locality?"

"Have you forgotten Richard Nares?"

"I had, in good truth, forgotten him, but now that you mention his name, you rouse all my suspicions. He evidently recognised us!"

"He called us by our names, and you may rely upon it that he will not rest until he has attempted to gratify his revenge!"

"I am very glad, Tom, that you suggested his name to me, for I have been so absorbed in recent events that I had forgotten him."

"Very likely we have nothing to fear, but still it will be best for us to keep ourselves prepared."

"Decidedly! Close your eyes, Tom, and endeavour to catch that repose of which you stand so much in need."

"I know I shall be safe."

"Yes; I shall keep good guard."

Tom closed his eyes, and in a little while was sound asleep, in spite of the many thoughts which thronged into his brain.

During the two hours which his watch occupied, Jack maintained a vigilant look-out.

But nothing happened to disturb him.

The old man did not make a reappearance.

As soon as ever the two hours had expired, Jack awoke Claude, who took his place.

Tom was still fast asleep, and so Sixteen-String Jack informed Claude of the adventures which Tom King had had, and cautioned him about keeping a sharp look-out.

"I told you we should have some bother with that Richard Nares! I said at the time that we had let him off a great deal too easily! He will be no end of torment to us!"

"We don't know that he has anything to do with the present affair, Claude."

"I know that, but it seems very much like it; and besides, there is another thing which very much vexes me!"

"What is that?"

"Why, to think I did not fire a bullet after him!"

"Perhaps it is all for the best."

With this Sixteen-String Jack laid himself down to rest.

Without being tedious, we may say that the day was spent in this manner, the highwaymen sleeping and watching by turns.

When evening came, they were all thoroughly refreshed, and felt that they should not need any sleep for a considerable time to come.

But now that this want was supplied, they immediately felt they desired something else.

This was a good meal.

But there seemed but little chance of their being able to obtain it.

As Tom King possessed the best knowledge of whereabouts they were, he was appealed to to know whether there was an inn anywhere near at hand.

"There is one," said Tom, "but at a distance from where we now are. It will, however, please you to learn that it is all in our way as we pass on to our destination."

"That is good news."

"Indeed, the inn is not far from the tree beneath which Dick Turpin and myself buried the treasure. I should think there would not be much risk in stopping there."

"None at all, I should think."

"Well, then, let us mount and pass on. It will take us some considerable time to reach the inn, I can tell you that; but after we have had something to eat, we shall be all the better able to do our work."

"Of course we shall."

The horses were now put in readiness for the journey.

Like their riders, they were all the better for the rest they had had.

Our friends mounted, and, under the direction of Tom King, continued their journey through the forest.

The day was fast drawing in, but as Tom struck into a kind of rude path, they were able to travel at a good speed.

Suddenly, however, Tom King uttered an exclamation which caused his companions to look up.

"There he is!" said Tom, pointing before him—"there is the old man of whom I spoke!"

"You described him well."

Standing beneath a wide-spreading tree was the same strange old man.

He evidently did not perceive the approach of our friends.

They came nearer.

Their curiosity was greatly excited respecting him.

They had thought over all that Tom had said concerning him, but though they were in possession of these particulars, yet they were unable to come to any reasonable conclusion.

Not the least remarkable circumstance was the fact of Tom King believing that he had seen him somewhere before, and that his features were familiar to him.

The old man was leaning with his back against the trunk of a large tree.

His head was bent down, and his eyes apparently fixed upon the ground at his feet.

One hand was placed, as though reflectively, upon his forehead.

The attitude was that of a man in deep and serious reflection.

His demeanour now contrasted strangely with his former wild and incoherent manner.

So deeply absorbed was he that he allowed our friends to come close up to him before he was aware of their presence.

They pulled up when within a yard or so of the tree against which he was leaning, and looked at him attentively.

He appeared to be aroused from his meditations by Sixteen-String Jack's horse, which was restlessly pawing the ground.

He glanced around him with astonishment upon finding three mounted men before him.

But his astonishment soon subsided.

In an instant he became a changed being.

Starting from his former position, he threw himself into one of those wild attitudes which he had shown when Tom saw him first.

His eyes assumed the same unnatural glare, and he flung his arms about with all the wild frenzy of one in a delirium

Foam, too, gathered about his lips.

In a hoarse, screaming, shaking voice he spoke.

But his utterance was so rapid and irregular that it bore but a faint resemblance to human speech at all.

Here and there our friends could catch a word, but it carried no sense with it.

The remainder of his speech was perfectly incomprehensible.

All the while he was speaking—if speaking it could be called—Tom King kept his eyes constantly fixed upon his face.

The tones of the old man's voice struck every now and then upon his ear with a familiar cadence.

All at once, without their having the least idea that he contemplated such a thing, the old man broke off in the middle of his ravings, and, turning round, dashed into the wood.

He was out of sight instantly, but he could be heard, for his loud, discordant and unnatural laughter resounded loudly through the forest.

But it rapidly faded away, and became fainter and fainter, until at last it was inaudible.

Neither of our friends offered to speak or to move their position until the laughter had wholly died from away.

Claude then turned towards Tom King and said:

"Well, my friend, what do you make of it now?"

Tom King passed his hand over his brow, and a perplexed expression settled itself upon his face.

"I don't know what to make of it," he said.

"Nor do I."

"I have seen him somewhere," said Tom, "I am certain of it, because I have not only a dim recollection of his features, but several tones in his voice sound familiar to me. But where I have seen the one and heard the other completely baffles me."

"But independently of all that," said Sixteen-String

[BLACK BESS OBEYS DICK TURPIN'S SIGNAL.]

Jack, "there is something very strange and mysterious about him."

"His manner is peculiar."

"Very."

"It is idle to speculate upon it any longer," said Tom King at length. "Come, my friends let us resume our journey."

"Can't you recollect?"

"No; I couldn't if my life depended upon my doing so, and yet I seem every moment to be upon the brink of recollection."

"Forward, then! Perhaps as you go on you may be able to call the circumstances to your mind."

The three highwaymen resumed their journey towards the inn, Tom King, as before, taking the lead.

But his two comrades could scarcely get a word out of him.

"They could tell by his manner that he was taxing his memory to the utmost, and trying his best to deepen the shadowy recollection in his mind.

Claude and Jack fell back a little way in the rear, and left him to continue his reflections undisturbed.

They chatted with each other upon various topics.

It was just as the last flushed hues of sunset in the western horizon were sobering down into the darkness of the night, that our friends arrived at the inn of which Tom had spoken.

Although at least half an hour had elapsed since the sun had set, they were able to see about them with ease and distinctness, for all objects within the range of their vision were illuminated by the soft evening twilight.

The inn, which bore in front the conspicuous sign of the Golden Lion, was a fine old picturesque edifice that would have formed a delightful study for a painter.

It was erected upon a road which intersected the forest, and was situated just where the rude footpath which our friends had been following joined the aforesaid high-road.

Many years had elapsed since it was built, for it was a style of residence that was then completely obsolete.

It was only one storey in height, and in consequence occupied a vast extent of ground.

It was constructed of wood—no doubt that was the material that came readiest to the builder's hands—and the roof was covered with a thick thatch, which added not a little to the picturesque beauty of the place.

Of course the straw of which the thatch was composed had long since lost its original tint, but the dark brown colour which it now wore was even more pleasant to the eye.

In front of the inn there was a huge swinging sign fixed upon a tall, upright post, at the foot of which was a, trough for horses to drink out of, and a rack for containing hay.

The windows in this old-fashioned inn were of a very primitive fashion, but yet they were pleasing.

Through the windows in front of the inn there streamed a bright, ruddy light, which showed that a bonny fire was blazing within.

Take it for all in all, it was, perhaps, a place above all others calculated to induce the passing traveller to halt and enjoy the comfort within.

Tom had seen the inn before, but Claude and Jack had not.

They were, however, perfectly charmed with it.

"That's the place to stop at, Tom! Why, it's really delightful; and how out of the way it is too! Nothing could be better. I should think that here we could rest perfectly content."

"Very likely. But the inn is not so out of the way as you might perhaps imagine."

"It seems to us to be in the heart of the forest."

"I know it does, and so it really is, but you must not forget that it is situated upon one of the main roads through the forest, and one which is well travelled. Many people pass along it, and as there is no other house for at least ten miles in either direction, you may be sure that almost everybody stops upon reaching the Golden Lion, so that in consequence the landlord does a roaring trade."

CHAPTER DXX.

IN WHICH THE THREE HIGHWAYMEN MAKE THEMSELVES VERY COMFORTABLE AT THE GOLDEN LION.

THE many evidences of prosperity around fully bore out the truth of Tom's assertion. None but a house of good trade could have looked as that did.

Under the guidance of Tom King, they approached the porch, but before they could reach it the landlord made his appearance.

He touched his hat, and commenced bawling aloud to the ostler.

"Glad to see you, gentlemen," he said, as he assisted them to alight—"very glad to see you! You are welcome to the Golden Lion, which—though I say it, as ought not, still, as it is to be said and must be said, I may as well say it for myself as let anyone else say it for me—is the best inn you'll find in the whole forest. Going to stay, gentlemen? You can't do better. Best of all accommodation can be had here, not only for your horses, but for yourselves as well. This way, gentlemen—this way!"

The landlord was excessively loquacious, and our friends were not able to interpose a single word. But that did not matter. The landlord was content if he could only manage to have all the talk to himself.

Tom King and Claude Duval followed him into the interior of the inn, but Sixteen-String Jack hung back and entered into conversation with the ostler.

It seemed almost ridiculous to apply such a term to the shock-headed youth who came forward in response to the landlord's vociferations.

Sixteen-String Jack, however, very quickly arrested the whole of his attention by telling him how liberally he should behave if he (the ostler) only attended to his commands.

Uncultivated and half-savage as he was, this youth understood the value of money, and promised the most implicit obedience.

While carrying on this very interesting conversation, Sixteen-String Jack managed to follow the ostler round to the stables at the back, the precise position of which he took particular care to notice, according to the highwaymen's invariable custom.

When he had done this, and seen that all three of the horses were properly attended to, he gave the boy a shilling, as an earnest of what he might expect to receive.

The youth opened his eyes to their utmost width so great was his surprise.

The coin which he had just received represented the amount of a whole week's wages.

He was ready to lie down for Jack to tread on him.

The landlord was so occupied in his conversation that he did not notice that Jack had slipped off with the horses.

Tom King took the first opportunity he could find to say:

"We are not going to stay very long, landlord, but we want to know whether you have got anything very nice in the eating line—something substantial, too."

"Gentlemen, upon my honour, you have dropped in at the right place, at the very nick of time, and so you will say when you hear what I am going to tell you."

Our friends waited impatiently.

"You must know, then, gentlemen, that we hold a grand supper here, at the Golden Lion, to-night. All the people who are employed about the forest. There's about twenty of them, and they meet here once a year. Ah, gentlemen, it was a lucky chance that you should arrive here on this night above all others!"

"And you have got quite a feast prepared, then?"

"Gentlemen, you have said it! Such a feast as your eyes never saw before!"

"And should we be allowed to join the company?"

"Oh yes, and proud and happy they would be to have three such gentlemen among them. Why, where has the other gentleman gone?"

Tom and Claude pretended now to notice his absence for the first time, and said, in an offhand way:

"Very likely he has gone to look after the horses."

"There was no occasion—no occasion, I assure you. The ostler is quite competent to look after them."

"No doubt—no doubt. It is only a whim of his; he will be here directly."

"All right, gentlemen—all right! Don't you think it was lucky you arrived here on this particular night?"

"Very."

"Ah, I knew you would say so! Come this way, gentlemen—come this way, and I will show you into a room where part of the company has already assembled, and they will be glad to make your acquaintance! You can't begin to be good friends too soon."

"Wait a moment," said Tom; "it is necessary that we should consult our friend upon the subject. He will be in directly, and then we will ask him; but if he has no objections, we shall be very glad."

With this the landlord was compelled to be content, and so he ushered Tom and Claude into a little private room, while he bustled off to attend to some fresh arrivals.

The door had scarcely closed before Sixteen-String Jack entered.

His two comrades drew him on one side, and spoke to him in a whisper:

"What do you think of it?" said Tom, after he had told him what the landlord had proposed. "Do you think there is much danger?"

"What is your opinion?"

"Well, frankly, that the danger is so slight as to amount to nothing at all!"

"That is just what I think! Do you, Claude?"

"Yes."

"We are doubtless known well enough by name down in these parts," said Tom King, "but the chances are a thousand to one against anyone being here to-night who has ever seen us."

"So I think."

"Then what have we to fear from recognition?"

"Scarcely anything."

"Oh, let us decide at once!" said Claude. "If there is a little danger, what does it matter? We will run the risk for the sake of having a smoking-hot supper! It's a very long time since I sat down to a good social meal, and it's a thing I'm very partial to!"

"And so am I!"

"Just think how delicious it will be! Don't hesitate any longer!"

"Our minds are made up."

"All right, we shall all have a jolly night of it! Rely upon it, no one will know us individually or suspect that we are in the neighbourhood, or if they did they would never imagine that we should sit down amongst them and take supper."

"You must not forget Richard Nares, Claude!"

"Confound that fellow, I am reminded of him at every turn! It's very aggravating, and makes me wish more than ever that I had not let him off quite so easy."

"I only mentioned his name in order that you might not make too sure about no one in these parts being aware of your presence! It was intended as a caution!"

"And as such I thank you for it."

At this moment there came a faint tapping at the door, and the landlord entered.

"Well, gentlemen, have you made up your mind to join the company? Rely upon it, you can't do better! Of course, if you like, you can have some of the good things brought into this room by yourselves, but if you take my advice, gentlemen, you will join the company! Say, then, which will you do?"

It was quite futile to attempt to check the torrent of words that came from the landlord's lips.

Our friends tried ever so many times to tell him their decision, but it was no good. He would not listen, but went right on, and never paused until want of breath compelled him to do so.

Tom then told him that they had made up their minds to join the company in the supper-room.

The landlord received the intimation with unfeigned pleasure.

"That's right!" he said. "It sounds English-like, and hospitable. I am going to preside, and, take my word, we shall make a night of it!"

"We shall not be able to stop long after the supper," said Tom. "Important business compels us to resume our journey. By this time we ought to be much further on the road than we are, but we have met with many delays."

"Well, gentlemen, of course you know your business best. I shall be sorry to see you leave early; but then I am a man of business myself, and I know business must be attended to."

So saying, he led the highwaymen across a passage into a long room, which was furnished with several tables, which were all laid ready for supper.

Round these tables and grouped about the room were about a dozen men, all of whom were employed in some capacity or other about the forest.

The landlord introduced them with a grand flourish, and it is no more than right that we should say they were received with a hearty good will.

The men were evidently pleased to have three gentlemen among them, for such, from their dress, they took our friends to be.

A space was cleared so that they could seat themselves round the fire, which was blazing on the hearth and which was a sight which did everyone good to see.

It was especially grateful to our friends, who had knocked about a good deal of late, and who had been deprived of anything approaching domestic comfort.

"Supper will be brought in in a very few moments, gentlemen, and I do hope you will have the goodness to do justice to it!"

"Landlord," said Tom King, standing up, and speaking in such a loud voice that he interrupted him, "as we are to wait for a few minutes, you cannot do better than furnish tankards full all round! I'll pay for them!"

The landlord vanished to execute this order, while a perfect tumult of applause shook the whole building.

Tom had taken the nearest way to all their hearts.

The men had before been disposed to treat them well, but now that so much liberality was evinced, their delight knew no bounds, and our friends reached the height of popularity at one leap.

Several more arrived, until the total number was reached.

Just as the last one arrived the landlord entered with the tankards of foaming ale.

"There," he said, as he placed them in succession before the guests—"there is a drop of the best October ale there is in my cellar!"

"Very good, landlord!" said Tom King, "and now go and draw yourself just whatever you think proper! I'll stand the damage!"

This put the landlord right, and then the healths of the three friends were drank in a style that could not do otherwise than gratify them, and the acclamations and applause made the old rafters ring again.

It would have been hard to have found throughout all England a number of men better pleased with themselves and all around them than those who were assembled on that night in the supper-room of the Golden Lion.

The substantial meal—which, from its character and the time at which it was taken, would have been called at the present day a dinner—was placed upon the table.

The viands were of the most excellent description, and the meal altogether did the landlord the very greatest credit.

Our friends enjoyed themselves immensely, for the fare, though very delicious, was at the same time very plain, and, in fact, just such as suited their palates.

The mirth soon began to wax

"Fast and furious."

Just, however, as the supper was about to be removed, our friends were startled by a loud, uncarthly peal of laughter.

The three highwaymen recognised the sound instantly.

Without knowing why, they felt the blood desert their cheeks.

They turned deadly pale.

The peal of laughter was repeated.

It was demoniac and hideous beyond all description.

All that were present in the room when the sound first made itself heard stopped suddenly in what they were about.

Those who were about to drink, hold their flagons halfway between the table and their lips.

Again, for the third time, came the peal of hideous laughter.

It seemed to cast a spell over all present.

They could not move—they could not speak, but only retain the listening attitudes which in the first instance they had instinctively assumed.

It was the landlord who first recovered himself, and, by way of putting his guests at their case, he said:

"Never mind, gentlemen all! Never mind! It is only Mad Tommy! He won't do any harm!"

CHAPTER DXXI.

TOM KING AND HIS COMRADES LISTEN WITH GREAT INTEREST TO THE PARTICULARS GIVEN BY THE LOQUACIOUS LANDLORD.

JUST as the landlord spoke, and declared who it was that had disturbed the harmony of the meeting, one of the windows was dashed violently open from without, and a face appeared at the aperture.

The strong light of the fire fell upon it, and revealed every feature with great distinctness.

It was the face of the strange-looking man whom the highwaymen had encountered in the forest, for once seen, it could never be forgotten.

Thrusting his head into the room through the opened window, Mad Tommy, as the landlord had called him, burst into another wild peal of laughter.

Then he added some more of those incoherent expressions such as we have already mentioned, but what they were would have puzzled anyone to make out.

And yet all did listen and try to make something out of what he said, but the attempt resulted in perfect failure.

The poor maniac—for such he seemed to be—wound up his long and unintelligible speech by another of his laughs, which were of such a dreadful and unearthly character that they made the flesh creep upon the bones of even the least sensitive of the assembly.

When he had concluded, he waved his arms wildly in the air, dashed the window shut again, and bounded off into the darkness.

Profound silence reigned in the room for at least a minute after he had taken his departure.

Tom King was even now more puzzled than before.

"Mad Tommy!" he kept repeating to himself—"I never knew a madman that I know of, and yet mad this poor creature is as sure as there is a disease called insanity. I am sure I am right! I cannot be so greatly mistaken as that—I cannot! His features are imprinted upon my memory, only I cannot remember who he is. I would give much to know some more particulars concerning him, for as he stood at the window his face looked even more familiar to me than it did at first."

Such were Tom King's reflections during the moment which elapsed after the maniac's disappearance.

He was puzzled and perplexed.

It was the landlord who, for the second time, broke the silence and the spell which the sudden event had occasioned.

He used the same words as before:

"Never mind, gentlemen all!" he said. "As I told you before, and as a great many of you must know very well, it's only Mad Tommy, and he would not do anyone any harm if he knew it, poor fellow!"

"Mad Tommy," said Tom King. "Who is he?"

"Ah, sir!" said the landlord, "you are a stranger in these parts, and so, of course, you don't know nothing about Mad Tommy."

"I should be glad to learn something!"

"No doubt, sir, your curiosity's roused, and I don't wonder at it!"

"My curiosity is roused, and if you would not mind the trouble, landlord, I should be glad to hear the particulars."

"Hear, hear!" said a man, who looked like a gamekeeper. "The landlord here knows all about it. Let him tell the tale. It's as strange a one as ever was listened to by the fireside on a winter's night!"

This proposal was received with acclamations, which showed plainly enough that a very great amount of interest was felt in Mad Tommy.

The landlord made but a feeble resistance to this request.

In fact, it came just in his line, for there was nothing he loved so much as to hear himself talk, and here was a glorious opportunity for the display of these particular powers of his.

He took half a dozen rapid whiffs from his pipe, and then placed it on the table.

Next he cleared his throat by a copious draught of old ale, and, these preliminaries done with, he commenced.

Tom King and his two comrades were seated together on one side of the huge fireplace.

From what had previously occurred, they felt the deepest interest in the narrative which fell from the landlord's lips, and this feeling soon became intensified as the landlord proceeded.

As for Tom King, he was completely absorbed, for the manners and appearance of the old man were both of so singular a nature that they would raise no ordinary amount of curiosity; but, in addition to this, there was the strange half-recognition of the features, the partial recollection, the absolute certainty of having seen him somewhere, but upon what occasion completely baffled him.

If the landlord of the Golden Lion prided himself upon one thing more than another, it was his manner of telling a story.

It was an occupation he loved.

Now, he had told all that he had been able to find out respecting Mad Tommy many a time and oft, but the story had not lost its charm to him.

No; he gloried in the manner in which he had arranged the incidents, coming as they did in proper order from first to last.

But after his preface, almost the first words he uttered were of such a startling character that our friends almost sprang up from their chairs in astonishment.

We will let the landlord tell his own story, for we are sure the reader cannot fail to be deeply interested in it:

"Gentlemen all, you have made a request to me which I have very great pleasure in acceding to, because it always makes me glad when I can do you a service in any way."

Here the landlord was interrupted with such a storm of cheers that he was obliged to rise and bow several times, while his countenance assumed a rubicundity of hue that was surprising to behold.

In a little while the excitement was over, and, with a gratified smile upon his countenance, the landlord resumed:

"Gentlemen, the pleasant task which you have set me is not, I can assure you, without its difficulties! But those difficulties can be set aside by you. I want to know how I am to tell my story?"

"In your own way—in your own way!" was the unanimous cry.

"Gentlemen, I am much obliged to you—much obliged, I am sure; but what I wanted to know was, shall I just tell you what I know about Mad Tommy, or shall I begin my tale at the beginning and acquaint you with the whole of the particulars which I have been at great trouble to collect?"

"Oh, begin at the beginning, landlord—begin at the beginning!"

"Thank you, gentlemen! That is, I can assure you, the course which suits me the best—much the best!"

Here the landlord was obliged to refresh himself with a draught of ale, after which he commenced his narrative in real earnest.

"Gentlemen all, nearly every one of you, excepting, of course, these three strangers—or, as I should say these three gentlemen and friends—yes, friends (hear, hear) who have so kindly consented to grace this meeting with their presence—I say, with this exception, every one of you must, in some way or the other, have heard mention made of Olinthus Furze!"

The words struck upon Tom King's ears with a strange familiarity, but again his memory failed him; he could not recollect where he had heard it.

"Olinthus Furze, the miser?" said several.

"Yes; Olinthus Furze, the miser!" said the landlord, slowly.

At this instant a light broke in upon Tom King's mind, and so great was his agitation, that, in his endeavour to appear calm by raising the tankard to his lips and partaking of its contents, he failed most miserably, for it slipped from his hands, and fell to the floor with a heavy crash.

This caused a momentary interruption to the landlord's story; but Tom King passed off the accident as well as he could, and begged him to continue.

The landlord gladly complied, and Tom King schooled himself to hear something startling now.

"Yes, gentlemen, Olinthus Furze, the miser! You have all heard about him—many must have seen him, for he was well known in these parts, and it is not such a very long time ago since he met with his death.

"Well, then, gentlemen, Olinthus Furze was a miser, who used to live in a miserable hut not very far from here, on the high road leading through the forest. Everybody said he had heaps of money, but I never yet found anyone who had seen anything of it! He looked like a miser though, for he never had any new clothes, never had enough to eat and drink, and used to spend the greatest part of his time in prowling about, turning over rubbish that had been swept out of houses, and picking up anything, even if it was worth no more than the ten-thousandth part of a farthing.

"Everybody said, however, that he possessed a great deal of money.

"There was one thing, though, that neither I nor anyone else ever could make out, and that was he used to keep a servant.

"Now, that's a common enough thing to do, of course, but it was something astonishing that Olinthus Furze should be guilty of such extravagance; but it was a fact—the man who was too miserable to buy himself anything to eat, or even to burn a bit of fire in the winter, actually kept a servant!

"What wages he paid, or whether he paid any, is more than I can take upon myself to say; but I know the servant looked as miserable a scarecrow as his master.

"Well, things went on in this way, and no notice was taken of old Furze until one day it was discovered he had disappeared.

"They broke into the house, but there were no signs of him there; and, what was more extraordinary still was the servant had disappeared as well.

"A great deal was speculated about this, and it furnished the subject for many an evening's conversation in the old inn here.

"At last, one day a boy came out of the forest.

"He looked very strangely did that boy.

"His eyes were almost starting out of their sockets, and he was so white that his very lips were like ashes.

"He gasped for breath, and his knees trembled and shook under him to such a degree that he could scarcely stand.

"We got him inside the inn, and gave him a drop of brandy, after which we tried to get out of him what it was that had frightened him so.

"It was a long time, I can tell you, before he could speak, and when he did we could not believe what he said.

"But he repeated his tale over and over again, and never wavered one bit.

"What he said amounted to this:

"He told us he was going through the forest, when he saw in the distance an immense flock of birds.

"Hoping to catch some of them, he went in that direction, until at last he arrived upon the edge of a dingle, over which these birds were hovering.

"The boy crept down the side of the dell until he was close to the bottom, and then he parted the bushes a little in order to see about him.

"What he saw almost deprived him of his reason.

"He stood just where he was, for he was rooted to the spot, and could not have stirred an inch if it had been to save his life.

"Hanging to the branch of a tree was the body of a man.

"It had evidently been there for some time.

"It was almost devoured by the birds which had been attracted to the dead carcass, and the body being in this half-eaten and decomposed state was a most horrible sight.

"It was no wonder that it produced on the boy, who saw it so unexpectedly, such an effect as it did.

"He did not wait to see any more; but, as soon as ever he had the power to do so, he scrambled up the side of the dell and ran through the forest towards the nearest house, which was this—the Golden Lion Inn.

"We made him tell his tale over and over again, and as he did not vary his account in the least, we came to the conclusion that he spoke the truth, and had not suffered himself to be frightened by his own fears.

"The very next day, after having communicated with the authorities, we set off upon our expedition into the forest, compelling the boy to act as guide.

"He manifested the greatest reluctance to visit the place again, but we were inexorable, and finding us so, he at length gave in.

"He led us to the dingle without hesitation.

"Before we had got half-way down the side of the dell we received confirmation of the truth of what he said.

"Here sure enough, swinging to a tree, was the body of a man, just in the same state and presenting the horrifying appearance which I have described to you.

"Having made this discovery we pushed on, being anxious to obtain a closer view.

"But when we reached the bottom of the dingle we found something yet more awful, and which amazed us not a little."

CHAPTER DXXII.

TOM KING AND HIS COMPANIONS AT LAST DISCOVER THE IDENTITY OF MAD TOMMY.

"You may think, gentlemen," said the landlord of the Golden Lion, "that I am going a roundabout way to tell you what I know concerning Mad Tommy—you may wonder what all this can have to do with him; but if you will let me go on with my story, you will find it is very intimately connected with it indeed!"

Tom King, of course, knew what was coming to a partial extent, but still he felt as curious and anxious as anyone could to hear what had followed the discovery in the dingle.

The landlord proceeded:

"When we got down to the bottom of the dingle, the first thing we noticed was a mound of dirt, and on the other side of this we found a hole, which looked as much like a grave as any hole in the earth well could.

"Its likeness was preserved, indeed, for lying inside of it, what should we see but another dead body.

"Like the one on the tree, it was almost devoured by the birds, and when we drew near, the flies rose up by thousands, and formed a perfect cloud.

"It was not a very nice task, I can tell you, but the body was got out of the grave; and though it was in such a frightful state, we managed to make out who it was.

"Our astonishment may be guessed when we discovered it was no other than Olinthus Furze, the miser.

"Yes, it was him, sure enough, though how he had come by his death, and how it happened that he was at the bottom of the grave we had no means of telling.

"But we did not give the old man as much attention as we perhaps should have done had it not been for the other dead body on the tree.

"Upon first identifying the miser, a great many jumped to a hasty conclusion, and said that the servant had murdered his master for the sake of his wealth.

"But we found, to our greater astonishment, that the man on the tree was no other than the miser's servant, so that that idea was done with at once.

"And now I ought to tell you that the miser's servant was suspended from the tree in a very singular manner.

"The rope was not round his neck, but tied under his arm-pits, and not in such a manner as to occasion death.

"And yet dead he was to all intents and purposes, but his body was so much decayed that it could not be told how that death had been exactly brought about.

"It was soon found, however, that there was a paper in one of the pockets, and this paper, when read, proved to be about the most extraordinary document ever heard of.

"It related, upon the testimony of two witnesses who signed it, that on a certain night they saw the servant deliberately shoot and murder Olinthus Furze, the miser.

"The paper then went on to say that they captured the servant and tied him up to the tree by the arm-pits; having done which, they went away, and left him shouting and screaming for help. Suddenly, however, the sounds ceased, and they retraced their steps to ascertain the cause, when they discovered that the miser's servant had apparently broken a bloodvessel in his screams, for the crimson fluid was streaming from his mouth.

"Now, gentlemen, is not this the most wonderful story you have ever heard, and to be true at the same time? You must say so. But the most wonderful part of the story remains to be told.

"You would never guess who were the two witnesses who saw the murder committed, and who signed the paper which I have mentioned.

"One of them was no other than the celebrated highwayman Dick Turpin, about whom you have heard so much, and the other was his scarcely-less celebrated companion Tom King!"

The landlord little thought that there should be something more wonderful than anything he had related in his story—namely, that one of the two celebrated highwaymen he had mentioned should be in the room at that moment, for whose especial behoof the preliminary portion of the tale was chiefly told.

In total ignorance of this singular circumstance, however, the landlord continued his narrative.

"Now, gentlemen, he said, "I come to that part of my story which is connected with Mad Tommy.

"Some time after the miser's death, two men came down to the forest, upon what errand I did not know, at least not for a long while.

"They put up at this inn.

"After staying about a week they informed me that they had formerly been turnkeys in Newgate, but, in consequence of their having been caught planning the escape of Tom King, they were discharged from their employ.

"But these two turnkeys—one of whom was named Wilson and the other Biggs—told me that what had induced them to consent to assist Tom King to escape was because he had promised to take them to a certain place in the New Forest, where they had buried a chest of gold belonging to a miser whom they had seen murdered.

"Recollecting, gentlemen, all the particulars connected with the murder of old Furze, I pressed these men for particulars, and I learned that the account they had received of the transaction corresponded exactly with that written down upon the paper.

"These two turnkeys, then, told me that they had come down to the forest in order to try their luck at discovering this hidden treasure, but after spending a great deal of time without effecting any good, they finally determined to relinquish the attempt altogether."

"I suppose it was what I told them concerning old Furze the miser, confirmatory as it was of the information they already possessed, which made these two men stay a little longer at the inn.

"I noticed that they went out every day, and had no doubt in my own mind that they were occupied in digging for the miser's treasure."

"And did they succeed in finding it?" said Tom King, breaking for the first time the silence which he had preserved ever since the landlord began to speak.

It may be imagined with what important anxiety both Tom and his comrades waited for a reply.

Upon it, of course, depended whether they had or had not undertaken this journey in vain.

"I do not know, gentlemen, whether they succeeded in finding the treasure or not," said the landlord, with great deliberation and emphasis. "I don't think they did—leastways, they disappeared, and I have never set eyes upon them from that moment to this.

"And now to tell you about Mad Tommy. Very few, if any of you, have the least idea of who he is, and therefore you will be all the more surprised when I tell you that his name is Tapner, and that he was at one time the governor of the prison of Newgate."

"Tapner!" exclaimed Tom, in his intense astonishment quite unable to restrain himself. "Did you say Tapner?"

"Yes."

Tom struck his forehead with his clenched fist.

He recollected all now, and knew perfectly well who the old man was.

It was his enemy, the governor of Newgate.

It was no wonder that Tom should find the face and voice familiar to him, and it is not much matter for surprise that he should have failed to recognise his ancient foe under such altered circumstances.

But now that the landlord spoke it gave him the clue to all the rest.

He knew his enemy now, but simultaneously with this knowledge came the desire to know by what means he had been reduced to his present position.

How came it about that the boisterous, tyrannical governor of Newgate should have become changed into a harmless maniac, and be known familiarly by the sobriquet of Mad Tommy?

There was something to be learned, and Tom felt that he would willingly give a great deal to be informed upon this point.

Although he might have been excused had he cherished towards his enemy a feeling of vengeance, Tom King was quite free from any such feeling.

He was sorry indeed that he should have come to such a lamentable end.

After a slight pause the landlord continued his narrative, and Tom King listened greedily.

"Listen to this, gentlemen all," said the landlord, "and then I am done. You won't begrudge a few minutes to hearing the end of my story. I have learned from very good authority that on the night when Tom King won over to his interests the two men who had been placed in his cell by informing them about the chest of hidden treasure, Mr. Tapner, the governor, was listening at the door.

"He heard all that was said on both sides, and then just when they had made every arrangement, he burst into the cell, had Biggs and Wilson locked up for conspiring with the prisoner to make an attempt, and placed two fresh men in the cell.

"Well, some time after that, from some cause or other, I don't know what, Mr. Tapner lost his situation of governor of Newgate. I have heard that it was in consequence of gross misconduct that he was removed from his post; but that is neither here nor there.

"After he had lost his snug situation I suppose things went bad with him, and as he could do no better, he bethought himself of the information he had accidentally gained concerning the buried treasure.

"Accordingly down here he comes, and took up his quarters at this inn.

"He commenced making his inquiries in a very cautious manner, but my suspicions were aroused, and I was not long before I found that he had come down to dig for the treasure.

"Of course I took good care not to make him aware that I knew so much.

"He went off like the other two had done, and one night he, too, failed to return.

"But he was found the next morning not very far off.

"He was lying on the ground in a bleeding condition—he had evidently crawled for some distance, and was quite insensible.

"As he carried some money with him, the nearest doctor did not hesitate to undertake his case, but he said almost as soon as he saw him that there was very little if any hope.

"He gave it as his opinion that the terrific wound on the head which the governor had received had been inflicted by some such implement as a spade.

"At last Mr. Tapner got better, but it was in body only.

"The blow upon the head had fractured the skull, and had caused severe injury to the brain.

"The effect of this was that, though he recovered, he never gained his reason, and ever since that time he has been nothing but a hopeless, raving, but harmless maniac, for ever playing such tricks as you have seen to-night.

"He wanders continually about the forest, as though in search of the treasure. This is what some people say, though for my own part I don't believe he has got sense enough even for that."

Such was the landlord's tale.

It was a dreadful one, and even the highwaymen could not avoid feeling some amount of compassion for the ex-governor, although he had been such a bitter foe to Tom.

A dead silence followed the recital of this story.

"You have not told us one thing," said Tom King, at length, who had quite succeeded in recovering his composure.

"What is it, sir?"

"Why, you have told us that the governor was found badly wounded in the head, as it would seem by a spade. Now, by whom was that blow inflicted?"

The landlord shook his head.

"Ah," he said, "there are a great many who would like to know that!"

"Then, has it never been found out?"

"Never, from that day to this."

"How strange!"

"It is strange. I have always suspected that the two turnkeys, Biggs and Wilson, are guilty of the deed, for they always spoke bitterly of the governor."

"But you say they had disappeared before the governor arrived."

"Oh yes!"

"It is a great mystery!"

"And will remain so, I am afraid. Of course, if the governor could be once restored to reason he would no doubt be able to tell who his assailants were, but that seems impossible. He seems doomed to die, as he has so long lived—a raving maniac! But—but what is the matter, sir? What is amiss?"

These words were hastily addressed by the landlord to Tom King, who had sprang suddenly from his chair.

His eyes were turned towards the window, and Claude and Jack instantly glanced in that direction.

As they did so they comprehended instantly the behaviour of Tom King.

With his face pressed close against the window pane, and peering anxiously into the room, was Richard Nares.

CHAPTER DXXIII.

DICK TURPIN AND MAUD FIND THE MEANS OF EGRESS FROM THE VAULT.

WHAT an unfortunate thing it was that Dick Turpin, in his haste, should have omitted to fasten that secret door which Maud's keen eyes had with so much difficulty detected!

But he knew that his enemies would not long be kept in check by the ruse he had adopted; and so, as we have already stated, he darted through the secret door, dragging his fair companion after him.

It is most probable that if Dick Turpin had been alone he would not have been so greatly agitated as he was, and would have retained that remarkable presence of mind and coolness to which alone on so many occasions he most unquestionably owed his life and liberty.

But that he was exceedingly anxious upon Maud's account, the reader can easily imagine.

Nor must it be forgotten that Dick Turpin had by no means recovered from the serious wound that had been inflicted upon his head, and which was so near proving fatal.

So far from this being the case, he felt giddy, sick, and faint, while every now and then a mist of blood would seem to collect before his eyes, and he would reel slightly.

He was too weak and enfeebled to be equal to such exertion as he had been making, and the excitement of the last few minutes could not but tell most fearfully upon him.

Such being the case, then, the reader will not feel surprised that Dick Turpin should hastily pull the door after him, and descend the flight of steps without first pausing to ascertain whether the spring had caught.

If he had done this, all would have been well, and he would have been saved much danger and distress.

His disappearance from the armoury would have seemed like magic to Mr. Wriggles and his officers, for the secret door was so well concealed that the chances were a thousand to one against their finding it.

But it was fated to be otherwise.

When Maud clung terrifiedly to him, and apprised him of the coming of his foes, Dick Turpin could scarcely credit the evidence of his own senses.

But as he listened, and the sound of footsteps rushing down the slippery staircase and the hoarse cries of the police officers came upon his ears with greater and greater distinctness, he was forced into a belief of that which he would gladly have discredited.

By what means the officers had found the secret door, he could not for the life of him imagine.

He recollected full well that on a former and not long-distant occasion he himself and his three comrades had searched narrowly in all directions, but without success.

How it was Maud had been lucky enough to find it in that moment of pressing need, he had not had time to inquire.

Still, she had been occupied for some time, whereas the officers had not appeared to be delayed one moment.

All this was puzzling and perplexing to Dick Turpin, who was labouring under the conviction that he had properly closed and secured the door.

He was not allowed the opportunity of thoroughly thinking the matter out.

Other matters of a more important nature pressed upon his brain, for was not his own and his companion's position more imminent and critical than before?

Surely yes, for while they were above the surface of the earth there did seem to be some chance of making their escape.

But now they had descended beneath the surface—they had taken refuge in a vault which seemed to have no other means of egress than the door by which they had entered, and before which the officers now stood in a dense throng, clamouring loudly for surrender and admittance.

Maud was ready to swoon with terror.

She firmly believed that all was over, and that the capture of her husband was a certainty.

With all her might she struggled against the feeling of faintness that came so strongly over her. She tried her utmost to be calm and to cheer her husband, but it could scarcely be said that she succeeded.

As for Dick Turpin, he was not himself.

He was not equal to the present emergency, and he felt it.

He was not so strong as he had fancied he was and he was alarmed at the rapidity with which one accession of weakness followed another.

His eyesight failed him, and he was fast falling into a dreamy, trance-like state, from which Maud could not rouse him, for she was half dead with fright herself.

Dick could hear his enemies banging at the door; he was dimly conscious that some one was speaking in a loud tone of voice, but what was said he knew not, and, what was more, he did not seem to have energy sufficient to make the attempt.

This state of things was dreadful to think upon.

The officers had only to break down the door—and, strong as it was, it could not be an insuperable obstacle,—and then what an easy prey the bold highwayman would be!

He would fall into the hands of his captors without a struggle.

Suddenly, the loud report of a pistol struck upon his ears, and, with a crashing, splitting noise, he could hear the bullet force its way through the wood-work.

In all probability, this was about the only sound that would have had the effect of recalling Dick Turpin to himself.

He started like one awaking from some awful dream.

His thoughts reverted instantly to his fair companion.

"Maud, Maud!" he cried, in a low but earnest voice; "Maud, Maud! Speak to me, dearest! Tell me that you are not hurt—tell me that the bullet has not injured you!"

Maud made a powerful effort to speak.

But her voice failed her.

A faint, murmuring, inarticulate sound was all that issued from her lips.

It was only natural that Dick Turpin should at once jump to the conclusion that she was wounded.

The bare thought produced an immediate and wonderful revulsion of feeling.

His weakness vanished as if by enchantment.

In a second he seemed to be endowed with the strength of a dozen men.

"Speak to me!" he cried, in anguished tones. "Tell me—oh, tell me!—are you hurt?"

"No—no!" said Maud, in a whisper.

This was the case.

It was terror alone which had prevented her from speaking before.

"Cheer up, then, darling!" said Dick, in something like his old voice—"cheer up! Perilous as our position seems, I somehow have the conviction that all will be well. Yes, yes! I do not feel as I am sure I shall feel when the hour is at hand when I am about to be delivered to my foes!"

"Hark—hark!" said Maud, whose courage rose now that she beheld the change which had come over her husband. "Hark—hark how they are hammering at the door. Surely, in a minute, or even less, they will have it down!"

"Nay, nay—do not be afraid! The door is very strong, and well secured. It will be no easy matter to force it from its hinges."

"But what hope have you of escape?"

"Have you forgotten, Maud, that we have made no examination of this place? It seems like a vault, but yet there may be an exit from it."

"Let us look, then."

"Lean upon me, Maud, and be of good cheer! Do not let your heart fail you!"

"But the door!"

"They are working away with right good will, I grant. But come this way, dear one! From the partial freshness of the air, I have every hope that there is some opening by which we can leave this dismal place."

Dick Turpin spoke this in order to cheer Maud's drooping spirits, for, in good truth, he was by no means assured of the correctness of what he stated.

But he hoped all would turn out as he had anticipated.

While speaking to Maud in the manner we have related, the reader must not fall into the error of supposing that he was idly standing still.

He was, on the contrary, looking eagerly around in search of some means by which he could leave the vault.

For a time he was unsuccessful.

The battering upon the door distressed and agitated him, and prevented him from prosecuting his search with that calmness necessary for success.

The police officers had evidently made up their minds to destroy the door, and were bending all their energies to the accomplishment of the task.

Already it showed signs of demolition, and no doubt ere long it would be forced from its hinges

It is easy to conceive that Turpin's attention was divided between what the officers were doing and the task which he had set himself to perform.

Suddenly, however, while he was making a second round of the vault, Dick fancied he perceived that in one part, near to the floor, the wall looked of a different colour to what it did elsewhere.

Stooping down, he tapped with the butt-end of his pistol against it.

The dull, heavy sound which was given forth convinced him it was wood.

But, at the same time, he found that the wood was in such a rotten, crumbling condition that the butt of his pistol sank deeply into it, almost as though it was sponge.

Upon making this discovery, Dick's hopes revived.

Restoring the pistol to his belt, he took hold of the piece of wood with both hands.

A slight effort of strength enabled him to tear this piece of wood completely down; and when he had done so, a small arched opening was disclosed, which seemed to lead into the very bowels of the earth.

The piece of wood which Turpin had displaced had evidently served as a door, but age and damp had completely rotted it away, so that it was nothing but a spungy mass.

Dick stooped down and passed under this archway without hesitation, dragging Maud after him, who naturally shrank from venturing into such a dreadful-looking place.

But she submitted passively to be drawn along by her husband.

The passage—for such it was—stretched straight before them, but it was narrow and very low.

In a half-stooping posture they ran along it.

Dick Turpin had made this discovery and entered the passage only just in time, for a loud crash and a shout, followed by a hubbub of voices and the trampling of footsteps, announced the fact that the door, strong as it was, had been broken down by the police.

There was now no obstacle—no barrier of any kind between Dick Turpin and his foes.

It was now just a question of which could run the fastest through those dismal passages.

Turpin felt the perspiration start out upon his brow, and he gasped painfully for breath, for he could not conceal from himself that his position was now far more desperate than it had been before.

The loud report of a pistol came at this moment upon his ears, but at what it was fired, or why, was more than he could tell.

The bullet did not injure either himself or his companion, and so he troubled himself no more about it.

Just at this moment, Dick came to a place where the passage divided itself into two, and branched off into two different directions.

He hesitated for a moment which way he should go, and then, feeling that it was a matter of complete indifference, he took the turning to his right hand.

Along this he ran as fast as Maud could follow him.

They could hear their foes plainly enough, and then the sound seemed to grow fainter.

Suddenly a tremendous discharge of firearms burst upon their ears.

It was followed without any appreciable pause by another, after which all grew still.

CHAPTER DXXIV.

DICK TURPIN DISCOVERS THE SKELETON IN THE VAULT BENEATH THE DESERTED MANSION.

WHAT was the cause of this volley, and what was meant by it, will presently be explained to the reader.

For a little while longer we must confine our attention to the proceedings of Dick Turpin.

That the terrific report of firearms in that narrow passage should be very perplexing to Dick Turpin the reader scarcely requires to be told.

He could not imagine what ever could be the motive that prompted so strange a proceeding.

In his astonishment he paused to listen intently, and as he did so he fancied he could hear groans, as though coming from persons who were badly wounded.

To linger, however, was most probably to court death or capture, and so, leaving this strange event unsolved, Dick Turpin hurried on along the passage.

Ere he had gone many yards further, however, his progress was arrested by a door.

It was in quite as decayed a condition as the one which he had pulled down with so much ease.

Placing his shoulder against it, he had the satisfaction of feeling it give way before the pressure he applied to it.

Another push, and the door was down.

Passing through it, they now found themselves in a vaulted chamber, in appearance not unlike the one they had so lately left.

But this vault was filled with so horrible an odour that they were compelled to draw back for some distance.

Maud shuddered.

"This is dreadful!" she said.

"It smells like a charnel-house."

"It does indeed! Oh, Dick, it would not be possible to bear such an atmosphere as that!"

"Wait a moment, dearest, and then all will be well! The foul vapours with which the atmosphere of that vault is loaded will rush out into the passage, while fresh air will take its place. Wait a moment!"

Maud stood still, but she was compelled to cover up her mouth while she did so.

A most suspicious stillness reigned in the direction from which they had come.

Had the officers given up the chase?

It seemed so, for as Dick stood and listened he found himself unable to detect the least sound indicative of their approach.

This circumstance, however, instead of imparting the least feeling of satisfaction to our hero, only made him still more anxious and alarmed.

He would have preferred a thousand times over to have heard his enemies hard upon his track.

He would have known then what he had to expect, but this mysterious cessation of hostilities boded, he felt convinced, no good to him.

Evidently his foes were adopting some deep-laid scheme, by which they hoped to secure his capture.

But if that scheme depended in the least degree upon the calculation that he would be thrown off his guard, Dick felt that it would fail.

He determined to be a thousand times more careful than he had ever been before.

Maud, however, experienced some degree of satisfaction upon making the discovery that their foes were no longer so close behind them, and Dick encouraged her in this idea, for he believed it would be foolish were he to make her a participator in his own fears.

"Let us advance now," he said; "the air within by this time will be comparatively pure. Come, follow me!"

"But, Dick——"

"What, dearest?"

"Where think you these gloomy passages will lead? What have we to hope for if we continue our progress along them?"

"That I can scarcely tell you. We must go on, and hope for the best."

Maud sighed.

She felt there was not much consolation to be derived from this, and yet she asked herself, what could they do?

Upon entering the vault, Dick Turpin looked anxiously about him for some means of egress.

But at the first glance his eye rested upon an object upon which his gaze became fixed instantly.

It was only dimly and indistinctly, however, that he could see what this object was, and, impelled by an irresistible curiosity, he advanced towards it.

Maud followed, but the moment the horrible spectacle was revealed to her vision in all its ghastliness, she shuddered, and clasped her hands over her face, so that her eyes should no longer behold it.

But Dick had seen strange sights before then, though he thought never one so truly horrible.

In a strange, huddled-up, sitting posture, with his back leaning against the wall of the vault, was the figure of a man.

It had, however, almost lost all semblance of humanity. From the head every particle of flesh had disappeared, leaving the skull bare and polished.

Such was the case with every part of the body.

[THE THREE HIGHWAYMEN DIG FOR THE BURIED TREASURE.]

Not one shred of flesh or skin anywhere adhered to it. The glistening bones were, however, covered in many places by fragments of apparel.

By these fragments of apparel the sex of the skeleton could alone be determined.

Sufficient, however, remained to enable Dick to pronounce the skeleton to be that of a man.

Truly was it an awful sight, and a strange one too, and it can scarcely be wondered at that the highwayman should look upon it with the amount of interest he evidently did.

The strangest thing of all was that the wrists and ankles of the skeleton were manacled.

The circlets of iron now pressed upon nothing but bone, and fitted loosely, yet there they were, and the chains proceeding from them were fastened to the wall.

Round the bony wrist was a stout belt of iron, which must have weighed many pounds.

To this was attached a chain of massive links, and this was secured to an immense iron ring which was strongly set in the stone-work near the skeleton's head.

From this, it was palpable that the form upon which Dick gazed had in life been a prisoner.

But how it was that he remained there in that condition was a mystery.

Many and many a rolling year had elapsed since that poor wretch had breathed his last, but there still remained sufficient of the apparel to indicate that it had been manfactured in an age long since gone by.

The most obvious inference to be drawn from this strange spectacle was that the unhappy victim had been chained to the wall in that noisome vault, and left to perish of starvation.

There was a pitcher at the skeleton's feet, which had doubtless once held water, but now it was dry.

Dick Turpin felt an amount of interest in this figure for which he could scarcely account.

He felt that he would give much to learn its history, and he hoped—though the hope seemed a vain one—that the time would come when he should be acquainted with some of the particulars.

Maud shrank back.

"Come away, Dick!" she said—"oh, come away! Do not look upon that awful sight! It is horrible—most horrible!"

"It is horrible, Maud—I grant you that; but these poor relics of humanity ought not to have the effects of inspiring terror in your heart."

"They ought not."

"Uncover your eyes, then, and look upon it. Perhaps never again will you behold anything so singular!"

"I hope I never shall!" said Maud, as she uncovered her eyes for a moment, and then replaced her hands.

"But what an awful fate this must have been to have overtaken anyone! I tremble when I think of it. Before, I had no idea such barbarity existed, though I have seen enough of the evil side of human nature!"

"What barbarity?"

"Ah, Maud, I find in glancing hastily you have not noticed the most singular sight of all. Look, now—the poor figure cannot harm you! Do you not perceive that its wrists, ankles, and waist are heavily manacled, and that it is chained to the wall?"

"I do—I do!" replied Maud, who, when she heard this, felt her curiosity assume the mastery over every other feeling, and she now gazed intently upon the skeleton, despite the disgust which she strove vainly to repress.

"Is not that a horrible fate, Maud?"

"It is—it is!"

"You see it is quite clear and beyond all dispute that this unfortunate being, let him be whom he may, has been chained to the wall, and there left to starve until death freed him from his sufferings."

"Could such things be done intentionally?"

"I am loth to think so, and yet there are people in the world who never care a jot how much others suffer, so that they are free from pain themselves."

"But look!" said Maud, "it would seem that at some time or other he must have been supplied with food, or at any rate with water."

Maud pointed to the pitcher by the side of the skeleton as she spoke.

"It does seem like it, Maud," replied Turpin; "but this, I fear, is one of those things about which we shall never know any more than we do at present."

"It is very probable; but Dick——"

"What?"

"Surely you cannot have forgotten the danger we are in? While we are lingering here, the officers may take measures to surround us."

"It may seem strange to you, Maud," replied Turpin, who gave a sudden start when his companion spoke, "but if you will believe me, I was so entirely wrapped up in the contemplation of this sad spectacle, and so full of various conjectures concerning it, that I had in truth forgotten that we were in so much peril!"

"I feared as much."

"Thanks, Maud, for recalling me to myself! Above all others, this is not the time to linger over such things. How silent all this place is! Where can the officers be? Why have they abandoned the search?"

"I am bewildered."

"So am I. Still, the best and only thing to be done is to push on through these passages, in the hope that by doing so we may at length emerge into the open air."

"Do you think there is a probability of such a thing?"

"I do. I believe there is every probability of it."

"Why?"

"Because at the time when the mansion above us was built—and that must be hundreds of years ago—it was customary to construct such secret passages as these, so that, in the event of such a thing being necessary, the inhabitants might quit the dwelling unperceived."

"I have often read of such things."

"No doubt you have."

"And you expect that this passage will lead us to some distance from the house?"

"That is what I expect."

"I hope it will."

"So do I; but come, let us try to find some exit from this vault, though I feel convinced that were I to live a thousand years I should never forget that ghastly sight!"

"Do you not think it strange that the officers should have suddenly become so silent?"

"It is most inexplicable."

"I could almost bring myself to believe that while we remain here we shall be in no danger."

"You must not give way to this feeling, dear Maud! We are in danger, and the sooner we get out of here the better."

"I shall be glad to leave it."

"And no wonder. There is one thing which puzzles me. I would give a great deal to know what could be the meaning of the rapid discharge of two volleys of firearms in succession. Something must be meant by it, but what, I am at a loss to think. I am unable to arrive at any conclusion as to whether it bodes me good or ill. It was done by my foes, and therefore I ought to think the last. Still, I am baffled, and scarce know what is the best thing for me to do!"

CHAPTER DXXV.

MR. WRIGGLES AND HIS OFFICERS MEET WITH A TERRIBLE MISHAP IN THE SUBTERRANEOUS PASSAGE.

DICK TURPIN spoke the truth.

He was puzzled, and well he might be, for the singular occurrences set conjecture at defiance.

Strange as it may seem, it is nevertheless true that Dick longed to hear some sounds that would indicate that his foes were keeping up the chase.

He felt that would be a satisfaction could he but hear some sounds.

The reason is, that then he would have known just what he had to expect, and would have been under no sort of doubt or hesitation as to what should be his course of action.

He could not help thinking that the silence of the officers arose from the fact that they had hit upon some scheme by which they could make sure of capturing him.

From this it will be seen that Dick had all the time a feeling hanging over his head that something was about to happen of a disagreeable character.

No doubt the reader feels quite as curious about the proceedings of the officers as Turpin did, and also would like to have the mystery of those two rapid discharges of firearms fully explained.

To do this, we will for a little while leave Dick Turpin and Maud alone with the skeleton in that dreary vault, seeking to find some mode of exit from it, while we devote a brief space to the chronicling of the proceedings of Mr. Wriggles and his officers.

It will therefore be necessary for us to go back to the moment when the police officers, having found that Dick Turpin had played them a trick, had demolished the door and rushed into the armoury.

How they found this apartment vacant we already know.

The secret door standing partly open was a thing that could not escape the most cursory observation of the officers, who hurriedly dispersed themselves about the armoury in search of some indication of the route by which the fugitives had left it.

That was a glorious discovery, and with elated hearts they all rushed down the staircase.

Mr. Wriggles went first, and uttered the most horrible cries, indicative of the exultation which he felt.

How it was that they all reached the bottom of the spiral staircase in the incredibly short space in which they did without meeting with some serious accident is a mystery.

The steps were worn and broken, and slippery with damp.

The officers, however, were lucky enough to reach the bottom without having had a fall.

They were brought up with great suddenness by the strong door which was placed at the foot of the spiral steps.

They had not been on the look-out for such an obstacle, and consequently they came against it with great force.

The confusion thus caused lasted but a moment.

Mr. Wriggles waved his lantern, and caused the beams of it to fall in rapid succession over every portion of the door.

He ground his teeth when he saw how strong it looked and how well it appeared to be secured to the stone-work.

There were no fastenings, too, that he could see, and, therefore, as he not unnaturally imagined, they must be on the other side.

From the moment when he saw the secret door was open, he congratulated himself that his troubles were almost over, and that he should achieve his long-sought purpose without much trouble.

He had, as he considered, run the redoubtable highwayman to earth.

But now that strong door quite altered the aspect of affairs, and he foresaw that he should have a great deal of trouble.

This thought occupied his mind for but a moment.

Drawing a pistol from his belt, he seized it by the muzzle, and struck some heavy blows on the door with the butt-end of it.

A hollow, reverberating noise ensued, but no notice whatever was taken of his summons.

Raising his voice to its highest pitch, he shouted:

"Dick Turpin! Once for all, and all for once—will you surrender? I am determined to stand no more of your foolery! If you don't give in at once, you may make up your mind to expect the worst! Will you surrender? If you don't reply, I'll batter the door down!"

To this speech there came not a word nor a sound in reply.

Infuriated beyond measure, Mr. Wriggles rapidly reversed the pistol he held in his hand, and, taking a hasty aim, fired at the middle of the door.

There was a crash of wood-work, and, when the smoke had rolled away, Mr. Wriggles perceived that the bullet had gone through the door.

But it did not appear to have produced any other effect.

There was no cry or groan that would indicate that either of the fugitives had been hit.

Mr. Wriggles was furious at having been foiled again.

"Down with the door!" he yelled. "D—n you all! what do you stand on one steps like that for, like a parcel of stuck pigs? Down with the door!—batter it down, I say!"

"It strikes me, Mr. W.," said Jim Lickfold, "that's a d—d sight easier said than done! Howsomedever, here goes!"

The police officers now made one unanimous attack upon the door, with the firm resolution of battering it from its hinges.

But the door was strong and well set in the wall, and resisted bravely the furious onslaught that was made upon it.

It must not be forgotten, too, that the police officers were but ill provided with such implements as would serve to batter down a door.

They were, too, in a very inconvenient position to perform such a deed, for they could not stand fairly before the door.

In spite, however, of these difficulties, they hammered and slashed away with right good will.

The door was only a wooden one, and after the lapse of some time, the officers, by perseveringly continuing their efforts, succeeded in forcing the door from its hinges.

It was reduced almost to splinters, though, before it gave way.

Mr. Wriggles and his companions tumultuously descended the two steps that led down into the vault.

The former waved his lantern about him, and stood in readiness to fire, should his eye by chance alight upon the person of the highwayman.

But nothing save the dark walls of the vault met his straining vision, and an oath of disappointment escaped his lips.

"Where are they?" he gasped, and he turned round twice on his heels as he spoke—"where are they, I say?"

"D—d if I know, Mr. W.!" said an unmistakable voice. "This here is about the rummest start as ever I knowed, that it is!"

"Peace, fool!"

"Oh, you be d—d!"

"Mr. Wriggles turned round, and would no doubt have immediately inflicted summary chastisement upon Jim Lickfold, only that individual very prudently beat a hasty but by no means dignified retreat.

Mr. Wriggles shook his fist, but that was the only manifestation of his wrath he could make, for Jim Lickfold was out of his reach.

Subduing his anger as well as he could, Mr. Wriggles proceeded to make an examination of the vault-like place in which he stood.

That Dick Turpin was not an inmate of it no felt quite certain.

In pursuing his investigations, however, he discovered that there was a narrow arched entrance leading out of the vault.

It was a narrow passage, apparently extending in a straight line.

The first thing Mr. Wriggles did after perceiving this exit from the vault was to fire a pistol down it.

The report sounded with astounding loudness in that underground place, but no sound arose to indicate that it had produced any effect.

Calling to his men to follow him, and holding his drawn sword in one hand and the lantern in the other, Mr. Wriggles dashed off down the passage.

It was low, and he had to advance in a stooping posture, to prevent his head coming in contact with the roof.

Ere long he discovered that the passage did not proceed far in one direction.

He paused at a place where the one passage diverged into two.

This was a puzzler.

The passages branched off like the fork of a tree, and seemed to be at an equal angle.

Now, Dick Turpin was just as likely to have taken one of these passages as the other, and how was Mr. Wriggles to tell which way he had gone?

He could not tell, for, though he searched narrowly on the ground, he was unable to discover the least signs of footsteps.

In this emergency he was fain to consult Jim Lickfold.

"Jim," he said, suddenly, "come here!"

"All right, Mr. W.! What's the matter?"

"What's to be done now?"

"D—d if I know!"

"Think, fool!"

"Don't be so complimentary, Mr. W.! I can't abear to be complimented. However, if I must give you my opinion——"

"What is it?"

"Why, that Dick Turpin must have taken one of these passages."

"Of course; but which?"

"That's just what I should like to find out!"

"Can't you suggest anything?"

"Well, it strikes me, Mr. W., there's about only one thing as you can do."

"What is that?"

"Divide your force into two equal portions, and one half take one passage, and the other half the other!"

"I had thought of that," said Mr. Wriggles, "and I suppose it is the only thing that can be done. I don't like it, because, you see, it weakens our force, and consequently lessens our chance of capturing him."

"I grant all that, Mr. W., but you can't do nothing better."

"Well, I consent. I will take the lead of one half and you can conduct the other."

"Very good, Mr. W. Any mortal thing to oblige!"

The party of police officers now divided themselves into two equal portions, one of which Mr. Wriggles placed himself at the head of, and Jim Lickfold the other.

They then proceeded along the passages.

They were immediately out of sight and hearing of each other.

Under these circumstances, this was unquestionably the best mode of proceeding which the officers could adopt.

Neither party met with any obstacle.

The passage continued to be of the same height and width throughout.

Suddenly, however, the sound of footsteps came upon the ears of Jim Lickfold, and he advanced with greater caution, for he began to think that the glory of capturing Dick Turpin was about to descend upon himself.

It was singular, but almost at the same period of time the sound of footsteps came in the same way upon the ears of Mr Wriggles and his party.

He became at once attentive, and advanced with caution, so as to be in readiness for the attack.

There could be no doubt about the footsteps.

All his men could hear them.

"Now, my lads," said Mr. Wriggles, "don't wait for the word of command from me, but the moment you catch sight of your foes, fire, for the sooner we get this disagreeable business over the better."

The officers were all of just the same opinion.

Louder and louder came the footsteps.

Another moment, and some dusky figures could be seen.

In obedience to the commands they had received, the officers fired, Mr. Wriggles, however, setting the example.

Those in front returned the fire almost at the same moment, and the police officers were not a little surprised at the extent of the volley.

Deep groans, however, came upon their ears, and Mr. Wriggles dropped his lantern.

He had been wounded in the left arm.

Just at this moment, a voice which all recognised exclaimed, with the greatest emphasis:

"Well, I'll be d—d!"

CHAPTER DXXVI.

IN WHICH THE MYSTERY OF THE DISCHARGE OF THE FIREARMS IS FULLY ELUCIDATED.

It was Jim Lickfold who spoke.

There could be no mistaking his voice after it had once been heard, and he spoke as he did in consequence of his intense astonishment.

A few words will suffice to explain this matter fully to the reader.

The passage leading out of the vault diverged in the way we have described; but both these paths led to the same point, for the two passages converged into one.

What purpose this was intended to answer was more than they could tell.

Doubtless it was to enable anyone to have a better chance of escape in case of pursuit.

As is well known, those houses built in troublesome times were nearly always furnished with some secret mode of egress, by means of which the inhabitants could escape in case circumstances should arise causing them to fly.

The fact of the passage branching off into apparently two different directions, and then gradually converging into one passage again, would no doubt perplex and mislead those who were in pursuit.

We have seen how Mr. Wriggles fared.

So cunningly were the passages contrived, and so little did he anticipate any such event, that when he heard footsteps he made sure it was the highwaymen he heard approaching, for all the officers were under the impression that the four highwaymen were secreted in the deserted mansion.

The fact was, the approaching footsteps which he heard were those of Jim Lickfold and his companions.

Thus both fell into the same mistake.

Each took the other for the highwaymen, and hastily fired.

Luckily for themselves, the two volleys did not produce such disastrous effects as one would have expected.

Nevertheless, three of the officers were killed upon the spot, and two were so badly wounded that their recovery seemed very doubtful.

Others were hurt more or less, and Mr. Wriggles had been struck on the left arm near the wrist by a bullet.

The wound was not a very serious one, but it took all the use out of his arm, and so he dropped the lantern, thus adding darkness to the horror of the scene.

Although his astonishment was so great, Jim Lickfold was the first to recover himself.

He could not make out what had happened, but still he had sense enough to spring forward and pick up the lantern.

He was just in time to prevent its extinction.

He held it straight for a moment, and then it burned clearly enough.

By the aid of its beams, he took a survey of the dreadful scene around him.

Groans smote upon his ear from every side.

Those who were only slightly injured hastened to scramble to their feet.

Mr. Wriggles uttered the most horrible curses that ever came from the lips of a human being.

He saw that, by some inexplicable means, his divided forces had met, and each mistaking the other for the enemy, had fired, and hence the deplorable result.

It was frightful to think of.

Some time, of course, elapsed before they recovered themselves.

Those who were dead and those who were badly wounded were left just where they were.

This disaster, so far from inducing Mr. Wriggles to abandon his pursuit of the highwaymen, only served to make him more determined to prosecute it to the utmost.

Calling all the men together who were able to muster themselves, he once more led the way.

Upon going a few steps further, the mystery of their encounter was revealed.

"Why, d—n me," cried Jim Lickfold, "if those two passages don't join into one! Here's a go! I'll be d—d if this don't beat everything!"

"Come on—come on!" said Wriggles; "while we are hesitating here, we are allowing the highwaymen every chance of making their escape!"

"Oh, cuss them! It's d—d odd to me if they ain't far enough off by this time!"

"No—no!"

"It's d—d odd to me if they ain't!"

"It cannot be!"

"Why not? It seems to me that they know the ins and outs of this place, and we don't, and so they are off by now, depend upon it!"

"I will not take that for granted. Ten to one if they know this place better than we do, and perhaps at this very moment they are not very far off! Come on! Come on, I say!"

"Just as you like. Only, if you will take my advice, you won't make quite so much noise!"

"You be d—d!"

Although Mr. Wriggles spoke thus contemptuously, he must have thought Jim's advice was good, for he became immediately silent.

"Mr. W.," said Jim, "will you listen to me for a moment?"

Mr. Wriggles had been about to rush forward in pursuit, but he changed his mind.

He had great confidence in his follower, Jim Lickfold, though he had not the grace to show it in a proper manner.

Of course he never admitted it.

On the present occasion he stopped short, and in no very gentle tones, said:

"Well, cuss you!—what now?"

"You are excited, Mr. W.," said Jim, coolly, "and I don't wonder at it! However, if you could be calm a moment and listen to me——"

"Well, go on! Are you going to stop palavering all night?"

"No—no; but you may feel sure, as I told you before, the chaps we want are all above-ground by now, and are a larfin' at us! Don't swear, Mr. W.! But I feel sure I'm right! Depend upon it, the best thing you can do is to get back to the open air; and when we do, if we don't see something of them, never take my advice again!"

Mr. Wriggles paused irresolutely, and felt more than half convinced that the course of action which his subordinate proposed was the best that could be adopted.

"And then, Mr. W.," continued Lickfold, "just think of the result of this unfortunate mistake! Some of the chaps are badly hurt, and common humanity almost compels those who have been lucky enough to escape to carry their less fortunate comrades to some place where their hurts would stand a better chance of getting looked to than they could in this place."

This was a speech such as one would hardly have expected to hear from Jim Lickfold's lips.

It showed, however, that his heart was in the right place, and it is very certain that there are a good many worse people in the world than Jim Lickfold.

Mr. Wriggles did not remain long in a state of hesitation.

The longer he reflected, the more he felt convinced that Jim was right.

All that had happened seemed to point to the fact that the highwaymen were familiar with their whereabouts.

Mr. Wriggles was pretty sure that the highwaymen had taken up their quarters in that deserted mansion for a lengthened period, and he judged that it would be only natural for them to make themselves familiar with every part of the building.

Besides, his own wrist pained him very much, and so he altered his mind, and said:

"Well, Jim, I will take your advice for once, but it is more on account of those who are hurt than anything else, and I scarcely think you are right in supposing that they have left the vaults."

Jim seemed to know that his superior officer was not speaking with candour, and so he merely put his finger by the side of his nose, and cried:

"Gammon!"

Of this Mr. Wriggles affected to take no notice, though he must have heard the word.

As speedily as possible, those officers who were unhurt raised the bodies of their wounded and dead companions, and carried them along the passage until they reached the spiral flight of steps.

Up these they proceeded with rather more slowness, for, now that their excitement was over, they found out how slippery the steps were.

Mr. Wriggles was in a state of mind that is truly indescribable.

He had suffered more injury among his men from this unfortunate mistake than he probably would have done in a desperate encounter with the highwaymen.

It was agreed upon that the dead and wounded bodies of the officers should be deposited on the floor of the armoury.

This was done as speedily as possible, and having promised that the men should have assistance as speedily as it could be obtained, Mr. Wriggles commanded the rest of his force to follow him.

First of all, however, he took off his neckcloth and made it into a sling, in which he carried his wounded arm, for he felt that holding it down increased the pain until it became almost more than he could bear.

Jim Lickfold had stanched the blood by binding a handkerchief over the wound and tying it tightly.

Mr. Wriggles and Jim Lickfold both cut a very deplorable figure, and both suffered a great deal of pain.

The latter, it will be remembered, suffered severely from the teeth of Black Bess.

The gallant mare had left a mark upon him which he would not easily get rid of.

Both with their left arms bound up, Mr. Wriggles and Jim led the way along the armoury, down the stairs, and out into the open air.

In the course of his life, as these chronicles have fully shown, Mr. Wriggles had many and many an unsuccessful encounter with the highwaymen.

Many and many a time had these encounters ended in a most disastrous manner to himself and to the men under his command.

But never before had there been an expedition in which he had wasted so much time, had been so unsuccessful, or which had terminated so disastrously to all concerned.

As for the highwaymen, he did not believe he had inflicted the slightest injury upon them.

These were anything but pleasant reflections to be compelled to make, and Mr. Wriggles found them so

Curses, both loud and deep, came from his lips.

But as we have said, they at length reached the open air.

Mr. Wriggles was not quite blind to all caution, and so he mustered the remnant of his band of men just underneath the window we have so often had occasion to describe.

Having done this, he crept forward stealthily.

But although he looked keenly all around him, he could not see the least signs of the fugitives.

Jim Lickfold even began to be doubtful of the correctness of his supposition.

His heart misgave him.

But he would not give up.

He reflected a moment, and then he said, suddenly and with great briskness

"Come on, Mr. W.! This way! We don't stand no chance of seeing them here!"

"Not anywhere else!"

"Oh yes, we does! Come on! I took particular notice which way the passage ran! This is the direction! We shall have to go round to the other side of the house!"

These words set Mr. Wriggles thinking, and a few moments' reflection convinced him that Jim was right.

"Come on!" said Lickfold. "It's d—d odd if we don't catch sight of them after all!"

With these words, the party of police officers silently and cautiously made their way round to the other side of the deserted mansion.

Scarcely had they gained it than Jim cried, in tones of suppressed exultation:

"D—n me, I'm right, after all! There they are—there they are, Mr. W.! Quick! D—n me, we shall have them yet!"

CHAPTER DXXVII.

DICK TURPIN AND MAUD AT LENGTH STAND BENEATH THE OPEN SKY.

WHETHER there was or was not any foundation for the outcries Jim Lickfold raised, succeeding events will very quickly show.

Having followed the police officers up to this point, we will occupy ourselves with the (to us) far more congenial task of relating what happened to Dick Turpin and Maud.

It must be stated first that Dick Turpin was by no means so well assured that there was an outlet to these passages as Maud thought he was.

Such a thing was, however, extremely probable.

It was a great pity that no kind fairy could have whispered in the highwayman's ears a faithful account of the precise state in which affairs stood.

That was quite out of the question—there was no possible means by which Dick could become acquainted with the facts which are in possession of the reader.

A few minutes' search served to show the fugitives another door similar to the two last they had encountered.

Upon removing this, Dick was much rejoiced to feel the cool fresh air blow against his face.

He drank it in as though it had been nectar, and as he did so, he murmured:

"Saved—saved!"

Maud, too, was sensible of the difference of the atmosphere, and inhaled it with as much pleasure as her husband, for after the noxious vapours of the dungeon it was doubly pleasant and refreshing.

"Did you say we were saved?" she asked, scarcely daring to believe in the reality of such glad tidings.

"Yes—yes, dearest!"

"How so?"

"This fresh air which blows so gratefully upon us shows clearly enough that there is an outlet not far off, and where that air comes in we shall be able to get out!"

"Oh, joy—joy!"

"You are rejoiced, and so am I. It will be a relief to gain the open air once more."

"And the officers?"

"I don't think we need fear them. The outlet to this passage must be, I should think, at some considerable distance from the house itself."

"Ah! I have thought——"

"Of what? You seem alarmed!"

"I am—I am!"

"What is the cause? Surely all is well!"

"No, no—all is not well!"

"What is not? Speak at once!"

"I may be wrong, but I feel almost certain I have arrived at the true solution of the officers' extraordinary behaviour!"

"Good heavens!"

"Hush—hush! I am so alarmed that I can scarcely speak!"

"Nay, nay—calm yourself, and speak! Do not keep me in suspense! If you are right, the sooner I know the better!"

"Yes, yes—I will try to tell you!"

Maud was breathless with agitation.

At length she spoke:

"Oh, Dick—Dick!" she said, "by some means or other they must have heard there was an outlet to this passage, and so they have hastened to it in order to pounce upon you at unawares as you emerge, and make you prisoner before you can defend yourself!"

Maud spoke these words with great energy, and Dick was absolutely startled.

The idea was an alarming one, and for a moment he believed that this was the true solution of the mysterious occurrence.

A little reflection, however, convinced him that this could not be.

He drew a long breath of relief as he said:

"No, no, Maud—you are wrong—quite wrong!"

"Wrong?"

"Yes, such is not the true solution!"

"How do you know that?"

"I feel sure of it!"

"Why?"

"If it was so, a portion of the officers would have remained in the passage, and would have driven us forward, or at any rate have prevented our retreat. No, no, Maud—you are quite wrong!"

Maud was by no means convinced of that, although Dick spoke with so much certainty and confidence.

Trembling in every limb, she followed him along the passage.

At every step he took, Dick felt more and more confident that the outlet was close at hand.

He fancied he could smell the sweet green turf.

Although he spoke as he did, he could not altogether divest his mind of every particle of doubt.

Maud might be right, although the more he thought it over the more he felt inclined to think that she was wrong.

Gradually and yet perceptibly the passage became lighter, until at last the fugitives could see before them a small patch of light.

This was the outlet.

A little while ago, they thought they would have rushed forward with joy upon making this discovery, and now Maud hung back, and prevented her husband from advancing quickly.

He suffered himself to be detained without making much resistance.

He was thinking that it was rather a fearful amount of risk to run to attempt to pass out through the aperture, and the thought was one well calculated to make him pause.

There was not only himself to think about, but his companion, whose life he prized far, far above his own.

When within about a dozen paces from the outlet which would lead him to freedom, Dick came to a dead stop, for he could not make up his mind to proceed any further.

He taxed his brain to the utmost, in the hope of being able to hit upon some scheme by which he could ascertain whether his foes were in ambush at the mouth of the cavern or not.

At last he nodded his head to Maud, and pressed her hand encouragingly.

"I have thought of a plan," he said, "by which I can ascertain whether the officers are outside or not. Stand still here for a moment!"

Maud clung tightly to him, and would not let him move.

"What are you going to do?" she asked.

"Come with me, and I will show you. There is no danger."

With these words, Dick led Maud nearer to the entrance.

She trembled excessively.

But she soon comprehended what Dick was about to do, and grew a little calmer.

In the first place, Dick took off his hat and stuck it on the point of his sword.

Extending the weapon to the full length of his arm, Dick crept along the side of the passage until close to its extremity.

Slowly he pushed the hat outside the entrance, so that if the officers were outside and watching for him to make his appearance, they could not fail to see it.

With no small amount of anxiety and suspense, Maud watched for the result of this experiment.

But all was still.

Not the least movement was made.

"It's all right, Maud!" said Dick, with a sigh of satisfaction. "There's no one here—I thought there scarcely could be!"

Still, Maud shrank from advancing, and it was not until Dick threatened to go out without her that she overcame her fears.

Her heart ceased to beat, however, as they approached the end of the passage, so firmly had the idea taken possession of her mind that the officers were in ambush outside.

When she gained the open air, however, and found that her suspicions had no foundation, she burst into tears.

But they were tears of joy which she shed, and every one gave her relief and did her good.

Dick let them flow on, without making any attempt to check them.

But he spoke to her in as cheerful a voice as he could assume.

"There, Maud," he said—"I told you that your alarm was groundless. Here we are beneath the open sky, and at last free from danger!"

"Yes, yes—I see we are!"

"Well, then, all is well! Dry up your tears, dearest! Dick Turpin has had another narrow escape."

Maud shuddered.

But she dried her tears and looked about her, and when she saw that the night sky was above her, and that the stars were twinkling overhead, she felt more composed.

The deep silence, too, had a most soothing effect upon her, and she soon regained a considerable portion of her lost firmness.

She looked around her, and said:

"I see no officers."

"No, Maud, nor I; and, do you know, I have an idea connected with their apparently unaccountable abandonment of the pursuit."

"What is it?"

"Do not be alarmed. It is really quite a comforting idea."

"Then let me—oh, let me know it!"

"I don't know how it is the thought did not occur to me before. I suppose it must be the fresh air that has cleared my brain. Don't you remember that as we came along the passage there was one part that branched off?"

"Yes—yes!"

"If you will recollect, after some hesitation I chose the right-hand path."

"You did—I remember it well."

"Then you may rely upon it the officers turned off to the left, and at this moment they are doubtless wandering through the maze of passages which I feel convinced exists beneath that mansion."

This supposition sounded so very, very probable, that Dick did not hesitate a moment in believing that it was perfectly correct.

"All is well, Maud!" he cried. "Surely you will cheer up now! There is but one thing that we require, dear one, and then I would laugh at Mr. Wriggles and his officers!"

"What is that?"

"Cannot you guess?"

"No."

"It is Black Bess—my bonny, bonny Black Bess! Could I but gain possession of her, I should not care a jot! She has carried a double burden before to-day, and will do so again, especially after her long rest."

"But can you reach her?"

"I hope so. What is there to prevent me?"

"Nothing that I know of."

"Did you leave her safe in the stable?"

"Yes. I went in as usual this morning, and fed her well."

"That is right. A load is taken off my heart. Are all her trappings on?"

"Yes; Claude put them on—not properly, but still she carries all upon her back. The bit wants putting in her mouth——"

"Yes, and the girths tightening—that's about it. I am glad Claude was so thoughtful. It will be of important service to have her ready for the road."

"What are you about to do, Dick?"

"If you will be guided by me, you will remain here, just where you are standing, and I will creep forward and enter the stable."

"No, no—do not leave me! Take me with you! If we are separated, I shall be terrified to death! I will be cautious—very, very cautious!"

"Well, you shall accompany me, for you have been truly brave to-night. We will mount Black Bess at the stable door, and then off and away!"

Nothing in the world would have induced Dick Turpin to approach the deserted mansion on this occasion, save the imperative necessity that compelled him to do so.

Without Black Bess he should be nothing: and, besides, he could not leave her in the hands of his foes.

Let the risk be what it might, he must regain possession of her

Of course the reader is full well aware that Dick was totally ignorant of the attempt which Mr. Wriggles and his officers had made to capture his gallant mare.

He little dreamed that he was running the risk of approaching the stable for no good.

At that very moment Black Bess was free and roaming who could say where?

CHAPTER DXXVIII.

MAUD GAINS COURAGE IN THE HOUR OF NEED, AND RENDERS DICK TURPIN AN ESSENTIAL SERVICE.

DICK TURPIN'S danger was now greater than it had been at any previous moment of that most eventful night.

Always before, he had known what risk he was about to run, and could form a good idea of the extent of his danger.

Now he was like one wandering in the dark.

The idea had unfortunately taken possession of him that his foes were down in the passages.

Instead of that, they were stealthily approaching him.

If he entered the stable, surely he would be caught.

Slowly and cautiously did Dick Turpin make his way towards it.

To do so, of course he had to come much nearer to the deserted mansion.

Suddenly a faint sound struck upon Dick's attentive ear, and then a shout, which told plainly enough that he had been seen by some of his enemies.

It was Jim Lickfold's sudden and exultant exclamation which he had heard first.

The shout which followed came from the lips of Mr. Wriggles.

He had caught sight of the forms of Dick Turpin and Maud, and he was so overjoyed that he could not contain himself.

He made a rush forward, and was quickly followed by his men.

"We must make a run for it now, Maud!" said Dick Turpin, hurriedly, between his teeth. "I did not think they were so close at hand. Come—come!"

Maud was almost paralysed with terror when she found they had so closely approached their foes.

She was ready to give up all hope now.

Dick did not say as much, but he felt that he was unequal to the exertion of running far.

Indeed, how he had kept up so long and so well as he had was a mystery, considering his physical condition.

It may safely be affirmed that it was intense excitement, and nothing else, which enabled him to go through and perform what he had done.

He had, of course, every incentive for exertion that a human being possibly could have.

But the time of reaction would of course have to come, and when it arrived it would be truly fearful.

He would be prostrated.

But he drew his breath hard, and nerved himself for the violent exertion he was so suddenly and unexpectedly called upon to make.

In addition to running himself, he had almost to carry Maud.

The poor girl felt every moment as though she must fall to the earth.

But she bore up bravely and did her best.

Dick Turpin of course made his way in a direct line to the stable, in which he imagined Black Bess still stood.

This was a proceeding which rather astonished the police officers, and puzzled them as well; but [illegible] may be expected, Jim Lickfold was the first to understand what it meant.

He laughed gleefully.

"All right, Mr. W.," he said—"all right! Lor' bless you, don't put yourself about! Take it easy! Easy does it! Don't you hurry! Can't you see what the blessed move is?"

"No."

"Dear me! It's as plain as the nose on your face! That's Dick Turpin yonder, and he is making full speed to the stable. That's where he's bound for!"

"How can that be? Black Bess isn't there."

"I know that, and it's a d—d good job for us she isn't. But Dick Turpin don't know that."

Mr. Wriggles uttered one of his peculiar yells, which rather alarmed the fugitives, who could not think what was the cause of it.

Still, they continued to run, and the officers to pursue them.

Dick Turpin had a good start at the first, and he was able to preserve it—indeed, it almost seemed as though he increased the distance that intervened between them.

"Let 'em alone, Mr. W.," said Jim. "They are running into the trap with their eyes shut! They won't find out that Black Bess is missing until they get into the stable, and then it will be too late! We shall surround the stable door, and then we shall have them as safe as bricks!"

And indeed there seemed every probability of things turning out in the way Jim Lickfold said they would.

How could Dick Turpin become aware of Black Bess's absence until he entered the stable?

So assured did they feel they should be spared all further trouble, that the officers slackened their speed a little, for they did not want to come up with their prey just yet.

It would be all the easier for them when they were inside.

Blindly, as Jim Lickfold said, did Dick Turpin hurry towards the stable.

Every step he came nearer, the more did he felicitate himself that all was well.

When he entered the stable, he calculated his exertions would be over.

Instead of that, they were about to begin.

Strange to say, Dick did not notice that the officers slightly slackened their speed.

He perceived that the distance between them increased, but he attributed this to his own superior fleetness.

The stable door was only a few feet distant.

Dick looked upon that stable as some belated mariner would look upon a harbour.

Once within that and all would be right, and he would cease to care about the past.

He felt that he was taxing his energies to the utmost.

His limbs flagged now and then, and he could not help it.

A minute elapsed.

Then, with a faint cry of joy, he crossed the threshold and stood within the stable.

The first thing he did was to close the door and secure it as well as he was able.

While he was thus engaged, Maud hastened to the stall in which she had left Black Bess standing, in order that no time might be lost.

Then a piercing scream burst from her lips.

Dick Turpin turned round with the rapidity of lightning.

He had put a strong bar across the door, and he sprang forward towards his companion, to whom he feared some dreadful accident had happened.

In tones of agony he cried:

"What—what is it? Speak, Maud—speak! Tell me what has happened!"

"Alas—alas!" moaned Maud

"Are you hurt?"

"No, no!"

"What is it, then?"

"Black Bess——"

"Ha!" ejaculated Dick, cold perspiration all over him. "What of Black Bess?"

"She has gone!"

"Gone?"

"Yes."

Dick clasped his hands frantically over his throbbing brain, and felt for a moment as though he should die.

At length he summoned up strength enough to gasp out:

"Gone—gone? Oh, no! Impossible!"

Bang, bang, bang! came three terrific blows upon the door at this moment.

Dick echoed them with three groans.

The moment of reaction had come.

All hope was over now, he felt assured of that.

His last and only chance was that he should be able to mount Black Bess, and ride away.

And now she was gone.

Gone!

No doubt she had been abstracted by his foes for the purpose of cutting off his retreat.

The mere loss of Black Bess—the thought that she had fallen into the hands of his hated foes—was surely enough to drive the bold highwayman to madness.

Such a thing was almost the worst calamity that could befall him.

Dick felt utterly crushed.

He knew now that his last hope had failed him—that there was not the slightest chance of making his escape.

His foes would conquer.

It would give the police officers but little trouble to force their way into the stable.

Then all would be over.

He might fall covered with wounds; but then there was Maud—what was to become of her?

The thought was madness.

Bang, bang, bang! came the blows upon the door.

Each one seemed to strike him on the heart.

He heard a yelling and exultant chorus of voices without.

He heard a formal summons made for him to surrender.

But he heeded it not.

He groaned bitterly.

Then, after a pause, a terrific attack was made upon the door.

The officers evidently intended to batter it down.

Still, Dick Turpin did not move.

His heart beat with such violence and rapidity that it seemed as though it would burst.

He was so weak, so exhausted, so completely paralysed that he felt himself compelled to lean against the wall for support.

He was now suffering from the effects of his tremendous efforts.

Now that the excitement had left him—now that he saw there was no longer the least possibility of his being able to escape—he was absolutely powerless.

He listened to the furious blows which the officers struck upon the door with a dull, apathetic feeling.

If one of them had entered, then they would have made him prisoner with very little trouble.

Mr. Wriggles did not think Dick would surrender, so he strained every nerve to break into the stable.

He made sure of having him this time.

But where was Maud all this time?

Dick fancied she was standing near, completely overwhelmed by this sad reverse of fate.

But she was not.

When she saw the effect which this discovery had had upon Dick Turpin, she felt her own courage rise.

She resolved to make some attempt to escape.

In her continual visits to the stable, Maud had noticed a door which seemed to lead into either another range of stables or else some inner room.

She had never had the curiosity to look where this door led, but now she recollected it, and resolved to ascertain whether there was any chance of escape in this direction.

Passing through the door, Maud found herself in a small apartment, which she saw immediately had been formerly used as a harness-room, though now it was quite empty.

A hasty examination showed her that there was no door by which they could escape.

But there was a window.

This was enough.

With her heart fluttering with joy and hope, she made her way back to where Dick stood in the strange, dreamy state we have described.

The officers by this time had made fearful progress in their attack upon the door.

It was already half demolished.

Maud was deeply grieved when she saw how downcast Turpin was.

She had to touch him twice upon the arm before he became cognisant of her presence.

He looked dreamily at her.

"Hope—hope!" cried Maud. "Rouse yourself—shake off this dreadful feeling of depression! If you are quick and attend to what I say, all will be well! Do you hear me?"

"Yes—yes!"

"Come this way, then—come this way, and I will show you the means by which you can without difficulty escape from the stable."

CHAPTER DXXIX.

BLACK BESS OBEYS DICK TURPIN'S SIGNAL, AND ONCE MORE SAVES HER MASTER'S LIFE.

Surely, if any words could have roused Dick Turpin from his state of partial unconsciousness, those would which Maud just uttered.

"Escape," he said—"escape? How can I escape?"

"Come with me, and I will show you."

"But have you found Black Bess?"

"No."

"Then it is folly to think of making an escape."

"No—no! Do not think so. Be persuaded by me! Do not linger—oh, do not! If you do, it will be too late. Look—the door is almost down!"

A glance showed that in less than another moment the officers would be able to rush into the stable.

Then the powerful instinct which prompted him to get as far away from his enemies as he could took firm possession of Dick Turpin.

By a sudden effort he seemed to shake off all that lethargy which weighed him down.

"Which is the way, Maud?" he said, with something like his old energy apparent in his tones. "Show which is the way! How can we leave this place?"

Maud did not pause for a reply, but, seizing Dick by the arm, dragged him across the stable to the door that opened into the harness-room.

Dick was surprised.

"I had no idea of the existence of this place," he said.

"Nor I, till now. Ah, they are here!"

These words were pronounced by Maud as she caught sight of the officers rushing into the stable, for the door had been completely battered down.

Dick closed the door leading into the harness-room, but felt in vain for some fastenings by which he could secure it.

He discovered that it was provided with neither bolts, bar, nor lock.

But at that moment his eye fell upon a huge chest that had perhaps been used for a corn-bin.

A sudden effort of strength enabled him to place it against the door.

But it would not form much of a barricade.

The officers were already hammering at this inner door when Maud pointed out the window to Dick.

To scramble through, however, took them but a moment, and as soon as they felt their feet touch the ground, they started off at the top of their speed.

But ere they had gone very far, several pistol-shots were fired after them, for the officers very soon forced open the door of the harness-room, and, rushing to the window, saw the fugitives flying for their lives.

They fired first, and then dashed through the window afterwards.

Dick ran for some distance, and then he paused.

"Maud," he said, "all is over! I can run no further—my strength is quite spent!"

"No, no, no! Don't say that, Dick!"

"I have but one hope, and that is a frail one. It may be that Black Bess has strayed out of the stable, and is somewhere in the grounds. If she is—if she has not been captured—I can call her to my side as easily as I could call a dog."

"Try—try!" gasped Maud. "The hope is faint, but yet——"

[CLAUDE DUVAL SETTLES OLD SCORES WITH RICHARD NARES.]

She said no more, for at that moment Dick Turpin uttered the peculiar whistle we have so often mentioned, and which he had taught his bonny mare was a signal always to be obeyed.

The notes pealed out clearly enough, and scarcely had they died away than there was a sudden rush among the brushwood, and the next instant Black Bess was rubbing her head against Dick Turpin's breast.

Oh, how overjoyed Dick was!

This deliverance was more—far more—than he had expected.

He uttered the whistle almost despairingly, for although he spoke as he did, he scarcely thought it possible that Black Bess would be able to respond to it.

And now his gallant mare was at his side, in readiness for the road. He had but to lift Maud to the saddle, and spring up after her, and then his frightful and terrible danger would be over.

The police officers, however, were alarmingly close behind, and when they saw the highwayman joined by Black Bess, they hurried forward with still greater speed.

They were well aware that the only chance they had of effecting his capture was to seize him before he could mount.

The distance they had to go was very short, and so they had every hope of success.

The possession of Black Bess seemed to have the effect of infusing fresh strength into Dick Turpin's frame.

Under the excitement of the moment he forgot all about his wound and the frightful weakness which had attacked him.

He lifted Maud up and placed her on the saddle, quickly and easily, and the next moment he was seated too.

Although this was done with so much rapidity, yet the officers had time to reach him. Just as he placed his foot in the stirrup, Jim Lickford, who was foremost, seized Black Bess by the bridle.

In another second Dick Turpin was surrounded.

Convinced that promptitude of action alone could save him, Dick drew a couple of pistols from his belt.

Without pausing to utter a word, he fired one full at Jim Lickfold, and the other at random amongst the officers.

With a loud cry, Jim released his hold upon the bridle, and fell bleeding to the ground.

Dick touched Black Bess with the spur, and then she bounded off, clearing her way through the officers, who vainly strove to check her progress.

They were dashed aside for their pains.

Mr. Wriggles was frantic, but, as often happened, his passion was perfectly impotent.

The garden surrounding the deserted mansion was separated from the fields beyond by a low hedge only, and Black Bess had leaped over this and galloped far away before the officers, who had been thrown down, had time to rise to their feet.

"Quick—after them!" screamed Mr. Wriggles excitedly. "We are not defeated yet! I will not give up till I have hunted him to the death! I will kill or capture him—I am determined! I have been very near having him twice—the third time I shall be successful! Quick! I say—mount your horses and follow me!"

Those police officers who were unhurt hastened off to obey Mr. Wriggles's command.

Jim Lickfold lay upon the ground just where he had fallen.

He was groaning as though suffering great agony, and was quite unable to rise.

Mr. Wriggles paid no heed to him.

His mind was too much engrossed by the all-important task of capturing Dick Turpin to take notice of any other circumstance.

Without so much as bestowing a glance upon him, he hurried off after the officers as fast as his legs could carry him.

It will be remembered that when Mr. Wriggles entered the deserted mansion he left the horses in charge of one of his men.

It was towards this spot that they all hastened.

They scrambled into their saddles in a perfectly reckless manner, and galloped off almost before they were seated.

Quite half the horses remained, for their riders were either dead or too badly wounded to join in the pursuit.

Mr. Wriggles fancied his men looked rather shy when they saw this, and he hastened to remove any uncomfortable idea from their minds.

"Now, my lads," he cried, endeavouring to speak in quite a hopeful and exultant tone of voice, "we are not all here of course, but still there are enough to capture one man, and you must know very well that the fewer the better, for when the reward is divided your shares will be all the greater. Come on—we shall make a good night's work of this yet!"

Mr. Wriggles shouted out these words at intervals, as he led the police officers across the garden, over the hedge, and into the field beyond.

But by this time Dick Turpin was out of sight.

They looked all about, but could not see the least signs of him.

Mr. Wriggles would not allow this to have a discouraging effect upon his spirits, and so he continued his vociferations to his men.

"Forward—forward!" he shouted. "We shall have him yet! It may be a long chase; but what of that?—we shall come up with him in good time; he can't keep up for ever; and if we only persevere we shall be able to overtake him!"

The officers tried to set up a shout in reply to this speech, but the attempt was a failure.

The truth was, they were, one and all, about as tired of the night's adventures as they well could be.

Still they didn't dare to disobey their leader, and so they followed him, but not with that eagerness and alacrity which is necessary for success.

Leaving Mr. Wriggles and his officers to continue their pursuit, we will return to Dick Turpin and Maud.

Once free from the officers who had surrounded him, the bold highwayman felt himself secure.

It was only for a moment that he had been apprehensive, and now Black Bess had got such a good start of her pursuers, he felt no fear for the result.

Maud clung to him in great terror.

Now that the danger had to some extent passed away, her feelings found vent, and she sobbed and wept bitterly.

That courage and boldness which had been of such service in the hour of need had completely deserted her.

It was a difficult task, but Dick Turpin tried his best to calm and soothe her.

With his left arm he supported her in the saddle, while in his right he held the reins, and guided Black Bess clear of the many obstructions that lay before him.

"Cheer up, Maud!" he said; "be of good heart, dear one! the danger is over now. Look up!—look about you, the police officers are no longer near; they have not yet been able to mount their steeds and commence the pursuit; by the time they do so we shall be far, far away—Black Bess will have obtained such a capital start that it will be impossible for them to overtake us! Cheer up, then!—dry your eyes and be happy, for now this night of peril is over!"

Maud continued to weep in silence.

She could not control this natural outlet to her feelings, and she felt, too, that these tears did her good, and made her feel much calmer.

The only reply she made to Dick's words was to cling still more tightly to him.

Presently she looked up with a smile upon her face.

It was a faint, weary smile, and when he saw it, Dick felt that he would have preferred to see her in tears.

From time to time he glanced back, but he could see nothing of the officers.

Dawn, however, was close at hand—in a little while it would be broad daylight.

It was necessary, then, that he should look out for some place of concealment.

It would never do for him to continue his gallop across the country in open day.

In a little while he would have such a band of pursuers at his heels that it would be quite impossible for him to shake them off.

As he looked about him, however, in search of some hiding-place which would escape the attention of the officers, he felt that dreadful sensation of utter weakness come over him which he had so frequently experienced during that eventful night.

His escape and his unexpected recovery of Black Bess at the time when he despaired of ever seeing her again endowed him with fleeting strength.

The excitement which had produced it passed rapidly away, leaving him, of course, ten times weaker than before.

All around him at that early morning hour was very calm, and this calmness seemed to have the effect of causing his weakness to increase.

Suddenly he felt himself sway to one side, and it was only with the greatest difficulty that he recovered his balance.

That was the first intimation of his weakness which he received.

It alarmed him greatly, and he tried his utmost to shake the sensation off.

By a powerful effort of his mind he succeeded in doing this, and continued on his way.

They were travelling on a wide, cross-country road.

As far, however, as the eye could reach there was no place which would afford the highwayman shelter from his foes.

In the distance, and situated upon a piece of rising ground, was a fine-looking manorial building, surrounded by extensive and well-cultivated grounds, which reached almost to where Dick then was.

This was the only dwelling in sight, and it was not at all likely that Dick Turpin would be able to find refuge there.

Perceiving this, he urged Black Bess onward at a more rapid rate, and he made up his mind to struggle with his weakness for some time longer yet.

Maud had noticed Dick when he leant so suddenly on one side, but did not think what it was that had caused him to do so.

Looking up into his face, however, she was startled at its unusual paleness.

His whole countenance had a worn and haggard look, and his eyes looked dim and lustreless, but at this she could not be surprised, for what he had gone through during the last few hours was sure to leave some trace behind it.

Just as she made this reflection Dick reeled again, this time more dangerously than before, and it was by the merest chance in the world that he saved himself from falling to the ground.

But he did save himself, and as if angry to think his weakness should have obtained the mastery over him, he touched Black Bess with the spur, although her speed at that moment was absolutely terrific.

Maud was alarmed without exactly knowing why She spoke to Dick, and asked what it was that ailed him but she received no reply.

He seemed unconscious that she had spoken.

Alarmed and terrified, she clung tightly to him, and spoke in a louder voice.

"Tell me," she asked—"tell me what it is that makes you look so strangely at me?"

By Turpin's manner and the movement of his lips it would seem as though he was trying to speak.

But, if such was his intention, he failed completely, for not a murmur issued from them.

More terrified than ever, Maud gazed into his countenance.

At length, after what was evidently a most painful effort, Dick said:

"Help!—he—lp—I—I!"

He could articulate no more

With a sudden lurch his body swayed to one side. This time he had no longer the power to make an attempt to recover his balance.

Quite helpless—quite insensible, Dick Turpin fell from the saddle and reached the ground with a dull crash, carrying Maud with him.

His arm was round her, and she was clasping him tightly.

Dick's left foot was entangled in the stirrup, and he was dragged along the road for several yards.

But Black Bess, with her rare intelligence, perceiving that something was amiss, brought herself to a standstill as soon as she was able.

She trembled in every limb, and her eyes were expressive of the utmost terror.

Maud had fainted with alarm, and Dick Turpin was insensible.

And so, as motionless as though dead, they lay together on the hard roadway, without anyone to look upon them save Black Bess.

Where was Mr. Wriggles now?

CHAPTER DXXX.

TOM KING MAKES AN EASY DUPE OF THE LOQUACIOUS LANDLORD, AND CLEVERLY CHEATS THE OFFICERS.

It was only for a moment that the countenance of Richard Nares remained pressed against the window pane, peering into the room in the Golden Lion, where Tom King and his two companions sat.

The hideous-looking countenance vanished almost as quickly as it had appeared, and the landlord and the others in the room never saw it at all.

As soon as the face disappeared, Tom King sank down into his chair again.

"What is the matter, sir?" asked the landlord again, his curiosity raised to the utmost pitch. "Pray tell me what is amiss? Why did you start so violently from your chair?"

The rapidity with which Tom King recovered his composure was really most remarkable.

But he was well aware that in all probability upon his calmness depended the safety of himself and his two companions.

Claude Duval and Sixteen-String Jack controlled themselves as well as they were able, but they had both caught sight of the countenance of Richard Nares, and felt certain that it boded no good to them.

They recollected the threats to which he had given utterance as he stood behind the hedge in the lane, and Claude Duval wished more than ever that he had put it out of his power to do them any mischief.

Although their acquaintanceship had been so short, Tom King had obtained a tolerable insight into the landlord's character, and he was certain that without he gave him some plausible account of what it was that had caused him to start up so suddenly and manifest so much agitation, he would not allow them to rest.

To invent something, then, on the spur of the moment that would satisfy the landlord's inquisitive curiosity was no easy matter, but luckily Tom King was struck with a happy thought.

He was not without a hope that he should be able to turn this incident to his own advantage.

When the landlord stood up and asked what was the matter, of course all the others who were assembled in the room looked anxiously towards Tom King in expectation of his reply.

Tom King threw an expression of great mysteriousness into his countenance, and beckoned the landlord towards him.

That individual advanced gladly enough, and then Tom King bent towards him and whispered in his ear:—

"Can I have five minutes' conversation with you? I want to take you into my confidence."

Now, if there was one thing more than another that the landlord of the Golden Lion was fond of, it was to be taken into anyone's confidence.

He was never so happy as when he was troubling his head with his neighbour's business.

His face quite lighted up with a smile, and he said:

"Certainly, sir, I am much obliged to you. Come this way."

Tom King rose, and beckoned to his comrades to follow him.

"We shall be back immediately," said the landlord, turning to the rest of the company—"I am going to have some private conversation with this gentleman."

This was said with such an air and tone of importance, that Tom King, although his mind was occupied with very serious thoughts, could scarcely refrain from laughing.

The landlord led the way out of the room, across the passage, and into a little private apartment that was situated behind the bar.

"Be seated, gentlemen,—pray be seated, and then I shall be at your service."

The highwaymen sat down, and then Tom King, turning towards the landlord, addressed him as follows, to the no slight astonishment of his companions:

"Landlord," he said, "it requires but a very slight amount of penetration to enable anyone to perceive that you are a man gifted with no ordinary amount of intelligence. It is also quite as easy to see that you are a man who can be trusted, and in whom implicit confidence may be placed."

The landlord of the Golden Lion had never had such a flattering speech made to him before in the whole course of his life, and, naturally enough, he was not a little confused and embarrassed.

"Gentlemen," he said, stammeringly—"that is, I mean—sir—or, gentlemen, at least—sir, you——"

"I quite understand your feelings," said Tom King, "and they do you infinite credit. However, I don't wish to compliment you, but I entrust you with a very important secret connected with Government."

The landlord was overpowered.

He had been entrusted with secrets before, and, as he believed, very important ones, and had experienced the utmost delight; but they all sank into insignificance when compared with a secret connected with Government

He was literally burning with impatience to know what his guest was about to say.

To speak the honest truth, Claude Duval and Sixteen-String Jack were scarcely less curious.

"You noticed me start up from my chair," said Tom King, "while you were speaking to me?"

"Y—es, sir, I did."

"I thought so—you have remarkable powers of observation. In all probability you saw what it was that made me spring up so quickly?"

The landlord hardly liked to confess it, and so it was with much hesitation that he said:

"I did not, sir."

"Ah, well—it don't much matter! I will tell you! First of all, however, you must understand that we are three detectives who have been sent down purposely from London."

The landlord looked aghast.

"Three detectives?"

"Yes, myself and my companions."

Claude Duval and Jack both nodded.

"Why—why, gentlemen, what's the matter?—what can have brought you down to these parts? I have not heard of anything, I can assure you—nothing at all!"

"Very likely," said Tom King. "We have come down here in pursuit of a great criminal; he made his escape, and we have tracked him to these parts."

"Oh, indeed!" said the landlord, breathing a little more freely, for he was frightened to death lest he should find that something had occurred in the neighbourhood that he knew nothing about.

"Yes," said Tom, "we have tracked him as far as the forest. Have you seen any stranger about?"

The landlord paused, and appeared to reflect deeply.

"Would you mind describing him, sir?" he said, at length.

"No, I have no objection!" Tom thereupon gave a full and accurate description of the personal appearance of Richard Nares.

He concluded by saying:

"We are making a very close search for him. Have you seen anyone within the last day or two answering to this description?"

Very reluctantly, the landlord confessed that he had not.

"When we came in," continued Tom, "we thought of having a good rest, for we had travelled many miles in pursuit. Duty, however, now calls us away."

"Why so, sir?"

"I forgot that I hadn't told you the reason why I started up from my chair."

"No, you have not told me."

"Well, it was because I saw the very man of whom we are in pursuit looking through the window into the room."

"Good gracious!"

"It's a fact, landlord, and so it's quite clear that he is lurking somewhere about! I have taken you into my confidence and entrusted you with this secret because I wish you to assist me in effecting his capture."

The colour faded a little in the landlord's face, for he was by no means a courageous man, and he asked, unconsciously:

"What do you want me to do?"

"Nothing that will give you very much trouble, and yet something that will render us great service."

The landlord looked relieved, and the colour came slowly back to his face again.

"We must capture this man in our own way, and you must say nothing about it. In the first place, you must lead us to the stables, and help us to get our horses ready. Then, if you can show us some other way of leaving your inn yard than the one by which people generally do leave it, you will be fully entitled to the reward of five pounds, which sum I offer you in the name of his Majesty the King."

If Tom King had made this proposition in a less skilful manner than he had done, the probability is that the landlord would have had his suspicions aroused; but Tom had found his weak points, and played upon them with great skill and advantage.

The landlord was quite carried away, and failed to perceive anything extravagant in what Tom said.

Taking his hat from off the peg behind the door upon which it hung, he put it on his head with great determination, and, buttoning his coat, said, emphatically:

"Gentlemen, I am a loyal subject, and ready to serve his Majesty. This way to the stables, gentlemen. You will see that I shall very quickly earn the five pounds."

The three highwaymen were almost convulsed with laughter, and they preserved their gravity with extreme difficulty.

The landlord seemed to be so full of loyalty and valour that Tom was afraid he would attract the attention of the other people in the inn.

"Hush!" he said. "You must be silent—you must not make the least noise. You might alarm him, and then he would again escape."

The landlord did not speak, but nodded his head, to show that he perfectly understood; he placed his fingers on his lips with a ludicrous gesture, and walked on tiptoe out of the private parlour into the bar, and along the passage to the back door opening into the yard.

He went first, and the three highwaymen followed; but the manner in which the landlord walked upon tiptoe was really too amusing, and they were obliged to indulge in a little silent laughter.

The landlord went straight to the stables, and assisted the highwaymen to saddle their horses and get them ready for the road.

This took but a very short time indeed, and our friends prepared to mount.

Just as the horses were led out of the stable-door, however, a loud knocking or hammering sound reached the ears of all.

The landlord turned round twice in surprise, and then said:

"Gentlemen, whatever is that?"

"I have no idea," said Tom.

"But—but, gentlemen, it sounds like some one knocking at my front door, and if they keep it up at that rate they'll batter it down completely."

"Never mind," said Tom King, "you must recollect that you are engaged in the service of his Majesty, and in the service of his Majesty's Government. All you have to do now is to show us the way out of the yard, and the five pounds are yours; and when you have got that you can run and see what all that knocking is about."

"This way, gentlemen. There's a door here through which you can pass easily enough, though it is not a very wide one,"

"And where does it lead to?" said Tom King.

"Into my paddock where I turn my horses."

"That will do excellently," said Tom King. "Here are the five pounds I promised you, and you may depend that I shall not fail to represent your conduct in the proper light to the authorities as soon as I return to London."

With these words, Tom King placed five pounds in the landlord's hands, and passed through the door leading into the paddock, leaving the landlord bowing and uttering his thanks, completely overwhelmed by his good fortune.

The forms of the three highwaymen quickly faded from his view, in the darkness.

How long he would have stood gazing after them is hard to say, only he heard the knocking which at first attracted his attention, and which now appeared to be going on more vigorously than ever.

Wondering what could be the cause of it, he ran into the house, and entered the passage just in time to see the front door opened, and a body of police officers rush tumultuously in.

As soon as the foremost of these officers caught sight of the landlord, he rushed forward and seized him.

"Explain this!" he cried. "What is the reason we have been detained so long knocking at your door? Explain yourself at once! Your conduct seems suspicious, and I feel strongly inclined to give you into custody!"

The landlord opened his mouth and goggled his eyes furiously, but uttered no sound.

"Search the inn thoroughly," said the officer who held the landlord—"leave no part unvisited! Beyond doubt we shall discover them!"

The officers at once dispersed themselves about the inn.

"Now, landlord," said the chief officer, "explain your conduct, or I shall give you into custody!"

"My conduct?"

"Yes. Why did you keep us so long at your front door?"

"I came as soon as I could, but I was engaged," and the landlord assumed an important air as he spoke. "I was engaged in assisting his Majesty and his Majesty's Government."

The police officer gazed in some astonishment into the landlord's countenance.

He fancied, and not unreasonably, that he must be just a little mad.

Having spoken, however, the landlord looked down with a kind of disdain upon the officer, who he now considered to be almost beneath his notice.

"Say that again," said the officer. "I can't accept that as an explanation; you must tell me in what manner you were assisting his Majesty's Government. I feel more suspicious of you than ever!"

"It is a secret," gasped the landlord, who began to feel rather alarmed—"it is a secret."

"Then, for your own good, I would seriously advise you to make a clean breast of it. You would find it so very comfortable thing to be marched off to Southampton Gaol!"

"March me to Southampton Gaol!" cried the landlord, indignantly. "I am sure his Majesty would never permit that, after the important service I have rendered him this evening."

"Are you mad?" said the officer. "You must be; I can't bring myself to believe that you are in your proper senses!"

Just at this moment the police officers who had been engaged in searching the inn returned.

"We can't find anyone, sir," they said, addressing their chief; "but we have learnt that three persons answering to their description were seen in the house a quarter of an hour ago."

"Arrest this man, then!" said the chief officer, pointing to the landlord. "Put the handcuffs on him immediately—he is a desperate character!"

Before he could recover himself, the landlord found he was handcuffed and a prisoner.

'None of your larks, now!" said the officer who held him—"you had best be quiet; if you ain't, it will be the worse for you!"

"But, gentlemen," said the landlord, who by this time began to realise the fact that he was in a very uncomfortable situation—"gentlemen, I say you are doing quite wrong—you are under some mistake."

"Why don't you speak out, then?" said the chief officer. "What were you doing?—why did not you open the door? In what way were you assisting his Majesty's Government?"

The landlord knew he was pledged to secresy, but yet he thought his wisest plan would be to tell all, for he imagined then he would be immediately set at liberty.

"It is a secret," he said, "but three detectives from London put up at this inn not long ago."

"Three fiddlesticks!" said the chief officer.

The landlord did not deign to notice the interruption, but went on:

"They told me themselves that they were in search of a great criminal. They saw him look through the window and then run off, after which they requested me, in the name of the King, to assist them in capturing him."

"And what did you do?" roared the chief officer.

"Do?" replied the landlord. "Why, as I am a loyal subject, I assisted them to serve the King."

"How—how?"

"I took them to the stables——"

A roar came from the officers.

"Helped them to saddle their horses, and showed them the way out of the inn yard into the paddock."

The landlord would have gone further with his explanations, but such a terrific uproar was raised by the police, that his voice could not be heard.

After several attempts, the chief officer succeeded in raising his voice above the tumult of sound.

"Keep the landlord secure!" he cried; "he must have thought we were natural-born fools if he imagined we were going to be taken in by such a tale as that. Assist his Majesty's Government!—a fine idea that! He has helped the three highwaymen to escape. It strikes me, my friend, you will look very queer when you are brought before the judge on the charge of having harboured, abetted, and aided those three daring highwaymen, Tom King, Claude Duval, and Sixteen-String Jack to escape from his Majesty's officers!"

Upon hearing these dreadful words, the landlord of the Golden Lion broke out into a cold perspiration.

His teeth chattered and his legs shook to such a degree that he could scarcely stand.

He began to find that he had made a horrible mistake—that, so far from having assisted his Majesty and his Majesty's Government, he had rendered himself liable to a charge of felony.

The prospect before him seemed to grow more and more alarming each moment.

The officers were in a terrible rage to think that they had been foiled when they were so near to accomplishing their object, and they were almost ready to sacrifice the landlord to their resentment upon the spot.

Probably the only thing that prevented them was the thought that he would be severely punished for what he had done.

"It is no good stopping here," said the chief officer; "of course they are far enough off by this time; but we will keep upon their track, and rely upon it we shall hear of them before long. You, Barrin and Philips, will remain here with the landlord, and I shall hold you responsible for his safe custody till I return."

The two officers named at once placed themselves on either side of the landlord, while the others hastily left the inn, mounted their horses, and rode away.

Before we describe the result of the pursuit, and before we return to the three highwaymen, we will in a few words explain the presence of the officers at the Golden Lion.

After Richard Nares had uttered the threatening speech which we have recorded in a former chapter, he lost no time in communicating with the officers.

In a very little while he had quite a large troop at his heels, who were all exceedingly anxious to effect the capture of the three highwaymen.

Richard Nares declared that he did not wish to take any portion of the reward, and this made the officers like him better than ever.

It is not necessary for us to describe minutely the progress of the officers to the Golden Lion.

Richard Nares led them in this direction, and upon reaching the inn—or rather upon drawing near to it—he requested the officers to halt while he went forward to reconnoitre and ascertain whether those they sought had happened to take up their quarters there.

This he did.

Approaching the inn carefully, he crept round it, peeping in at all the windows on the ground floor, until he came to the one which looked into the apartment in which the three highwaymen were seated.

He saw them at once and recognised them.

He was also aware that he himself had been seen, for he observed Tom King start suddenly to his feet.

He waited for no more, but hastened off to the spot where the officers were waiting.

In a few words he communicated the welcome intelligence that the three highwaymen were at the Golden Lion Inn, and so they hastened towards it.

With what happened afterwards the reader has already been made acquainted, and we will now occupy ourselves with relating the fortunes and misfortunes of the three highwaymen.

CHAPTER DXXXI.

THE THREE HIGHWAYMEN MAKE A SECOND ESCAPE FROM THE GOLDEN LION, AND SUCCEED IN DISINTERRING THE MINER'S TREASURE.

Tom King and his two comrades trotted quickly across the paddock which was situated at the back of the inn.

It was of no great extent, and in less than a moment they had reached its boundary.

This was simply a low wooden railing which divided it from the forest.

To leap over this was easy enough, and, under the guidance of Tom King, who was well acquainted with the locality, they plunged among the trees.

He led them into an open glade of considerable length.

Smooth green turf was beneath the horses' feet, and they galloped onwards at great speed.

Upon reaching the termination of it, they once more passed beneath the shadow of the trees.

"There is no occasion to hurry now," said Tom King "For the present, we are perfectly safe. We need not go faster than at a walk."

"You deserve very great credit, Tom," said Claude Duval, "for your ingenuity, and the cleverness with which you got us out of this last scrape."

"So say I," exclaimed Sixteen-String Jack, "though I should scarcely have thought you would have so easily made the landlord your dupe."

Tom laughed.

"I found out his weak points, that was all. I think, however, that we ought to congratulate ourselves upon our good fortune, for if those we heard knocking at the front door were not police officers, it is very odd to me."

"Confound that villain Richard Nares!" said Claude Duval. "He will give us a great deal of trouble yet. Oh, now I regret now that I didn't put it out of his power to be a trouble to anybody!"

"It is no good regretting the past," said Tom King; "the best we can do is to make our way as rapidly as possible to the tree beneath which the treasure is hidden, and if we are lucky enough to gain possession of it, the sooner we take our departure the better."

"I quite agree with you," said Sixteen-String Jack. "We have had sleep, a good meal, and our horses have been properly attended to, so that we are quite in readiness for this adventure."

"Stop!" said Claude Duval, suddenly.

"What is the matter?"

"Did you not say that the treasure was buried?"

"Certainly."

"Well, then, how are we to get at it? Where are our tools?"

"I had forgotten all about them," said Tom King; "but now you mention it, it will be necessary for us to get a pickaxe and a spade."

"I was afraid so," said Claude, "and that is why I spoke, but could we not manage to do without them?"

"No, for the chest is deeply buried. We must have both the implements I have named, and where in the world we are to obtain them from, I have no idea."

"I think I can get you out of that difficulty," said Sixteen-String Jack.

"How?"

"There would be some little risk and danger, but still I think it might be done."

"Speak out, then."

"Well, when I followed the ostler into the yard with the horses, I watched him feed them and such like, according to custom, and while doing this I noticed several gardening implements standing in one corner of the yard."

"You mean at the Golden Lion?"

"Yes."

"But how are we to get them?" said Tom King. "You may depend the police officers were pretty close behind Richard Nares when he peeped through the window, and indeed, as I said a little while ago, if that knocking at the front door did not announce their arrival, it is very odd to me."

"You may depend it was that and nothing else!" said Sixteen-String Jack.

"Well, then, while the officers are about, would it not be very dangerous to return?"

"It looks to me very much like putting your head in the lion's mouth!" said Claude Duval.

"The danger is a point to be considered," said Sixteen-String Jack. "The articles you want are in the inn yard. For my part, I think I could fetch them without running very much risk."

"We must have a spade and pickaxe," said Tom King, "that is very certain, but still I hardly fancy the idea of going back to the Golden Lion to fetch them."

"I think we could manage to approach the back premises unperceived," said Sixteen-String Jack.

"Very likely we could."

"Well, then, I am on particularly good terms with the boy who does duty as ostler, and if he was about I should merely have to lean over the wall and ask him, and he would give me what we require in a moment."

"But suppose he should not be there?"

"Why, then I would go through the door myself, or, if it was fast, climb over the wall. I know just where the things are, and could get them and be off before the officers or the people in the inn had the least notion that we were so close at hand."

"I suppose necessity will compel us to run this risk," said Tom King, "though, believe me, I can hardly reconcile myself to it."

"Nor I," said Claude Duval, "for after having succeeded in getting away, it seems the height of foolhardiness to return."

"It is not worth while to stop lingering here," said Sixteen-String Jack. "In all probability, by the time we get back to the inn we shall find that the officers have left and commenced a pursuit after us. If that is the case, why then all will be well."

"Very good, then," said Tom King, "I will lead the way back."

He turned his horse's head round as he spoke, and made his way towards the back of the inn.

He took quite a different path through the trees, but this was a necessary precaution, as it diminished the danger of being seen.

In a little while they reached the railing which bounded the paddock.

Here they paused to reconnoitre, but finding all was still, they leaped over without hesitation.

Very cautiously they approached the wall that divided the inn yard from the paddock.

It was a good height, but still as they were on horseback they could look over it easily enough.

They found the yard was perfectly quiet.

Lights could be seen, however, at the various windows of the inn, and a loud hum of voices reached their ears, telling them plainly enough that some excitement or other was going on inside.

"It seems all right," said Sixteen-String Jack, in a whisper. "I don't see the ostler, but that doesn't matter; the spade and pickaxe are in yonder corner, and I can get them in a moment."

"Is the little door fastened?"

"Let us see."

Upon reaching the little door through which they had passed, they found, as they quite expected, that it was secured on the inner side.

"Never mind," said Sixteen-String Jack; "you hold my horse and I will be over the wall in a twinkling."

Claude Duval took hold of the bridle.

As he spoke, Sixteen-String Jack stood up on the saddle, and so gained the summit of the wall.

He sat astride it for a moment before he ventured to descend, but reassured by the continued silence, he cautiously lowered himself until he hung at the full length of his arms.

He was then within an inch of the ground.

He let go and stood perfectly still.

No one was about, and he stole swiftly across the yard to the corner where he had seen the gardening tools.

He possessed himself of the spade and pickaxe instantly, and as he did so he noticed that close by was a pair of steps which were probably used to clean the windows of the inn.

'That will help me over the wall bravely!"

As he spoke, he took hold of the steps and ran towards the wall.

When about half-way across the yard, however, the back-door was flung open, and a bright light streamed forth.

It so happened that this light fell full upon the form of Sixteen-String Jack, and revealed it with tolerable distinctness.

Jack heard the door open.

He didn't stop to look, however, but ran still more rapidly towards the wall.

The loud report of a pistol struck upon his ear, and at the same instant he felt a stinging sensation in his neck.

He knew that he was hit, and staggered slightly.

The wall, however, was just before him, and, making a desperate effort, he placed the ladder against it and hastily descended.

His two comrades were at the top.

Tom King took hold of the pickaxe and spade, and Claude Duval seized him by the arms and dragged him over.

While thus engaged another shot was fired, which was followed almost instantly by a brisk volley.

All that we have just described occurred with a rapidity that was quite bewildering.

The door was opened by the chief police officer, who had made up his mind that the landlord should show them by which route the highwaymen had left.

No sooner was the door opened than he caught sight of Sixteen-String Jack running at full speed.

He was within a few paces of the door.

To draw a pistol and fire it was the officer's first impulse.

The noise of the report attracted the attention of everyone, and the remainder of the police officers rushed tumultuously into the yard.

The one in command could just see the dusky figures on the top of the wall, and fired again, at the same time commanding his men to fire also.

He was obeyed, but before they fired all three highway-men had disappeared from the top of the wall, so that no effect was produced.

The officers had heard the landlord say there was a door in the wall through which the highwaymen had passed, and they ran forward to find it.

They did so very quickly, and the bolts having been withdrawn, the door was dashed violently open.

Short as was the time occupied by these proceedings, yet Claude had been able to assist Sixteen-String Jack into the saddle.

The wound which the latter had received was not a serious one, but yet it bled profusely.

As he was heated with excitement, he thought nothing about it.

Just as the officers rushed through the door, the three highwaymen cleared the palings.

They were instantly among the trees, and so they succeeded in accomplishing their second escape.

The police officers were furious at their defeat, but they observed in which direction the fugitives had gone, and, mounting their horses, they commenced the pursuit.

As soon as they had gone a little distance, our friends paused.

Tom King and Claude knew that Sixteen-String Jack had been hit, and were anxious to learn whether the wound was serious or not.

They were not able to examine it very closely, but, as far as they could tell, it was only a flesh wound, that would require no other treatment than a simple bandage to check the flow of blood.

The large neckcloth which he wore served admirably for this purpose, and Claude folded it, and tied it with sufficient tightness round his neck to stanch the blood.

"I feel a little sick and faint," said Jack, in reply to his comrades' eager inquiries, "but otherwise I am all right."

"That feeling will soon pass away," said Claude. "The wound is a scratch, and nothing more."

"Forward, then," said Tom King; "follow me! We had better make what speed we can, for we are decidedly too near the officers to be at all agreeable."

It was greatly in their favour that Tom King possessed so good a knowledge of the intricacies of the forest as he evidently did.

He led them onward without hesitation.

From time to time they paused to listen, but on no occasion could they hear anything of their pursuers.

This was scarcely to be wondered at, for among the trees there were so many paths that it was next to an impossibility for the officers to be able to choose the right out of so many wrong ones.

Tom King carried the shovel, and Claude Duval the pickaxe.

"We are all right now," said the latter; "and if you, Tom, will only just lead us to the tree you have mentioned, we will quickly have the chest out of the ground; and then, in my opinion, we can't make too much haste out of the forest, for if we stay much longer we shall make it too hot to hold us."

"I will do so," said Tom King. "We have yet some distance to go, but still we shall not be very long reaching the tree. I quite agree with you, Claude; you may depend what has taken place at the Golden Lion to-night will cause no trifling amount of excitement."

Sixteen-String Jack was silent. His wound caused him more pain than he would have liked to confess.

While making their way towards the tree beneath which the miser's chest of gold had been hidden, our friends occupied themselves in congratulating each other upon the success they had had, not only with respect to their escape from a perilous position, but also with respect to the obtainment of the tools they needed.

At last, the much-wished-for spot was gained.

Claude Duval and Sixteen-String Jack looked about them with great interest and curiosity when Tom King said:

"Yonder is the tree near which the treasure is buried."

"Are you sure you are right?"

"Yes. I could tell that tree from a thousand. Do you not perceive that it has a monstrous hollow trunk—at any rate, it appears to be hollow—and from the upper portion of it there grows another young tree?"

"It is, in truth, a singular object," said Claude Duval, "and though I have never seen it before, I am sure I could recognise it again."

"A few yards to the left," continued Tom King, "is the dell you have heard me describe, and in which the poor old miser met with his death at the hands of his own servant."

Tom alighted from his steed as he spoke, and his two comrades followed his example.

"I think we are quite clear of our pursuers," he said, "and it will take only a short time to unbury the treasure, and when we have done that we will be off."

"Jack had better hold the horses," said Claude Duval, "as he is wounded—we will do what digging is required between us."

"Agreed!"

Accordingly, Sixteen-String Jack held the horses, and Tom King having pointed out the exact spot, Claude Duval set to work with the pickaxe, with great vigour.

When he had loosened a quantity of earth, Tom King cleared it out with the spade, and by thus working alternately, they quickly had a deep hole in the ground.

Suddenly Claude Duval felt the point of his pickaxe strike upon something hard.

"What is this?" he said.

He loosened the earth and Tom shovelled it out.

The top of the chest containing the miser's treasure was then exposed to view.

After about a quarter of an hour's hard labour, the earth was quite dug away from round the chest, and all that remained, was to lift it out of the hole.

This promised to be the most difficult part of the whole affair, and had not the chest been furnished with a massive iron handle at each end, it would have been well-nigh impossible.

Tom King and Claude Duval sat down upon it to recover breath, for they were quite exhausted by the tremendous exertions they had made.

But knowing time was valuable, they wiped the perspiration from their faces and started up.

"Now, Tom," said Claude, "if you will be kind enough to show us how to open this strong-looking chest, we will stow as much of its contents about our persons as we can, and then say farewell to the New Forest.

CHAPTER DXXXII.

THE POLICE OFFICERS OBTAIN POSSESSION OF THE MISER'S TREASURE, AND DIVIDE THE SPOIL AMONG THEMSELVES AND RICHARD NARES.

"You must not run away with the idea," said Tom King, "that I know anything at all about opening this box."

"The deuce you don't!"

"No; as I told you, we buried it without even so much as looking at the fastenings."

"Then," said Claude, as he stooped down and examined the front of the box more closely, "it strikes me we shall have a troublesome job to get it open."

"Very likely. The old miser would take good care to have it well secured; but we have some powerful tools with us, and we must do our best with them."

The box appeared to be fitted with three locks, while it was crossed and re-crossed in every direction by stout bands of iron.

"I am afraid we shall not be able to force open the lid," said Tom King, "it seems too firm; I should fancy the weakest part would be the bottom."

"Help me, then, to turn it over."

It required the whole of the united strength of the two highwaymen to effect this, but by the aid of the handles, they at last turned it bottom upwards.

It did not look as if this was a weaker part than any other, for it was divided into little squares by the bands of iron just the same as the top and sides.

"This is a puzzler, Tom," said Claude. "I don't know what we are to do."

"We must get the box open somehow. Suppose you try the effect of your pickaxe upon it?"

"With all my heart," said Claude, who thereupon commenced a violent attack with the pickaxe, but the only result achieved by this was the making of a number of deep indentations, for the wood of which the box was composed, having been buried so long, was soft and moist, so that, instead of splitting when these heavy blows were struck upon it, the point of the pickaxe sank in.

"That is no good," said Claude, after a few minutes' labour. "We must think of something else."

"Now that we have run so many risks," said Tom King—"now that we have to a certain extent succeeded, it will never do for us to be baffled by being unable to force open the chest."

"But how is it to be done?"

"Suppose we turn the box over on to its side, and try what effect the pickaxe will produce on the locks?"

"I should be inclined to think that it would demolish them completely," said Claude.

The huge chest was rolled over on to its side, so that the keyholes were uppermost.

Claude whirled the pickaxe round his head, and brought it down with terrific force upon the keyhole in the centre.

A crash was the result.

"That lock is considerably damaged, I should say," remarked Duval; and as he spoke, encouraged by his success, he struck it again in the same place, and then the lock appeared completely demolished.

The other two locks were now treated in precisely the same fashion, and after many heavy blows had been struck, they at last had the satisfaction of seeing the lid fly open.

Before, however, they could look to see what the contents were, their attention was attracted towards Sixteen-String Jack, who uttered a low warning cry.

"What is it?" they asked.

"I fancy I can hear some one approaching stealthily?"

This was serious, and the highwaymen assumed listening attitudes.

They heard the rustling of the underwood, then and there was a hasty rush of footsteps, and a voice cried:

"Now, my boys, be quick, and we shall have them! One sharp touch, and it will be over!"

Before these words were spoken, the highwaymen comprehended the full and exact extent of their danger.

They knew that by some means or other the police officers had managed to track them to this spot.

To attempt any resistance they knew would be nothing short of madness, as the officers so far outnumbered them.

Vexatious as it was to be interrupted at such a moment, and loth as they were to leave the treasure behind them, our friends were nevertheless compelled to mount as hastily as they could, and gallop away.

They were able to do this before the officers came near enough to attack them, although they fired several shots after their retreating forms.

This did no injury, for the highwaymen were instantly hidden among the trees.

A pursuit was not commenced, for one of the police having noticed the miser's chest with its glittering contents strewed upon the ground, set up a loud shout, which caused the others to look round.

No sooner did they see what had caused it than they resolved to let the highwaymen alone until another opportunity presented itself.

Running up to the chest, they surrounded it, and quickly emptied all that it contained upon the ground.

The party which had just arrived and put the highwaymen to flight comprised Richard Nares and most of the troop of officers he had induced to follow him.

Of course they knew nothing about the old miser, and were ignorant of the fact that the chest and what it contained belonged to him, or rather his heirs.

Reasonably enough, the officers jumped to the conclusion that the money and other valuables contained in this chest were the produce of some robberies, and that the highwaymen, being unable to carry away their booty, had buried it.

The chief police officer was not a very scrupulous man, and he considered for a few moments in what way he should act with respect to the discovery he had so unexpectedly made.

He glanced at his men, and saw that they all looked rather longingly at the glittering pile of wealth on the ground.

"A-hem!" he said, pretending to clear his throat—"just attend to me for a moment!"

His followers gathered about him, for they expected that something interesting was coming.

We have had a very troublesome job in pursuing these highwaymen, and as yet we have got no good for our pains. Now, this chest was no doubt buried by them some time back, and their motive for visiting the forest on this occasion, was to dig it up again. Of course, as you all know very well, we are in duty bound to make this discovery known in the proper quarter, and take some of the money ourselves, but I think, under all the circumstances, and considering what a deal of trouble we have had, we have a better right to it than anyone else."

His followers set up a shout, by which they intended testifying their entire assent to what their chief had just said.

"Well, then," he continued, "if you will only consent to my terms, we will have this money, and no one will be the wiser, and after we have got it, we can continue our pursuit of the highwaymen just the same. True, if we can catch them, the reward we shall obtain will be so great that, added to what is on the ground yonder, it will make us all independent men for life."

This was a very tempting prospect, and the police officers were very anxious to know what their chief's terms were, though some went so far as to promise to consent to them beforehand.

"Let me see," he said. "Including myself, there are twelve of us, and Richard Nares who gave us the information makes the thirteenth. Now, what I propose is, that the money and the other valuables are divided into fourteen portions, that you all take one each, and that I take two."

The police officers agreed to this without a murmur, and so did Richard Nares.

The miser's gold was counted out into fourteen shares, which were very quickly appropriated.

Each man had quite a large sum of money about him.

"Now then," said the one in command, "let us set off after these rascals, and if we can only capture them, all that I can say is, that we shall have made a very good night's work of it."

The officers set up a cheer, and, guided by their chief and Richard Nares, plunged into the forest in pursuit of the highwaymen.

Before our friends had gone far they discovered that no pursuit was being made after them, and so they came to a halt.

"Could you imagine anything more vexatious?" said Claude Duval, in a tone of voice which showed clearly enough how aggravated he was. "To think we should have had all that trouble, and then, just as the treasure was ready to be put into our pockets, for those lubberly police officers to make their appearance!"

"We are not pursued," said Tom.

"No; and a good reason why," replied Claude—"they would see the box, and would not hesitate to appropriate its contents to themselves, and they much prefer doing that to keeping up the pursuit after us."

"I suppose it is so."

"You may depend upon it. I wish you could just turn back quietly, and then you will see them dividing the gold, sure enough."

"I am quite willing to do so," said Tom King, "for now that we have had all this trouble and risk, I don't intend that they shall retain possession of the treasure if we can help it."

"Bravo!"

"I am afraid it will not be easy to get the money back again, for their numbers are very superior to our own."

"We shall see that," said Claude, and as he spoke the highwaymen turned round and retraced their steps towards the spot from which they had so precipitately fled.

They approached with great caution and stealthiness.

When at a short distance from the tree, they looked through the bushes, and saw that Claude was perfectly correct.

The officers were engaged in dividing the treasure.

Our friends remained perfectly still, watching them.

Then, as we have already stated, the officers darted off in pursuit, but they had no idea that the highwaymen were hiding so close to them, and they ran past the bushes behind which our friends were concealed.

In a few minutes they were quite out of hearing, and then the highwaymen ventured to speak.

[MAUD ENDEAVOURS TO RESTORE DICK TURPIN TO CONSCIOUSNESS.]

CHAPTER DXXXIII.

THE THREE HIGHWAYMEN AGREE TO PURSUE THE POLICE OFFICERS THROUGH THE FOREST, AND TO REGAIN POSSESSION OF THE TREASURE.

"I AM afraid we stand but a very poor chance of obtaining possession of any of that money; there are thirteen of them altogether, and thirteen to three is rather too long odds!"

"I agree with you in that," said Claude Duval; "but it will go very hard with me if I don't get that money back again; I don't think we stand much chance of succeeding by force, but we must use stratagem."

"Did you notice," said Sixteen-String Jack, "that Richard Nares was along with the officers?"

"I did!" said Claude, angrily. "A day of reckoning will come soon. I have a long account to settle with that gentleman!"

"He is certainly the occasion of all our troubles on the present occasion," said Tom King, "for had it not been for him we should not have been disturbed at the Golden Lion, and we should have been able to dig up the treasure and carry it off without anyone being the wiser."

"Don't talk about it!" said Claude Duval. "I can hardly contain myself as it is; but it will be a caution not to let another rascal off so easily as we did him."

"But what are we to do next?"

"I can scarcely tell. As regards the officers, we will keep pretty close to them."

Tom King laughed.

"That seems very odd!" he said.

"It does. It is a droll idea for us to be following the officers!"

"Very."

"From what the one in command said, I think we may safely argue that they won't rest until they have tried to capture us for some time longer; they are not wise enough to be satisfied with the money they have already got and disperse themselves! On the contrary, it seems to have made them more eager after the reward."

"It does; and you must remember Richard Nares——"

"Remember Richard Nares!" cried Claude—"I can assure you it will be a very long time before I forget him!"

"I can quite believe that; but what I was going to say was this:—You must remember that Richard Nares is along with the officers, and that he is especially bent upon our destruction, therefore he will not allow the officers to rest until they have made some further efforts. They will be in his power."

"How so?"

"Because, if they refuse to do as he wishes, he will threaten to disclose the particulars connected with the treasure."

"I see—I see—as you say, they will be in his power!"

"I can hear nothing of them," said Sixteen-String Jack, "and we ought not to lose sight of them altogether if we are to succeed in getting the money back again."

"We ought not, but still we need not feel alarmed about their leaving the forest. There are thirteen of them altogether. They will consider that they are quite enough to effect the capture of three persons, and so we need be under no apprehension about their communicating with other police officers, because their object will be to divide the reward among themselves, and not let anyone else in for a share."

"No, they will not leave the forest without they find that we have done so."

"Well, then," said Claude, "let us follow them, and we will try what stratagem can accomplish."

"The New Forest is a large place," said Tom King, "and it will hold us all easily enough. We must be careful not to be surprised by our foes, and in the meanwhile we must devise some plan by which we can get these thirteen men into our power, and take from them the money they each possess."

"Good! Morning will soon be here, and so I am afraid we shall not be able to accomplish much until night comes again."

"We must not show ourselves by daylight—that is certain!"

"No; I think I can take you to a place in the forest, into which the officers would hesitate to penetrate, without they knew that we had done so."

"And we could remain there during the whole of the day, I suppose?"

"Yes—yes; and occupy ourselves in thinking over some scheme by which we can get the better of our foes."

"Agreed! Lead the way at once; and as for the officers, for the present we will leave them to themselves. I am not afraid that they will quit the forest!"

"They will not do so, rely upon it; their own covetousness would keep them here, independently of Richard Nares, and he will not rest so long as he fancies the means of gratifying his revenge are in his reach."

"I am sure he would not, but we shall defeat him and circumvent the officers, I fell sure!"

"Is it very far, Tom," asked Claude, "to the place you spoke of?"

"No, we could reach it in half an hour."

"Then let us do so, for I fancy by that time it will be fairly dawn."

"We shall have to dismount," said Tom King "and lead our horses through some places"

"But safety is beyond?"

"O yes!"

"Well then, the more obstacles there are in the way the better, for then the officers will not be so likely to follow us."

"You are right."

The highwaymen dismounted, and, under the guidance of Tom King, threaded their way through the mazes of the forest.

As they had been told, there were some places where the vegetation was so dense that they had great difficulty in leading their horses through it.

To have proceeded while mounted would have been an impossibility, and on several occasions the only means by which they could proceed on their way was, by Claude and Tom King grasping the low-lying branches with both arms and pulling them aside, while Sixteen-String Jack led the horses through the opening thus made.

As they proceeded the trees grew closer and closer, and the underwood became more and more luxuriant.

The soil was of a swampy character, and their feet sank deeply into it at every step they took.

"This place is a morass of considerable extent," said Tom King, in reply to a question addressed to him by his comrades; "some portions of which are of such a treacherous character, and so soft that they would swallow up anyone who ventured to tread upon them."

"Are you quite sure you know the way, Tom?"

"I have no doubt I can guide you in perfect safety I am quite sure, indeed, without the place has altered greatly since I last visited it."

Tom King led the way with great confidence; apparently there was no path, but yet his companions noticed that where he led them the ground, though soft and oozy, was nevertheless sufficiently substantial to sustain their weight.

After going a little further the ground took an upward tendency, and rapidly became firmer.

In something less than half an hour Tom King paused in a small open space, entirely surrounded by trees.

It was covered with short green grass, and the soil was comparatively dry and hard.

"I don't think there is much fear that the officers will find us while we remain here," said Tom King.

"I fancy we are secure."

"Depend upon it we are; our horses will be all right they will rest themselves, and crop the sweet grass with great pleasure, and it will do them good."

"I shall be glad to rest a little while," said Sixteen-String Jack, "for I feel faint and dizzy."

"No doubt you are; you ought to keep still for a time after receiving such a wound."

"It has ceased to bleed," said Jack, "but before it was bound up, I am afraid I must have lost a great quantity of blood."

"I am glad you escaped so well," said Claude Duval.

"I was very fortunate. But after this trouble, and after receiving this wound, I, for one, shall not rest until we have got the better of Richard Nares and the officers. We have a whole day before us, and therefore there will be plenty of time for several plans to be devised; we cannot occupy our minds better, and we can decide upon the best one."

With this understanding the highwaymen flung themselves down upon the ground, and remained for some time perfectly silent.

Morning advanced with rapid strides, and soon the sun was pouring his rays upon them.

A most intense stillness reigned around that spot, and it was unbroken by the least sound that would indicate the coming of the police officers.

In this way the entire day was spent.

Several plans were thought of and discussed, and eventually one proposed by Claude Duval was agreed upon, after some slight alterations had been made by Tom King.

What that plan was we need not say.

It will be sufficient to see it worked out.

It was considered a very good one, and all three believed that it possessed every element necessary for success.

Now that they had devised what was to be done, they waited with impatience for the day to pass away and night to come.

The entire day passed without any interruption from their foes, or indeed, without our friends hearing or seeing anything of them.

Occasionally they would feel fidgety and apprehensive that the officers should think better of their situation, and determine to rest content with what they had got.

The day's rest made a wonderful difference to Jack.

The flow of blood had been entirely stopped, and as the wound in his neck was little more than skin deep, he felt no serious or painful effects from it.

In a few days at the most it would be completely healed.

The reader may be sure that he was well pleased to find himself in a condition to assist his comrades during their night's adventures; it would have galled him exceedingly had he been compelled to remain inactive.

At last, to the great relief of all three, the sun set, and darkness rapidly came on.

During the twilight the highwaymen, with Tom King for their leader, retraced their steps through the morass, and it was just as night might be said to have fairly commenced that they passed beyond its precincts and gained the forest beyond.

They were in excellent spirits.

"Now, Tom," said Claude Duval, "lead the way once more. Had anyone told me so, I should never have believed that the day would come when, instead of wishing to get as far away from the officers as possible, I should be doing my utmost to come up with them and find out where they were."

"They are searching in the forest beyond a doubt," said Tom King, "and as they have no clue, will probably not stray far from the spot where they found the treasure. I have no doubt we shall hear something of them before long."

Tom King had from the first shown himself such a capital guide that his comrades followed him with perfect confidence.

They proceeded with caution, and listened at frequent intervals, for although they desired so much to learn where the officers were, yet they did not want to come upon them unexpectedly and be taken at a disadvantage.

Indeed, they were extremely cautious to guard against this, for if such a misfortune happened it would entirely ruin the scheme they had formed.

Suddenly Tom King paused and held up his hand in an imperative manner for silence, in order to check his comrades, in case they should be about to speak.

They listened, and they all heard plainly enough that peculiar rustling sound which is caused by persons forcing a passage through the fern and brake, and other vegetation which grows between the trees in a forest.

Every now and then the crackling of a twig would be heard as some stray branch was trodden upon and broken.

The sound of footsteps and of voices could also be heard.

Some persons were evidently approaching, and the three highwaymen shrunk back, for who could these persons be but the police officers?

As the night was profoundly dark, our friends imagined they should be able to escape being seen by the officers, providing they had no suspicions of their presence.

The footsteps came nearer and nearer, and the highwaymen grew somewhat alarmed, lest the officers should walk directly to the spot where they were concealed.

They did not dare to stir, however, for if they did, the rustling which would be made, although very slight, could not fail to reach the ears of the officers who were very close at hand.

From this it will be seen that they had no other resource than to remain perfectly still, and they were in great anxiety to know what would next ensue.

CHAPTER DXXXIV.

IN WHICH THE THREE HIGHWAYMEN CARRY THEIR DARING SCHEME INTO EXECUTION.

THE result of this extraordinary combination of circumstances seemed very doubtful.

The position of the three highwaymen was far more peculiar than pleasant.

With an anxiety that increased so fast that it rapidly became a feeling of alarm, they listened to the steady approach of the police officers.

On they came unswervingly, and our friends were quite certain that, without something occurred to cause them to turn to the right or to the left, they must run with full force against them.

Very luckily, the highwaymen happened to halt just before a kind of thicket, that appeared to be composed of brambles and other prickly plants.

The officers were on the other side of this thicket, and no doubt it would prove a check to their further progress in a straight direction.

This was their only hope.

While in this state of suspense and fear, their joy and surprise may be imagined, when they heard some one call out in a loud voice:

"Halt!"

The tones were abrupt, and such as would be used by one in command.

In fact the word was spoken by the chief officer, though the highwaymen were not certain of it, as they were not familiar with his voice.

The whole troop came quickly to a standstill.

The highwaymen could not see their foes, but they were certain that they were separated from them by a few yards only.

When they heard the chief command his followers to stop, they, naturally, quite expected that they should hear something more, and in this expectation they were not disappointed.

"What is the matter?" said another voice.

This they recognised without difficulty as the voice of Richard Nares.

The harsh, grating, surly tones once heard could ever afterwards be recognised.

"What is the matter, I say again? Why do you halt here?"

Evidently the words were addressed to the chief officer, and Richard Nares was in anything but an amiable frame of mind.

"I called out 'halt!'" replied the chief police officer, in a voice that did not sound one bit more amiable than Richard Nares's—"I called out 'halt!' because I thought I could not do better than bring my men to a standstill."

"Why—why?"

"What on earth is the good of tramping through the forest in this way? We have been at it now for several hours, and what is the result?—we have not so much as got a glimpse of the highwaymen, or heard the least sound to indicate their presence in the forest."

Richard Nares stamped his foot on the ground impatiently.

"I can understand it all!" he said. "It is plain enough to me and to everybody else, now you have got that money you don't care about the reward."

"You are wrong."

"No I am not. If I was, you would have tried better than you have to effect your purpose."

"I have done all I can!" returned the chief officer. "I am quite tired down, and so are all the men. What was the good of going on in this way, when we found there was nothing to be gained by it?"

"I say again," returned Richard Nares, fiercely, "you have not used your best efforts!"

"Perhaps you will take the direction of affairs into your own hands, and see how you will prosper then!"

"No, I won't do anything of the sort," replied Richard Nares—"it is not my business, I don't know anything about it."

"Then how can you say that I have not done right?"

"Because you have not succeeded."

"Bah—stuff!"

"Look here, Mr. Officer," cried Richard Nares, excitedly, "and weigh my words well. If you don't try better, and go to work more in earnest to capture these three villains, I'll split about the treasure!"

"You are as deep in that as we are."

"No I am not; and if I was I should not care; I would suffer a little myself with very great pleasure if I could only make sure of having you punished!"

"You are a nice youth, you are," said the chief officer.

"You had better be civil! I tell you—you are in my power. But it's no good wrangling like this; we shall do harm instead of good. Let us try what can be done."

"Well, don't let there be any illfeeling between us," said Richard; "for reasons of my own I will do and dare anything myself to make these men prisoners—you shall have my full assistance; I will accompany you with them when they are caught, and not leave them till they are delivered to the governor of the jail, and I do all this without wanting one fraction of the reward."

"Yes—yes! We know that."

"I give my share," continued Richard, "to be divided amongst you, and if you will only try a little more during to-night, I will divide what money I have about me amongst you all."

The police officers accepted this offer with very great satisfaction, though they looked upon Richard Nares as being a very queer character.

That, however, was no business of theirs, and if he was fool enough to give up his own share, why so much the better for them.

"Well, now that we have arrived at a friendly understanding," said the chief officer, "let us see what can be done."

"With all my heart," said Richard Nares, "for I want this business over, even more than you do."

"Very good; the sooner the better say I. However, we have been tramping about in this fashion for a long while, and we have not effected the slightest amount of good. Finding this to be the case, I called out 'halt!' so that we should consider over the matter, and adopt some other plan, as we had found this one fail to answer our purpose."

"That is all right and reasonable enough," growled Richard. "Let us hear what you have to propose?"

"I have not thought about anything yet."

"Can't you suggest something?"

"I will try."

There was now a few moments' silence, during which the brains of Richard Nares and the chief officer were actively at work.

The three highwaymen listened to this conversation with the greatest conceivable amount of interest, and they waited anxiously for the rest.

They were in an agony of apprehension, lest their horses should make some slight movement; if they did the sound could not fail to be heard by the officers, and their discovery would be the result.

Now it was highly important that they should remain undiscovered for a little while longer at least, because there seemed to be every probability that they would be able to overhear what their foes intended to do. Such a piece of knowledge as this would be valuable indeed.

So they sat and listened for what should be said next, stroking their horses silently all the while.

It was the chief police officer who broke the silence.

"Well," he said, addressing Richard Nares, "have you been able to think of anythiug?"

Richard replied by gruffly asking:

"Have you?"

"It appears to me that there is only one thing that holds out the least hope of success."

"Let me hear what that is?"

"It is this—hitherto we have all remained together, and this I think is a great mistako. Instead of doing so any longer I propose that we all separate, and creep about with all the stealthiness that we are masters of. Well, in this way you see it will be quite possible for one man to steal upon the highwaymen unawares."

"And what then?"

"The instructions I should give would be that, when any man heard the least sound which he fancied might come from those of whom we are in pursuit, he should blow his whistle."

"Go on."

"This signal would be obeyed by all the rest of us hastening towards him with all the speed we could, and by adopting this plan I fancy we stand a good chance of getting on their track."

Richard Nares was silent for about a minute, and then he said:

"I don't like your plan, but I can't think of anything better myself, and I suppose it must be adopted."

The chief police officer then gave his instructions to his men, adding:

"Don't be afraid about giving an alarm; it won't much matter if you make a mistake on the right side, and you understand, directly you hear a suspicious sound, blow your whistle—you may depend we shall be quickly after you."

Having given these instructions to his men, the chief police officer commanded them to follow him to the tree from among the roots of which the chest had been dug up.

It was close at hand, and his motive for this proceeding was clear enough.

He intended to remain there along with Richard Nares, so that should his men make any important discovery, they might know where to find him if they wished to communicate some intelligence silently.

Upon reaching this tree he repeated his directions to his men, and ordered them to disperse themselves at once

They did so.

When the police officers had left the spot upon which this consultation had taken place, Tom King turned round to his two comrades, and said:

"I think we cannot do better than get a little farther off; what we have heard, as of course you were aware, has had the effect of disturbing our plans in a very material degree."

With these words the three highwaymen withdrew, and placed a greater distance between themselves and their foes.

Having reached a convenient spot they halted.

"We are in luck's way for certain," said Claude, "we could not have counted upon such a piece of good fortune as being able to overhear the plans laid by our enemies."

"We could not, indeed."

"We know now exactly what they are going to do, and in their amazing cleverness, it appears to me, they are going to play into our hands."

"We could not have desired anything better."

"That is true. Jack will mind the horses as before, while we crouch down behind some bush, and whenever a police officer approaches us we will capture him."

"But it must be done silently."

"Leave me alone for that," said Claude, "I will undertake that part of the business."

"All right. Now that we are agreed, we had better lose no more time. Jack, you will remain here with the horses, Claude and I will take care that the officers don't discover you."

"It vexes me to think," said Sixteen-String Jack, that I am obliged to be idle while all this is going forward."

"You would have preferred helping us, no doubt, but it is the fortune of war."

With these words, Tom King and Claude, having alighted, crouched down behind a huge bush, which was very close indeed to where Jack was.

Here they remained in perfect silence listening intently for some sound that would inform them that one of their foes was approaching that spot.

For a long time all was still, and then, to their great satisfaction, they heard some one approaching.

It was too dark for them to see who this was, but they felt sure, from the stealthy manner in which he advanced, that it must be one of the officers.

At every few steps he would pause, and strike the bushes with something he held in his hand.

Our friends grew anxious and impatient while waiting for him, for this officer did not come direct to the bush behind which they were concealed, but flitted about in a devious, uncertain way.

At last he reached that bush, and struck it with his stick.

"Nobody here," the highwaymen heard him mutter. "Of course there is nobody here; we may keep on at this rate till dooms-day. What a nuisance that Richard Nares is to be sure; of course, the chaps we want are far enough off by now, and ——"

The officer suddenly ceased speaking.

He had walked round the very huge bush, and as soon as he got to the other side of it Claude Duval and Tom King rose quickly to their feet.

Claude Duval seized him by the back of the neck, and placed his hand before his mouth so quickly that the officer had no time to utter a cry of alarm.

At the very same instant Tom King just touched the officer's neck with the point of his sword, and as he did so he said, in a suppressed whisper:

"If you attempt to utter a sound—if you attempt to struggle, or make the least resistance, you are a dead man! Do you feel that? It is the point of my sword; it is entering your skin already; one thrust, and you would be a dead man!"

CHAPTER DXXXV.

THE HIGHWAYMEN MAKE FOUR PRISONERS, AND THE CHIEF POLICE OFFICER DISCOVERS HIS LOSS.

THE police officer was evidently a man who thought discretion the better part of valour, and he preferred to let events take whatever course they liked, so long as he remained uninjured.

Perceiving that they had made this capture, Sixteen-String Jack left the horses for a moment and came towards them.

In his hand he carried a short piece of strong rope, such as the highwaymen never travelled without, and a piece of wood which he had been occupied for several minutes in fashioning.

With the piece of rope he quickly tied the officer's arms behind him, then Claude removed his hand, and Jack gagged him with the piece of wood.

He submitted without a murmur, and suffered himself to be led very quietly to the spot where the horses were secured.

The next thing the highwaymen did was to search his pockets.

As soon as he found what they were about the officer appeared to object very strongly to this proceeding.

He was not in a position to do much, however, and our friends paid no attention to him.

In addition to the fourteenth share of the miser's gold, they found a small store of ammunition and a couple of those stumpy pistols which the officers invariably carried.

Having done this, their first prisoner was laid down at full length upon the ground, and Sixteen-String Jack, with his drawn sword in his hand, was left to keep guard over him while Tom King and Claude returned to the bush and awaited the approach of another.

This time their patience was destined to be put to a more severe trial than before.

But they were delighted with the success they had already met with, which was so much greater than they had expected.

"If we can only nab them all one by one as easily as we have nabbed the first," said Claude Duval, "we shall do bravely."

Presently after this, they heard another officer searching about.

After some delay he approached the large bush, which would seem to anyone peculiarly fitted for a hiding-place.

Our friends got themselves in readiness.

When the officer was near enough, they started up and seized him in the same way as they had seized the other, but they were not so fortunate this time, for, before Claude could dash his hand before his mouth, the man uttered a cry.

It was not a loud one, and it ceased with great suddenness.

At first he seemed inclined to make a desperate resistance, but when he felt the sharp point of Tom's sword penetrating his skin, he thought better of it, and became quiet.

The police officer did not doubt that the highwaymen would carry their threats into execution without the slightest amount of hesitation, and being under this impression, and valuing his own life more than anything else on earth, he suffered himself to be gagged and pinioned even more quietly than his predecessor.

His pockets were emptied, and their contents transferred to those of the highwaymen.

Then he was laid down by the side of his comrade.

"Listen to me!" said Sixteen-String Jack, as he waved his sword very close to their faces—"listen to me! If you lie quite still no further harm will be done to you—your lives will be spared; but, as sure as this is a sword that I hold in my hand, I will run the first one through who moves hand or foot!"

Had the officers been two corpses they could not have laid on the ground more immovably than they did.

Being now quite carried away by their success, Tom King and Claude once again took up their positions behind the bush, and waited for the appearance of another of their foes.

The cry which their last prisoner had uttered did not appear to have reached the ears of his companions, or if it had they evidently attached no importance to the sound.

"I am afraid," said Claude, "that we shall have to wait some time for the next; this portion of the forest having already been visited by two officers will be considered to have been properly searched."

"That depends," replied Tom King, "upon the amount of method with which the search is conducted; for my own part, I am inclined to think that the officers will wander about searching at random, and if so, we can't do better than remain where we are, and pick them up one by one as they arrive."

"Hush!" said Claude, "I fancy I can hear some one."

Tom was silent, and he found his companion was quite correct.

Another officer was approaching.

He was already very close at hand, and almost directly afterwards he paused against the bush.

"I cannot help thinking," he muttered, "that I heard some sort of a cry, but it came and went so quickly that I was not quite sure. Curse this work! I wonder what good will be got by poking about among the trees in this way? I have a good mind to give them all the slip, and make off with the money I have already got; I will, too 'A bird in the hand is worth two in the bush,'—that is the way! I'll go straight out of the forest!"

The officer was unconscious that he was uttering his thoughts aloud, and our friends did not hear quite distinctly all he said.

The last part of the sentence, however, they heard plainly enough, and feared that they were about to lose this one.

Fortunately, however, before they made a movement, they discovered that this third police officer was coming straight towards the bush, as though he intended to pass by it on his way out of the forest.

Claude and Tom was ready to receive him.

As soon as he came near enough, they pounced out upon him and made him a prisoner so quickly that he had not time to understand what had happened.

Matters were soon made clear to him, however.

There is a very little doubt, from what he had previously said, that he wished most heartily he had decided to have given his companions the slip, and leaving the forest a little sooner than he had.

There was no help for him, however, and he gave in quietly like the rest, for these officers, it must be remembered, were not from London, but from Southampton, and all the country officers had very exaggerated notions about what the highwaymen would do.

He was laid down by the side of his companions.

In spite of its peril, this adventure began to assume a very laughable aspect.

The natural order of things was completely reversed, and, curiously enough, for the time being Sixteen-String Jack was converted into a kind of jailer.

Upon reaching the bush, Tom King said:

"This is a very daring and dangerous trick, Claude."

"I believe you."

"We have succeeded so far in really a wonderful manner, but that ought not to blind us to our own peril."

"What do you mean? Surely, after getting on so well, and having so much encouragement, you would not wish to give up?"

"I almost think it would be prudent to do so."

"No—no! We will have one more, at all events. For my own part, if possible, I should like to keep on until we had captured them all."

"I daresay you would; but we must abandon that idea. It would not be at all wise to do so."

"I don't quite see that."

"But I do; our object in making these officers prisoners is not just for the mere fun of the thing, but in order that we may obtain possession of the treasure that we came down here on purpose to fetch."

"Just so."

"Well, you must recollect that there is a great deal of it altogether; even a fourteenth portion of the whole is a great deal. We have now three portions, and in a little while we should have more than we could carry away with us, and what would be the good of that?"

"No good at all; but still, we can carry a great deal more than we have got at present."

"Hush! not another word! As I live, there is another coming! Whatever attracts them to this spot?"

This seemed a mystery; but it really did appear that there was something which drew the officers towards this bush.

Another was coming, searching about much in the same way as the others had done.

Claude Duval considered this capital sport, and his fingers quite itched while he waited for this next one to approach.

At last he came, and was captured like the rest.

It really was most amusing to see how the highwaymen succeeded; it looked as though they were in a fair way to capture the whole lot.

When his pockets had been emptied, he was laid down on the ground beside the other three, and Sixteen-String Jack had one more to watch over.

"Successful as we are," said Tom King, "it won't do to keep this up."

"Why not?"

"Because in a little while they must discover the loss of so many of their companions."

Just as Tom King spoke, they were both startled by hearing a loud and prolonged whistle.

It came from some distance off.

Our friends listened to the sound with amazement, not altogether unmingled with uneasiness, for they could not imagine what was the meaning of this signal.

What could have been discovered?

Not themselves, certainly.

"Claude," said Tom King, "I think we cannot do better than to take a lesson of experience from these officers."

"How do you mean?"

"Why, let us be satisfied with what we have got, and be off while we have the opportunity. By waiting for more, we may, like them, lose that which we already have."

"Wait a little longer," said Claude. "Perhaps we shall be able to find out the meaning of that whistle."

Tom consented, and they both remained behind the bush listening.

A remarkable silence followed this whistle, and the highwaymen could not catch a sound.

"There is something going on," said Tom King. "I feel quite sure of that. I wish I could make out what it is."

"If we wait a minute or two," said Claude, "we shall probably make a discovery."

Quite five minutes elapsed.

At the end of that period, the silence was as profound as before.

The whistle was then blown again and again.

"Rely upon it," said Tom King, "in some way or other they have found out that four men are missing."

Tom King was quite right in his supposition.

The chief police officer and Richard Nares remained leaning against the tree for some time—so long, indeed, that their patience was completely exhausted.

Richard Nares grumbled and growled without intermission.

At last he induced the police officer to summon his men around him, and hold a consultation in order that they might try to find out some better plan of proceeding.

After a good deal of hesitation, the chief officer complied with Richard Nares's request.

He did so very reluctantly, for he had great faith in the excellence of his own scheme.

That, then, was the meaning of the first whistle the highwaymen had heard.

Upon hearing the signal, those police officers that were searching about, repaired with all possible speed to the hollow tree.

Nevertheless, several minutes elapsed before they had all assembled, for, at the time the signal was given, some of them were at a considerable distance.

The chief officer counted his men as they came up, and found he was four short.

He waited a little while, expecting them to come; but hearing nothing of their approach he began to grow uneasy.

He blew his whistle again, and then again.

But with no better result.

The silence remained unbroken.

"There are four short," said the police officer. "What can have become of them?"

His followers looked at each other with a vague feeling of alarm; they began to think that in some mysterious way or other, they had managed to escape a terrible fate.

They felt quite certain that their four comrades would not absent themselves of their own accord, and they came to the conclusion that they must have been cut off by the highwaymen.

They said as much to their chief, but he refused to support the idea.

"You are all a parcel of cowards and idiots!" said Richard Nares. "I have been unfortunate in bringing such a cowardly crew along with me. Why, you have had them in your hands two or three times, and then let them slip as though your fingers were buttered. Bah! I have no patience with you!"

CHAPTER DXXXVI.

THE THREE HIGHWAYMEN FIND THEIR PLAN SUCCEED TO ADMIRATION.

Richard Nares worked himself up to a pitch of furious excitement.

His whole frame shook with passion, and foam gathered about his lips.

Neither the chief police officer nor his men much liked being addressed in such a style by Richard Nares, but they felt they were not in a position to help themselves.

They had one and all had quite enough of the chase, and would very willingly have abandoned it.

"You are not very civil, Mr. Nares," said the chief officer. "We have done our best, and we are not altogether to blame if we have not succeeded."

"Yes you are; if you would try with a will, you would have been successful. I tell you I am sick of it!"

"But what else can be done?"

"That is your business."

"I can think of no other plan; and the last has failed more completely than the first, since we have done no good, and I have lost four men."

"Bah!"

"I tell you I have! I had eleven men; now count, and you will find only seven remain."

"And what's the reason?"

"That I can't tell. I feel very uneasy about it."

"Stuff. I can explain their absence at once."

"How?"

"Why, they have left the forest with what money they have got, and left you and the rest to carry on the pursuit."

The police officer was silent, for, in spite of his original suspicions, he felt it not unlikely that Richard Nares had given a true explanation.

"You know nothing about your business," said Richard Nares. "I dare say you would be able to take prisoner some poor, half starved wretch who had caught a rabbit, or who had pulled up a few turnips to satisfy his hunger. I say, I dare say you would be able to manage such a difficult thing as that, and it is about the extent of your capabilities."

"Find them yourself, then!" said the police officer, his passion getting the better of his reason; "for I'll be——"

"Gently, now; you are in my power, recollect, and must do as I tell you; if you don't you will suffer for it! However, I will look for them myself, but you must remain at hand to assist me in case I should make a discovery."

The police officers were pleased rather than otherwise with this speech.

They were very tired, for they had been walking for many hours without intermission, so that the prospect of remaining in one spot while Richard Nares went prowling about after the highwaymen was quite a pleasant one.

"Give me one of your whistles," said Richard Nares, to the chief officer.

"Here you are."

"That will do. I am going off myself, and as soon as I make a discovery I will blow this whistle."

"And we will run to your assistance without the loss of a moment's time."

"Very good."

"I will accompany you if you like."

"No, I will go by myself; great caution is needed. I feel certain that I shall be able to find them."

With these words, Richard Nares, holding the whistle in his hand, took his departure.

As soon as he had disappeared among the trees, the officers flung themselves upon the ground to rest, for they were very weary.

We will return now to the three highwaymen.

As we have said, they were very much puzzled when they heard the whistle sounded, and could not imagine what it meant.

They had overheard the instructions given to the officers, and wondered what discovery had been made to cause them to give the signal.

Then the whistle sounded twice more, and Tom King said:

"I cannot imagine what is the meaning of this."

"Nor I," said Claude; "without they have found a mare's nest of some kind or other."

"Perhaps that is it."

"Let us wait in patience a few minutes longer, and see whether another officer will appear on this spot."

"I would rather go at once."

"The night is young yet," urged Claude, "and it is very probable that by waiting a little longer we shall be able to get another share of the treasure with no more trouble than we have already had."

"Well, well, I'll stay."

After the whistles there was a long period of silence, during which the little discussion we have just recorded was going on between Richard Nares and the officers.

They began, indeed to lose all patience, and once or twice Tom King renewed his entreaties to Claude to leave the forest at once.

"Let us keep silent," said Claude; "the officers may have discovered their loss, and taken some fresh means to effect our capture. We may be overheard talking, and it would be a thousand pities if our voices betrayed our hiding-place."

After this Tom did not speak again.

At last the two watchers were rewarded for their trouble by hearing a very slight rustling among the underwood.

It was, however, with great vexation that they noticed at the same moment that the clouds which had hitherto covered up the whole of the sky now parted a little, and through a long, irregular opening in one of them the moon peeped forth.

In comparison with the previous darkness that had filled that spot, her light seemed absolutely brilliant.

The three highwaymen were able to see all around them—every tree, and bush, and leaf was revealed to them.

When Claude perceived this, he regretted that he had not taken his comrade's advice.

Now, however, it was too late to regret, and the only course they could pursue was to remain crouching down behind the bush in their old attitude, and trust to the shadow of it to conceal them from the view of anyone who might approach.

The rustling sound ceased for a moment, and then recommenced.

The highwaymen turned their heads in the direction from which the sound came, and tried to look through the bush.

They were able to see a little—but only a very little—of the trees.

Presently they saw a figure emerge from the shadow into the small open space before them.

The moon still continued to pour her rays down upon this spot.

At first our friends paid no attention to the appearance of this figure, for they made sure that it was a police officer.

Suddenly, Claude started, gazed more earnestly before him, and then clutched his companion by the arm.

The figure advanced across the open space, peering about in every direction, and pausing at every few paces to listen.

Claude put his mouth close to Tom King's ear, and whispered:

"Do you see him?"

Tom nodded.

"It is Richard Nares!"

Until this moment Tom had not recognised the approaching figure, but now as he looked he saw that his comrade was right.

It was no other than Richard Nares who was crossing that open space.

In one hand the rascal carried the whistle, and he looked about him with the greatest stealthiness.

He came to within about a dozen paces of the bush behind which our friends were concealed, and then he paused.

Something on his left hand appeared to attract his attention, and, with noiseless steps, he crossed over in that direction.

Claude was in an agony of apprehension lest he should escape.

When Tom King saw him retreating, he took the opportunity of whispering to Claude, for Richard Nares was too far off to hear such a slight sound.

"What are you going to do, Claude?" he said.

"Do? I was in good hopes I should be able to do something, but now the rascal has gone off over there."

"He may return?"

"I only hope he may, for if I can once get hold of him, I won't let him go until I have paid him all I owe him."

"Where is he now?"

"Confound him! he seems to have vanished entirely. No, there he is! He is creeping stealthily this way!"

"Claude!"

"What?"

"Do you intend to capture him?"

"Yes, like the rest."

"But you must be careful! No doubt the officers are very close at hand, and it would be unfortunate if just as we seized him he managed in some way or other to summon them to his assistance."

"That would be awkward, and I will take care he don't do it."

Claude became silent, for Richard was much nearer.

His approach was very stealthy, and, had our friends not been on the look-out as they were, in all probability the slight sound he made in his progress would have entirely escaped their attention.

Nearer and nearer to the bush he came.

The highwaymen almost held their breath in anxious expectation.

Suddenly Claude started to his feet.

In less than a second he seized Richard by the back of his neck with one hand, and thrust the other before his mouth.

He was only just in time to prevent Richard giving the signal, for as soon as he found himself seized he raised the whistle to his lips.

But Claude was just in time to intercept it.

Richard struggled most furiously, and strove hard to disengage himself from Claude's grasp, and to remove his mouth from his hand.

This, however, was beyond his power.

Tom King made quite a sharp incision in his throat with the point of his sword before he spoke.

Then he cried:

"Richard Nares, I warn you! If you don't cease your struggles you are a dead man!"

Richard felt the steel already entering his flesh, which made him think that Tom was fully in earnest, and with an inward groan he became still.

As before, Sixteen-String Jack approached with a rope.

With this he pinioned Richard's arms behind him, and after that a gag was thrust into his mouth.

Not alone was Claude Duval anxious to retaliate in some way upon the rascal who had given them so much trouble.

Both Tom King and Sixteen-String Jack were anxious that he should be punished in some way.

They consulted together in rapid whispers, and then Claude proposed something which met with the entire concurrence of his two comrades.

Richard Nares strained his sense of hearing to the utmost, in the hope of catching what was said, but with all his efforts he could make out nothing save a low murmuring sound.

The consultation was quickly over, and Sixteen-String Jack produced another piece of rope.

It was a good length, rather fine, but very strong, and capable of supporting a good weight.

Claude Duval still retained his grasp upon the back of Richard Nares's neck, and Tom King still stood with his sword just penetrating the skin.

Richard Nares looked upon the production of this piece of rope with great dissatisfaction.

He wondered what would be done with it.

His guilty fears suggested to him that the highwaymen were about to hang him.

Certainly, if any human being deserved such a fate, Richard Nares did, and what was more, he knew it.

This made him fearful.

He knew, after all that he had done that the highwaymen could not fail to be much exasperated with him, and they were not likely to put up with an injury calmly

CHAPTER DXXXVII.

CLAUDE DUVAL SETTLES OLD SCORES WITH RICHARD NARES.

THERE was not the slightest hurry visible in Sixteen-String Jack's movements.

He stood exactly before Richard Nares, and first of all passed the rope completely through his hands from one end to the other, coiling it up as he did so.

During this operation Richard Nares became more and more apprehensive.

But when he saw Sixteen-String Jack deliberately tie a running noose in one end of the rope his apprehensions increased to positive agony.

He glared wildly about him.

He was so terrified that he shook from head to foot like an aspen leaf in a storm, and the probability is he would have fallen to the earth had not Claude Duval held him up by the firm grasp he had got on the back of his neck.

A cold perspiration started out from every pore in his body.

He had no doubt now about the fate that was in store for him.

Helpless as he was, the highwaymen were about to tie him up to a branch of one of the trees.

He gazed upon the rope with a horrible kind of fascination as Sixteen-String Jack swayed it negligently backwards and forwards.

At last the noose was tied to Jack's entire satisfaction, and then, holding it in his hand and fixing his eyes upon Richard Nares, he stepped closer to him.

Had it been possible, the trembling wretch would have shrunk back.

But he could not move—he could not shout—he could not do anything to summon assistance.

A most horrible death was staring him in the face.

The thought that the police officers were so close at hand, and that if he could only give the agreed-upon signal he should be saved, inflicted an additional pang upon the villain's heart.

Had any doubt of the highwaymen's intention lingered about his heart, it would most certainly have been dispelled at the moment when, having got close enough to him, Sixteen-String Jack cast the noose over his head.

He was to be hanged.

Sixteen-String Jack kept hold of one end of the rope, and as soon as he had put the noose about Richard's neck, he said:

"Now I am ready."

"Forward, then!" said Claude Duval. And as he spoke he endeavoured to make Richard Nares follow.

But the wretch was so terrified, and his legs trembled so excessively, that he could not or would not move a step.

Perceiving this, Tom King removed the point of the sword from his throat, and, grasping him by one shoulder, he held the sword behind him and pricked his back with it.

It was only natural that Richard Nares should start forward to escape the wound which would have been inflicted.

After going a few steps, however, he paused again, and once more Tom had to urge him forward with the sword.

Sixteen-String Jack led the way towards the horses.

They were close at hand, and so they quickly reached them.

So firmly convinced was Richard that he was about to be hanged offhand, that he did not notice that Sixteen-String Jack, instead of casting the end of the rope over a branch of a tree, secured it in some manner to the saddle on Claude's horse.

Sixteen-String Jack was careful to make it quite safe.

And having done so, he said:

"I am ready!"

Claude turned towards Richard.

"We are going to punish you," he said, "for all your villainies, past and present, but not in the manner you probably suppose. Don't imagine, though, that we are going to let you off very easily."

Claude said this, because Richard, as soon as he had caught the first words that were said to him, appeared to revive.

The fear of immediate death passed away, although the halter still remained about his neck.

"Don't think you will get off very easily," continued Claude. "We mean to have a settlement in full—we intend to go to a more convenient place; there is a probability that if we remain here that we should be overheard by your friends the police officers, who are, doubtless, somewhere close at hand. Now then, just bear this in mind, you are our prisoner, and we mean to keep you so! We are going to take you some distance, and in a manner that will give us the least trouble! The least strain will draw that noose tight about your neck and strangle you! One end, you perceive, is fastened to the side of my horse; your arms are pinioned tightly behind you—I am not afraid that you will release them; your mouth is gagged—I am not afraid that you will shout, and so give an alarm. I am going to mount; I shall not go very fast, and you will have two alternatives—you can either keep pace with my horse, or you can stand resolutely where you are; in the one case the rope will be no tighter about your neck than it is now, and you will be unhurt; in the other case it will be drawn tight at once, and you will soon be out of your misery."

In spite of his manifest terror, there was an evil look upon the countenance of Richard Nares as Claude spoke, which showed what angry feelings were struggling at his heart.

He clearly understood, however, all that Claude said to him.

He did not like the idea of being moved from where he was, and yet how could he help himself?

Without he ran along after Claude's horse, and kept pace with it, the rope would be drawn tight about his neck, and he would be dragged to the ground, for as his hands were tied behind his back he could not assist himself in any way.

The three highwaymen now mounted their horses.

As before, Tom King led the way.

He went first, Claude followed next with Richard Nares at the end of the rope.

Sixteen-String Jack brought up the rear, so that should any unforeseen accident happen, Richard Nares would not be able to escape.

In this manner they threaded their way rapidly through the forest, and were soon at a considerable distance from where the officers were waiting.

Finding that he had no other resource, Richard Nares ran as fast as he could after Claude's horse; but in spite of all his care, there would come a slight jerk now and then that would have the effect of tightening the rope to a very painful degree.

Nor was Claude very particular about where he went, and more than once Richard Nares was compelled to scramble through a mass of prickly vegetation.

Of course, this materially added to his discomfort, and when at length Claude paused, the poor wretch was scratched in a dreadful manner.

No one could regret, however, that Richard Nares should suffer this pain—he fully deserved far more than he got.

When Claude stopped his horse, he stood panting, exhausted, and almost choked.

Claude made a rapid sign to his two companions, and alighted from his steed.

Going towards Richard Nares, he loosened the rope a little, which enabled him to breathe more freely.

He was surprised indeed to find the rope so tight, and all round Richard's neck there was a black mark, which he would carry for many a day.

"Recover yourself in the best way you can," said Claude. "You will need all your strength, I can assure you. I have not done with you yet!"

Richard looked at him in great alarm, and wondered what was in store for him.

Having spoken these words, Claude Duval began to search about upon the ground.

Not one of his movements escaped the notice of Richard.

At length Claude stooped and picked up a straight piece of stick, which was a portion of the branch of a tree which lay upon the ground.

Taking a large knife from his pocket, he set to work with great deliberation to cut and trim this stick, Richard Nares eyeing him all the while with the greatest uneasiness.

Perceiving what a state of fright he was in, Claude worked with more deliberation than ever, for he felt that even in this indirect manner he was inflicting punishment upon his captive.

[DICK TURPIN APOLOGISES FOR HIS INTRUSION.]

When he considered he had tormented him long enough, Claude came towards him with the stick under his arm.

The first thing he did was to remove the gag from Richard's mouth.

No sooner had the highwayman done this than Richard sank down upon his knees, and in the most abject manner conceivable roared for mercy.

"All right!" said Claude; "we will talk about mercy when I have settled off the little account I have against you."

"Get up!"

Richard refused to move, and continued to pour out his frantic appeals for mercy.

"Get up!" said Claude, again.

Finding that no notice was taken of what he said, Claude took hold of the rope and gave it a jerk.

The noose tightened itself round Richard's neck, and stopped his vociferations in a very abrupt and summary way indeed.

"Will you get up now?"

Richard rose slowly to his feet.

As soon as he had done so, Claude loosened the rope again. With the knife he severed the cord by which Richard's arms were confined behind him, and then he flung the noose off his neck.

Richard made a frantic dash to escape.

But he was too late.

Claude twisted his hand into his neckcloth, and held him secure.

"Now, Richard," he said, "your time is come, and woe be to you!"

The abject wretch again howled for mercy.

"You can keep that up as long as you like now!" said Claude. "I thought you would make a great fuss, and that is the reason I brought you here; I am not afraid that the police officers will overhear you now!"

Although he was so terrified, yet he was literally burning with rage, and when the police officers were mentioned he ground his teeth savagely together.

"We made a mistake," said Claude, "and let you off a great deal too easily the last time, and this is the way you recompense us for it. You ought to have been dealt with more severely at first, and then we should have been saved a great deal of trouble; but it will be all the worse for you now! Then defend yourself as well as you are able, or, if you can't defend yourself, submit quietly to be thrashed!"

Raising the stick, Claude laid it about the back and shoulders of Richard Nares with right good will.

Disregarding all his howls of pain and rage, and all his appeals for mercy, Claude continued his discipline until his arm positively ached.

It soon became unnecessary to retain his hold upon Richard's neckcloth.

He spun round and round, he fell to the ground, he rolled over and over, and tried in every possible way he could think of to escape the blows with the stick.

But it was all in vain, Claude was inexorable, nor would he desist until he found himself quite unable to wield the stick.

By the time this was the case, Richard Nares was one mass of bruises from head to foot.

The punishment was a very severe one, and yet it was thoroughly deserved.

"Now," said Claude, by way of valediction "I hope this will be a lesson to you for the future! You see what you have brought yourself to; and for the future you ought to study to escape such treatment!"

Richard Nares writhed about on the ground and groaned—he felt himself utterly unable to rise.

"We are going now," said Claude, "and you must get out of the forest in the best way you can—that is no business of ours. I am afraid you have dropped your whistle; if you hadn't, you might have amused yourself with blowing it until the police officers came."

Richard Nares made no reply to this taunt.

"Beware," added Claude, "how you interfere with us again; if you do, you will find the result will be the same. Now I am going. Good-bye, and I fervently hope that I shall never catch sight of your ugly visage again!"

Uttering these words, Claude Duval turned away and mounted his horse again.

"I think we have given him what he deserves," he said to his two comrades.

"Not any more!" said Tom King. "But let us depart; we have lingered here longer than is prudent already."

"Stop a minute!" said Claude. "I have just recollected something which I had forgotten."

He flung himself quickly off his horse as he spoke, without telling his companions what it was that he alighted for.

He hastened to Richard Nares, who lay quite flat upon the ground, every now and then uttering a dismal groan.

"You have a share of the miser's gold with you," said Claude, as he bent over him, "and I don't intend you to keep it. I mean to have that myself!"

He felt on the outside of his coat as he spoke, and found that the money had been deposited in one of the side pockets.

In order to save time, Claude took out his knife and cut the pocket away entirely, carrying it off and all its contents.

Richard Nares was not able to make any resistance.

"Now I will be off," said Claude, as he once more mounted. "I think, after all, we have managed pretty well—at any rate, I fancy we have got money enough between us to carry out our plans for the future."

"I am glad you didn't leave Richard Nares any of it," said Sixteen-String Jack.

"I was very near doing so, for I had forgotten all about it until the last moment. However, we will say farewell to the New Forest."

"Yes," said Tom King. "What with one thing and another, we have been detained much longer than I anticipated. It is quite time we thought of getting back to the deserted mansion, for how can we tell what may have happened during our long absence?"

Claude and Jack murmured a reply, but they little thought what had occurred since their departure.

After casting one last look upon the form of Richard Nares, as he lay stretched at full length upon the grass, they took their way steadily out of the forest.

As soon as they had gone, Richard Nares, with many hideous groans, slowly raised himself to a sitting posture.

He was bruised all over, and it was evident that every movement he made, however trifling, caused him excruciating pain; nevertheless, he looked in the direction which the highwaymen had taken, and shook his clenched fist.

A look of deep hatred came over his face as he did so.

"I will have my revenge," he said, gaspingly, and uttering a groan at almost every word—"I will have my revenge upon you all three! I will not rest until I have it—I will live for nothing else, I will devote the whole of my energies to this one task, and I shall succeed—I know I shall succeed—I can feel it! But as for you, Claude Duval, your fate shall be a thousand times worse than either of your companions!"

A sudden accession of pain compelled him to cease, and he sank back upon the grass, and then he occupied himself by muttering his threats of revenge over again, varying them with occasional bursts of frightful imprecations.

CHAPTER DXXXVIII.

RELATES WHAT BEFEL DICK TURPIN AND MAUD IN THE CROSS ROAD.

HAVING related the result of the journey of the three highwaymen to the forest, and having shown what amount of success they met with, we will leave them on their way back to the deserted mansion, where they fully expected they should find Dick Turpin and Maud waiting their arrival.

Of course, as we know, they would be disappointed.

Dick Turpin had been hunted from that place of refuge by the indefatigable Mr. Wriggles and his men.

It is to that picturesque and charming country road where we last saw Turpin and Maud that we now wish to direct the attention of the reader.

It was a lonely road, and one that was rarely travelled except during the busiest part of the day.

At that very early hour, with the sun only a little way above the horizon, it was scarcely likely that anyone would be upon it.

From the windows of the mansion, however, which we have spoken of as being visible in the distance, a view could be obtained of that strange and interesting group.

Dick Turpin's swoon had been caused by sheer fatigue.

Only a short time before, he had been very, very close to death, and though his recovery had been rapid, yet he was not in a condition to bear an immense amount of fatigue and excitement, such as he had suffered the whole of that eventful night.

Dick was insensible when he fell from the saddle.

Maud, however, was in full possession of her senses until she reached the ground, when she became unconscious in consequence of her head striking against the hard roadway.

And so, neither of them showing the least signs of life, they lay side by side upon the ground, with Black Bess bending over them.

How long her state of unconsciousness continued Maud knew not.

Suddenly she recovered full possession of her faculties. For a time she lay perfectly still as she had fallen, being quite unable to comprehend where she was, and to recollect what had happened last.

Presently, with the suddenness of an electric shock, the remembrance of all that had occurred flashed through her mind.

She understood the full peril of their situation, and, with a cry of alarm upon her lips, she endeavoured to rise up.

Turpin had fallen upon her arm, and she had some trouble in disengaging it.

She wept and sobbed bitterly when she saw how motionless he lay, and the terrible conviction came over her that he was dead.

Her grief then was terrible to witness.

Some of the shots which had been fired, she thought, must have struck him; he had borne up against the effects of the wound as long as he could, until at length he had fallen a corpse from her side on to the roadway.

This was a terrible thought, and, as she gazed upon him and found that he still continued motionless, she felt more and more convinced that she was right.

At last she murmured through her tears

"The evil day which I have so long foreseen has come—he is dead and I am alone!"

She seemed at that moment as though she could freely, willingly have laid down by his side again and died too.

Fortunately, however, the thought occurred to her that it would be well to ascertain where the wound was, and what was its nature.

She passed her hand rapidly over his apparel, without being able to detect any signs of blood.

Hope once more entered her heart, and she rose to her knees while she continued her examination.

In less than a moment she satisfied herself that he had not received any fresh wound.

When she made this unexpected discovery, she was almost overpowered with joy.

She could scarcely believe in the reality of so much happiness, and she rapidly examined him again.

The result was the same.

There was no fresh wound.

"He has fainted," she said—"fainted from weakness; he was not strong enough—he was not sufficiently recovered to go through such a night of trouble, danger, and adventure as this has been!"

She placed her hand upon his heart, and found that it was beating slightly.

"I shall be able to recover him to life again!"

With these words on her lips she rose to her feet.

For the first time, then, she noticed that Black Bess was standing near to them, and that Dick Turpin's foot was entangled in the stirrups.

Her first act was to release it, and then she looked about her for water.

She searched hastily around, but was unable to find any.

While thus engaged, she happened to look back along the road they had just come.

It was a long, straight road, and had an upward tendency.

The morning was clear, and she could see a great distance.

She caught sight of something which caused her to utter a scream of terror, and, for a moment or two, she felt that her senses were leaving her.

By a powerful effort of the mind, she succeeded in shaking off this feeling.

Probably the reader will guess what she beheld that caused her so much alarm.

In the distance, but coming at a rapid speed, was a dark mass.

She could not see it distinctly, but her heart told her that it was Mr. Wriggles and his officers in pursuit.

They had kept upon the track well, and were now only a short distance off.

What was to be done?

After another hurried glance to satisfy herself that she had not been mistaken, she rushed frantically towards the spot where Dick Turpin lay in his death-like state of insensibility.

Excitement lent her momentary strength.

Kneeling down, she passed her arm under his head and raised him to a half-sitting posture.

She pushed his hair back from his forehead, and looked into his countenance.

Her anguish grew more and more poignant when she found that Dick's state of unconsciousness was as complete as before. He was evidently unaware that his position had been changed in the least.

Maud once more glanced hastily back along the road.

Already she fancied she could hear the hoofbeats of the officers' horses.

What could she do?

She shook Dick violently, and tried by a thousand means to restore him to animation.

But all in vain.

"Dick, Dick!" she screamed, putting her mouth close to his ear—"look up—arouse yourself—the officers are close behind you! Quick—oh, be quick, or it will be too late! You will be captured! Do you hear me? Open your eyes and look around! Shake off this lethargy! Dick, Dick!"

The poor girl fancied she could detect a slight movement of the highwayman's limbs, and as she looked into his countenance she saw that his eyelids were fluttering slightly.

With increased apprehension she looked back again.

As she knelt upon the road, she was now able to see her pursuers.

They were very much nearer than they were before, and they were coming on at full gallop.

Whether they could see her as she could see them, Maud could not tell, but she fancied such must be the case, or else why did they urge their horses so furiously as they did.

If they knew that Dick Turpin was lying senseless on the highway, what efforts they would make in order to come up with him!

It would be impossible to have a better chance of capturing him.

To take him prisoner while he lay helpless and unconscious with no one to defend him save Maud, would have been a very easy matter.

The poor girl thought so, and her eyes filled with tears.

Almost maddened by the danger, which increased at every moment, she turned round to Dick Turpin, and made another effort to restore him to life.

But, as before, she failed.

Some more powerful means than she possessed were required to bring back life to that exhausted frame. The repeated application of some powerful stimulant was the only thing that could drive off this swoon.

But nothing of the kind did Maud possess—not so much as a cupful of water to sprinkle upon his face, though if she had, it is doubtful whether it would have produced any effect.

In vain, then, she clung to him, and shook him as violently as her strength would permit.

In vain did she scream affrightedly into his ears, and call upon him by every endearing word that she could think of.

He was insensible to all her efforts.

Tears streamed down her cheeks, and her heart seemed as though it would break.

"At last," she thought—"at last he will fall into the hands of those who are thirsting for his blood! He cannot help himself, and I cannot help him, and I know they will have no pity!"

As she made this reflection, she heard the clatter of the horses' hoofs upon the road.

Her fancy did not deceive her; it was indeed such a sound that reached her ears, telling her with what frightful rapidity the officers were approaching the spot.

With her heart almost standing still, and with the blood in her veins cold and chill, she dashed the tears from her eyes and looked towards her pursuers.

They were frightfully close at hand.

To Maud's excited fancy it seemed as though another moment, or even a dozen bounds of their horses would bring them to where she was.

That was her fancy, however.

The clear morning air made the officers appear to be much closer than they were in reality.

When Maud looked upon this occasion they were considerably more than half a mile distant.

That, however, was a little way.

How soon those horses coming on at such a fierce gallop would perform so short a distance!

Capture was inevitable; for, even if Dick Turpin recovered, what time was there for flight?

All these dreadful reflections thronged rapidly through Maud's mind, and the poor girl felt positively maddened.

She clasped her hands tightly over her temples, in order to check their throbbing, which seemed to set thought at defiance.

"Am I quite useless?" she murmured—"cannot I do anything? Is there no plan that I can adopt by which he may be saved? No—no—I can think of nothing! The officers can see us here! They know that they have but to ride up and take him prisoner at once!"

Just at this moment a wild and desperate thought flashed through Maud's brain

She sprang suddenly to her feet, as though galvanised into life and action.

"I will try to save him!" she said—"I will try to save him! I fear it is impossible for me to succeed, but if I fail he will be no worse off than he is now; it is worth while to make the trial. Oh, how I wish that I was stronger! If I was only strong it would be easy enough!"

By this time the officers had considerably decreased the distance that intervened between them and the object of their pursuit

"Too late—too late!" moaned Maud; "and yet I feel strong—strength seems to have come into my arms! I will try—I will try!"

Hastily seizing Black Bess by the bridle, she led her close to Dick Turpin's side.

Then, stooping down quickly, she raised Dick from his recumbent position.

As she did so she fancied he showed signs of recovery

But she did not pause to ascertain whether she was correct or not—there was no time.

With the exercise of an amount of strength which she could not possibly have put forth under less urgent circumstances, Maude continued her efforts to raise Dick Turpin from the ground.

She succeeded in placing him upon his feet, and with a much greater amount of ease than she had dared to anticipate.

CHAPTER DXXXIX.

MAUD SAVES DICK TURPIN FROM CAPTURE, AND AFTERWARDS RESTORES HIM TO CONSCIOUSNESS.

MAUD seemed already to have accomplished a great deal, but in comparison with what she had yet to do it was insignificant.

Without pausing a second,—for she knew how important time was—she placed the insensible body of Dick Turpin against the saddle.

Her purpose now became clear.

The desperate thought which occurred to her, and which, impossible as it seemed, she determined to attempt to carry out, was to place Dick across the saddle and afterwards mount herself.

It was too much, however to suppose that she would be able to perform such a feat as this, requiring, as it did, three times as much strength as she possessed.

Black Bess stood perfectly still.

From the moment when her master had fallen from her back she had not ceased to gaze upon him.

The gallant creature was possessed of quite sufficient intelligence to be aware that something unusual was the matter.

With her head turned round, she had watched every movement that Maud had made.

It was on this occasion that Dick Turpin's celebrated mare gave a most striking proof of her extraordinary sagacity.

Apparently comprehending her master's helpless condition, and apparently comprehending Maud's intention, Black Bess, as soon as she felt him leaning against the saddle, knelt down upon her fore legs.

For about a second Maud wondered what it was Black Bess intended to do, but then she comprehended, and her heart became filled with joy.

The task, which just before had seemed quite beyond her powers, was now comparatively easy.

Almost as soon, then, as Black Bess sank upon her knees Maud succeeded in placing Dick Turpin across the saddle.

He lay there exhibiting no more signs of life than a sack of grain.

Maud put one foot in the stirrup, and seated herself in the saddle behind him.

She had been very quick in all her movements, and a very little time indeed had been consumed since the hope to place Dick on Black Bess's back had entered her mind.

Quick, however, as she had been, the officers were certainly not more than a hundred yards off.

Scarcely had she seated herself in the manner we have described, and almost before she was able to press her arms round Dick's insensible form and clutch hold of the bridle, than Black Bess started to her feet.

Uttering a loud, snorting sound, she turned round and galloped off at a speed that deprived Maud of breath.

How it was that she retained her seat, and how it was she kept Dick from slipping to the ground, she could never tell; in that moment of intense excitement she was only conscious that, in some extraordinary way or other she was holding him, and that she was clutching the saddle with such violence as to cause herself great pain.

She was aware that they were flying along at a furious speed, but nothing more.

In what direction she knew not.

The reins lay idly upon Black Bess's neck, and she went just wherever she chose.

As Maud had feared, it was indeed no other than Mr. Wriggles and the remnant of his men whom she saw so rapidly approaching.

But she made a mistake in thinking that they saw her so soon.

When, however, Mr. Wriggles actually caught sight of Dick Turpin lying in the roadway, and Black Bess standing riderless, he could scarcely believe the evidence of his own senses.

He was only convinced when all his men declared with one voice they could see it too.

He absolutely screamed with joy and anticipated triumph, while his face had a deeper purple tint than it had ever been seen to have before.

"At last—at last!" he cried—"we have them now! I fancied he could not have escaped being wounded by one of the many bullets that were fired after him! He's hit—he's down! We shall have him without any trouble at all!"

He spurred his horse savagely while he spoke, and ordered his men to do the like.

The poor animals were already much exhausted; but the pain made them continue to bound forward.

Mr. Wriggles uttered several oaths when he saw Maud so busily engaged in raising Dick Turpin from the ground.

Still, he did not doubt that he should be able to effect his purpose, notwithstanding all her efforts.

But, as we have already seen, before he could arrive, Maud had succeeded in getting clear away.

This was an event which Mr. Wriggles had never expected.

He would not have believed it possible that such a feat could be performed.

To his extreme annoyance, however, he found he was once more defeated, and defeated too at a moment when he had counted with the most absolute certainty upon success.

"Come on!" he roared—"keep up the chase—we shall have them before long! That woman must be a fiend, or she could not ride in the way she does! Ah! she'll be off!" he exclaimed suddenly, upon perceiving Maud almost lose her balance. "Come on—we shall have them soon! She can't go far like that—she must fall to the ground!"

The police officers spurred and flogged their poor horses in the most unmerciful manner; but, in spite of all they could do, it was clear enough to them all that Black Bess was distancing them with very great rapidity.

The gallant creature taxed herself to the utmost, and never before had she made such wonderful speed.

Hedges and trees flew past with a speed that was absolutely bewildering, and in after times Maud thought that if the speed had been less rapid than it was she could not have retained her seat.

As it was, she had great difficulty in preserving her balance, and once almost fell to the ground.

Black Bess continued her terrific gallop, and soon the police officers were left far behind.

Strive as they would, they could not make their horses go at such a speed as that, and after a time the exhausted creatures became quite insensible or indifferent to the application of either whip or spur.

Thoroughly dead beat, they were at last compelled to give up.

"On—on!" cried Mr. Wriggles. "We will keep on at the little speed we can make! In a little time we shall come to an inn, where we shall be able to obtain fresh horses! We shall succeed yet—I feel convinced of it!"

In the meanwhile Black Bess continued her rapid flight.

She left the open road to take her course in a direct line across the country.

How long she would have continued to fly, or to what place she would have gone, is hard to say.

At length Maud, growing calmer, perceived that Dick Turpin showed signs of returning animation.

She turned her head round, and looked searchingly across the open country behind her, but she could see no signs of the police officers whatever.

From the rapidity with which Black Bess had travelled, and the length of time for which she had maintained the same rate of speed, made Maud easily believe that she must outrun the police officers completely

At this moment Black Bess leaped over a low hedge, and alighted in a narrow country lane.

On the opposite side were some palings, eight feet nigh at the very least, and so Black Bess changed her course, and continued along the lane.

Now that the officers were no longer in sight, Maud thought that the best thing she could do was to pause, and to use what means she could to bring Dick Turpin back to life.

She saw the reins upon Black Bess's neck, and, after one or two unsuccessful attempts, succeeded in taking hold of them.

Slowly tightening them, she gradually reduced Black Bess's speed, until at last she stopped.

It was early morning yet, and all around was still and calm.

A better place for coming to a stop Maud fancied could not be found.

It was very difficult to lower Dick Turpin to the ground, but she did so as gently as she could, and then alighted herself.

Black Bess appeared to be suffering severely from the tremendous exertions she had made.

For a long time past her food had been none of the best, and now she showed the effects of it.

She was covered with foam, while she was actually dripping with perspiration, for it gathered in large tear-like drops, and fell into the roadway.

Maud gave but one glance at her, and then turned her attention to Dick Turpin.

He seemed now every moment as though he would revive, and a little thing would doubtless suffice to restore him.

By the side of the lane there ran a little brook, and with some trouble Maud dragged Dick towards it.

When his head was near the mimic stream, she stooped down quickly and sprinkled plenty of water over his countenance.

A quick shudder shot over his whole frame when the cold drops were dashed upon him, and then he slowly opened his eyes and looked intently about him.

It could be seen at a glance that he neither knew where he then was, nor recollected what had happened.

Presently, however, his eyes rested upon Maud's face, as she bent anxiously over him.

He recognised her, for he smiled faintly.

Turning his head a little, he saw Black Bess standing within a yard of him.

This appeared to content him, for he closed his eyes again.

Maud feared at first that he had relapsed into unconsciousness, but such was not the case.

Dick closed his eyes to shut out surrounding objects, in order that he might be better able to recollect what had last happened.

This baffled him entirely.

The last thing he could recollect was being seated on Black Bess with Maud before him, flying at full speed from the officers.

He remembered how faint he felt, and how he was several times in danger of falling; but this was the extreme point to which his recollection reached.

He taxed his brain in vain in the endeavour to remember farther.

He opened his eyes once more, and endeavoured to raise himself up, but he found that his strength was not yet equal to such an effort.

"Lie still a little longer," said Maud, gently placing her hand upon his breast. "Don't attempt to move yet. Wait until you have recovered your strength a little more—you are quite safe now; you have nothing whatever to fear from the officers. They are far behind, and quite out of sight and hearing.

Dick smiled again, and nodded to Maud that he perfectly understood what was said to him.

He was silent a moment, and then he said:

"I suppose, Maud, I must have fallen from my horse? I felt myself grow giddy and weak, and I tried hard to overcome the feeling and preserve my balance, but I suppose I failed and fell to the ground."

"You did."

"I thought as much. And you—did you fall too?"

"Yes."

"And are you unhurt?"

"Quite."

"I am thankful to hear that, and I suppose, since I have fallen, you have been endeavouring to restore me to consciousness?"

Maud nodded.

She thought that she had better not tell him just yet all that had happened.

"How lucky," continued Dick, "that I had already managed to gallop so far and out-distanced the officers! Are you sure they are out of sight?"

"They were a little while ago," replied Maud. "I will go and look."

"Do so."

Maud rose to her feet, and, going to that hedge over which Black Bess had leaped, she climbed up the little bank, upon the top of which it was planted, and gazed long and earnestly over the face of the whole country.

She could see for a great distance, for the ground was very level, and there were not many trees to obstruct the view.

Her heart filled with thankfulness when she found that there was indeed none of their pursuers, and, leaping down into the lane again, she hastened back to where she had left Dick.

She found that during her absence he had managed to sit up, and he was looking about him with a puzzled expression on his countenance.

Upon seeing or hearing Maud approaching, he turned quickly towards her, and asked, anxiously, if all was well.

"Yes," she replied. "I have had a careful look-out, and I feel convinced that the officers are not within several miles of this place."

"That is a satisfaction indeed!" cried Dick Turpin. "Help me to my feet—I feel quite strong enough to stand."

Maud did so, but as soon as he stood upon his feet, Dick found that he had formed an exaggerated idea of the amount of his strength.

He felt as though he should faint again, and he leaned heavily upon Maud's arm.

The death-like sensation quickly passed away, and, still leaning upon her arm, he looked all round him, while the puzzled expression again became visible upon his countenance.

"Where are we?" he asked. "What place is this?"

CHAPTER DXL.

DICK TURPIN FINDS THAT HE IS INDEBTED TO MAUD FOR HIS ESCAPE FROM THE POLICE OFFICERS.

MAUD did not make any reply to this question; indeed, she could not, for she had not the remotest notion of where they were.

Dick Turpin passed his hand several times over his brow, and his countenance showed that he was more puzzled than before, while he muttered:

"I cannot understand this—I cannot understand this!"

"What," asked Maude anxiously—"what is it that bewilders you?"

"Why, to find myself where I now am!"

"And do you know where you are?"

"Yes, within half an hour's ride of Enfield Chase."

"Indeed—are you sure?"

"Well, that is what puzzles me. I feel as sure as I could feel about anything, and yet——"

"Yet what?"

"I am quite certain, that in the short time I was galloping, I did not get so far as this from the deserted mansion."

Maud could have given an easy explanation of all this and at once put an end to Dick Turpin's bewilderment, but somehow or other, she felt strangely reluctant to confess that she had been the means of saving his life.

"I don't see why this should cause you any anxiety," she replied. "You ought indeed to feel glad that you are so much further from your foes than you had hoped or expected to be."

"Well, so I ought, and yet it is not that—there is some mystery in all this, I feel convinced."

"What mystery?"

"I have been trying to think back, and I remember now that just before I fell from my horse, I could see in the distance a handsome-looking mansion; now I look around me, and I cannot see any trace of it."

Maud was silent.

Dick looked into her countenance, and he seemed to gather from its expression the idea that his companion could give an explanation of that which had so puzzled him.

"Come, Maud," he said, "you know something about this; I am certain you can set me at rest upon this point. Pray do so, for anything in the shape of a mystery troubles me."

Being thus urged, Maud resolved to speak. She felt that it would be unwise to remain longer silent; she knew that in a few words she could disperse this mystery, and then Dick would think no more about it, whereas if she did not, in all probability his thoughts would be given to that when they ought to be directed to more important matters.

"When you fell," she said, "you were indeed in sight of an elegant mansion; it was built upon some rising ground. You must remember that your arm was round me, and that I was clinging to you, so that when you fell I fell also, and we both reached the road together."

"Good heavens! I didn't know that! I was unconscious of that until you spoke. Were you hurt?"

"No, no—not at all—scarcely scratched. The suddenness of the fall, however, deprived me of my senses, and when I recovered, I found we were both lying in the road, and Black Bess was standing near."

"And I?"

"You were quite insensible. At first I was greatly terrified, for I feared you were dead; I remembered the volley that the officers fired after us, and I fancied that you might have been seriously wounded by one of the bullets."

"No, Maud, I was not touched by any of them."

"I know! I soon made that discovery—I learned that it was weakness, and nothing more, which had caused you to swoon. Your death-like state alarmed me very much, and I tried every means I could think of to restore you to life, but in vain."

"Were you not alarmed?"

"I was, indeed; and then when I looked up, I saw that the police officers were approaching."

Dick started violently. He had no idea that he had been in such a frightful peril, and he waited with the utmost anxiety for Maud to continue.

"When I saw them I felt almost maddened; I did not know what to do, and I redoubled my efforts to recall you to life, but you remained as insensible as at first."

"And the officers," said Dick—"what of them?—how was it I escaped?"

"I saw them coming on at a rapid speed, and I could tell by their manner, or I fancied I could, that they were able to see you lying down in the road. In my despair I hit upon a desperate thought; it was to raise you up, to place you on the back of Black Bess, to mount behind you, and then gallop away."

"And you must have done this, Maud—you have saved me. I can understand all—indeed it is to you, and to you alone that I am indebted for my freedom! At this moment, had it not been for your courage, dear one, I should have been in the hands of the police officers!"

Dick Turpin was greatly overcome by this proof of Maud's devotion, and it gave him a great shock to think that he was in so much peril while unconscious of all around him.

He drew Maud to his breast and kissed her fondly, while he thanked her for having saved his life.

There was a silence between the two of several minutes duration.

On Dick's part it would have lasted much longer than it did, but Maud was the first to speak.

"Come," she said, "if you are better, and able to proceed, let us seek some better place of shelter; the officers are not at hand, yet they may succeed in tracking us."

"They may—they may; and I must look out for some means of providing for my safety. Let us walk a little way along this lane, and I will lead Black Bess by the bridle—I never saw her look so fatigued and so distressed as she does now!"

Dick patted his mare fondly as he spoke, and led her by the bridle, while his other arm encircled Maud's waist.

"As we walk on," he said, "I will try and decide upon what shall be our future proceedings. At present I don't know what we can do for the best. When you carried me off, what made you gallop towards Enfield Chase?"

"It was Black Bess's doings; she came in this direction of her own accord; I did not even hold the reins."

"I see—I see; her instinct would lead her to this place."

Dick Turpin became silent, and Maud did not offer to interrupt him, for she knew well enough that he was considering over his position, and endeavouring to come to a conclusion as to what was the best thing he could do.

In this manner they strolled on for a considerable distance.

It was not yet late, and the lane was so secluded that they met no one.

The ground had an upward tendency, and as they proceeded the rise became more and more rapid.

Dick tried in vain to think of some place that would afford him shelter.

Enfield Chase was not far off, but then he had a lively recollection of the perils he had encountered during his last stay there, and he felt but little inclination to return to it again. There seemed, however, no other resource than to take refuge among its trees.

Occupied with these reflections, Dick Turpin ascended the hill, and upon gaining its summit he paused for breath, for the ascent had tried his strength severely.

Maud, too, was tired and exhausted, as could be seen by her pale and haggard face.

From the brow of the hill a very beautiful view of the surrounding country could be obtained.

Almost the first thought which entered Dick Turpin's mind upon reaching this eminence was, that it afforded him an excellent opportunity of ascertaining whether or not any of his pursuers were in sight.

It was very important that he should ascertain this.

"Look out, Maud," he said, "your eyes are probably stronger than mine are now, for I can still feel the effects of that wound in my head! Look out—and I will do the like!"

Dick Turpin placed his hand so as to shade his eyes from the extraneous light, and he commenced gazing earnestly and searchingly in every direction.

Nothing, however, in the shape of horsemen met his view, and he was beginning to congratulate himself that he was completely out of the reach of his foes when he was startled by a sudden ejaculation from Maud.

He turned round quickly.

"What is it?" he said—"what can you see?"

"They are here, Dick—they are here, and close at hand, too. By some means or other—I cannot tell how—they have managed to follow in our footsteps!"

An anxious expression came over Dick Turpin's countenance, and he looked round piercingly.

"Where are they, Maud?" he said. "I cannot see anything of them!"

"But I saw them, and they are close—oh, so close at hand!"

"And where are they now?"

Maud looked again.

But this time she was unable to see that which had so much alarmed her.

"It must have been your fancy?" said Dick.

"No, no—it was not! Look—there they are—there they are! I can see them now quite plainly!"

"And so can I," returned Turpin, in a serious tone, for he had really fancied that Maud had been led astray by her fears.

"I see now how it was that they vanished—they were behind that row of tall trees yonder. Now they are all in sight!"

"Yes," replied Dick—"and there are five of them!"

"What shall we do, Dick? Oh! what shall we do?" asked Maud.

And as she spoke she clung in a terrified manner to his arm.

"First of all, we must get away from this spot, or else we shall be seen by the officers below."

"Do you think they have already seen us?"

"No, no—I am not afraid of that; but we will move from here. It's a lucky chance that brought us to this place, and made me think of looking around; if I had not, we should have been taken completely by surprise."

"We should, for I did not believe that they were anywhere near!"

"There is some consolation to be derived from the thought that they cannot now come upon us unexpectedly!"

"But that is a poor consolation! Can you tell us what we must do next?"

Dick Turpin looked troubled—for the life of him he could not think of a plan by which he might cheat the officers.

While pondering over this subject, he descended the other side of the hill.

"There is only one thing that we can do."

"And what is that?"

"We must find some hiding-place—a secure one—and that at once! To fly would be madness!"

"Why so?"

"Black Bess is already exhausted, and is not equal to a double burden. The officers will presently reach the top of the hill; when they do so, their first act will be to scrutinise the landscape; then they will see us, and of course would have no difficulty in getting upon our track! No, no—that must not be thought of!"

"But where can we hide?"

"I wish I knew, Maud! If I could think of some place of concealment, I should not care! I feel almost certain that the officers have not caught sight of us, and consequently they cannot tell just where we are! If we can hide ourselves before they reach the top of the hill, then all will be well; they will look, and, seeing nothing of us, will probably come to the conclusion that they have lost the track."

"But suppose they should not—suppose they should have a suspicion that we are hiding somewhere near?"

"Why, then we must rely upon the excellence of our place of concealment; and that is just what troubles me! It is necessary to find a place where we can hide without fear of being found!"

Maud shook her head.

"I am afraid that is impossible?" she said.

"I hope it is not, for I can assure you that is our last and only chance!"

CHAPTER DXLI.

DICK TURPIN HAS A VERY SINGULAR ADVENTURE.

JUST as Dick Turpin spoke these words the bottom of the hill was reached.

With a sinking heart Maud looked around, but, as far as the eye could reach, no place was visible which would serve their purpose.

In the distance could be seen a huge mass of trees, among which they might manage to find shelter; but in order to reach them they would have to cross the open country, and while doing that the officers could not fail to see them.

The landscape was almost level, and there was not a single object which held out the slightest promise of concealing them from the officers.

Although they could see for many miles, only one habitation was in sight.

This one was close at hand, and was a rather singular-looking mansion, surrounded by its own grounds.

From its general appearance, it was doubtless the residence of some person possessed of great wealth.

Maud just glanced upon this dwelling and turned her eyes away; she knew full well that the inmates of it were not the kind of people who would be likely to find shelter or a highwayman.

She was in despai

